The supply of water is abundant, being derived from four springs of essentially the same character, each of which affords a large volume of water. The water is beautifully bright and crystalline, and the ever-bursting bubbles of gas that escape with the water and float in myriads of vesicles upon its surface impart to it a peculiar, sparkling appearance. Its temperature is uniformly eighty-five and eighty-eight degrees Fahrenheit. Ladies say that this water possesses the virtue of softening and beautifying the skin. It produces the most delightful satin-like feeling, and renders the complexion peculiarly clear and transparent; gives to the cheek a new tint, and makes one fancy the wrinkles are smoothed away.

There is every accommodation for tourists to enjoy hot and cold baths and those of the natural temperature. The Rockbridge Alum Springs began to attract attention about the year 1830. Persons from the adjacent country were in the habit of visiting them and camping out, sleeping for weeks in their wagons and rude huts, that they might avail themselves of the virtue of these waters in the cure of eruptive and cutaneous disease.

The Springs, four in number, are basins hollowed out at the base of the ledge of shales lying at the foot of Mill Mountain, and these waters, which are of different degrees of strength, may be administered fresh from the fountains to the patients in various stages of disease. About 350 yards southeast of the hotel, there is also a chalybeate spring, which issues from a hill on the North Mountain side of the valley.

There are accommodations for five or six hundred guests, on the cottage and hotel plan, which seems so popular in the Virginia mountains; nor are the pleasures of this Summer resort neglected, as the means of ministering to gayety and cheerfulness have been provided on a liberal scale. The mountains abound with game and the streams with trout.

The Jordan Alum Springs are but a short distance from and adjacent to the Rockbridge Alum; they have more lately come into public notice, but have attained no small share of popularity for the remedial virtues of their waters and the attractiveness of their grounds as a place of resort during the Summer months.

The accommodations are all modern, consisting of a "Grand Hotel," containing spacious halls and parlors, the handsomest and largest ballroom in the mountains, well ventilated dining and lodging rooms, lighted with gas; hot and cold baths on every floor, and double cottages near the hotel, which, with the exception of gas, are furnished in every respect like the main building. The means for amusement are such as are usually provided at the Virginia Springs, and in addition, is the delightful drive and visit to the Natural Bridge.

All the above resorts of mountain and spring are reached by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway through a charming and picturesque region. Tourists may go all rail by the Pennsylvania Railroad via Gordonsville, or by the Baltimore and Ohio via Harper's Ferry and Staunton. Or those who like a breath of the sea en route for the mountains may go by the well appointed steamers of the Old Dominion Steamship Company to Richmond, and thence by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad.

Northern visitors who go to these Springs by way of Alexandria will have an opportunity for going over Bull Run and the historic battle-field of Manassas, and through Culpepper, Orange, Gordonsville and Charlottesville. Between the latter places a fine view is had of "Monticello," the home of Thomas Jefferson, while at Charlottesville the University of Virginia, founded by the author of the Declaration of Independence, can be seen. Between this point and Staunton, the beauty and grandeur of the scenery is almost unrivaled. At Staunton the State has her asylums for the deaf, dumb, blind and insane.

If the Summer tourist expects to make the round of the resorts that fashion has made popular, nothing can be more sensible than to take what is true rest for a week in this region, and then, properly fortified, the subsequent recreation will be neither wearisome nor unduly fatiguing.

REGATTA OF THE ATLANTIC YACHT CLUB.

THE Atlantic Yacht Club opened the season on June 9th by sailing their fifteenth annual regatta. The conditions were by no means favorable. In the Bay there was almost no wind, while outside Sandy Hook there was so much that but few yachts ventured out. The yachts were divided into seven classes, Class A being for schooners of 70 feet and over; Class B, for schooners under 70 feet; Class C, for cabin sloops of 55 feet and over; Class D, for cabin sloops of 43 feet and under 55 feet; Class E, for cabin sloops of 38 feet and under 43 feet; Class F, for cabin sloops under 38 feet, and Class G, for open sloops. There were two entries in Class A, the Cruiser and the Cynic; two in Class B, the Agnes and the Triton; four in Class C, the Fawn, Comet, Fenian and Mischief; four in Class D, the Regina, Dolphin, Fanita and Sadie; three in Class E, the Stella, Pirate and Lizzie L.; five in Class F, the Gem, Schemer, Caprice, Flying Cloud and Elephant, and two in Class G, the Corinne and the Pilot. The start was from the club's new anchorage, near Bay Ridge. The course was, for the first four classes, including all the larger boats, down through the Narrows, to and around the stake-boat at Buoy 8½, on Southwest Spit, thence to and around the Sandy Hook Lightship, rounding the same by the eastward and southward, thence home, going south and west of the beacon on Romer Shoal. For Classes E and F the course was the same, to and around the stake-boat, near a buoy in Gedney Channel, rounding the same from the southward; thence home, passing to the westward of the beacon on Romer Shoal. For Class G, the course was the same, to and around the stake boat at Buoy 8½, on Southwest Spit, rounding the buoy from the west and south, thence home. All yachts were required to pass to the westward of Fort Lafayette, both going and returning. The course for Classes A, B, C and D was estimated at 40 miles; for Class E and F at 32 miles, and for Class G at 24 miles. There was one prize for each class, and a Livingston Memorial Prize, to be awarded to the first sloop of Class D in at the home stake-boat, without time allowance. The winners in the several classes and the corrected time of reaching the home stake-boats, were as follows:

	H.	M.	S.
Class A—Cruiser	10	06	10
Class B—Triton	9	49	10
Class C—Fawn	8	28	19
Class D—Regina	8	24	19
Class E—Lizzie L.	6	46	30
Class F—Elephant	6	44	16
Class G—Corinne	7	10	02

The Regina also took the Livingston Memorial Prize.

Afloat on the Mississippi.

ON the 21st day of December, 1877, Captain W. P. Hall, of Davenport, Iowa, left that city in a skiff, bound on an exploring expedition for the Davenport Academy of Science, a volunteer venture on his part, incited by his love of archæological study and scientific research. His craft was a skiff, twenty one feet long and over five feet wide at the oar locks, and it bore a small frame house which was to be his lodging-place when he tied up for the night. And now, after an absence of two years and five months, he has returned to his home. The captain looks well, is straight and hearty as he was ten years ago, and though he looks weather-beaten indeed, he has an athletic appearance which most men would be proud of. In giving an account of his tour, he said he set out with the special purpose of exploring among the mounds of the South for relics of the predecessors of the Indian. He floated down the Mississippi to Morganzie, Crevasse and Grand Rivers, and rowed through the lakes, bayous, rivers, creeks, bays, and every body of water navigable with his craft, stopping from one to three days at points of interest. He dug in the mounds of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana and Arkansas. The reporters got to heralding him as "The Old Man in the Skiff." At a point a few miles below Sepleville, Tenn., a couple of young men, who supposed he had money in his boat, opened fire on him one evening with lead slugs, and several of the slugs inflicted flesh wounds. He crawled into his cabin, got his shot-gun, and when they got near he blazed away at them, and off they ran. He was laid up about a month by his wounds. He has been "ship-wrecked" several times, and by two of these mishaps lost valuable relics. His journeyings have comprised a tour of at least 18,000 miles in his skiff. He has sent boxes of great value in ancient implements and utensils to the academy, and he says he has many buried because he could not send them or bring them. He says he shall remain at home a few weeks, and then carry out a long-cherished design of making an exploration of the Lake Superior region in pursuit of his favorite science.

First Gold-find in Nevada.

NEVADA'S first nugget was mined with a butcher's knife. John Orr started across the plains in 1849. The roads were bad, the weather was worse, and he was obliged to remain through the Winter at Salt Lake. In April he resumed his journey. He had a partner named Nick Kelly, after whom Kelly's Ravine was named, and in the company was William Prouse, now living in Nurb City, about forty miles southwest of Salt Lake. Prouse had worked in mines before gold was discovered in Coloma, and was a good prospector. One day the train stopped on the edge of what is now known as Gold Cañon, near the Carson River, to let the animals feed on some bunch grass found growing among the sage brush. Prouse at noontime took a milk-pan, and going down to the gulch began washing dirt, in a few minutes getting color to the value of a few cents. Orr then named the place Gold Cañon.

The train soon after resumed travel, going to the head of the Carson Valley. There they met a party of seven who had left the train at the sink of the Humboldt, intending to go in advance to California and select good locations for the remainder of the party. They had been unable to cross the country, and had been lost in the snow four or five days, unable to find the divide to Hangtown. A stay in Carson for three weeks followed, when Orr, Kelly and several others returned to Gold Cañon, and resumed prospecting. Kelly and Orr went up the cañon until a little fork was reached, when work was begun.

The party had few tools, and Orr had nothing but a knife. While Kelly was working he noticed a very narrow place at the fork, where the water barely covered a slab of slate rock. Idly he examined it, and noticing a small crevice near the edge, drove the knife into it, breaking out a piece. The water running over it washed away the underlying dirt, and in a few seconds he discovered a gold nugget where the rock had covered it. It was quickly removed, and afterward found to weigh $8.25. This was on the 1st of June, 1850, thirty years ago. Prospecting was continued, and though gold dust was found in several places throughout the cañon, Orr's was the only nugget. He still has it in his possession, the first ever found in Nevada.

Visiting in Afghanistan.

AFGHAN etiquette forbids paying visits in the off-hand and unceremonious way usual in Europe, and it is customary, and also convenient in many ways, to send at least a few hours' notice of the intention to call upon an Afghan. The visitor is received at the door by some confidential retainer or retainers, and conducted through an open court-yard to the foot of a rude, winding staircase, which leads first to an uncovered landing, and thence to the ordinary reception-room or balcony of the proprietor. Here he is received by the host in person, and conducted with every mark of courtesy and respect to a small row of chairs, the use of which article of furniture seems to be general in good society in Cabul, and to have quite superseded the carpets and felts which satisfied an older generation. After a few words of welcome and inquiries in a set formula after health on both sides, a tray of fruits usually appears, and is placed upon the carpet at the feet of the visitors. The fruits are followed by the tea-tray, and a cup of highly-sweetened green tea, without milk, is placed before the visitor. The conversation is then carried on with more or less spirit on the ordinary topics of the day, and here, if the visit is a merely formal one, the interview comes to an end, and the visitor is conducted to the door with the same formality and courtesy with which he was received. It is not, however, unusual for the host to ask if the attendants, who have been seated at a respectful distance all this time, shall withdraw in view to the introduction of more confidential topics. Those who look for more than the mere interchange of civilities at these meetings will gladly accede to this proposal, and it is then that the conversation often becomes deeply important and interesting.

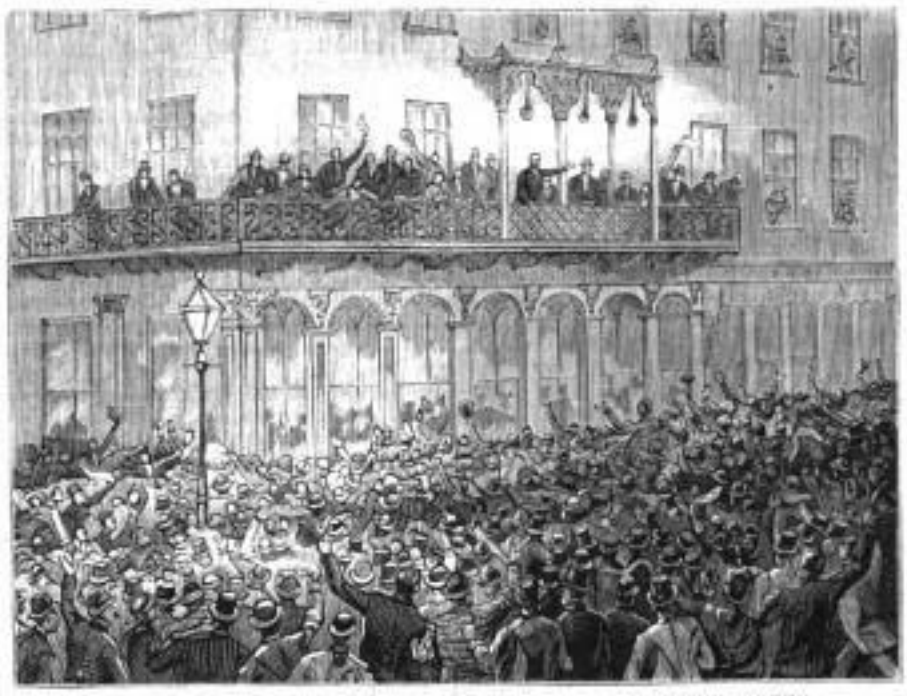
Lightning and Trees.

PROFESSOR COLLADON, of Geneva, has made some interesting observations on the course of lightning when it strikes trees and houses. He holds that the great discharges which injure trees and houses seldom or never happen while the lightning has an unobstructed course—which it has along the thin upper branches of trees, where birds and their nests are often left quite uninjured by its descent. But it is where the electric current reaches the thick stem that the tree becomes a worse and worse conductor, and it is here, therefore, that the tree is what is called struck—i. e., here that the electricity, failing to find an unobstructed channel to the earth, accumulates in masses, and gives out shocks which rend the tree. And the same is true of houses whose lightning conductors stop short of the ground. Professor Colladon has also shown that the close neighborhood of a pool of water is a great attraction to the electric current, and that the electricity often passes down a house or tree till it is near enough to dart straight across to the water; and he thinks that where possible, lightning conductors should end in a spring or pool of water. Professor Colladon believes that lightning descends rather in a shower—through a multitude of vines, for instance, in the same vineyard—than in a single main stream. It divides itself among all the upper branches of a tree, and is received from hundreds of atmospheric points at once, instead of, as has been usually supposed, from one. Electricity is a rain, a number of tributaries from a wide surface, not a single torrent.

Icebergs in Mid-ocean.

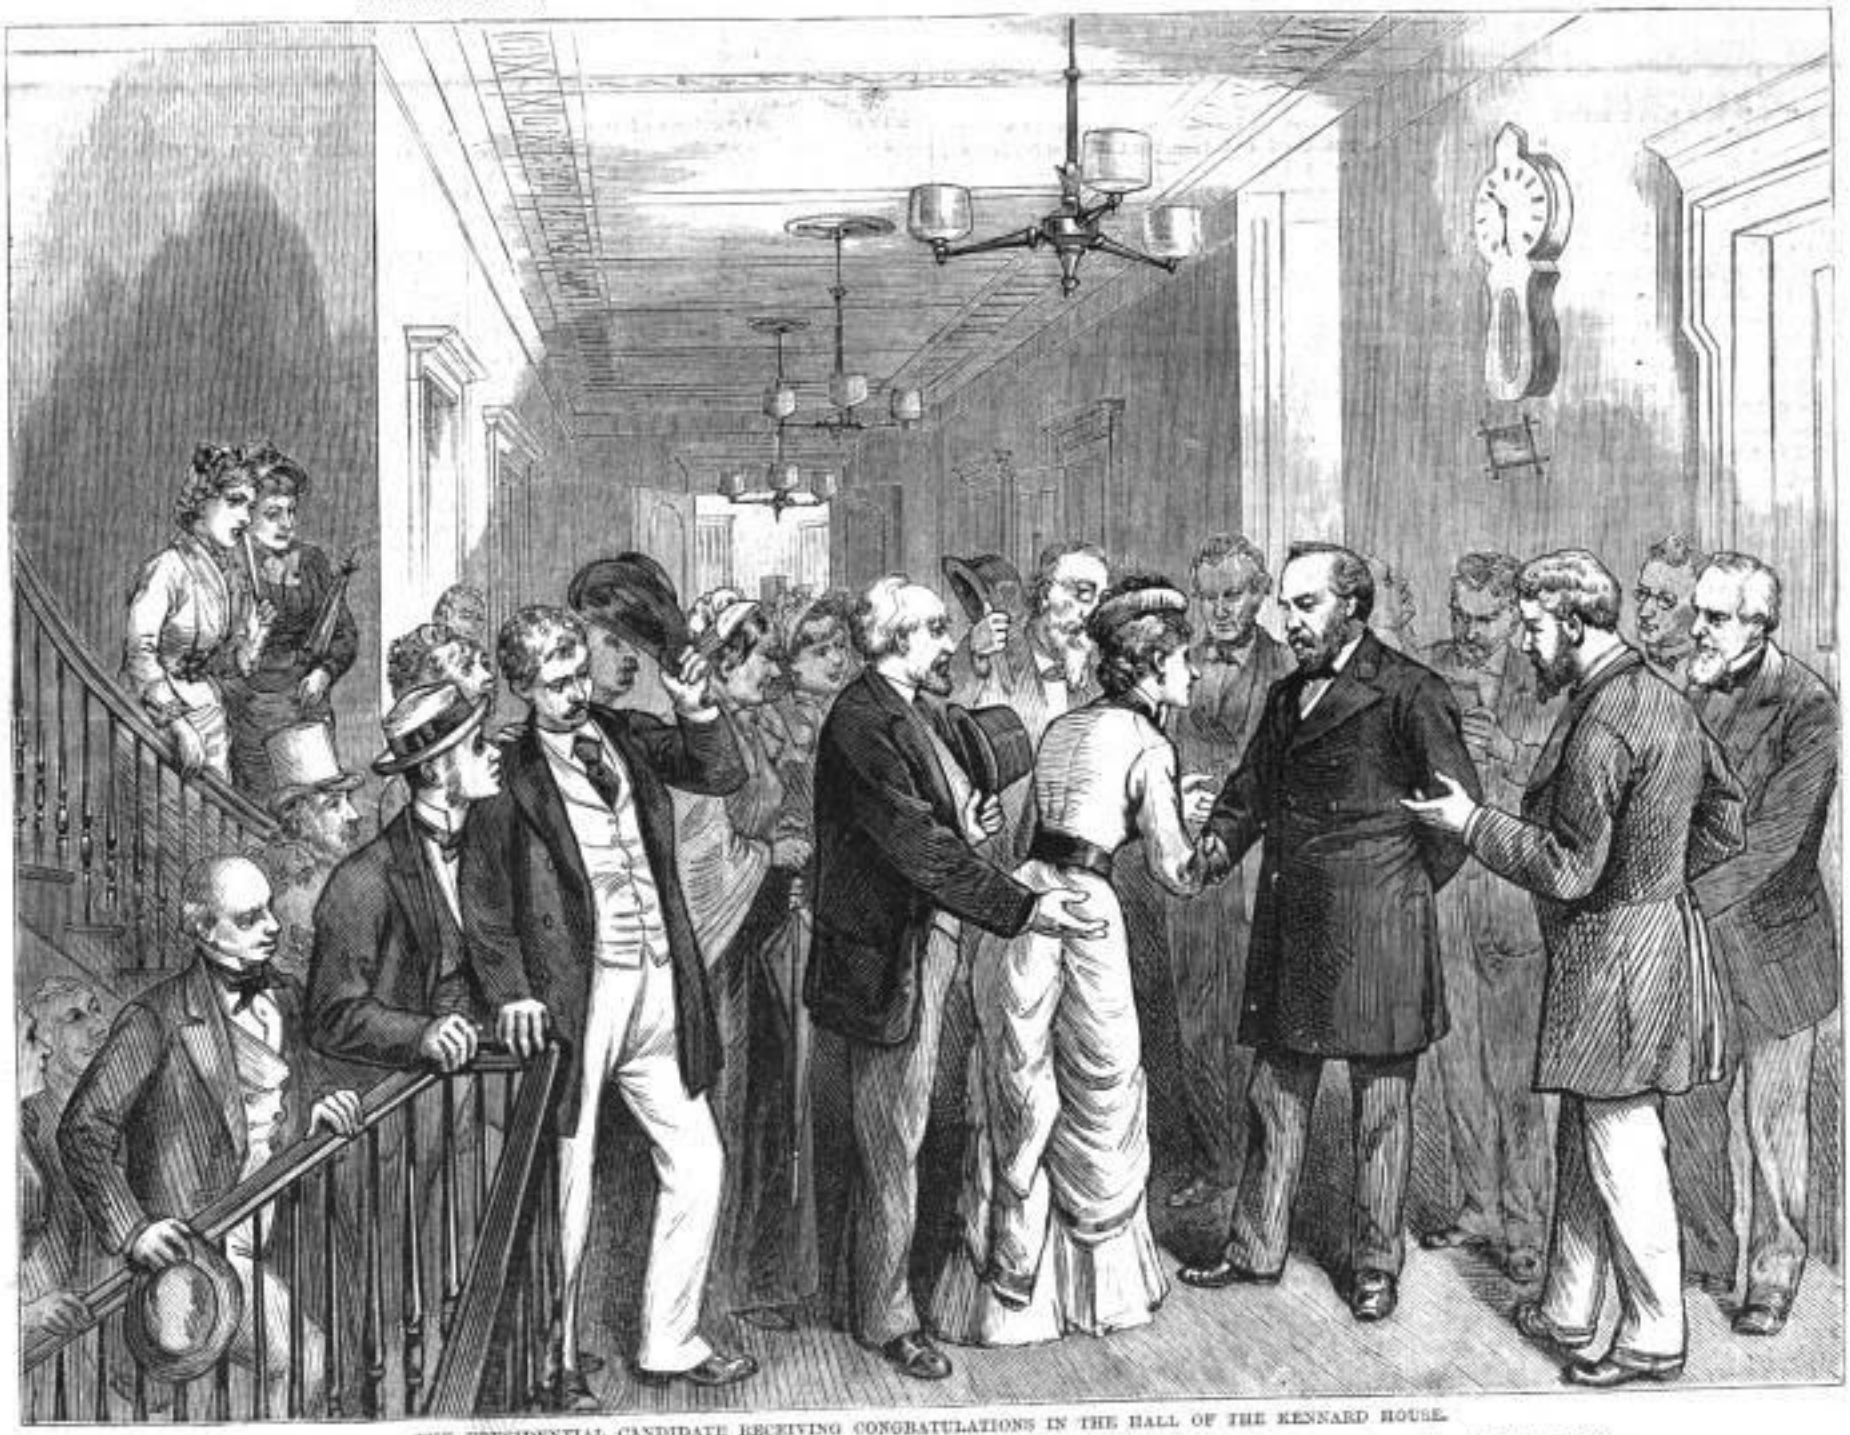
ALL the steamships arriving at this port from Europe during the last month have reported encountering icebergs on the passage across the ocean. One captain who arrived last week reported: "In all my ocean experience I never saw so many. At five o'clock on the morning of June 3d, we first sighted them. We were then about one hundred and eighty miles southeast of Cape Race. At first there seemed to be but three of them. As we drew nearer the number marvelously increased. By seven o'clock we were in the midst of a crowd of them, perhaps a hundred. They were of all sizes and shapes. Many rose over five hundred feet above the water, and the forms of some were very pretty and fantastic. One had two pinnacles and from the centre of another there rose a high steeple. They looked like villages. The most singular feature of the whole thing is that there were two lines of them, and our steamer passed through the intervening channel, a wall of ice rising on either side. We did not have to move the helm but once on account of them. This was to avoid the last one, which seemed to be a straggler from one of the two main bodies. But it would have been dangerous to have encountered them in a dense fog or on a dark night."

Digitized by Google



FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Leslie, Jr., in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.



No. 1,292.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, JULY 3, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

THE RECEPTION OF THE GENERAL ON HIS ARRIVAL AT THE RAILROAD DEPOT.

GEN. GARFIELD ADDRESSING THE PUBLIC FROM THE BALCONY OF THE KENNARD HOUSE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE RECEIVING CONGRATULATIONS IN THE HALL OF THE KENNARD HOUSE.

OHIO.—AFTER THE CONVENTION—POPULAR RECEPTIONS TO GENERAL GARFIELD AT CLEVELAND.

From Sketches by Jos. B. Beale.—See Page 302.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, JULY 3, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

J. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

WE publish in this issue of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER an able and highly interesting article on the present condition and prospects of South Carolina, from the pen of Hon. F. W. Dawson, the well-known editor of the Charleston News and Courier. This valuable paper will be followed by others, from prominent resident writers, on the condition and outlook of other Southern States, it being our purpose to present to the country, so far as possible, an accurate and exhaustive exhibit of the "South in 1880," to the end that its great advantages may be more generally and truly understood than they can be so long as partisan journals are the only sources of public information.

THE ELECTORAL COUNT.

ONE of the most important questions brought to the attention of Congress at its recent session was that of providing for the regulation of the count of the electoral vote, or, rather, for the appointment of an umpire competent to decide, constitutionally, in case any State shall next Winter send in two or more sets of Presidential electors. That such an emergency will arise is more than probable; it is nearly certain. True, this is not Spain or Mexico, and our citizens appear to possess a degree of self-denial, self-restraint and self-poise, which will make partisan revolutions infrequent. Unlike tropical nations, we are cool, patient and forbearing, and either party is above resorting to the sword merely because it is outvoted; but it is equally true that we are quick to resent injustice and to repel any invasion of our political rights. The imminent danger is that one party or the other, when next February comes, may imagine that it is being cheated out of its President, and unless there shall exist a constitutional, non-partisan tribunal competent to decide the question, a spark may light the fierce fires of sectional and partisan strife.

It will not be safe to have such an uncertainty occur in two successive Presidential elections. Three and a half years ago we were face to face with this peril, and civil war was averted only by the conciliatory spirit of the Republican Party and the Anglo-Saxon forbearance of the Democratic Party. Can we safely calculate on the same result following the same dilemma again? There are laws of disorder as well as laws of order, and it is not by any means certain that either of the two great parties would again permit itself to be deprived of a President whom it believed it had elected. A majority of the Republican Party is convinced that very many of the black voters of the South are ostracised, persecuted, intimidated and prevented from voting, and that Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina can be carried for the Democratic candidate only by fraud; and a majority of the Democratic Party as sincerely believes that Mr. Tilden was honestly elected President in 1876, and was cheated out of his rights. Will either of these great parties quietly take a back seat for the sake of peace next Winter, if there shall be a contest about who has been elected? Especially, we may ask, will the same party be likely to surrender now that surrendered before?

The joint resolution proposed by Mr. Morgan, and passed by the Senate, proposing in effect that the party majority in Congress should be the final judge of everything connected with the electoral count—the qualifications of Electors, the regularity of elections, the correctness of certificates, and any objection, direct or indirect, which might be brought to their notice touching any vote or votes of any State—was defeated in the House by the filibustering of the Republicans. The resolution was no doubt objectionable, being of doubtful constitutionality, and as likely to aggravate as to avert the grave misunderstandings which may possibly arise; but it should have been met in a manly way, and not killed as it was by indirection. As the case now stands, the Republicans are justly liable to the charge of obstructing, for partisan reasons, necessary legislation on a subject of supreme national importance. It is true, indeed, that there still will be time after the meeting next December to pass this or some other measure for the regulation of the electoral count, but the difficulties in the way of definite action then will be quite as great and serious as they have been hitherto; and specific legislation, in the event of a close election, will scarcely be possible, and even if had, will be dictated by inflamed partisan feeling, and therefore little likely to command that popular sanction which, in a less excited state of the public temper, it might be expected to receive. Are the Republicans prepared to assume the responsibility for an infraction of the public peace should it come as the result of their policy of obstruction?

Undoubtedly capital is conservative and prosperity is quieting. The fact that business is thriving will disincline men to break the peace whatever may be the partisan provocation. But even avarice is relative, and to prevent what they regard as the outrage of the ballot-box angry men might break its restraints. There is only one way to be certain that the next election will not be followed by a widespread catastrophe, and that is for Congress to agree, immediately upon reassembling in December, upon some ultimate umpire in case of disagreement. He is no alarmist who tells of real danger; nor is he a prudent man who hides his head from it like an ostrich in the sand. All sober, right-thinking citizens unite in demanding that Congress shall make amends for its present recreancy to duty by providing, at the earliest possible opportunity, that the results of the next Presidential election may be declared in peace, and within the scope of just constitutional limitations.

THE RECENT COLLISIONS.

OUR readers have been so fully informed as to the sickening details of the disastrous collision between the Narragansett and Stonington, that it is not our purpose now to dwell upon them. A few words of comment on the general subject, however, seem appropriate, if not necessary.

A more inexcusable calamity, can scarcely be imagined. The collision itself would have been avoided by the slightest exercise of prudence or caution on the part of those in command, while, having occurred, it was shameful and even criminal that under the circumstances a single life should have been sacrificed. Incompetency, recklessness and brutality seemed to reign supreme. The most simple appliances for saving life in such an emergency were either wanting, out of gear or useless, and such as could be made available were only made so through the energy of others than the officers and crew.

Notwithstanding the many homes made desolate by this calamity, we are a patient community; we have become accustomed to such matters, and after a few days our indignation will subside, the guilty will go unpunished, and the event will be forgotten, or only brought to mind by some fresh atrocity of a similar nature.

It has happened, however (it might be said providentially), as if to impress the guilt indelibly upon the authors of this disaster, that within a few days another similar accident occurred, under much more unfavorable circumstances, where not a life was lost, and a most striking contrast was presented. The ocean steamers, the Queen and the Anchoria, collided in a fog three hundred miles from land, and although some one must be held to blame for the fact of the collision, still the highest praise is due to the officers and crew of the Queen for what then took place, not for brilliant ingenuity or unusual daring, but simply for performing the duties which reason and their stations imposed upon them with the most thorough skill, discipline and precision. And how was this brought about? Simply by keeping the crew in constant training to meet and provide against just such accidents, though they might never occur. Even an hour before the collision the regular routine exercise of this character in the way of manning and lowering the boats had taken place. Thus, when a real crisis came they were fully prepared for it, and instead of a panic-stricken mob cutting away boats with holes in their bottoms, without thole-pins or oars, the work of transferring the passengers of the supposed sinking vessel was effected with as much coolness and method as if there were no danger.

Again, what a contrast is presented in the construction of the vessels with a view to the protection of life. Both these ocean steamers were built with separate air-tight compartments which enabled them not only to keep afloat, but, although so seriously damaged, to bring vessel, passengers and cargo safely into port.

Of the lessons to be learned from these occurrences little need be said. They speak strongly for themselves. Various suggestions have appeared in the Press with a view to prevent their repetition, some in the nature of new legislation, others in the way of improved mechanical contrivances. If our present laws are not stringent enough, let them be amended so as to compel at least an apparent regard for human life under similar circumstances. But, after all, the law is comparatively a slight protection. It may command certain preventive measures to be taken, and may prohibit the use of dangerous agencies. But who is to enforce these provisions? If intrusted to a few officials, we know by sad experience how far they can be relied upon, and we might refer as an illustration to the recent Madison Square Garden calamity.

As suggestions are in order, here is one of a practical character. We have seen how beneficial and efficient have been the operations of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and of the kindred Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. When kind-hearted people organize under the inspiration of some great principle, and are endowed by law with the necessary powers to effect their purpose, experience has shown that they are far more efficient than the ordinary officers of the law. Why not, then, organize the Society for the Protection of Human Life? If even the brute creation can find such kind and gallant champions as Mr. Bergh and his associates, are there not philanthropists ready and willing to extend similar protection to poor humanity? Such a society, properly organized and with suitable powers conferred upon it, would be a blessing to the community. Its agents might prevent places of amusement from being constructed as traps to crush or roast the audience, boilers from being made only to explode, compel railroad engineers to look out for misplaced switches, steamboat owners to provide ordinary life saving apparatus, and generally to compel a full observance of the law on all matters where human safety is concerned.

If philanthropy or public spirit is not a sufficient motive for the foundation of such a society, would it not be a valuable auxiliary in a pecuniary point of view to our Life and Accident Insurance Companies? Who will start the movement?

FRESH SPANISH OUTRAGES.

TWO further "Spanish outrages upon the American flag" call for prompt and decisive action on the part of our Government. On the 30th of May the schooner Ethel A. Merrill, bound from Boston for Jamaica for a cargo of fruit, was fired at, brought-to and searched by a Spanish man-of-war, some six miles from the coast of Cuba. On the same day the schooner Eunice P. Newcomb, bound from Port Antonio for Boston, was overhauled by a Spanish cruiser on the Cuban coast, having been first twice fired at. In both cases the traders carried the American flag and were sailing in their proper courses. Their stoppage and search on the high seas were wholly unwarrantable, and it is to be hoped that Secretary Evarts will at once carry out the instructions of the President and demand an explanation of the outrage from the Spanish Government. If this explanation is not at once given, with instant and full reparation, if the circumstances shall require, then more vigorous measures should be immediately adopted. Our carrying trade is not so prosperous that we can afford to have our ships, engaged in their lawful pursuit, stopped or sunk at the will and caprice of Spanish cruisers. There has been entirely two much paltering with previous offenses of this sort from the same quarter, and Secretary Evarts may be assured that a failure now to assert with emphasis and decision the demands of the Government against these marauders of the seas will provoke the indignation of all who believe that the American flag should protect American citizens and interests wherever it may float.

OUR EXAMPLE.

THE world has recently enjoyed the spectacle of the two English-speaking nations in the process of changing their government—one involving a complete change of rulers and consequently of policy, and the other a mere change in the chief magistracy. This must have been an edifying sight to the clumsy despotisms of Europe, which never accomplish these feats without a revolution, with its accompanying bloodshed.

The ease with which the British people have superseded the captain of the ship, and his chief officers, must astonish those rulers who think they own the vessel of State with all its crew and passengers.

The particular element in the constitutional system is its unexpectedness. When Mr. Gladstone dissolved the British Parliament in 1874 he had a working majority in the House of Commons, a committee of which heterogeneous assembly governs the empire, and he, no doubt, calculated upon a larger one in the next. He was miserably disappointed, for the new House made Disraeli Lord of the Ascendant. In like manner when three months ago Lord Beaconsfield—the Ben Disraeli of 1874—appealed to the country, the tables were turned, and Gladstone once more reigned supreme. The people's breath had blown away the filigree of Jingoism, without respecting Queen Victoria's fancy for her pet Minister. She was obliged to dismiss him, and install as virtual ruler of the British Empire the necetic man she would not invite to her daughter's wedding.

The political history of England for the last fifty years shows how deeply our institutions have reacted upon that solid and slow-moving nation, and every year increases this positive influence. Take the cases of Disraeli and Gladstone—the two men who have for the past twenty years wielded more power in that land of steady habits than any statesmen of their time—the one an obscure Jew, the son of a Jewish littérateur, without one drop of British blood in his veins; an alien in everything, even to his idiosyncracies, which were entirely Eastern; who openly proclaimed, both in his writings and his speeches, his admiration of everything Oriental, even to the ignoring of England as a European power, declaring her to be an Asiatic Empire. It was the reaction of our democratic influence upon our aristocratic ancestor which enabled this ignoter of British individuality to override the oligarchical feeling of the most firmly established monarchy in the world. Nor is the case of Mr. Gladstone, the present ruler of the British Empire, less an instance of the power of our Republican example. The son of a Scotch shopkeeper, he has, like his Jewish predecessor, shouldered aside the highborn nobles of England and forced himself, despite the silent hostility of the Queen and Court, into the first position in the councils of the nation, and that with such an emphasis that Lords Hartington and Granville when offered the Premiership are compelled to decline it, and place the virtual crown on the head of the low born commoner. Truly, the leaven of our Revolution is permeating the whole mass of despotism.

The examples of Abraham Lincoln, the rail-splitter, of Andrew Johnson, the tailor, and of Grant, the tanner, have not been lost upon the descendants of the Plantagenets and the Tudors. Even in that stronghold of ancestral abuses, how steadily, though slowly, our example is sapping the foundations of the olden times is apparent—in the disestablishment of the Irish Church, the vote by ballot, and numerous other innovations upon the sacred precincts of divine right. Truly, the whirligig of time has brought about its revenge, and George Washington, the rebel of 1776, has been very instrumental in revising the institutions of the nation whose most eloquent advocate once declared them, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, to be immutable.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

IT has for some years past been a subject of undisguised regret to the admirers of constitutional government that the dignity of debates which has always characterized the proceedings of the British House of Commons—the greatest deliberative assembly in the world—has been sadly impaired. The Irish members, who acquired some notoriety last year by their so-called obstructionist policy, are no doubt responsible for most of this degeneracy; and when one of them, Mr. O'Donnell, rose in the House lately and made a personal attack upon M. Challemel Lacour, the newly-appointed French Ambassador in London, he was very frequently called to order by Mr. Gladstone. It appears that M. Challemel Lacour, during the Commune, had sent a dispatch in answer to an appeal for mercy from some Mobiles in the laconic form of "Fusillez moi ces gens-là." The dispatch was, however, never forthcoming, and the whole subject had been consigned to oblivion until Mr. O'Donnell thought fit to question the Government about it. M. Challemel Lacour is an intimate friend and, to a certain extent, a protégé of Gambetta, upon whose newspaper—La République Française—he is supposed to have been the managing editor. Mr. O'Donnell's proceeding of trying to make the House of Commons a place for discussing the record of ambassadors was indefensible; but the English people is generally opposed to him upon other grounds—namely, the looseness of his private life and his connection with the Communists.

The refusal of Mr. Bradlaugh to take the oath of allegiance, which is administered to every member of the House of Commons, and his subsequent request to be allowed to make it, have also given rise to a grave scandal. Mr. Bradlaugh at first stated that he was an atheist, and that he was opposed to the monarchy in England; that, consequently, an oath would not be binding upon his conscience. He then asked to make an affirmation instead of the usual oath. This request was referred to a select committee, which decided that he could not be allowed to do so. Then he denied that he had refused to take the oath, and another committee was appointed to inquire into the question whether a man who stated that the oath would not bind his conscience should be allowed to make it. This committee has decided that he cannot be allowed to take the Parliamentary oath, but that he may make affirmation of allegiance at his own risk. This matter of swearing a religious allegiance has been on several occasions the subject of discussion. The famous Daniel O'Connell, the Irish agitator, declined to take the old form of the oath, and desired to take a new one under the Catholic Relief Act, but the House refused to allow him to do so. On another occasion Baron Rothschild was kept out of his seat under somewhat similar circumstances, and it now looks as if some Act will have to be passed which will provide an oath broad enough to bind the most elastic conscience.

The Supplementary Conference has met at Berlin, and is engaged in discussing the Greek frontier and the affairs of the Porte. The Turkish Government is not officially represented, and it is more than likely that it will refuse to accept the decision of the Conference should it be unfavorable to Ottoman interests. If this happens, a war between Turkey and Greece will be the probable result; and the King of Greece, who is now in England seems to be trying to enlist the sympathies of Western Europe on his side against the Turks. Meantime the other European powers are busy strengthening their armaments, and a review which the German Emperor held at Berlin has attracted considerable attention from the increased number of troops upon the field. The war strength of the German army is now 2,000,000 men, and the foreign military authorities who were present at the review are ready to admit that the army has reached the highest point of effectiveness. Some idea may be formed of the fearful drag the military establishments of European countries are upon the people by a comparison of the amount spent merely upon the soldiers with the whole budget. For the support of the army in England and her colonies the proportion is 14 per cent., and in Italy the percentage is the same. Austria comes next with 19 per cent., and France and Germany are equal with a total of 21 per cent. Russia is the most extravagant of all, and spends 29 per cent. of her revenue upon her military establishment.

Digitized by Google

Massenet's oratorio, "La Légende Sacrée," is now complete and has been performed in Paris. It is divided into three parts, "Marie Magdeleine," "Eve," and "La Vierge." The immaculate character of the Virgin Mother is said to be depicted with great ability and with an austere simplicity which reminded the hearer of the primitive pictures of the Virgin, in which earnestness of religious feeling atones for a want of artistic skill. In the first part the Angel Gabriel crosses the star lit plain on his way to the humble dwelling of Mary, and the announcement of the visit is deliciously rendered by a chorus of children's voices, with a harp accompaniment. Then there is a chorus of the guests at the marriage at Cana, a Galilean dance, and an air of the Virgin when she entreats Jesus not to leave her. The oratorio ends with the arrival of Mary in the abode of the blessed amid a grand chorus, in which voices, instruments and organ combine in a magnificent ensemble.

Madame Marcella Sembrich, the new prima donna, who has made a great success at the Covent Garden Opera House as Lucia, comes from Dresden. She sang there at the Imperial Opera House, and her fame quickly spread to London. Mr. Gye, the proprietor of the Covent Garden Opera House, being unable to go himself to Dresden, at once sent for her, and as soon as he heard her sing a few bars he engaged her for five years. Besides her vocalistic acquirements she is a remarkable musician. The success of another American lady has to be chronicled. A Miss Gertrude Kellogg has been giving readings at Willis's Rooms, and the London Press speaks of her as possessing "very many claims to be considered the legitimate successor of the late Mr. Bellew."

THE opposition to the confirmation of General Longstreet as United States Minister to Turkey proved altogether insignificant when a vote was finally reached. Thirty nine Senators recorded themselves in favor of confirmation and only three against it. The new Minister will represent his country worthily and honorably at the court to which he is accredited, and his fame as a soldier will secure him a cordial welcome abroad.

THE young State of Minnesota is receiving a large proportion of the volume of emigration flowing westward. The newcomers are for the most part Germans and Scandinavians, destined for Fergus Fall, Alexandria and other points where farming lands are cheap, with no lack of transportation facilities. These contributions to the population of States possessing almost unlimited agricultural and mineral resources will both accelerate and add immensely to the prosperity and wealth of the country.

THE dullness in the iron market still continues. The demand having been more than met, an enormous surplus is accumulating from importations, and as a result furnaces in Pennsylvania and elsewhere are shutting down, with little prospect of renewing operations for some months. The dealers who for a time "rushed the market" at so vigorous a pace, are probably persuaded by this time that a policy of quick sales and moderate profits would have been preferable to that which they pursued.

AT the Cleveland reception of General Garfield, a transparency was displayed bearing the sentence:

"He who steered a canal-boat at sixteen will steer the ship of State at fifty."

It will scarcely be safe for the Republicans to base their hopes of success in the Presidential canvass on the record of their candidate as a sailor. General Garfield says himself, that, "by actual count, during his first trip as bowsman on a canal-boat, he fell overboard fourteen times."

THE net result of the partisan struggle in Congress over the Bill relative to the supervision of elections appears to be this: The Republicans have succeeded in maintaining the integrity of the Federal election laws, while the Democrats have succeeded in withholding the appropriation necessary to pay Deputy Marshals who may be employed in the Fall contest. If it shall be deemed desirable by either party to have a Federal supervision of the elections, the officials must either be paid out of the partisan campaign funds or agree to wait for their pay until such time as Congress shall make provision for their claims.

THE Turk again defies Europe. It is plain that the Porte will not carry out the decisions of the Supplementary Berlin Conference, except upon the compulsion of main force. As stated by Minister Layard, "The Sultan always replies with a promise which he does not fulfill. The policy of the Sultan and his advisers is to act entirely without Europe and defy her." The only remedy for the existing condition of things lies in the expulsion of the Turk from Europe, or in a supervisory commission of the Great Powers.

THE exports of domestic products from this port week before last are said to have been the heaviest on record. They amounted to $10,802,522, the excess over any previous total being $819,914. While the greater part of our shipment goes to British and continental ports, American products are coming more steadily and extensively into request in other countries than ever before. The increase in the exportation of butter, cheese, and general merchandise is especially notable. The total shipments from New York from the 1st of January to June 12th, were $177,662,246, against $145,144,191 for the same period last year—an increase in five and one half months of $32,518,055, or over twenty two per cent.

THERE are some indications that the nomination of Mr. Arthur as the Republican candidate for Vice-President will repel from that party the support of a considerable number of voters who would have favored it had Mr. Washburne or some equally well-known statesman been named for the second place on the ticket. It is Mr. Arthur's misfortune that he is regarded as a representative of the "Ring" methods in politics, which have become so odious to the independent class of voters: and, should the Democracy put in the field a ticket representing other than the machine element of the party, the objection to the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency would be found assuming a very positive and formidable shape.

AMONG the immigrants arriving at this port last week, were 330 Mormons, gathered by eleven missionaries in England, Wales, Scotland, Switzerland, Schleswig-Holstein and the northern part of Germany. All are destined for Utah, where they expect, no doubt, to find a paradise. The credulity of these people is only equaled by their perversity in holding fast to the polygamous relation. Meanwhile, the hostility to the peculiar institution is deepening in all the Territories, and it cannot much longer withstand the assaults upon it. The Utah Territorial Democratic Committee have adopted a resolution "that it is the solemn duty of the Government to provide a suitable law for suppressing the practice of polygamy in the Territories, and proper officers to enforce it," and an effort will be made to have the Cincinnati Convention insert this or some equivalent declaration in the national platform of the party.

GENERAL GORDON, whose resignation as United States Senator from Georgia was criticised by some politicians in that State as the result of some sort of an unworthy "bargain" looking to the promotion of ex-Governor Brown to the vacant seat, has met his accusers face to face in large public assemblages at Atlanta and elsewhere, and by his outspoken statements has not only vindicated his reputation, but deepened his hold upon public confidence. In an address at Atlanta he said he had resigned his place in the Senate solely in order to better his fortune. A lucrative position was offered him on the Pacific coast, but he had concluded to accept that of counsel of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, as this would enable him to remain in Georgia. General Gordon, whose Senatorial career has been in every way honorable, is to be congratulated that he has found refuge from the annoyances and thanklessness of political life in a position suited both to his talents and tastes.

THE whole number of electoral votes is 369, of which 185 are necessary to elect a President. The "Solid South" has in all 138 votes, and these will in all probability be given to the Democratic candidate. The doubtful Northern States are New York with 35 votes, Indiana with 15, New Jersey with 9, and Connecticut with 6. To these may be added California with 6 votes, and Oregon with 3. If the Democrats can hold the South and carry New York and Indiana their nominees will be elected, or, if they can add to the Southern vote those of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, victory will crown their standard. But if they should lose New York and carry all the other doubtful States, they would still be 12 votes short of a majority in the electoral college. These figures show the importance of the vote of New York to the general canvass, and account fully for the conviction that the contest here will be marked by a vigor and desperation wholly without precedent in recent years

---

THE statistics gathered by the census enumerators show very strikingly the crowded condition of some of the tenement-houses of the city. One enumerator reports that in one house he took down 137 names, in the next house 107, in another 96, and in another 94. In one five story building in Baxter Street, an enumerator found eight families, numbering from seven to fourteen persons, all living in the utmost squalor. In one case two families occupied one small room. The rooms were generally destitute of furniture, and, in some cases the children were almost naked. The enumerators discovered some curious juxtapositions in these crowded tenements. In one he found a mission house, and, right behind it, a low opium den, governed by six Chinamen. Also, in the rear of the mission-house, was a colored boarding-house, managed by a person whose mother was of the Delaware tribe of Indians, and whose father was a Spaniard. With him lives an insane Indian; while close at hand is another collection of black men and white women, who did not hesitate to say that they were married to each other. It is quite obvious that the legislation looking to an improvement of our tenement-house system has not as yet produced any really practical results.

THE next election for Representatives in Congress will possess unusual importance, from the fact that the character of our national legislation for years to come may depend upon the result. In the present House, which has a small Democratic majority, sixty-seven Republicans and forty-eight Democrats hold their seats by pluralities or by slender majorities. Here is a total of 115 districts which may be turned one way or the other by the drift of the canvass and by the character of the rival nominees. In some of the districts a change of only fifty votes will change the character of the representation politically. In the growing independence of voters, the party which makes the best nominations will be likely to succeed in these and all closely balanced districts; but the struggle, in view of the important interests at stake, will undoubtedly be one of extraordinary intensity and vigor. It would not, perhaps, be a serious misfortune if the President should be chosen by one party, while a majority in Congress should be secured by the other.

Two national banks—one in New Jersey and one in Vermont—have recently been bankrupted, one by the rascality or stupidity of its officers, and the other by the dishonesty of its president, who forged its paper to the extent of $250,000, and made away with nearly its entire capital. It is practically impossible that either of these institution could have been wrecked had their directors attended intelligently and faithfully to the duties imposed upon them. In the case of the New Jersey bank, where a loss of $400,000 is reported, all the directors express immense astonishment at the discovery of the deficit. They appear to have permitted the cashier to run the bank just about as he pleased, and he is conveniently absent in Europe. The stockholders and depositors of both these banks owe it to themselves and to the public to hold the directors to the full measure of their responsibility under the law, to the end that other disasters of a like nature may be averted. Where ordinary supervisory vigilance would prevent frauds and thefts in any institution, the negligence which makes either possible is positively criminal, and ought to be pitilessly punished.

WHILE Congress failed to do a good many things which it ought to have done, it is entitled to credit for having passed all the Appropriation Bills and prevented the passage in the last hours of the session of any of that class of questionable Bills which are only too often crowded through in the excitement and confusion preceding the final adjournment. So far as appears, no "jobs" of any sort were sanctioned by either House in the closing hours. The total appropriations made during the session for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1881, exclusive of miscellaneous items but including the Agricultural and River and Harbor Appropriation Bills amount to $184,405,180, as against $192,860,237 appropriated for the fiscal year ending on the 30th instant. From this aggregate there should be deducted, in order to show the actual ordinary expenses of the Government, the sum of $14,000,000 for payment of arrears of pensions, $2,875,000 for the census, $300,000 paid to the Cherokee Indians, and $2,998,741, being an excess granted by the Committee on Commerce in the River and Harbor Bill over the average amounts appropriated for rivers and harbors in 1875 and 1876. Making these deductions for extraordinary expenditures, the sum of the ordinary appropriations is reduced to $164,000,000.

IF President Hayes does not mean that the country shall brand all his professions of sympathy with the cause of Civil Service Reform as wholly insincere, he will at once remove the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, General Raum. That gentleman has violated the civil service order of the Executive in the most flagrant manner, going out of his way to emphasize his contempt for the whole system of reform. Requested to abstain from any participation in the Illinois controversy, he abandoned his official duties, went to that State, served as chairman of the Republican Convention, and played throughout the part of a violent partisan. If the head of one of the most important departments of the Government can thus impudently defy the commands of his superior and the rules to which his own subordinates are required to conform, then a reform of the civil service will not only be impossible, but its debasement will be made both easy and inevitable. In saying this, we by no means impugn General Raum's character as a public official, or deny his right to hold any political opinions he may please. It rests with President Hayes to determine whether he shall be held responsible in history for acquiescing in the insolent nullification of his authority in the one effort for administrative reform to which he is conspicuously and peculiarly pledged.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

IT is believed that the census returns will show the population of New York City to be nearly 1,500,000.

THE Greenback State Convention of Arkansas has nominated a ticket, with William F. Parks, of Lafayette, for Governor.

THE Louisiana Supreme Court has decided that the State law taxing commercial travelers from other States is unconstitutional.

GENERAL JOHN A. SUTTER, the discoverer of gold in California, and one of the earliest pioneers on that coast, died in Washington, June 18th.

THE census shows a total population in Philadelphia of 842,428. The population of Chicago is stated at 475,000, and of Brooklyn at 554,696.

THE agricultural appropriation Bill passed by Congress applies $7,500 for experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and cornstalks.

THE Supreme Court of Georgia has decided that the Western Union Telegraph Company has no exclusive rights to erect telegraph poles in that State.

THE American Institute of Homeopathy held its annual session at Milwaukee, Wis., last week. Dr. J. W. Dowling, of New York, was elected President for the ensuing year.

THE Democrats of the Third Maryland Congressional District have nominated Fecter S. Hobbinel for Congress. In the Fourth District, R. M. McLane was renominated.

THE Long Branch steamer Adelaide was run down in the North River, June 18th, by the excursion steamer Grand Republic, broken in two and sunk. No lives were lost.

THE annual reunion of the Society of the Army of the Potomac was held at Burlington, Vt., on June 16th. General Horatio G. Wright was elected President for the ensuing year.

THE Supreme Court of Indiana has declared the constitutional amendments providing that the State election shall be held in November instead of October, etc., to be unconstitutional.

EX-GOVERNOR HARTRANFT of Pennsylvania, nominated for Collector of the Port of Philadelphia, having failed of confirmation by the Senate, has been again nominated by the President.

A MEETING of survivors of the Narragansett steamship disaster was held in Boston last week, at which a committee was appointed to examine into the company's legal liability for losses.

THE Democrats of the Thirteenth Ohio District have renominated Gibson Atherton for Congress. William McKinley has been renominated by the Republicans of the Seventeenth District of Ohio.

AT the annual Commencement of Cornell University, June 17th, a class of '78, including ten ladies, were graduated. Addresses were delivered by General Stewart L. Woodford and Acting President Russell.

FIVE hundred of Sitting Bull's band from the other side of the international boundary have come in and surrendered to the United States forces. The Indians were in a starving condition. It is said more are about to come in.

MEMBERS of the Cabinet are about to start on their Summer vacations. Secretary Ramsey goes to Kansas, Secretary Thompson to the Pacific coast, and Secretary Sherman to Ohio. The President will probably visit the Pacific coast during the Summer.

PRESIDENT HAYES vetoed the Deputy Marshals Bill passed by Congress on the ground that, while it recognizes the power and duty of the United States to provide officers to guard and scrutinize the Congressional elections, it fails to adapt its provisions to the existing laws so as to secure efficient supervision and protection. Congress adjourned without acting on the veto.

HON. A. G. PORTER, First Comptroller of the Treasury, has been nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor of Indiana. A National Convention of Prohibitionists, held at Cleveland last week, nominated Neal Dow, of Maine, for President, and A. M. Thompson, of Ohio, for Vice-President. The Democrats of North Carolina have nominated Thomas J. Jarvis for Governor.

Foreign.

ACTIVE military preparations are said to be going on in Greece.

THE Lower House of the Prussian Diet has rejected the first clause of the Church Bill.

THE French Cabinet has decided to propose that amnesty shall be plenary, except as regards crimes against the common law prior to 1871.

THE American Rifle Team began practice at Dollymount, Ireland, on June 16th. The team has been most cordially received by the Irish marksmen.

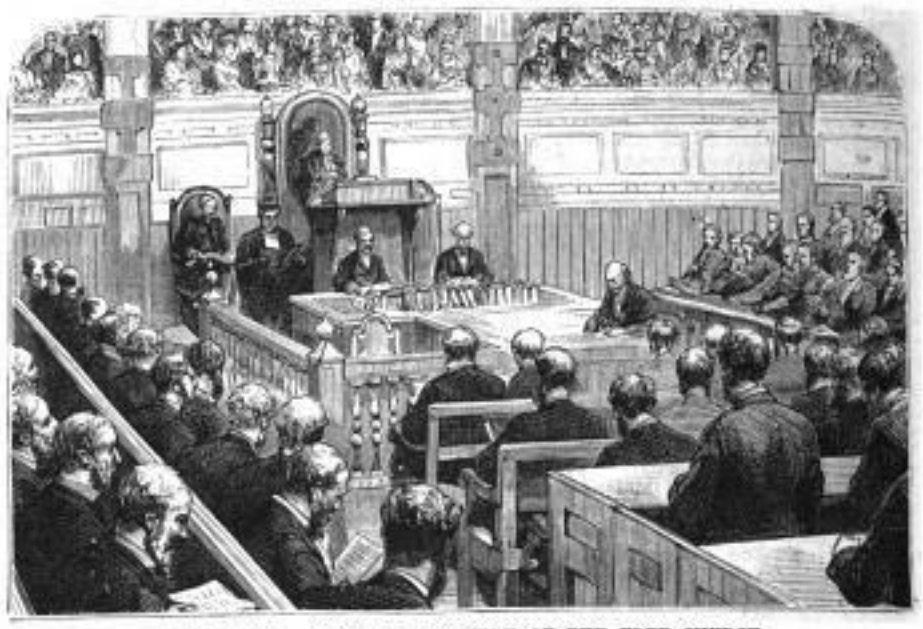
THE Spanish Government has forbidden religious Orders expelled from France to establish themselves near the frontier or anywhere else in Spain, except by special permission.

THE Liberal Party in Mexico has convoked a National Convention to assemble at the capital on October 15th, each State sending one delegate, the object being to insure free suffrage to the people.

CHILI is reported to demand the cession of the whole coast line of Bolivia as one of the terms of peace. The Colombian Government is taking steps towards a consolidation with Venezuela and Ecuador. The withdrawal of Buenos Ayres from the Argentine Republic is threatened.

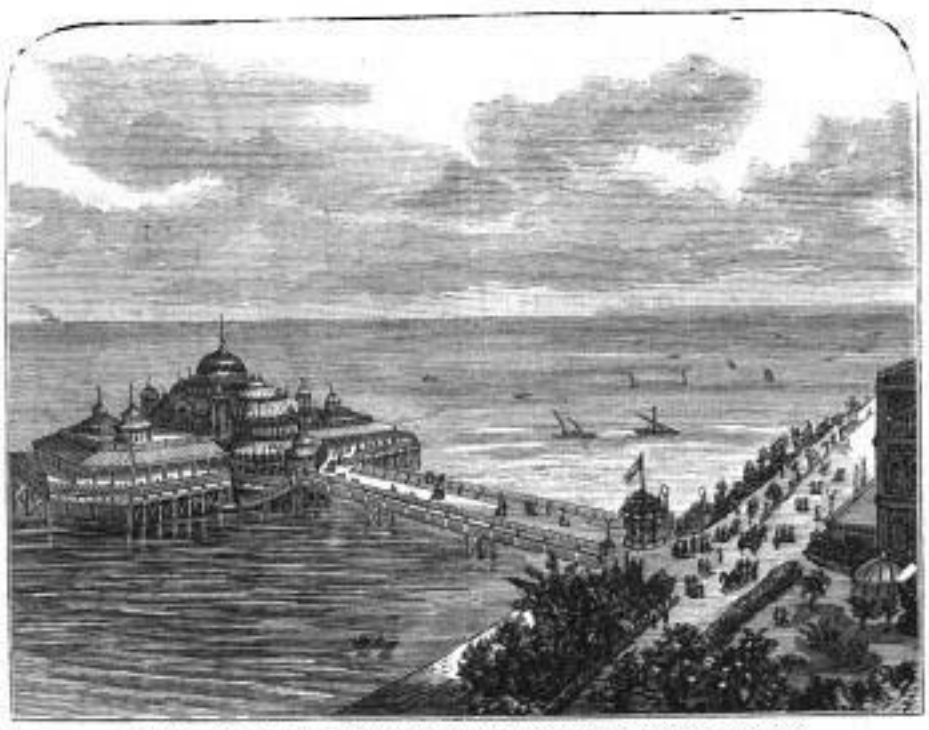
THE Canadian Government has decided to issue a royal commission to inquire into the affairs of the Pacific Railway from its inception. A commission will also be appointed to confer with the New York and Ontario Governments with reference to the proposed improvements at Niagara.

THE British House of Commons last week adopted a resolution urging the Government to recommend to foreign Governments a reduction of European armaments. The Commons has passed the Irish Relief Bill to a second reading, and has also adopted a Local Option resolution, giving to the inhabitants of any district the right of determining whether licenses to public houses shall be renewed.



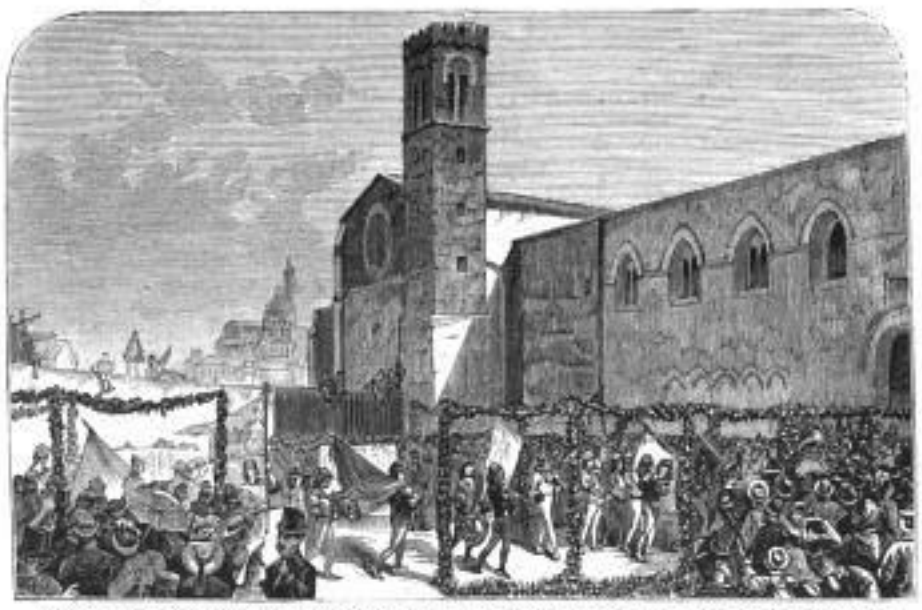
THE Supplementary Berlin Conference convened last week to consider the Greek frontier and other questions. There are conflicting reports regarding the amount of territory which will be probably ceded to Greece, but both Greece and Turkey are said to be preparing to fight. It has been proposed to give Montenegro territory on the coast in lieu of that now in contest. The Eastern correspondence of the new English Government is published, including a letter from Sir Austen Layard saying that if England is in earnest she must be prepared to go further than mere menace with the Fleet.

Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 303.

SCOTLAND.—GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.



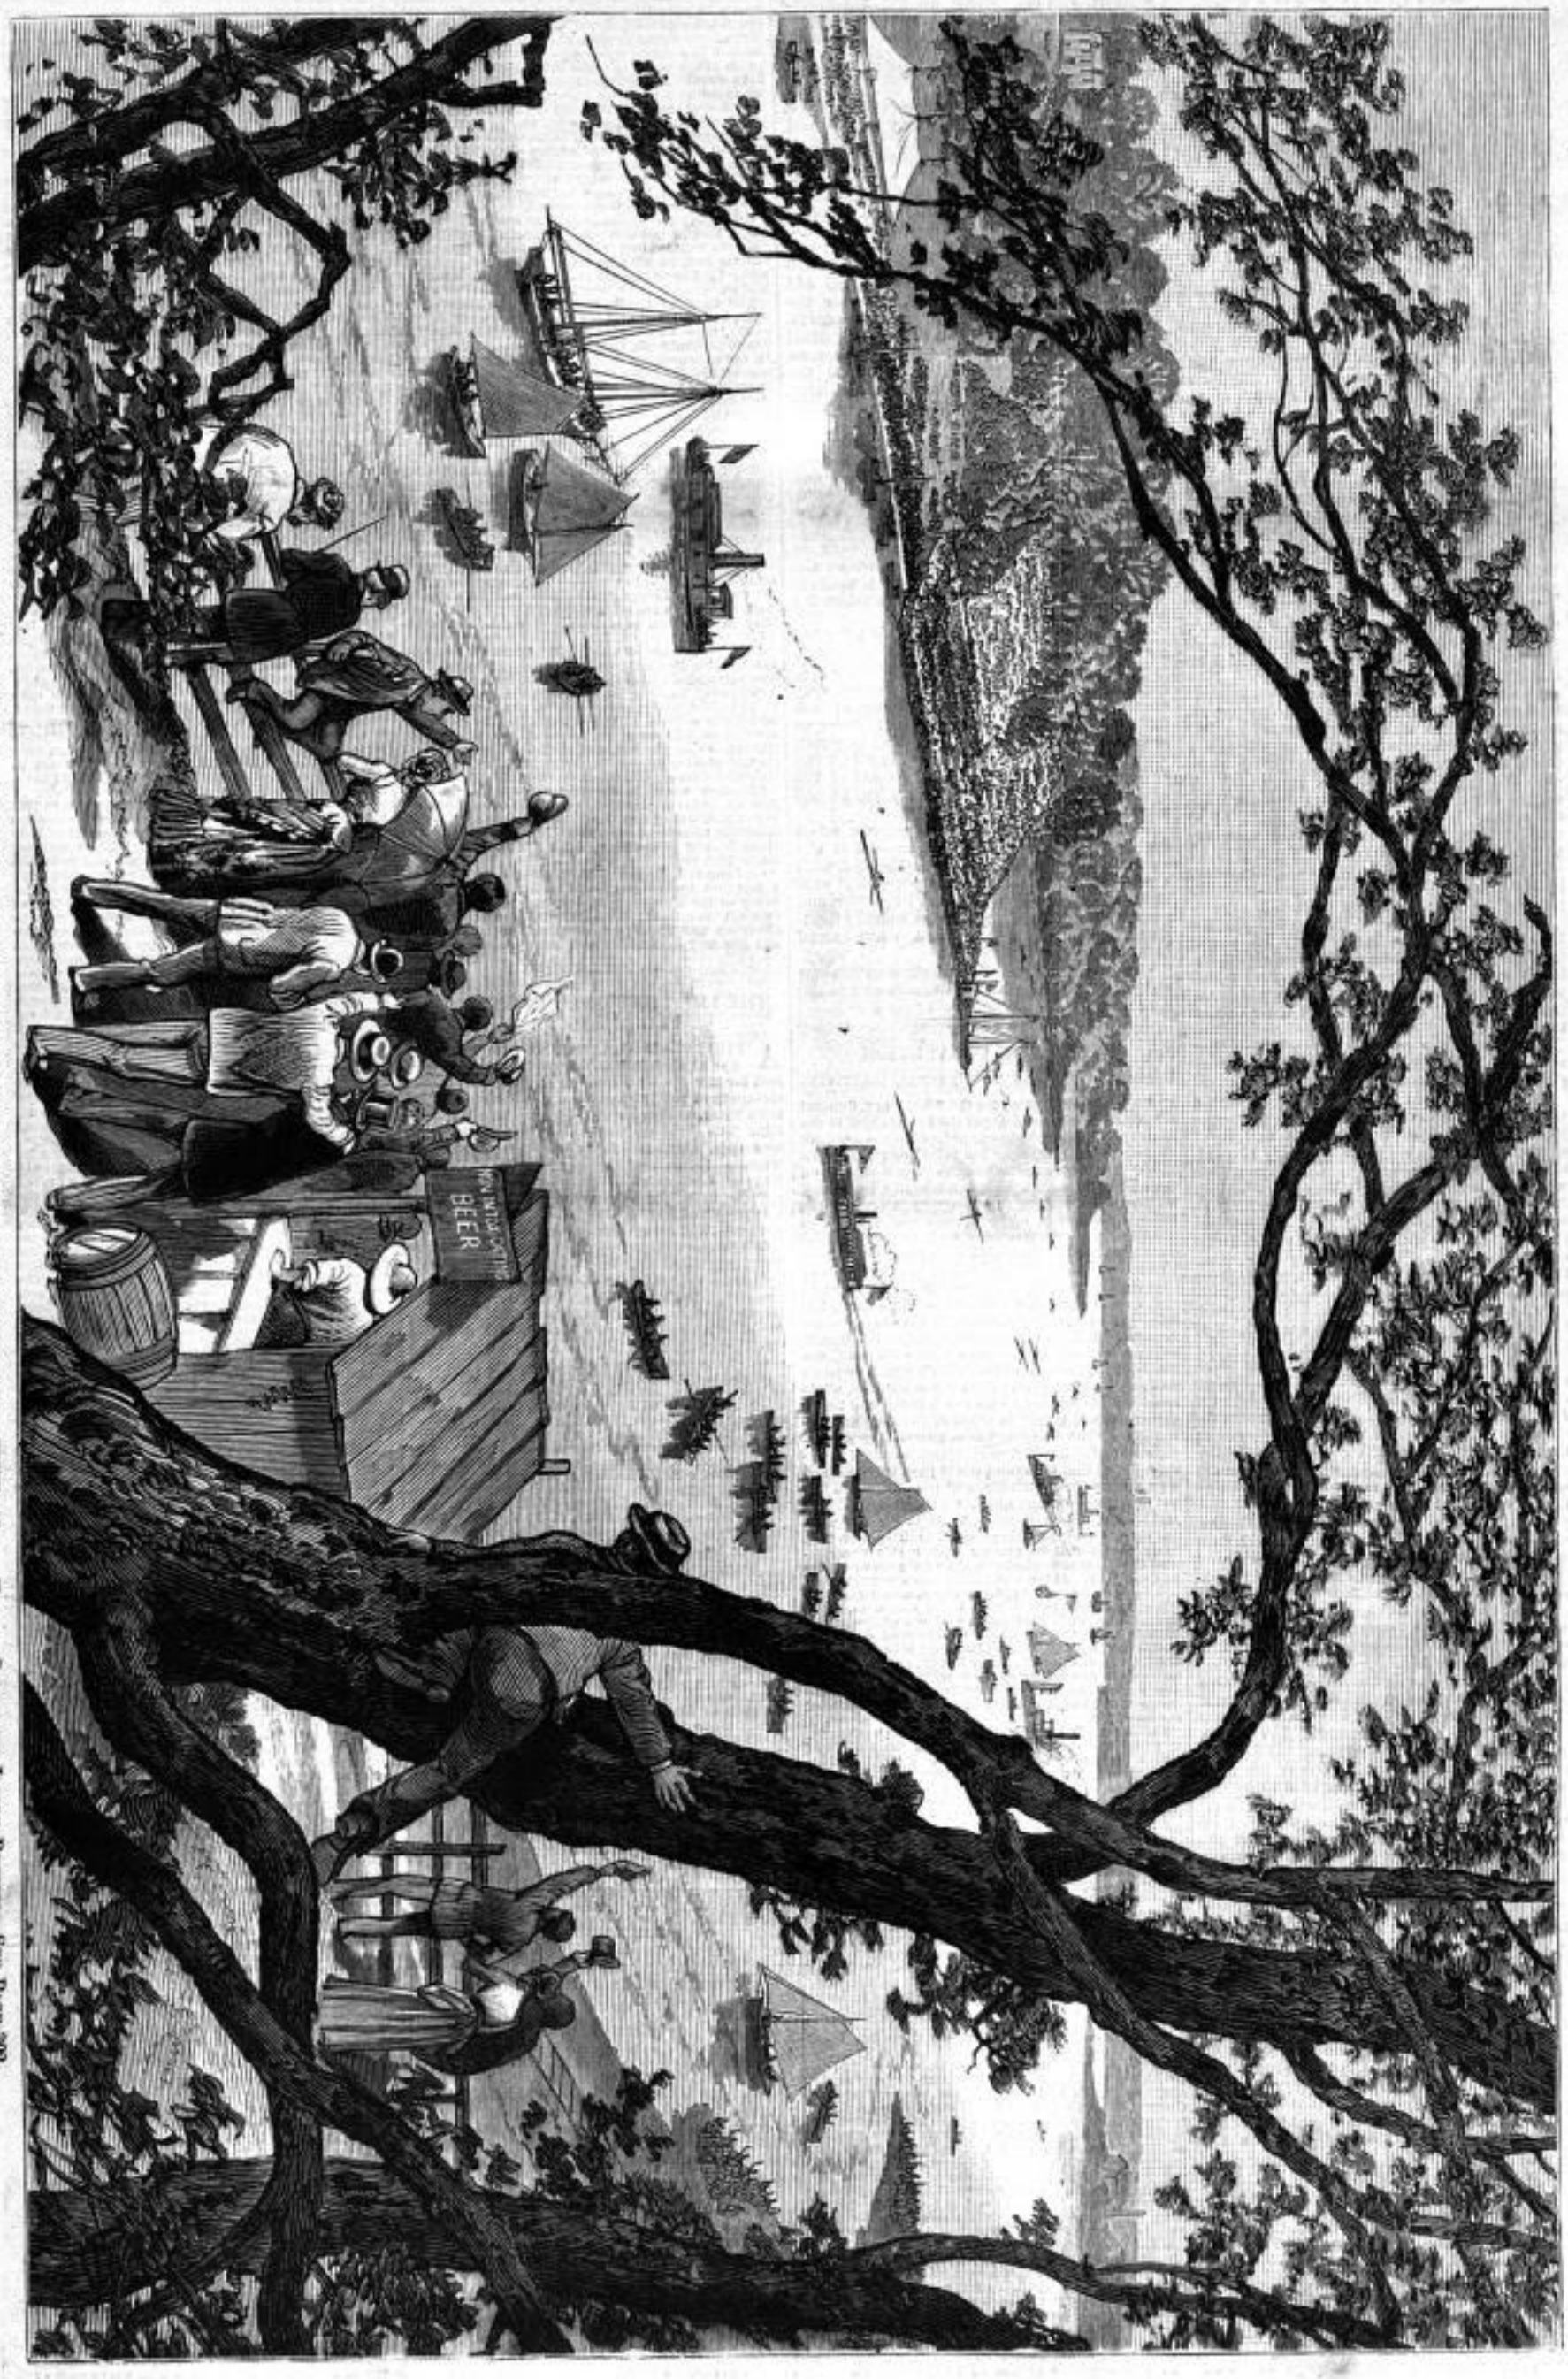
SCOTLAND.—GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE FREE CHURCH.

ITALY.—PROJECTED PROMENADE AND CONCERT GARDENS AT NICE.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—THE NEW VICEREGAL RESIDENCE, MARBLE HILL.

ITALY.—PROCESSION OF STUDENTS AT THE CENTENARY OF ST. CATHARINE, AT SIENA.

FRANCE.—HISTORICAL CAVALCADE AND ROMAN FÊTE, AT RENNES.



BELGIUM.—BLESSING HORSES AT ANDERLECHT, ST. GEORGE'S DAY.

POLAND.—RETURN OF A VILLAGE BRIDE TO THE ENVIRONS OF CRACOW.

Digitized by Google

RHODE ISLAND.—THE INTERNATIONAL REGATTA ON THE SEEKONK RIVER, AT PROVIDENCE, JUNE 17TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.—SEE PAGE 302.

Digitized by Google

BETH'S STORY.

"WHAT an awfully lovely ghost story! I never heard one which made me shiver so deliciously!" cried Beth Aldrige, who was seated with a party of girl friends around a blazing wood fire, on the last night of the old year.

"No, nor I," rejoined another, who actually looked as if she had really been a participator in the ghastly tale just narrated.

"Oh, girls," she added, "just listen to the wind and the rain; was there ever such a sweet night for ghost stories?"

It was truly a pretty picture which the ruddy glow of the fire revealed, as it played now on the grim old armor or the forbidding features of some stern forefather which adorned the walls, and now on the group of heads, blacks, golds and brown, clustered closely together.

The night itself was in accordance with their pastime, for as the wind shrieked and moaned through the leafless branches of the trees, it seemed as if the old year, who was dying to-night, was weeping and wailing, not only for his lost youth and the brightness of his departed glories, but that he would so soon pass from the memory of man who was even now waiting breathlessly to welcome in with joyous peals of merry music his successor.

Ah, well, old year, yours is but the fate of the many who have gone before you, and there are hearts which beat with you, and for you to-night. Requiescat in pace!

"Now, nut-brown maid, it is your turn!" cried Meg Morton, whose face was all aglow with excitement when the exquisite thrills of horror, which had been caused by the last recital, had somewhat subsided.

"I don't remember any ghost story exactly," replied Beth Aldrige, a tall, brown-haired, soft-eyed girl, to whom her companions had given this sobriquet; "but I can tell you a tale which will curdle your blood, and make each individual hair to stand, etc., as effectually as any of that description. Besides," she continued, "it is a bona-fide account of as thrilling and a much sadder event than any which has been told to-night."

After a little pause, during which the group by the fire waited impatiently for the anticipated pleasure, she began:

"It had always been the custom for the Dudleys to invite a large party of young folks to pass the Christmas holidays with them, in their old homestead at Longville, which was in a ruinous condition, but to which the family regularly repaired to eat their Christmas dinner.

"This year the gathering was larger than usual in honor of Minna Field, a bright, pretty girl, who was engaged to Jack Dudley.

"Well, as I said before, the house was a very ancient affair, having been built by some pilgrim ancestor of the Dudleys, and it, of course, had a haunted room, as every respectable old family mansion should. As the guests were so very numerous, it became necessary for some one to occupy this apartment. There was a good deal of joking and laughter about it, and Harry Field, Minna's brother, said, 'Of course one of us fellows will have to sleep there, for the girls would be frightened to death at the mere thought of a ghost.'

"'You may be sure,' Jack Dudley replied. "I never knew a girl yet who wasn't afraid of the dark.'

"'That is the last time you shall ever make a speech so derogatory to my sex, Master Jack!' exclaimed pretty Minna, excitedly, 'for I am going to sleep in the haunted room to-night,' she added, with a triumphant glance at the discomfited males of the party, while the girls crowded around her with an air as if each one of them had made, and was willing to abide by, the heroic choice.

"'Oho! little championess of the gentle sex, so you want to frighten yourself to death with imaginary horrors! No, indeed, my child, I really won't allow it,' said Jack, with an exasperating assumption of authority.

"'Oh, fudge!' exclaimed Harry, with the scornful tone of a younger brother. 'She wouldn't put her nose inside that door for a fortune. I know her.'

"'You do, do you!' returned Minna, with a determined expression in her pretty face. 'Well, you'll see.'

"After this, some encouraged her in her resolution, and others endeavored to dissuade, urging her at least to accept one of the girls as a companion; but to advice of all kind she turned a deaf ear, and when it was time to retire, only allowed the procession which attended her to accompany her as far as the haunted portal. Here she bade them good-night, and, opening the door, entered—alone!

"The candle which she carried in her hand flickered and almost went out in the draft caused by opening the door, and she laughed to herself as she thought of the derisive shouts which would have met her had she been obliged to call for another light.

"She placed her burden on the dressing-table, over which hung a long glass, then turned and surveyed her chosen quarters.

"'Well, I don't see why they should have set this room apart for a ghostly visitant,' she thought. 'What quaint old furniture! That huge, carved wardrobe, and that long, low bed, make quite a picture. Why, I feel as if I were a princess in some old castle on the Rhine.'

"She let down the braids of her sunny hair, and slowly prepared for the night; then, according to a very bad habit which she had contracted during her school-days, she placed the candle on a little table near, and, jumping into bed, opened a book and began to read.

"Somehow or other, she could not fix her attention on the book: thoughts of the triumph she would have at the breakfast table next morning, and the laugh which would be turned against the boys, would thrust themselves between her and the page she was reading, until, finally, breaking out into a little rippling laugh at the anticipated merriment, she glanced into the mirror, which hung directly opposite her. The laugh froze on her lips, for there, under the low bed, was the figure of a man stealthily thrusting out his head.

"She lay still for an instant in an agony of terror, and then slipped quietly out of bed, never removing her gaze from the glass, to which her eyes seemed glued by a terrible fascination, and in which she saw the man crouch further back into his old position.

"She reached the door—after a lapse of hours, it seemed to her overwrought mind—and tried it, but—oh! girls, pity her!—it was fastened on the outside by an old forgotten spring-lock, placed there by some dead and gone Dudley, who had been wont to use the haunted room as a repository for his treasures.

"When at last the full horror of her situation entered her mind, she flew to the bell-rope, an antiquated affair, and pulled with all the strength of despair. The bell gave a faint, ghostly tinkle, and the rope which depended from it gave way from the ceiling.

"Almost beside herself with terror, she turned and saw the robber crawling out from his hiding-place. His head was entirely out, and he had a wicked, jeering smile on his lips, but the bedstead was so low that it was with great difficulty he could move at all.

"Quicker than thought, Minna sprang on the bed and flung the bell-rope, of which she had retained hold, around the man's neck, at the same time pressing him back against the hard, sharp edge.

"The hours wore on and still she kept her awful vigil, until, when the Winter sun shone full in the room upon the rigid, distorted features of the man, and the wild frenzied eyes of the girl, her joyous companions of the previous night came to rouse her, eager to hear of her adventure with the Dudley ghost. They found a raving maniac, holding fast the rope round a dead man's neck, instead of the bright, courageous young girl they had parted with but so few hours before."

There was a long, shivering silence when Beth finished her tale, and then—"Did she ever recover?" asked little May Sheldon, with a white face, and tearful eyes. "No," said Beth, sadly, "she died not very long after, and poor Jack Dudley changed from a merry light-hearted young fellow to a sad, white-haired man.

"That was the last of the festive gatherings at Longville, the house was torn down and the land sold."

AFTER THE CONVENTION.

POPULAR OVATIONS TO GENERAL GARFIELD.

SINCE his nomination for the Presidency, General Garfield has been one of the busiest men in the country. Wherever he has appeared the masses have flocked to see him, hear his voice, and shake his hand. From Chicago he went to Cleveland, and on the night of June 9th he was tendered a reception. Owing to his fatigue this was very brief. On the following day full amends were made, when, in obedience to a general desire, he held a levee in the Kennard House. The committee arranged to have it begin at half past nine o'clock, but long before that time the crowd began to assemble, and when the General arrived, accompanied by his host, Mr. Everett, and his friend, Major D. J. Swaim, Judge-Advocate of the United States Army and formerly adjutant-general on General Garfield's staff, the hands of the clock pointed to nearly ten. The party was greeted with cheers from the multitude, while from the surrounding windows hundreds of handkerchiefs were waved in token of welcome and admiration. The General was conducted by a committee into the hotel. The reception was held in the corridor, so that the crowd could pass up one stairway, gratify their curiosity, and pass down another out into the street and away. On General Garfield's right stood Mayor Harrick, while to his left were the members of the Reception Committee, who had their hands full in getting each man's name, so that the General might know the strangers whom he was saluting. At ten o'clock the doors were thrown open and the crowd began to move, and from that time until half-past eleven there was a constant stream of people passing in and out of the hotel. Shortly after the reception commenced Governor Foster arrived and took a place beside General Garfield, and continued to shake hands, smile and nod during the remainder of the morning. The streets about the Kennard were thickly parked, and hundreds failed to get even within hearing distance of the building.

On June 11th he went to Hiram, Portage County, to preside at the Alumni reunion of the college of which he was formerly president. He did not attend the early forenoon society gathering, but at half-past ten o'clock, with Dr. J. P. Robeson, Captain G. E. Henry, President B. A. Hinsdale, of Hiram College, and Mr. William Robeson—all old friends—he entered the Reunion Hall. There were loud cheers as the General assumed his place on the platform. Prayer was offered by the Rev. J. Knight, of Wilmington, Ohio, and President Hinsdale arose and introduced General Garfield as chairman, with explanatory remarks as to why it had been arranged to have the reunion. The preparations, Mr. Hinsdale said, were made before the nomination of General Garfield, and he had accepted an invitation to preside over the reunion meeting two months ago. He delivered an address, giving a history of the college, and early in the evening, amid loud cheers, bid adieu to Hiram and drove to his home in Mentor, where he was accorded a rousing reception by the farmers.

The new residence, about which there has been much pleasant gossip, was built almost entirely from plans drawn by Mrs. Garfield.

The Garfield farmhouse is not grand in any sense of the word, but will be a pleasant, very convenient country house, superior to the majority along that section of the ridge road. It is of the Gothic style of architecture, mingled, however, with other styles, so as to form what the contractor calls a mixture. A roomy porch extends along the front and part of the side towards Cleveland, affording opportunities for enjoyment in the fresh air and out of the way of the heat of the sun. Lattice-work has been arranged in front for training vines. Sixty feet front by fifty deep is the size, and the structure is two stories and one half high. The apartments are all roomy for a country house, and the wide hallway attracts attention the first thing on entering. General Garfield has marked that section of the plan where the pantry is located, "Plenty of shelves and drawers," and in the rear part of the second floor is written "Snuggery for General." The last mentioned room is rather small, measuring only 13½ x 14 feet. It is to be fitted up with book-shelves, but Garfield will still continue to use as his library the detached building erected a year or two since in the yard, northeast of the house. Two of the best apartments in the eastern and front part of the edifice are being especially fixed up for the occupancy of Mrs. Garfield, the mother of the General. The front room has a large, old-fashioned fireplace, and the pains being taken to make everything comfortable here shows the tender feelings that General Garfield bears towards her who gave him birth. There are very few of the timbers of the old house, over which the new has been constructed, visible at this time, and there will be none in sight when the carpets are put down. The cost of the structure will be, when finished, but between $3,500 and $4,000, which will be remarkably slight when the expense of securing such workmen as were wanted, so far away from the city, is considered.

Our artist was accompanied to the residence by Major Swaim and William N. Hudson, of the Detroit Post and Tribune, and the three were most hospitably entertained, in the absence of the General and his wife, by his venerable mother and his daughter Mollie.

The Garfield family consists of the General, his wife, five children and his mother, for whom he has always shown filial care and the tenderest affection. His two oldest sons, Harry, aged 16, and James, aged 14, are at school at Concord, New Hampshire. Next comes his daughter Mary, a charming girl of 13; then Irwin McDowell, a boy of 9, named after the well-known general, and with all his godfather's spirit and pugnacity; and then the youngest, Abram, 7 years old, named from the General's father. His wife, who was Miss Lucretia Rudolph in her maidenhood, was a farmer's daughter, and is a lady of singularly sweet and refined disposition, fond of study and reading. Last, but not least, in the family is the General's mother, now 79 years old, but hale and vigorous; small in stature, with clear eyes and clearer memory, shrewd sense and pointed and pleasant speech.

After dinner and a season of enjoyable conversation, Mr. Avery, of the Lake View House, on Little Mountain, five miles from the Mentor dwelling, sent Mr. R. P. Briggs, of the Little Mountain House, with a carriage after our artist and Mr. Hudson, and they were driven over beautiful roads to Painesville.

On Wednesday, June 16th, General Garfield reached the National Capital, and in the evening was serenaded at the Riggs House by the National Veterans of Washington, accompanied by a number of Republican organizations. A temporary stand had been erected at the G Street entrance to the hotel, and had been gayly decorated with flags, streamers and gas-jets, and a calcium lamp, placed on the portico of the Treasury building near by, lighted up the street, the crowd and the platform.

Speeches were delivered by Attorney-General Devens, General Garfield, Senator Logan, General Anson McCook, of New York; Mr. Palgner, of South Carolina, and Representatives Haskell, Henderson, Shallenberger and others, after which the assemblage dispersed.

On June 17th General Garefild was entertained at a banquet by the members of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland, residing in Washington. General Sherman, Secretaries Schurz, Ramsey, Sherman and Thompson, Postmaster-General Key and Attorney-General Devens were present.

THE INTERNATIONAL REGATTA AT PROVIDENCE, R. I.

A FIRST-CLASS day, an immense audience, worthy competitors, a splendid start, and defeat for the plucky Canadian oarsman—such is a summary of the International Regatta on the Seekonk River, at Providence, R. I., on Thursday, June 17th. The great contest was preceded by an amateur race, in which there were seven starters: William Murray, of Portsmouth, Va.; Timothy Murphy, of Norwich, Conn.; Frank E. Holmes, of Pawtucket, R. I.; Edward Hayden, of Boston; George Gaisel, of New York; Jno. Buckley, of Portland, Me., and Joseph Laing, of Montreal.

The official time for the three miles, as given by D. H. Morrissey and Captain Gorman, the timekeepers, was as follows: Holmes, 22m. 44s.; Gaisel, 22m. 58s.; Laing, 23m. 10s.; Murray, 23m. 16½s.; Buckley, 23m. 36s.; Hayden, 23m. 48s.; Murphy not timed. Through this race Mr. Frank Holmes, of the Pawtucket Club, who is a well-made young man of twenty-seven or eight, not only lays very good claim upon the much-disputed title of "amateur single-sculls champion," but secures a really desirable trophy in the shape of an immense silver cup, said to be worth $1,000.

The professional race, in accordance with the prescribed limitations, after a lapse of fifteen or twenty minutes, was next in order, and the oarsmen were called out. Ten starters took positions at the post, numbering from the bank as follows: Wallace Ross, St. John, N. B., 1; George W. Lee, Newark, N. J., 2; James Riley, Saratoga, N. Y., 3; Horatio Delano, Chelsea, Mass., 4; James A. Ten Eyck, Peekskill, N. Y., 5; Fred. A. Plaisted, Boston, Mass., 6; Jacob Gaudier, Toronto, Canada, 7; James A. Dempsey, Geneva, N. Y., 8; Robert W. Boyd, Middleboro, England, 9; Edward Hanlan, Toronto, Canada, 10.

At the signal Hanlan rushed to the front, and was followed by Boyd and Riley. After a time Ross pushed ahead of Boyd, and they fought steadily for the third position beyond the half mile. Finally Ross passed the Englishman and sped for Hanlan, passing him before reaching the turning-point by three or four lengths, with Riley second and Hanlan third. Gaudier and Boyd fouled their buoys. Ross maintained his lead. About half a mile from the turn, Hanlan was observed to stop rowing and rest on his oars. When asked what was the matter he placed his hand on his chest as though experiencing pain. At this time Ross was several lengths in advance, with Riley second. The water was exceedingly rough, and one of the oarsmen fell out of his boat. Ross kept his lead easily, and at the finish had a lead of 26 seconds, with Riley second, and Ten Eyck third. The following is the official time of the three winners, that of the others not being taken: Ross, 29m., 54s.; Riley, 30m., 30½s.; Ten Eyck, 30m., 5s.

The prizes amounted to $5,000, and were divided as follows: $3,000 to first, $1,500 to second, and $500 to third.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE RESOURCES AND PROSPECTS OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON, S. C., June 7th, 1880.

To the Editor of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper:

TO appreciate what has been accomplished since 1865, and to understand how well grounded are the present anticipations of continued progress and increasing prosperity, it is necessary to describe briefly the losses the State has sustained and the gigantic difficulties which have been already overcome.

The value of the real and personal property in South Carolina in 1860, according to the United States Census, was $907,816,288. In 1869 only nine years later, the entire value of the real and personal property, as assessed for taxation by the State Government, was $168,434,553. At this time gold was at thirty premium, so that the gold value of the entire taxable property of South Carolina was less than $130,000,000. The loss in nine years in actual money value reached, therefore, the enormous sum of $437,816,288. In this is included, of course, the loss by the emancipation of the slaves; but there was a depreciation of over $120,000,000 in the value of real estate alone. The banks were insolvent; the railroads were worn out; little remained save the land and such buildings as had escaped the torch of invading armies.

It is doubtful that the extent of their disaster was realized by the people of the State. The negroes were still here, and excluding the value of their increment as property from the account, it was evidently cheaper to hire negroes than to own them. In hiring free negroes the whole expense is for wages and food. There are no women or children or aged persons to support. There are no doctors' bills to pay. If the laborer dies there is no loss of capital on the part of his employer. These things, no doubt, encouraged the people to resume their agricultural operations, with no other change than was involved in having freedmen instead of slaves to work their crops. The high price of cotton was a great temptation. They who had sold their cotton satisfactorily five or six years before in slave times at six or seven cents a pound, saw no difficulty in quickly realizing a fortune when the staple was selling at thirty and forty cents. The mistake was in not taking into account the difference in the efficiency of the labor, the disturbances caused by political agitation, the inflated price of provisions, the high rate of interest and the onerous commissions and expenses charged by those who made advances to planters.

Year by year, with occasional fluctuations, cotton steadily fell in price, and the result of the agricultural operations of the six or seven years from 1866 to 1873 was widespread failure and embarrassment both for the farmers and planters, and for those who had provided capital for them.

It should be noted that the difficulties of the agricultural as well as the mercantile classes were aggravated by the intolerance and extravagance of the State Government. For the ten years prior to 1860 the annual expenses of conducting the State Government was $400,000. In the year 1872 the Legislative expenses and the salaries of State officers alone amounted to over $800,000, and in 1873 the cost of the public printing was $331,000. Otherwise stated, the expenditures for salaries, public printing, public asylums and sundries, were $261,000 in 1865, the last year of the old State Government, and in 1872 amounted to $1,358,000. Five years of Republican rule cost South Carolina over $22,000,000, including taxes amounting to $8,825,000. Is it not strange, therefore, that the number of delinquents was enormous. In the years 1873 and 1874 no less than 868,657 acres of land, equal to 1,326 square miles, were sold by, or forfeited to, the State on account of unpaid taxes. This, too, was in only twenty-two of the thirty-two counties in the State. One acre in every nineteen acres of land in the State was in these two years confiscated under the guise of taxation!

The State could go no lower. The people in 1874 touched bottom. They had learned by experience that they must keep within their means; that they must pay attention to making their own provisions; that they must diversify their crops and redouble their efforts to raise live-stock. The rule had been to raise cotton to the practical exclusion of everything else. Inexorable necessity had now taught the people that their maxim must be to "make bread and meat first and cotton last." They were encouraged, likewise, by a decided improvement in the tendencies of the State Government, and were inspired with new hope by the promise of reform under the administration of Governor Chamberlain. Additional help was given them by the circumstance that the decline in the price of provisions far exceeded the decline in the price of cotton. In January, 1868, middling cotton was quoted in Charleston at 15 cents; corn, $1.20 a bushel; flour, (N. and W. super.) $11 per barrel; Western rib sides 13½ and 14 cents a pound. In January, 1874, cotton was still quoted at 15 cents, while corn had fallen to 90 cents, flour to $6.50 a barrel, and bacon to 9 cents a pound.

From 1874 to 1876 the State at least held its own, and the result of the State election in the Fall of the last named year gave a fresh start to every industry. It gave the people as well the assurance of just and equal government as of security for person and property. There was likewise an instant decrease in taxation. Comparing the expenses of the State Government as met by taxation for the years 1876-7 and 1877-8 with the four previous years under Republican rule, it is calculated that the saving to the people amounted to nearly one million and a half dollars a year, as the first result of the election of a Democratic State Government. Indeed, in 1877-8 the whole expense of the State Government in every branch—exclusive of the interest on the public debt and the appropriation for public schools—was $363,723, which is less than the average annual expense under the same head from 1850 to the breaking out of the war. It was shown also by reports of the judges and the State solicitors that in the years 1877 and 1878 there were only two cases of crime committed by white persons against colored persons. The records of every county showed that crimes had decreased both in number and degree. Punishment swiftly and surely followed every offense. The pardoning power was no longer a shield to the criminal classes. Justice still was blind, but Mercy saw extenuating circumstances, which gave an opportunity for a judicious display of Executive clemency. In 1877 and 1878, of eighty-one persons who were pardoned by Governor Hampton sixty-two were colored persons.

From 1876 to the present time lands in the State have slowly but steadily improved in value. The people as a whole are better off than at any previous time since 1865. They are generally out of debt. They know how to work successfully under the new condition, and they have learned how to take advantage of new opportunities. Two examples will illustrate the progress which has been made:

1. There are in South Carolina seventeen cotton factories with 26,928 spindles and 1,983 looms. They produce 103,336 yards of cloth and 17,438 pounds of yarn for each working day, and consume for each such day 34,704 pounds of cotton. They employ 2,612 operatives, who support 6,143 persons. The capital employed amounts to $2,250,000. The profits range from 18 to 50 per cent on the capital invested. For those who believe in the economic principle of "bringing the mills to the cotton," there are opportunities in South Carolina that cannot be surpassed in any other State of the Union. The water-power in the middle and upper counties of the State is immense—enough to turn the spindles of all the cotton mills in the United States. At Trotter's Shoals, on the Savannah River, Abbeville County, there are twenty-one miles of water-power, with only a single ancient grist and saw mill! At Mountain Shoals, on Enoree River, Spartanburg County, there is a fall in the river of 155 feet in the distance of one mile. At this point there is only one grist and flouring mill. All through the State there is abundant water-power, with available sites for the establishment of cotton manufactories, offering an open field to the enterprise and capital of the world.

2. The Sea Islands of South Carolina, which appeared to be ruined beyond redemption, are so improved by the new system of subsoil drainage and heavy manuring that lands on the Islands range in value from $40 to $200 an acre. On James Island, near Charleston, last year one planter realized a net profit of $100 an acre, after expending $80 an acre for fertilizers, labor and ginning.

This will give an idea of what has been done, and is at the same time a happy omen of the future.

South Carolina abounds in timber. There is an almost inexhaustible supply of pine, hickory, walnut, maple, cedar, poplar and other woods, valuable for use and ornament. The forests abound in game. Fish are found in all the streams of the interior, and are brought in regular supply from the rivers and banks near the sea. Pisciculture is receiving systematic attention, and young salmon, shad and other fish are being distributed by the Commissioner of Agriculture. The climate corresponds with that of the south of France and of Italy, and even in the low country perfect health may be enjoyed with proper care for personal cleanliness and regular living. The climate, too, is strikingly uniform, being neither so hot nor so cold as in the North and West. Cotton is grown in every part of the State up to the very slopes of the mountains on the borders of the State. The yield ranges from 200 to 400 pounds of ginned or commercial cotton an acre. South Carolina rice is the finest known in commerce, and its culture is exceedingly profitable. The prairies of the Great West do not give a larger yield of corn than can be obtained in South Carolina. Over 100 bushels of corn to the acre have frequently been raised, and as much as 200 bushels have been made. The average is 25 bushels of corn per acre, 15 bushels of wheat, 20 bushels of oats or rye, and 40 bushels of barley.

Scientific farming is largely increasing the average crop. For instance, it has been established that on the light, sandy lands of the lower part of the State, which sell for four or five dollars an acre, there can be made from 40 to 60 bushels of oats to the acre, from 20 to 30 bushels of wheat or two crops of fine hay. This is effected by fertilizing with the cow-pea and a mixture of phosphate of lime and calcined marl. The cost does not exceed $15 an acre, and the average net profit will run from $20 to $16. It is easy to see that there is no need to "go West" when so large and sure returns can be made in a State like South Carolina, where the markets are within easy reach, and the new-comer enjoys advantages which cannot be had in newly-settled States.

Besides cotton and rice, the usual productions are tobacco, sorghum, hemp, flax, indigo, hops and all kinds of small grain and peas. The grape grows luxuriantly, and excellent wine is made in Darlington, Aiken and other counties. Fruits of every kind reach a high state of perfection. On the coast near Charleston the cultivation of the strawberry is an important branch of trade, as well as the growth of potatoes, peas, cucumbers, tomatoes, beans, asparagus and garden vegetables generally. The value of the fruits and vegetables raised around Charleston every year is about $800,000. Experiments show that the tea plant can be grown successfully, also the olive. In vegetables South Carolina can grow almost whatever can be grown in any garden in the world.

The mineral wealth of the State even now is not fully appreciated. Iron is found in Union, Spartanburg, Greenville and Pickens counties. There is gold in these same counties, and also in Abbeville, Lancaster, and York. Several gold mines are in successful operation. Lead is found in Pickens County and copper in York, Spartanburg and Pickens. Besides these, South Carolina has manganese, bismuth, plumbago, soapstone, coal, black lead and asbestos. There is also granite of the finest grain, as well as sandstone, burr-stone, flag stone and materials for pottery and porcelain clay.

The discovery of the value of the phosphatic rock or nodules as a fertilizer took place in 1866, and was of vast benefit to the low country directly and to the whole State indirectly. The total production so far is 1,500,000 tons, worth $9,000,000. The accessible deposits cover 10,000 acres, estimated to contain 5,000,000 tons of rock, worth at about the present prices, $30,000,000. The yield to the acre is at least 500 tons, making lands which were almost worthless for agricultural purposes command what would have been deemed a fabulous price. The rock is found in the beds of the rivers as well as on land, and the State Government has received as royalty on the rock mined in rivers and navigable streams over half a million dollars. The exports of phosphate rock amounted last year to 210,394 tons, and 40,000 tons of commercial fertilizers, with Carolina rock as the basis, were manufactured last year by the factories around Charleston. These factories have a capital of between $600,000 and $800,000.

The railroads, which were in a terribly dilapidated condition ten or twelve years ago, are now in good order and projecting western connections that will cheapen breadstuffs and provisions and pour new life through the arteries of the State.

Foremost among the public works is the grand system of jetties in Charleston Harbor, undertaken by the National Government, and confidently expected by the Government engineers to increase the depth of water on the bar to twenty-five or twenty-six feet, making Charleston the finest harbor on the South Atlantic coast.

Renewed attention is given to manufactures since the profitable character of cotton spinning in the State has been generally known. Three or four large factories have been organized within the last two months, and Columbia, the capital of the State, is now looking forward to the speedy commencement of operations by a company of Northern capitalists, who, under a grant from the State, propose to put up factories with 36,312 spindles on the long-neglected water-power of the Columbia Canal.

The public schools of Charleston will compare most favorably with similar institutions in the larger Northern cities, and afford thorough instruction in the lower and middle branches to nearly 7,000 pupils. The Charleston College furnishes the means of higher education. The last Legislature provided for the opening, in October, of the State Agricultural College, a branch of the State University. Claflin University, at Orangeburg, is also a branch of this institution, and is devoted exclusively to the education of the colored people. In addition to these colleges there are a number of denominational institutions in the State—Erskine College, at Due West, Associate Reformed Presbyterian; Newberry College, at Newberry, Lutheran; Wofford College, at Spartanburg, Methodist; Furman University, at Greenville, Baptist; Adger College, at Walhalla, Presbyterian. There are also female colleges at Williamston, Greenville, Due West and Columbia. Military academies are in active operation at Yorkville and Greenville. All of these schools are under the control of able and experienced professors, and maintain a high standard of scholarship. The total attendance in the public schools of the State last year was 122,483—White, 58,368; colored, 64,095.

It would take more time than I can give, and more space than you can spare, to describe fully the valid and cogent reasons for my unshaken faith in the future of South Carolina. I have said enough, I trust, to show that the State has overcome difficulties which seemed to be insurmountable. That she has largely improved her position in every department of agriculture and manufactures, the cornerstone of the social and industrial fabric; and that, with the assurance of just, equal and economical government and low taxation—with the public debt settled in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of the State; with the public school system enlarged and improved, and an increase of 40 per cent. in the average attendance of the pupils; with the peaceful and contented disposition of the colored people and the determination of the whites to command success—there is nothing to prevent South Carolina from becoming a powerful and wealthy State; not growing up in a night like Jonah's gourd, but built up stone by stone and course by course, solid, massive and enduring.

I am yours, very truly,

F. W. DAWSON.

Uses of the Telephone.

THE practical uses of the telephone are being constantly extended. It now appears as the means by which an important improvement in British journalism has just been made by the London Times, namely, the reporting of the late after-midnight debates in the House of Commons. It seems that the many prominent men — those whose speeches in Parliament are most widely read—are in the habit of speaking at very late hours. Owing to this fact, and to the further fact that the leading morning trains start an hour earlier than formerly, it has always been difficult, and sometimes impossible, for the great morning dailies to give a satisfactory report of what was said in the House the night of going to press. It has been scarcely practicable to give a full report of a speech made after one o'clock, and only a mere abstract of what was said or done after two o'clock was possible. The reports of late speeches, necessarily imperfect, have given rise to complaints on the part of members of Parliament, and even to suggestions that some more satisfactory means of publishing the Parliamentary debates be provided. To overcome these difficulties the London Times has called the telephone to its aid. It has made telephonic communication between its office and the House of Commons, in each of which is placed one of Edison's loud-speaking telephones. Instead of writing out his notes and transmitting them by telegraph or otherwise—a proceeding which has heretofore consumed a good deal of precious time—the reporter, or, if he is busy, some other person, reads the report in the telephone receiver placed in a room adjoining the gallery. At the receiver at the other end in the printing-office is the compositor. The disk of the telephone is placed above and behind him. Two tubes, with trumpet shaped ends, are so arranged that one end of each is at the telephone disk and the other ends at the ears of the compositor. In this way all distracting noises are shut off. There is speaking and bell communication with a system of signals between the compositor and the reporter so as to secure a perfect understanding and harmony of operation. As the reporter in Parliament reads, the compositor in the printing-office sets the type. Still greater rapidity is secured by the use of the machine by which the type are brought down and placed in position by manipulating keys resembling those of a piano. With this machine it is stated that a printer, working from dictation, can set up nearly two hundred lines an hour, or about one hundred lines from manuscript, whereas, from forty to fifty lines an hour are said to be the limit of type-setting by hand. By the use of the telephone and the type-setting machine, the Parliamentary debates are now brought down by the London Times from one half to three-quarters of an hour later than they were reported a few weeks ago, and it is believed that a higher degree of accuracy is attained. The method is regarded as a great practical success even now, and it will doubtless be much improved in the course of time.

Restoring the Jews to Palestine.

"SIXTY years ago," says the Philadelphia Press, "Mordecai M. Noah built a monument on Grand Island upon which was inscribed: 'Ararat, a City of Refuge for the Jews.' It was the dream of his life to restore the Kingdom of Israel at that place, but it came to the end of all dreams. It has recently been rumored that Mr. Lawrence Oliphant, that world-wide traveler and accomplished man of the world, had, at the instigation of Sir Moses Montefiore, at last gained a concession of certain districts in Palestine, where the oft-attempted project of that venerable philanthropist is to be carried out. It is now stated semi-authoritatively in the English press that among the projects which Mr. Goschen will present to the Sultan is that of forming into a united Jewish colony the districts of Galaad and Moab, which are at present inhabited only by a few nomad tribes. The Ottoman Government would retain its suzerain rights over this territory, which was formerly the part of the Promised Land set aside for the tribes of Gad, Reuben and Manasseh, and would receive in return for its concession, in other respects, a respectable number of millions from certain capitalists, who have undertaken that they shall be forthcoming. The new colony would be subjected to the authority of a prince of Jewish race and religion and would serve as the nucleus of a second Kingdom of Israel."

Bismarck's Big Dog.

ONE of the most important and generally respected members of Prince Bismarck's household is a huge hound, popularly designated "The Realm Dog." This animal, his mighty master's inseparable companion, is stern of aspect and wrathful in disposition. He inspires fear, rather than love, in all men save one, and has acquired a somewhat formidable renown for having "collared" several eminent personages—among them Prince Gortschakoff—whose appearance inspired him with distrust, or in whom his instincts revealed to him the entertainment of hostile purpose towards his lord. For his extraordinary intelligence in this respect he is highly prized by the Chancellor, who is known to entertain considerable faith in the accuracy of the Realm Dog's judgment of human character. The other day two delegates from Altona, charged with the presentation of a petition from that town to his Highness, were received by Prince Bismarck in special audience. The Chancellor sat in his comfortable rocking chair, the Realm Dog stretched on the carpet by his side, while the delegates, Messrs. Nothnagel and Semper, took their seats on a leathern couch facing his Highness. Mr. Nothnagel held a roll of paper in his right hand, and, being an energetic speaker, accustomed to emphasize his arguments by gesticulation, he waved his scroll about while addressing the Chancellor, disregardful of the fact that his movements elicited several successive disapproving utterances from the watchful hound. Presently the dog rose with a fierce growl, whereupon Prince Bismarck, hastily interrupting his interlocutor's remarks, exclaimed: "Do put down that scroll, I beg of you. My dog, like myself, entertains a profound aversion to every kind of paper. He believes it to be a weapon!" It is needless to add that Mr. Nothnagel promptly complied with his request, obviously to the satisfaction of the Realm Dog, who forthwith subsided into his former peaceful attitude.

History of the Drum.

DRUMMERS and their drums are to be eliminated from the French army by the reforming zeal of General Farre, and that the infantry soldier will not march better in consequence of this latest innovation may be safely predicted, for any attempt he may have made hitherto to keep step has been mainly due to the rataplan. Comparatively little importance, however is attached in France to regularity of step, though a regiment which makes any show of it is invariably the most cheered at reviews, this being one of the inconsistencies prevalent there which it would be vain to attempt explaining. The Minister of War explained before the Budget Committee that his reason for adopting the change is because drummers are not combatants, so he proposes to replace them by trumpeters, who do come under that category. Like the white leather aprons of the sappers, which have disappeared for some time, the little parchment covered cylinders are henceforth doomed. We do not know whether the origin of the drum has ever been traced by some patient inquirer. We have been told that it comes to us from the East, and that the Moors first brought it into Europe. Certain is the fact that the most savage races have always rejoiced in their tamtams, and, as the pleasure of making a noise is inherent in human nature, perhaps this most effective way of creating a din was invented by Adam's sons or grandsons. But the drum does not appear to have been used in the French army until towards the close of the fourteenth century, and its introduction is attributed to the English invasion under Edward III.; its general adoption by the infantry dates back to the time of Louis XI., when the Swiss element was largely infused into the royal forces. The drum at that epoch was a shapeless instrument, and served more for rallying the troops or for the conveyance of the word of command than for regulating the step, which was far from being as measured as it is now. Each captain had a drummer in his private livery, and he employed him to carry his orders or his instructions as much as for beating the word of command: the drummer in those days appears to have been a kind of aide-de-camp. The covering was usually made from the hide of some animal—generally of an ass—though if it be true that John Ziska, the avenger of Huss, bequeathed his skin to his gallant companions-in-arms to form the covering of a drum which was to summon them in case of danger, material more noble was at least once made to serve the purpose. The drum was not used for drilling infantry to keep step until the middle of the eighteenth century, and the roll, such as we now know it, was only regulated some hundred years ago. The drummer's art then became more difficult, and to perfect it regimental schools were established, the master of which was the drum major, who in recent times was still such a prominent and popular personage in each French regiment. The period of his greatest glory was the First Empire, when the drum-major of the Grenadiers of the Guard had rank as a captain and wore a uniform which cost Napoleon $600. Under the Restoration and the Monarchy of July drum-majors were given to the regiments of firemen, and even to those of the National Guard; but of late years their prestige has diminished in a great extent, and also their stature; they are no longer such imposing clothes-horses, all lace and feathers, towering above ordinary mortals; the race has, in fact, been visibly deteriorating. Such as they are, however, they will now disappear from the head of French regiments, with their drums.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Annual Assemblies of the Scottish Churches.

On Thursday, May 20th, the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland commenced its annual sittings in Edinburgh. In the morning a levee was held in Holyrood House, and at noon the Earl of Rosslyn, Lord High Commissioner, accompanied by the Countess of Rosslyn, went in procession to St. Giles's Cathedral, where divine service was conducted by the Rev. J. Chrystal, of Auchtinlech, the retiring Moderator. They afterwards went to General Assembly Hall, where the Assembly was constituted, the new Moderator, Dr. Archibald Watson, of St. Mary's, Dundee, was chosen, a committee was appointed to answer Her Majesty's letter, and a variety of reports and motions were considered. The General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland commenced its sittings on the same date, but it was not until the following Thursday that the case of Professor Robertson Smith was considered. On that day the galleries of the Free Assembly Hall were crowded with ladies and gentlemen, and the sitting lasted from 10 A.M. until after midnight. There were originally no fewer than twenty-four distinct charges against the Professor, but practically they were all included in the accusation that his views with regard to the historical authority of the Book of Deuteronomy were contradictory of the Confession of Faith. The proceedings commenced against him some three years ago. After an animated debate a motion to admonish the Professor, but leave him in possession of the chair, was carried.

The Projected Jetty Promenade at Nice.

The pleasure and health-seekers at Nice have long felt the want of a proper building for balls, exhibitions, shooting-matches and the like. Mr. James Bruniess, an English engineer, has proposed a jetty promenade, running out like our long piers and with a Summer palace at the seaward end, which will afford halls for all the desired objects, with restaurants, saloons, and rooms for those who habitually will stroll out on the jetty to enjoy the sea air, and sit down to chat and enjoy fruits or ices or cool Summer drinks. The project has been adopted with enthusiasm, so that its erection is assured.

New Viceregal Residence, South Australia.

Marble Hill, Adelaide, one of the highest and most picturesque peaks of the Mount Lofty Range, is the site of the new viceregal residence. It is a splendid building, worthy of the colony and of Her British Majesty's representative there, and has been erected at a total cost of $100,000. Marble-hill is about four miles beyond Norton's Summit, and therefore about twelve and a half miles from the city. The viceregal residence is erected on the top of the hill, fully 2,000 feet above the level of the sea. The building is of two stories, with a square prospect-tower rising to a height of about seventy feet, and surrounded by battlements which struck many of the visitors as a little more suitable to an ancient castle where cannon might have to be used than to a mere view-tower on a mountain in peace-loving South Australia. There are twenty-six rooms in the house, which is fitted up with everything likely to be required for the comfort and convenience of those who may hereafter live in it. A veranda and balcony ten feet wide extend round three sides of the building.

Centenary of St. Catharine at Siena.

"Great citizen, great soul, great writer, and in the opinion of her contemporaries, which subsequent ages ratify, sublime in sanctity," are the epithets applied to St. Catharine of Siena, daughter of James Benincasa, a dyer, whose shop still exists. The procession was historical, representing costumes of various districts in Italy in the fifteenth century, with their appropriate banners. St. Catharine of Siena was born in Siena, Italy, and took an active part in arresting the civil wars of her time and restoring peace and concord. She exerted all her influence to recall the Popes from Avignon to Italy, and her writings, from the eloquence and beauty of their style, have become "standards" for the purest Italian.

The Great Cavalcade at Rennes.

Several departments of Brittany concurred in a provincial festival at Rennes on the 23d of May. The cortège was prepared to represent the old Roman days, and our illustration shows it passing the square of the Palace of Justice. The catapult on a car manned by Roman soldiers, and that of vestals carrying the high priest's throne, with the priestesses of Vesta surrounding the altar of the sacred fire, attracted general attention. These were designed by Laloy after ancient monuments. In the line were centurions, lictors, senators, athletes, retiarii, gladiators of various kinds, horse and foot soldiers, all true to the latter in costume. It was a perfect reproduction of old Roman times, and was not only instructive but useful, as the proceeds of the day were devoted to charity.

Blessing Horses in Belgium.

In a recent issue we published an illustration of the blessing of cows in Russia, an interesting feature of St. George's Day. At Anderlecht, in Belgium, horses are blessed by the clergy on the same day and with equal ceremony. The day is devoted to fêtes, in which the horses, oddly caparisoned, perform an important part, and every possible respect to the memory of the patron saint is paid.

A Polish Wedding Party near Cracow Returning Home.

Wedding festivities are the great public rejoicings in the old rural parts of Europe. In great cities the festivities are confined to the house and to a stately reception, but in village life all take part in the general merry-making, all being equal and all the villagers being in some way related by blood or consanguinity, or friendship with the bridegroom or the bride. Our picture shows such a scene in Poland, near the city of Cracow, where the bride and her bridesmaids, all crowned with flowers, have reached her new home amid a gay escort of friends.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—IT is denied that China is making preparations for war.

—TRADE in India is greatly depressed, and it is feared that a crisis is at hand.

—BETWEEN 300 and 400 Hindoo families in Balasore, India, have recently abjured heathenism.

—THE party in Afghanistan opposed to the English is gathering men, and there is talk of a holy war.

—THE King and Queen of Belgium, on June 15th, opened the Brussels Exhibition with much ceremony.

—THE plague, said to be the black quarter, which has broken out among the cattle in Winnipeg, Manitoba, carries off its victims in twelve hours.

—THE Berlin Statistical Bureau publishes a return showing that 12,888 emigrants from Germany came to the United States during the first quarter of the current year.

—THE French Government, to oblige the Emperor of Germany, has refused to authorize the sale of the French translation of "The Political Comedy of Europe" at the railway stations.

—THE conference in Madrid to determine the status of foreigners in Morocco is at a dead lock over the question of the right of protection to foreigners which may be exercised by consuls.

—THE first honorary prize at the Berlin Fish Exhibition was awarded to Professor Baird, of the Smithsonian Institution, and a large number of medals were given to other Americans.

—THE Great Council of the Canton of Geneva has passed to a second reading a Bill for the separation of Church and State by a vote of 50 to 42. The Old Catholics regard the measure with favor.

—THE issue price of the £15,000,000 worth of Cuban mortgage bonds at six per cent., redeemable in twenty years by quarterly drawings, is fixed at eighty-three. Two thirds of the loan will be offered on June 30th.

—STATISTICS of the foreign commerce of Calcutta show that for the last few years the proportion of the whole trade absorbed by England has been slowly decreasing, while that of America and China has been increasing.

—THE returns to the Agricultural Department indicate an increase of seven per cent. in the acreage of the cotton crop. Winter wheat is in remarkably good condition. There is a slight increase in the acreage of Spring wheat.

—IT is believed that a general amnesty will be proclaimed in France on the national fête day, which, by a recent decree of the Chamber of Deputies, is now fixed for the 14th of July—the anniversary of the taking of the Bastile—instead of the 15th of August, the imperial fête day.

—M. JULES FERRY, Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts, has appointed Messrs. Gaston L. Feurdant and H. de Morgan, of New York, agents of the French Government for the United States, to facilitate scientific expeditions and effect exchanges with American museums.

—THE members of the harem of the ex-Khédive of Egypt have embarked on a steamer of the Rubbattino Company for Stamboul, despite the dispatch from the Porte disclaiming that they could not be received. Redif Pasha accompanies them. If they land neither in Turkey nor Egypt they will return to Naples.

—THE Paris Figaro prints an account of a Legitimist conspiracy, to which the Count of Chambord is said to be privy. A number of French Senators and Deputies have had a conference on the amnesty question, and it is now thought that the whole strength of the Ministry will be thrown in support of a Plenary Amnesty Bill in the hope that the Senate will yield.

—THE rumors regarding the insolvency of the First National Bank of Bentleboro, Vt., have been more than realized. Enough is already known to warrant the statement that the loss will reach upwards of $400,000 mainly through the forgeries of the president, S. M. Wait, who has undoubtedly left the country, and, as the directors believe, taken with him a large sum of money.

—A DISPATCH from Alexandria says that the trial of Mirzan before Minister Maynard, and his sentence to death for the murder of Dubun Pasha, occupied several days. Great crowds of people were present. Dubun Pasha was a Syrian, who occupied the position of legal adviser to the Egyptian Minister of Finance under the ex-Khédive. The fact of a man being tried by a single individual on a charge of murder is much criticised. Yet as it appears to be American law in the East, there is nothing said against it.

—MR. WHARTON BARKER, the banker, who acted as the agent of the Russian Government in the construction of the Russian cruisers at Cramp's, has had certain concessions made to him by that Government for the development of the natural resources of Russia. This includes the opening up of coal mines in Southern Russia, the construction of a railway system from Southern Russia to the Sea of Azov, the establishment of a vast shipping port on that sea, the erection of works for the manufacturing of Bessemer steel rails, etc.

—THE Moorish Envoy has absolutely refused to accept the proposals of Austria and Italy at the Conference. The results have been reached, and, after an animated discussion, the Conference adjourned sine die. It is reported that the Moorish Envoy will denounce the French Treaty of 1843, which forms the basis of the present difficulty. The dead lock was caused by the resistance of the Moorish and French Envoys to the conciliating proposal of the Austrian Plenipotentiary to establish some recognized principles to regulate the protection of consuls over the natives of Morocco.

—THERE is much excitement among the European and Arab population at Cairo because Chachin Pasha, formerly Minister of War and Marine, has obtained naturalization as an Italian subject without the permission of the Egyptian Government or the Porte, thus placing under the protection of the Italian Government his immense property, which is generally supposed really belongs to the ex-Khédive. Chachin Pasha has left Egypt without having a passport from the Egyptian Government. The Khédive has ordered his degradation and dismissal, and forbidden his return to Egypt.

—THE National Line steamer Queen, bound in from London, and the Anchor Line steamer Anchoria, bound out from New York, were in collision in a fog on June 13th, 312 miles east of Sandy Hook, and both were seriously damaged. The Anchoria suffered most and her passengers were transferred to the Queen very expeditiously, the Queen's boats being readiest in that service. The steamers then returned to New York together, reaching the city June 15th. The officers and agents here reserve their reports on the collision for the British authorities and courts, but it is gathered that the Queen observed the rule of the road, and that the Anchoria apparently did not, having gone to port when the rule said starboard.

Digitized by Google

OHIO.—OPENING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN—THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CO

Digitized by Google

GON IN SESSION IN MUSIC HALL, CINCINNATI.—FROM SKETCHES BY JOS. B. BEALE.—SEE PAGE 307.

Digitized by Google

THE KINGCRAFT OF LOVE.

A KING would try his servants on a day,
And, none suspecting, in the street was seen
A mendicant of most unroyal mien,
Who with no empty wallet passed away.

One, offering all he had, went poor for him:
One gave him silver, though he carried gold;
One gave him a godspeed; and one was told
To throw him coins debased and clipped of rim.

But when the king returned in robe and crown,
He that went poor was only poor a day,
But whose stinted him, or said him nay,
He entered knight, but left the presence clown.

Love leaves his court to look for lovers true,
And, masked himself, unmasks his retinue.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.—THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

COUNT NICHOLAS LAGORS lives in the ancient castle which for generations has been the proud abode of his haughty ancestors. Nicholas is the last living representative of his family, and lives alone amidst his gloomy splendor.

Viewing the castle in the last grim light of the fast fading day, truthfully speaking it cannot be pronounced especially attractive, though its size and solidity may well be considered a marvel. It is a colossal mass of frowning masonry, wholly guileless of any prescribed shape or form ever yet known, save at each corner, where massive towers rear upwards, and in the dusk of the Russian night seem to lose themselves in the cold, gray sky above.

Although the dusk is fast deepening, not a glimmer of light shines forth from the walls, apparently fierce and uncompromising, and as the noble ascends the massive steps and pauses for a moment beneath the arched and deep set doorway, above which, carved deep in the stone, is the stainless escutcheon of the haughty and powerful Lagors, his tall, slim form seems part and parcel of the surrounding gloom.

Entering the vestibule, if a frowning dungeon like apartment looking quite capable of springing fatal trap-doors for unwary occupants can be designated by such an inoffensive appellation, the count makes his way into the central hall, which also, to a timorous guest, might hold unpleasant suggestions of dark mysteries and darker deeds. This apartment is a wonder; its length is simply marvelous, and gives rise to the pardonable suspicion that it leads to the opposite quarter of the globe. The floor is paved with rare mosaics, and its ceiling richly frescoed. It is draped in dark masses of shadow save at the entrance, close to which depends an ungodly-looking lamp in the shape of a ghastly dragon from whose vicious eyes gleam two jets of greenish light, which but imperfectly illuminate the vicinity and terrify the unaccustomed observer.

It is a weird frowning interior of Castle Lagors, and its owner makes his way up the broad flight of stairs through endless corridors, and finally enters an immense chamber somewhere in the centre of the castle.

This apartment, destitute of the slightest pretense of a window, is brilliantly lighted and furnished with sybaritic luxury. Soft Persian carpets, Indian hangings, couches of eider and marabout, paintings from ancient masters, statues, malachite and buhl—everything bespeaks unlimited wealth and glory.

As Count Lagors enters his chamber, a man comes forward from the fire—a man with iron-gray hair and iron-gray clothes. A short, slender figure, and smooth gray face, and eminently respectful in appearance. This is the count's body servant, confidential friend and general factotum. He is looked upon with awe in the establishment of the Lagors, as being the inseparable companion of the count, and is altogether a host within himself. But inside of this chamber, over whose threshold no one ever steps but the count, his man, and one or two intimate friends, his position altogether depends upon the moods of his master. At one moment he is the victim of the count's temper, which is villainous, and at such times is abused, slandered and sometimes kicked. At others, and fortunately these are the most numerous, he is treated with a degree of friendliness and equality that is sufficient to turn the brain of any one but the shrewd and sensible Peter. In Peter's faithful breast there is but one God and one religion—his master, or patron, as the case may be. He is honest and faithful, and attached to Lagors with a boundless affection which robs his submission of the slightest servility. All of Peter's ancestors have been respected servants in the Lagors family, of which fact he is unquestionably proud, and to the allusions of which he must plead guilty to a trifling weakness.

"Peter, I am going out. Hurry and bring my things." The first words betoken fair weather, and, nodding his gray head, which, after all, holds a deal of wisdom, Peter prepares himself to array his master for the evening.

"And now," says Lagors, getting into his dress coat, which finishes his dressing, "ring the bell and order up something to eat. We will dine here to-night. I am in a hurry."

"I have been looking over those papers," says Peter presently, over their impromptu dinner, "and I find that we have the deeds safe and sound. Now let them try all they want to."

"Very good," observes Lagors, a trifle absently.

Peter's remark refers to a track of corn-land over which there has been some litigation with a rival noble, rather ill-disposed to the Lagors.

"I went to see Moskowa to-day"—their lawyer—"and he is very busy attending to some English people," proceeds Peter, complacently.

"English people, eh?" feigning interest, which, however, is a dead failure.

"Yes. They have put in a claim for the Schaffuskie lands."

"Eh!"

Fortunately for Peter, he is never surprised out of his presence of mind. He calmly proceeds with his dinner on the present occasion, especially helping himself to mafon, for which he has suddenly been seized with a suspicious weakness. All the same, he has noticed that sharp, quick cry of inquiry, which held an intonation so new from anything that he has ever before heard from his master, that Peter's steady-going soul is a chaotic whirl of consternation and amazement.

"Eh? What did you say, you idiot?" thunders the count.

"Yes, sir," says Peter, meekly, who is not without his innocent little artifices at such times as this, and who has purposely misunderstood that he may gain time for deliberation in the alarming turn the conversation has taken.

"Repeat what you said, you fiend!" commands the count, glaring murderously at his perplexed and irresolute factotum.

"I said some strangers were putting in claims for Russian lands," says Peter, discreetly non-committal.

"Peter," says Lagors, with sudden and menacing calm—"Peter, I never have killed you, but I'll be the death of you now if you don't tell me all you started to."

"That is all I started to say, my lord," says Peter, still valiantly reticent.

"You lie!"

Silence on Peter's part.

"Look here!"

"Yes, sir."

"What lands are being claimed?"

"The Schaffuskie lands," replies Peter, reluctantly succumbing.

Peter is the possessor of an amazing faculty; he positively can tell what is transpiring around him, though his eyes at the same time may be turned in a diametrically opposite direction. At present his attention is apparently undividedly bestowed upon his plate; all the same he is perfectly conscious that Lagors's face is suffused with an ashen-gray shadow, and that his hand shakes as he lifts an unusually heavy draught of wine, and gazes into its crystal depths with his fiery eyes, as though he saw a phantom of the past.

"And who are claiming them? Mind you, Peter, no lies now."

"English people, I heard. But I dare say it is all a pack of stories. I don't believe——"

"And why the deuce should you believe it a pack of stories?" interrupts the count, fiercely; and, rising from the table with a force that is quite damaging to his companion's equilibrium, he commences pacing back and forth. "And why should you think me interested in the Schaffuskie lands, or these English people? What business have you with any opinion of all, sir?"

Peter has actually devoured his third breast of fowl, and is intent upon the fourth and last, which obviates a reply.

"What are the names of these people?"

"Lord Ashhurst."

Lagors stops in his rapid walk, surprised out of his ill-humor.

"The deuce!" he ejaculates. "Why, Peter, that is where I am going to night."

"Well, really," says that injured individual, cheerfully accepting the flag of truce, which, however, is soon withdrawn. "I hope you will have a pleasant——"

"Silence!" shouts the count, again commencing his promenade.

In a few minutes he pauses in front of the table, and picking up one of the heavy silver forks, handles it absently. That grayish shadow still bleaches his thin, dark face; his brow is creased with deep lines, and around his mouth certain fine muscles occasionally twitch convulsively.

"Peter," he says, after a pause, "who last occupied those lands?"

"That, sir, I cannot tell," replies Peter, with miraculous good humor.

"Why not, sir?"

"Because they have not been tenanted within the range of my memory."

Peter is actually under the delusion that he is speaking the truth. Lagors promptly undeceives him.

"There again you lie!" he says. "They have been lying idle between fifteen and twenty years, sir! Do you know, Peter, who last owned them?"

"Indeed I do not, my lord," says patient Peter; "but I might find out."

"Fool!" snorts the count, quick to resent any offer of his companion, yet fully resolved to sift the matter to the bottom. "Of what consequence is it to me?" Then he again relapses into that moody silence, while over his visage slowly struggles an expression half-remorseful and very bitter, the first that it has ever been seen to wear. His eyes burn with a deeper fire, and his long, dark fingers work restlessly. His brows are drawn close together in deep thought, and he seems to be forcing his mind back through the hoary vistas of a not too pleasant past. His appearance is bitter, perplexed and slightly alarmed.

"What did he say?" He raises his hand with a bewildered gesture and passes it several times across his eyes. 'Members of the English aristocracy.' 'Possessor of one of the proudest, and, once, the richest, peerdoms in England.' That is the man. But the woman—— It is impossible! Who is claiming these lands?" He ceases and buries his face in his hands; and as he stands with his head bent down, his tall, slim figure looks weak and shrunken.

All this time Peter has been minutely studying the fire, apparently utterly unconscious of the existence of a second person.

"Peter!" shouts Lagors, suddenly straightening himself and glaring at his innocent companion.

"Yes, sir," and Peter gets upon his feet with marvelous velocity.

"Go out and find who the deuce Jack Ashhurst's wife is!"

Peter for once manifests the liveliest bewilderment, and stares at his companion as if that individual had betrayed signs of dangerous lunacy.

"Are you mad, you stupid idiot!" cries the count. "Obey me this instant!"

"But——"

"There are no 'buts' about it. Start!"

"But, my lord——"

"Leave!"

Thus admonished, Peter starts towards the door.

"What are you going for?" inquires the count, as he is about to disappear.

"My lord," says Peter, "I haven't the slightest idea!"

"You are to find out who Lord Ashhurst's wife is. Do you understand?" The count's tones suggest a grievous wrong on Peter's part. "Whether she be tall and dark or short and light; and who she was before she married."

Angelic Peter nods his head comprehensively.

"And mind," continues Lagors, "you are not to be absent over half an hour."

It is almost a hopeless task, yet upon rare occasions Peter has crowded as much business as this in thirty minutes. So, drawing himself erect, he starts upon his mission.

Precisely as the clock chimes the half-hour he reappears before his master, his countenance beaming with conscious triumph.

"Well?" Lagors fixes his sunken, fiery eyes upon his faithful servitor, and were it any one but Peter he would surely give a start at the great alteration in his master. A change like unto that of death has come over the haughty countenance of the count.

"I find," begins Peter, triumphantly, "that Lady Ashhurst is a very beautiful woman of thirty, and a decided blonde. Her husband is devotedly attached to her, as is also she to him. They are members of the English aristocracy; but I could not ascertain the lady's name before she married."

All the time he has been speaking the count's eyes, half-shrinking and fearful, have been fastened upon his companion. As he ceases he makes no comment, and a silence comes over them.

"Peter," says Lagors at last, "sit down and write a letter to Toboskie, and tell him that sudden sickness prevents me from having the pleasure of accompanying him this evening, and have a servant take it to him immediately; and, Peter, pour me a glass of brandy. I am freezing."

CHAPTER XIII.—ONLY A SLIPPER.

TOBOSKIE finds that his English friends have taken a castle which is the remains of an ancient and extinct family, whose last living representative died a few months ago impoverished and in debt.

A well-appointed footman shows him into a richly furnished, brilliantly lighted reception-room. Despite its sybaritic luxury there is that home-like, free-and-easy air about this apartment which he remembers characterized the abode of the Ashhursts when he was in England. They have brought it with them here to Russia, that restful, comforting atmosphere all their own—that sweet harmony of soft, beautiful women, dainty luxury, and high-tone ease and idleness.

While waiting for the appearance of the family he glances around him. Upon the centre table, where a golden lamp sends forth its mellow flame, lie a few dainty shreds of linen and a malachite work-box. Close to this reposed a man's riding glove, and—shall I record it?—the stump of a cigar! Albeit a short distance off is a silver deposit for such worthless remains. On the floor a villainous, ugly pug, of unquestionable English extraction, is wound up in a mass of gray zephyr, which he has evidently appropriated for his own amusement.

"Poverty!" thinks Toboskie, with a smile, and looking around upon the surrounding splendor, "where do I see any traces of it?"

Suddenly in his examining gaze he observes a tiny object suspiciously close to the pug—so close as to arouse the belief that it is a discarded toy. Approaching he stoops, and, with impudent deliberation, is about to possess himself of this object, when the small canine interferes with a vicious snarl.

For a moment Toboskie is intimidated and hesitates. In the next his inherent and unconquerable weakness for victory asserts itself. He gazes sternly at the dog; it lies motionless as a stone, his vicious, bead-like eyes twinkling through the tangled yarn. It surely does not present an amiable appearance, and judging from his present aspect he pronounces it of a beastly temper.

With his gaze fixed severely on his adversary, he again essays to become possessor of the bone of contention, which has resolved itself into a small, silken sandal of exquisite shape, and looking as if it were still warm from the dainty foot of the owner. Again the pug testifies his readiness for battle with a fierce growl, and stirs threateningly, though his ugly black nose still rests between his forepaws and is pressed close to the carpet.

"You brute!" says Toboskie, in his sternest tones. "You vile, ill tempered cur!"

Being a very intelligent dog the pug's temper is not improved by this abuse. Though as he remains silent Toboskie is mad enough to seize the slipper. In another moment he is conscious of a sharp, stinging sensation, and both his hand and the slipper are in the mouth of his enemy, which is of frightful dimensions—in fact, he thinks, by far the greater part of him.

It is not a pleasant sensation, nor an agreeable position. And the horrors of his situation are increased tenfold when, attracted by soft breathing, he glances up to see stretched upon a tiger-rug before the fire a long, lithe woman-form.

He is petrified. In the heat of battle he has not before observed that he is not the only occupant of the room, and a couch drawn up to the grate shielded her from his former point of observation. But now he is kneeling but a few steps from her in disgraceful dispute with a dog.

And he is a prisoner, too; for, dishonorably pursuing his advantage, the pug testifies in sundry ways his intentions of maintaining his hold on the hand of his noble adversary. Actually fearing to breathe lest he shall awake his companion, this fallen statesman resigns himself unconditionally, and stares at the figure. He sees a face that Guido might have painted for his angels—grand, pure, holy, now in its slumber, albeit it may change in consciousness; yet a face bearing the impress of that sin by which angels may fall—pride unconquerable and never dying. It sits upon the snowy majesty of the broad brow, in the arched nostrils of the straight, Greek nose, in the haughty curving of the perfect lips.

Her form is tall and perfectly molded, as he plainly sees, where the dress is drawn tightly around her in her careless attitude. One arm lies by her side upon the tiger-rug, the other is thrown across the chest, and her face and full, rounded throat gleam white in the firelight, while around her form, reaching to her knees, sweeps a flood of golden hair of incredible length and thickness. In all his life he has never seen anything so lovely as this sleeping woman in the gleam of the fire.

He looks at her and then at the dog. At a glance he sees that his enemy is still savage and uncompromising. Still, he tries the effect of a gentle withdrawing motion, which is hailed with renewed signs of wrath, and a fierce wagging of the tail, particularly obnoxious to the prisoner. It is truly an appalling position.

He showers glances at once indignant, appealing, reproachful upon the conqueror, but he is invulnerable. He tells him as plainly as eyes can speak, that he will be his eternal debtor, his slave for life, if he will but release him; he tries to throw a subduing amount of affection in his glance, and even raises his hand for an affectionate and conciliating pat, which last advance being received in the light of an attack, the proffered hand is speedily withdrawn. His blandishments are of no avail; the dog positively refuses to be bribed or flattered. He glances again at that form by the fire—that picture fit for a painter's dream! To his consternation he meets the full gaze of a pair of magic eyes.

In an instant he recognizes her. Ah, yes, it is the eyes of old—those dark, powerful, soul-stirring eyes, with their hidden wells of strength and fire and passion! For one blissful moment he forgets the ignominy of his position. The spirit proud, lofty, unconquerable, now verging into its full development—that spirit that is to rouse his best and earliest attributes—is once again with him. Then a look steals into those glorious eyes, a look mirthful, amazed, and full of a sweet wild shame that arouses him.

Their positions, to say the least, are somewhat peculiar, and stealthily, consciously, they stare at one another—the girl prostrate upon the rug, and the Russian statesman kneeling perforce close beside her.

Then the girl springs lightly to her feet and all her hair falls down around her. In all the miserable future he never forgets her as he sees her now! She stands above him in the full glow of her haughty and perfect womanhood—in the rich glory of her matchless splendor! He is stunned, crushed by the force of her dazzling beauty and stares at her in stupid silence, while the fiendish pug, upon whom the presence of his mistress acts as an incentive, renews his zeal in clinging to the imprisoned hand.

The glorious eyes of his companion regard him gravely, but around the sweet proud mouth certain lines twitch showing that the gravity is forced.

Perhaps in this astounding moment the vision of an angry, untrained child flashes across her brain—a child maligned by her nurse, and sat in judgment upon by this man at her feet, and afterwards subjected to mortifications innumerable and none the less great because of her youth—but, if so, she magnanimously conceals all evidences of it.

"What is the meaning of this conduct, sir?" her tones are severe to suit the occasion, and Toboskie starts guiltily, being conscious that if they are addressed to the dog, they are also quite applicable to himself. "How dare you! Release this gentleman immediately!"

With every sign of great reluctance the dog obeys, and, feeling himself in disgrace, has the wisdom to take himself off.

In some way Toboskie gets upon his feet. Then they again stare at one another; then, from the woman breaks a sweet, wild peal of laughter—there is still girl enough in her to enjoy their position—laughter, which to his ears sounds like the murmur of Summer seas, and in which he joins.

"I have been out this afternoon," she says, "and got chilled through, and I was imprudent enough to throw myself before the grate. I must have fallen asleep. But will you tell me, Count Toboskie, for I suppose it is he, how it is I find you a prisoner to my dog?"

Her coolness and address in some way pique him. This spirit has a strange influence over him; that old thirst for dominion is instantly aroused in his breast. But it is still new enough for him to conceal it. His stately composure is fully restored. At this moment, glancing down, he spies the toe of a silken stocking peeping out from beneath her dress. With courtly grace he stoops and picks up the slipper.

Digitized by Google

"This," he says, tragically, "is the cause of my disgrace."

"Impossible!" exclaims the young lady, though she has the grace to blush slightly.

"It is only too true," he affirms. "My eagerness to possess this slipper betrayed me into the clutches of that miserable cur. Will you tell me," he continues, with a suspicious thirst for information, "the species of that dog?"

"Certainly," replies the young lady, promptly and with unimpaired composure. "He is an English pug, and a very good dog indeed."

"Ah!" the tone betrays a trifling skepticism.

"Yes. And it is only upon rare occasions —for instance, when dealing with dishonest people—that I have ever found him to manifest any unpleasant traits."

"If you consider," says Lord Toboskie, reproachfully, "the cause in which I fell victim to your vigilant attendant I think that last remark of yours just a trifle ungenerous in its insinuation."

She bends upon him the full fire of her magnificent eyes. They are sunny, mocking and filled with a sweet, wild laughter; yet star back in their shadowy depths he sees a gleam of topaz which he thinks betokens partial anger, and, as he looks, they grow more weird and vicious, yet more beautiful than a dream.

"At least," she says, and there is a ring of mirth in her tones. "Count Toboskie, I am more generous, you must confess to your bondage, than was a certain Russian ambassador many, many years ago, whose bad luck it was to fall in with a very naughty child. My lord," continues this amiable young lady, with unpleasant enthusiasm, "the deepest admiration of my soul is always challenged when I think of the nobility with which that man indorsed the cause of the poor, victimized nurse."

A dark flush actually mounts to the swarthy, proud face of Toboskie at her merry bantering, and involuntarily he throws out one hand in a gesture peculiarly his own.

"Do not remind me of a mortifying mistake which has always been a thorn to me," he says, earnestly; then adds more lightly, "You will cause me to think you are revengeful if you continue to make me the victim of your crushing sarcasm."

"You do not deserve leniency," retorts the young lady, severely. "Will you tell me, if you can, in what way I have been sarcastic? Can it be possible that you knew anything about that wicked little girl whom the great ambassador punished in his righteous wrath?"

"Ah, you are revengeful," he murmurs, while, helplessly fascinated, he gazes at her proud young loveliness.

"And would I be worth anything if I were not?" she says, with a bewildering little laugh. "But I assure you you are safe. I do not consider you my enemy. Though I am free to confess that if any one had ever done me or mine a bitter, grievous wrong, there is savage enough in my nature to make me cry for revenge."

Light words, spoken recklessly, and in the midst of a senseless badinage, yet in the future they weigh heavily against her in a matter more vital than death.

"Then I hope I may never injure you," he says, devoutly.

Then a silence comes between them, and the young lady looks reflectively at the slipper, which he still holds carefully in his hand.

"If you are quite through with it——" she suggests, mildly.

"Thank you; but I am not," he replies, and with calm audacity places the dainty shoe in his pocket. "Anything that has been the cause of so much trouble to me as this, I claim as my own. I have earned the bitter right to it in the mortification it has occasioned me."

"Keep it by all possible means," assents the young lady, with surprising generosity. "Yours is a precarious profession, and attended with great risk. Persons who go about awaiting opportunities of surreptitiously forcing their way into people's parlors, and surprising young ladies asleep—persons who furthermore add to their guilt by purloining those young ladies' shoes—deserve some recompense for their trouble. Nevertheless, it is a comfort to feel that one has the protection of a pug against such adventurers."

"That is a blow that staggers my fortitude," says Toboskie, while a broad smile breaks athwart his face. This bandinage is new to him, though he enjoys it foolishly. In society he is stern and unapproachable. "In your romance, fabricated for the occasion, I will pass over the discrepancy of young ladies sleeping on parlor floors, guarded by malignant and disreputable pugs, and inquire if I really have the pleasure of addressing my former friend—Maize, the incorrigible?"

"Your former victim, my Lord Toboskie." She shoots him a wicked glance, looking back over her shoulder as she crosses the room with an adorable little limp, the effect of her missing slipper, and in the next moment he is alone.

(To be continued.)

THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

THE National Democratic Convention, which assembled at Music Hall, Cincinnati, June 22d, embraces some of the ablest representatives of that party in the Union, and the results of its action will be awaited everywhere with profound solicitude. The contest for the Presidential nomination up to this time has been marked by less excitement than that of the Republicans before the Chicago Convention, but the masses of the Democratic Party have been keenly alive to the importance of securing candidates upon whom all factions can unite, and at this writing the indications are that the Convention will be governed by a determination to wisely utilize the opportunity which is offered to make a winning ticket. The prominent candidates are Senator Bayard, ex-Governor Seymour and S. J. Tilden, with General Hancock, Henry B. Payne, Judge Field, Hugh J. Jewett, and some others showing more or less of strength. Mr. Tilden's nomination is strongly opposed by the delegations from some of the Southern States, while Mr. Bayard seems to be the favorite, especially of the hard-money wing of the party. Ex-Gov. Seymour is by many regarded as the most available candidate; but the prize may after all be carried off by some "dark horse."

The hall in which the Convention assembled is admirably adapted for the purpose to which it is devoted. The decorations and designs in the interior, arranged by Mr. F. T. Foster, are elaborate, and finished with exquisite taste. The chorus seats are entirely reserved for distinguished ladies who are present by invitation, hemmed in by a light framework guard, handsomely decorated with flags and lit-colored bunting. The two doors back of these seats are ensconced in a tower of tricolors, mottoes and national flags, each constituting a large six-foot shield, gayly ornamented. The Chairman's desk is raised on a dais—on a little jutting platform—so that the presiding officer stands fully nine feet above the delegates, and should be able to direct their movements with ease. Besides the profuse decorations of the platform and dais, the centre of attraction has in the background a magnificent escutcheon, eight by fifteen feet in dimensions, which above represents in oil-colors a life-like picture of General Jackson—"Old Hickory"—from whose illuminated countenance are reflected the rays of the sun, with the word "Democracy" in large letters thrown forward. Immediately below the picture are two bands carpet, with bunches of flags radiating from them. Light, decoy clouds, scattered below, finish the fine effect of the whole, which is oval-shaped and tastily decorated with evergreens and flags. The whole front of the immense platform is covered with tricolors and national flags, and that part of it immediately in front of the ladies' stand is occupied by members and officers of the National Committee, besides other Democratic celebrities.

An immense American flag, forty feet long, sweeps from under the roof over the top gallery with the word "Welcome" on it in large gold letters. The tops of all the columns are emblazoned with flags of different nationalities. The seats for the different delegations are designated by mounted banners of blue satin, tinged with bullion, and bearing the names of the several States inscribed with gold letters. Two-thirds of the hall is inclosed by a frame guard, decorated with tricolors and flags for the sole use of the delegates. The railing extends over the passages and doorways, so that there is no possibility of an intrusion on the part of the strangers. Delegates pass in and out by the special passage reserved for their use. In the centre of this railing a handsome blue silk banner is mounted with bullion fringe, and bearing on it, in characters of gold, the inscription, "For delegates only."

The whole number of delegates in the Convention is 738. Under the two-thirds rule, 492 are necessary to a choice. The latest fact in connection with the Convention is the publication of a letter from Mr. Tilden withdrawing from the contest.

DISASTROUS FIRE AT TITUSVILLE, PA.

ON the morning of June 11th, lightning struck a 20,000-barrel iron tank of oil located on an eminence above Titusville, Pa. The oil immediately took fire, and in a few minutes the flames were communicated to another tank of the same size. About noon the burning oil overflowed, and, running down the hillside, consumed everything in its course. By five o'clock in the afternoon the flames had reached Franklin and Washington streets, and were threatening the destruction of the railroad bridge, and by seven o'clock the buildings along both sides of Bread Street were burning, besides about 100,000 barrels of oil. Fire companies from Corry, Oil City and Warren, were sent to the city in response to the Mayor's appeal for assistance, and co-operated with the Titusville force. At 10 P. M. another tank burst and set fire to the Franklin Street bridge, and the Octave Refinery soon caught. At 2:30 on the following morning the fire was under control, although the oil-tanks were still blazing; but in the afternoon a 5,000-barrel tank exploded with terrible force. The firemen, exhausted by their long labors, were obliged to leave the scene, and citizens were summoned to take their places. In the afternoon the fire was entirely under control, and no further danger was apprehended. The losses were set down as aggregating $1,500,000.

The Work of Congress.

CONGRESS adjourned on June 16th until the first Monday in December. The joint resolution to enforce the eight-hour law, passed by the House, failed in the Senate. None of the tariff Bills were passed. During the session 1,197 Bills and joint resolutions were introduced in the Senate and 4,288 Bills and joint resolutions in the House of Representatives. At the adjournment, besides the great number of measures not yet reported from the committees, there remained about 800 Bills and joint resolutions on the Senate calendar, and about 1,400 Bills and joint resolutions on the House calendar, including about 900 pension and other private Bills.

Mr. Gladstone's Budget.

MR. GLADSTONE'S supplementary budget constitutes the great political event of the day in England. Nearly everybody admits the extraordinary ingenuity displayed in the new financial proposals. Every essential feature in the scheme surprised alike the Liberals and Tories. The secret was perfectly kept, Cabinet Ministers themselves being scarcely aware of Mr. Gladstone's intentions till the eve of the delivery of his speech. It was supposed hitherto that the negotiations with France for the reduction of wine duties had failed, and the French Tories alleged this failure to be the real reason for M. Say's resignation as Ambassador. Nobody dreamed that Mr. Gladstone contemplated to abolish the malt tax. This tax has been for a generation one of the chief grievances of the farmers. The Tories, always assuming the attitude of the farmers' friends, repeatedly promised to abolish or modify the tax, but never found a financier in their own ranks capable of dealing with the question, which involves an immediate loss to the revenue of over £1,000,000. Hence Mr. Gladstone's bold project destroys at one stroke a large share of the Tory political capital, insures large accessions to the Liberal party from the farmers, and encourages agriculturists at a moment of the deepest depression. The brewers are equally delighted because they will be relieved of much vexatious interference. The business classes who pay income tax will endure the additional penny cheerfully, confident that the burden is only temporary. The country generally relies implicitly on Mr. Gladstone's financial genius to equalize the fiscal impositions next year. Beer-drinkers hail the prospect of cheaper and better beer.

Interesting Fossil in Saratoga.

ANOTHER wonderful fossil is now being excavated from the Trenton lime rock formation, at Rowland's quarries, four miles west of Saratoga Springs, and the same distance from Ballston Spa. About seven feet in length has been found, extending in a serpentine form, from the extremity of the tail to a well-defined leg or flipper. At that point the body is about three feet in circumference, and the flipper is about fourteen inches in length from the body. Mr. James Lee, the proprietor of the quarries in which these fossils have been found, has made the science of fossil remains a study for the past five years, since his attention was first drawn to this deposit of what appears to be the remains of an ante-Noachian menagerie, and he believes that the specimen now being unearthed is what is known to geologists as a Pterodactyl, a sort of pre-Adamite flying dragon. If so, the percentage of fossil now recovered would indicate its full length to be about forty feet. The deposits seem to be casts of limestone in the molds left in the rock, after the decay of the animal's substance, rather than petrifactions, and to have been formed by the stalactite process observed in caverns. They are apparently of the same nature of rocks as that in which they are imbedded, and comprise specimens of the smallest trilobite to the unknown fossils now being brought to light. The deposit is well worthy of scientific exploration.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Death is announced of Dr. J. G. Mulder, Professor of Chemistry at Utrecht University. Dr. Mulder's name was well known in the scientific world; he died at the age of seventy-seven years.

The Iron and Steel Institute holds its Autumn meeting this year at Düsseldorf, by invitation of the German iron trade, on August 25th and four following days. An extremely interesting programme of excursions and meetings has been arranged.

A Scientific Examination of the Ibaraki mountain range in Japan has resulted in the discovery of marble of different colors. One mountain is believed to be a mass of white statuary marble, and in another place black marble of the finest description was found.

The French Academy of Sciences has awarded a prize of 2,500 francs to Boutmy & Foucher for their improved and safe method of manufacturing nitro glycerine. For the past six years there has been no death in making nitro-glycerine at the factory at Vonges, and the health of the employés has been excellent.

Dr. Holub, the well-known African traveler, has opened an interesting exhibition at Vienna, which contains thousands of objects brought by him from the South African tribes. They are arranged in various groups, and are classified as zoological, botanical, mineralogical, archæological, ethnographical and commercial objects.

At Dorpat a monument is about to be erected to the memory of the celebrated naturalist, Karl Ernst von Baer, who died at Dorpat on November 28th, 1876. The funds will be supplied by the Dorpat University and the Imperial Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg. The eminent sculptor, Herr Franz von Villebois, has made two excellent sketches for the monument.

The Lisbon Academy has decided to ask the consent of the Government to transfer the bones of Vasco da Gama from Vidigueira Alemtejo to the church of the Jeronimites, Belem. It is proposed that a deputation of the Academy should accompany the remains of Vasco da Gama, and a war-ship convey them from Barcira, on the banks of the Tagus, to the Lisbon Arsenal.

An Important Discovery is stated to have been made in the neighborhood of Sydney, New South Wales. Boring for coal has been going on in Moore Park for ten months, and about the middle of March a quantity of oily matter was observed to come up, one gush lasting half an hour. This liquid is believed to be crude kerosene, but the analysis was not complete when the last mail left.

On August 5th the exhibition of anthropological and prehistoric objects found in Germany will be opened at Berlin. At the same time the general meeting of the German Anthropological Society will take place. No less than 114 archæological, eight palæontological, and sixteen craniological museums will send objects to this exhibition. The objects found in the Loess strata will be particularly interesting, and besides these we may point to the objects found in caves and in moors.

Admiral Mouchez, the Director of the Paris Observatory, has published a pamphlet on the work executed in this establishment during the year 1879. A new decree quoted by M. Mouchez arranges that the several employés of the Observatory, when not too old, can be admitted to follow the course of lectures given at the School of Astronomy recently created, and are fit to be appointed astronomers if successful in their examinations. The establishment is to be enlarged in the vicinity of Boulevard Arago, the admission of the public to be more frequent, and the magnetical observations to be resumed.

Lieutenant A. Louis Palander, of the Swedish Royal Navy, has been elected a corresponding member of the French Geographical Society, in acknowledgment of his brilliant services to geography as commander of the Vega during the late Arctic Expedition. The Swedish Royal Academy of Sciences has just caused a handsome bronze medal to be struck in commemoration of the successful accomplishment of this enterprise. This medal shows on one side the heads of Professor Nordenskjöld and Lieutenant Palander, and on the other a well-executed representation of the Vega surrounded by ice.

Dr. Werner Siemens, the well-known German electrician, had been instructed, a few years ago, to manufacture a series of standard weights on behalf of the Egyptian Government, which wished to adopt the German system; but as the Egyptian Government did not fulfill its financial obligations, Dr. Siemens kept the set of weights in his workshop, where they were used for various purposes. On the occasion of the visit of the weights and measures inspector these weights were discovered, and Dr. Siemens summoned before the police. The case has been tried with some solemnity, and Dr. Siemens fined two marks.

General Myer has sent a letter to his numerous correspondents, requesting, on behalf of the United States that the hour for taking the simultaneous meteorological observations, from which are constructed the United States Weather Maps, be changed to a time thirty-five minutes earlier than at present; in other words, as regards the British Islands, that the observations be made at 0h. 5m. P.M., instead of 0h. 43m. P.M. Greenwich mean time, and that the change be made to take effect on September 1st, 1880. The proposed changes being rendered necessary by the exigencies of the Signal Office, the request will doubtless be gladly acceded to.

A Beginning is about to be made to carry out Lieutenant Weyprecht's proposal for a circle of observing stations around the North Pole region. The Danish Government has resolved to establish a station at Upernavik, in West Greenland; the Russian Government has granted a subsidy for an observatory at the mouth of the Lena, and another on the Siberian Islands; Count Wilczek is to defray the expenses of a station on Novaya Zemlya, under the direction of Lieutenant Weyprecht; the United States Signal Service, under General Myer, has received permission to plant an observatory at Point Barrow, in Alaska; and it is expected that Canada will have a similar establishment on some point of her Arctic coast. At the Hamburg Conference it was announced that Holland would furnish the funds for a station in Spitzbergen; and it is expected that Norway will have an observing post on the extremity of the Province of Finmark.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

LORD DUNMORE, the musical earl, is coming to America to stay a month.

THE Emperor William has just given Professor Nordenskjöld a decoration.

THE new Commission to China, headed by James B. Angell, United States Minister, sailed from San Francisco, June 17th, for Pekin.

THE Rev. Mr. Deziel, the parish priest of Notre Dame de Levis, at Quebec, has received from Pope Leo the title of Chamberlain to his Holiness.

MR. J. H. SHORNBERGER, the Pittsburg iron manufacturer, has just settled $1,000,000 upon his new-made bride, who was Miss Alice Taylor, of this city.

GEORGE D. VITTUM, of Concord, N. H., left an estate of $50,000, of which his adopted daughter has the income of $7,500 until her death, when the principal goes to Bates College.

MR. PHILIP R. ALGER, the young man who has just been graduated at the head of his class in the Naval Academy, is the son of the Rev. W. R. Alger, late of the Church of the Messiah.

HERBERT REEVES, son of Sims Reeves, the famous English tenor, has been received at St. James's Hall, London, with great favor. According to a cable dispatch he sings marvelously like his father.

KING GEORGE of Greece is said to be a charming person, bright, liberal-minded and witty. He is an excellent husband, and a judicious father to his young sons, the Dukes of Athens, Sparta and Corinth.

AMONG recent deaths were those of ex-Senator James A. Bayard, of Delaware; ex-Mayor George Opdyke, of New York; the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Boardman, of Philadelphia, and ex-Senator A. G. Brown, of Mississippi.

MR. HENRY BERGH has just come into possession of the sum of $250,000 bequeathed to the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals by the late Mrs. Catharine Radcliff, a former resident of Poughkeepsie.

JAMES B. COLGATE, of New York, has given $50,000—one half to the Madison University and one-half to the Colgate Academy. This makes $260,000 he has given the University, and he increases the endowment of the institution to $500,000.

THE many friends of the Harper family throughout the country will be grieved to learn of the recent affliction sustained by John W. Harper, in the loss of his wife, who was a daughter of the late Joseph Wesley Harper, and who died on June 11th.

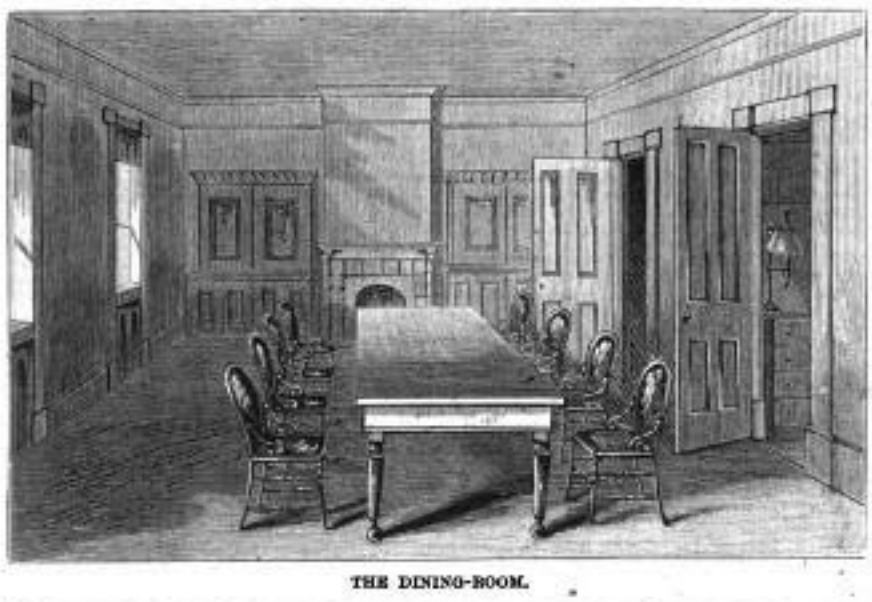
PRINCE GORTSCHAKOFF is reported to have made a marvelous recovery, and is in Baden full of health and spirits. He will spend the Summer there, and next Winter in Paris. Before he left St. Petersburg, he published a newspaper card offering the assurance of his "heartfelt gratitude" to those who had given him "token of their affectionate sympathy."

IN our issue of June 19th we stated that the late Joshua James, of Philadelphia, had bequeathed $20,000 to the Academy of Natural Sciences in that city in a codicil to his will, which sum, although the codicil was not signed, had been paid over by the executors, his sons. We have since been informed that the deceased was a bachelor, and the sum of money was paid to the Academy in his name by his two brothers, also unmarried.

GENERAL GIBBON, the old commander of the famous Iron Brigade of Wisconsin, attended, with his wife, the recent soldiers' meeting at Milwaukee. Mrs. Gibbon, who had accompanied her husband throughout his campaigning and who was almost worshiped by the command, rode with him in the procession. The wildest cheers greeted General Grant and General Gibbon, but when the soldiers caught sight of Mrs. Gibbon there was a greater uproar, and they pressed forward, eager even to touch the hem of her dress, many of them breaking into tears and sobs.

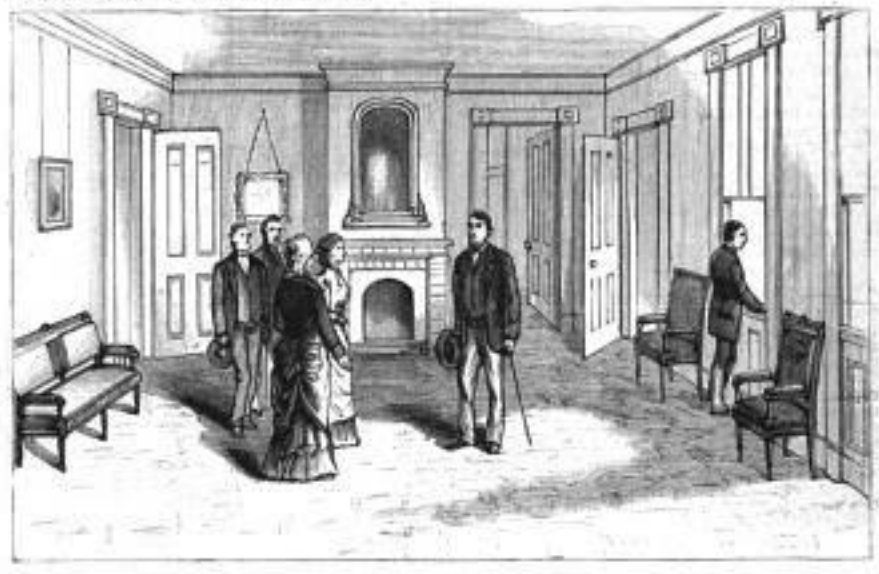
AMONG the passengers of the ill-fated Narragansett who were lost was Mrs. William Stevens and her four-years old son. This lady was the only daughter of Mr. Joseph Lejeune, for the past twelve years connected with the composing room of this establishment. With her child Mrs. Stevens had been paying a brief visit to her parents in Hoboken, and was on the way to her Boston home at the time of the disaster. Both bodies were recovered, and funeral services were held in her father's residence on June 15th. Mrs. Stevens was only twenty-six years old. Much sympathy is felt for Mr. Lejeune by his friends in this establishment.

PRINCE WILLIAM, the eldest son of the Prussian Crown Prince, has just been solemnly betrothed to Princess Augusta Victoria. The aged Emperor brought in the bride, and beamed with gratification as he presented Bismarck and other guests to her. She has great personal attractions, and is in her twenty-second year, nearly the same age as Prince William. She wore a white silk dress and a hat trimmed with May-flowers, with white veil. A bouquet of tea-roses rested on her breast, and in her hand the Princess held one of white roses and May-flowers. A six-fold string of pearls, with a golden medallion, was round her neck. The match is said to be one of mutual affection rather than of State arrangement.



LETTERS received in New York City from M. Charnay, in charge of the Lorillard antiquarian expedition to Mexico, state that he has already obtained from the Mexican Minister of Public Instruction a "provisional" authorization to proceed with his excavations and researches, which, however, must be ratified before it can take full effect by the Congress of the republic. He has submitted a plan to the Government, which he hopes may eventually be adopted, but the leading feature of this plan is an agreement on his part to give up one-third of all the discoveries he may make to the Mexican authorities. Between the French Government, which under the original understanding was to take all the originals of any objects found by M. Charnay, and the Mexican Government, to which M. Charnay now offers to cede one-third of these objects, the museums of the United States will fare rather poorly.

ON Tuesday morning, June 15th, a farewell breakfast was given to Edwin Booth, the distinguished tragedian, prior to his departure for England, by his friends in many professions. Among the gentlemen present were the Rev. Drs. Robert Collyer and F. C. Ewer, W. H. Beard, J. Q. A. Ward, Sanford R. Gifford, E. C. Stedman, Cyrus W. Field, Parke Godwin, Noah Brooks, General Horace Porter, Constant Mayer, Algernon S. Sullivan, Judge Hilton, James R. Osgood, G. E. Church, Judge John K. Brady, John T. Weir, Frederick S. Wards, W. S. Andrews, Judge C. P. Daly, George Edgar, William Warren, Joseph Jefferson, Lester Wallack, Lawrence Barrett, Dr. Austin Flint, Dr. Charles Phelps, William Winter, General Adam Badeau, T. Bolton, Dudley Buck, Edgar Fawcett, Charles Roberts, Jr., Albert M. Palmer, Lawrence Hutton, G. W. Carleton, L. Clark Davis, F. C. Bangs, W. H. Floyd, H. L. Cott, Judge Gedney, Whitelaw Reid, A. W. Sandford, General L. P. Di Cesnola, James Steele Mackaye, Chief-Justice Shea, Joel B. Erhardt, District-Attorney Phelps, Rufus Hatch, S. E. Woolf, Judge Donohoe and P. T. Barnum.



Digitized by Google

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER OF GENERAL GARFIELD.

THE DINING-ROOM.

THE PARLOR.

THE NEW RESIDENCE OF GENERAL GARFIELD.

OHIO.—HOME-LIFE OF THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT, AT MENTOR.—FROM SKETCHES BY JOS. B. BEALE.—SEE PAGE 302.

Digitized by Google

HENRY M. DOAK, EDITOR OF THE "AMERICAN," NASHVILLE, TENN.
FROM A PHOTO. BY CORMAR.

REPRESENTATIVE SOUTHERN JOURNALISTS.

HENRY MELVILLE DOAK, OF THE NASHVILLE "AMERICAN."

THE present editor of the Nashville American, Henry M. Doak, was born August 3d, 1841, coming from a line of teachers—his grandfather having been one of the pioneer educators of Tennessee, and his father a distinguished college professor up to the time of his death, a short time subsequent to the late war. His education, therefore, was obtained at home and under the eye of his father, who was his chief instructor. He was being prepared for the Bar at the time of the breaking out of the war, when he enlisted as a volunteer in the Confederate service with Cummin's regiment, organized in East Tennessee, to which part of the State his father removed, from Clarksville, just before the commencement of hostilities. In the earlier part of the war he served with Zollicoffer's brigade in Eastern Kentucky, but later was attached to the naval service of the Confederacy. At the close of the war he married and settled at Clarksville, where he began the practice of the law. He soon after became editor of the Clarksville Tobacco-Leaf—a weekly Democratic newspaper—and rapidly acquired reputation as a vigorous and practical political journalist. In 1872, during the memorable triangular contest for member of Congress from the State at large, between Horace Maynard (Republican), General B. F. Cheatham (Democrat) and the late Andrew Johnson (Independent), he wrote and published over the nom de plume of "Montgomery," a political brochure—a scathing review of the record of the late ex-President, and a merciless criticism of his public career, and especially of his administration, which attracted attention even beyond the State, and gave prominence to its author as one of the rising political journalists of his section. In 1876 he accepted a position on the editorial staff of the Nashville American, the leading Democratic newspaper in Tennessee, and, in this field, as chief political writer on the paper, soon took rank among the foremost journalists of the West and South, and gave to the American a character for candor, political precedence and independence previously attained by but few Southern political newspapers. The tone and dignity, the influence and progressive leadership of the American, which began to be generally recognized shortly after his connection with it, was in a good measure due to the daily contributions from his industrious pen. Descended from an ancient East Tennessee and North Carolina Whig family, he, no doubt, inherited some of its political philosophy, while in practical politics rather a progressive Democrat of the new school—living in and for the present and future while drawing wisdom from the past. A classical scholar and close student, of extended general reading and information, well versed in ancient and modern current literature, thoroughly up with the political history of the country, the subjects that come under his treatment are handled intelligently and with the discretion of an evidently well-balanced and thoroughly disciplined mind. The genuineness of a frank, earnest nature impresses itself through his writings, and the healthful and elevated tone of his political utterances, and his catholic and calm discussion of other themes, would seem to be inspired of a clean conscience and sturdy sense of duty. While not a churchman in the orthodox sense, he is profoundly religious in sentiment, and the purity of his private life is as marked as that indicated in his professional work and public expressions through the columns of the American. Mr. Doak is happily married to a lady of culture and varied accomplishments, and has an interesting family of four children, to whom he is devoted.

M. W. WILBUR FISK FOSTER,

GRAND MASTER OF MASONS IN TENNESSEE.

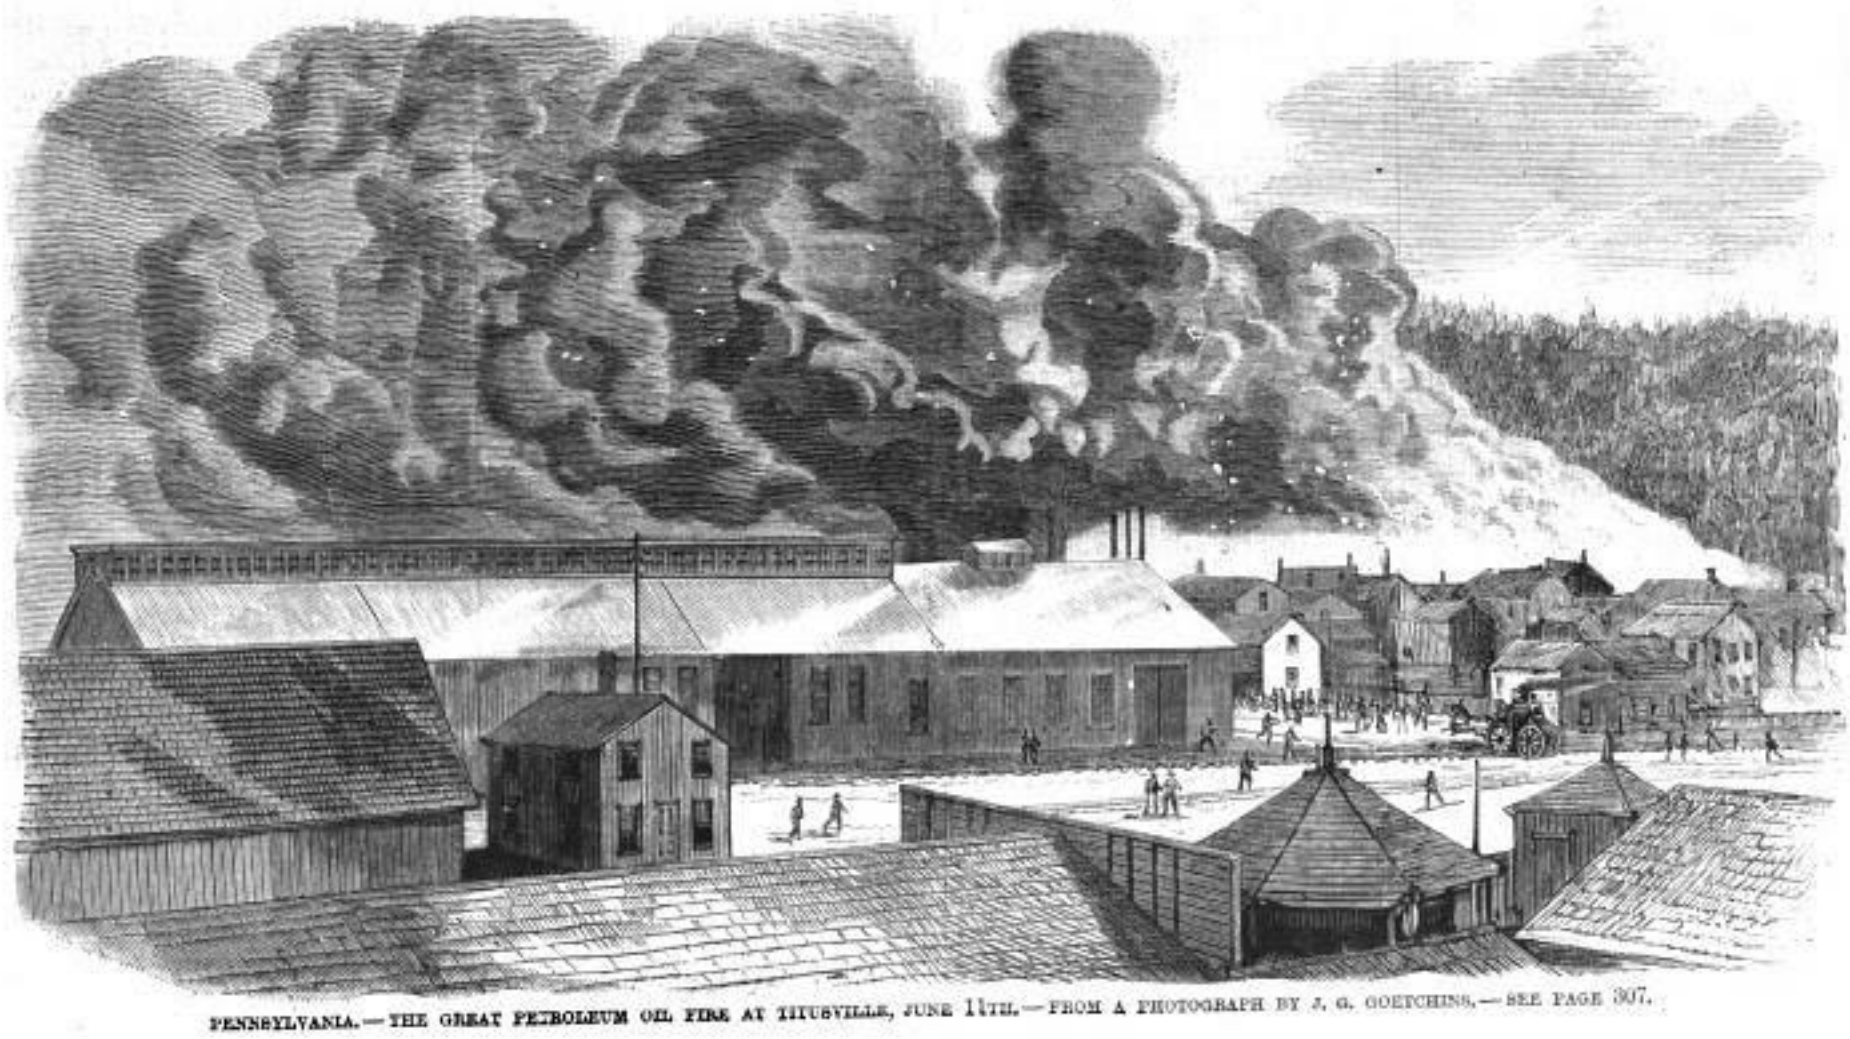
ONE of the most prominent citizens of Tennessee is Mr. Wilbur Fisk Foster, M. W. Grand Master of Masons in that State. He was born in Springfield, Mass., April 13th, 1834, and first saw Masonic light in Cumberland Lodge No. 8, in Nashville, having been made an E. A. Mason January 31, 1857, F. C. February 23d, 1857, and Master Mason March 26th, 1857. He received his Chapter Degrees in Lafayette Chapter No. 4, Columbia, Tenn., in 1859, the Council Degrees in Nashville Council No. 1, in 1861, and was dubbed a Knight by St. Omer Commandery, Macon, Ga., in March, 1865. He has served as Master in Cumberland Lodge No. 8, and was for four years Master of Corinthian Lodge No. 414, Nashville, Tenn.

In the Grand Council he was elected Deputy Grand Master in 1868, and Thrice Illustrious Grand Master in 1869; in the Grand Chapter he was elected Grand King in 1870; Deputy Grand High Priest, 1873, and Grand High Priest in 1874. In 1871 he was elected Grand High President of the Order of High Priesthood. In the Grand Commandery he was elected Grand Generalissimo in 1876; Deputy Grand Commander in 1877, and Most Eminent Grand Commander in 1878. In the Grand Lodge he was elected Deputy Grand Master in 1878, and Most Worshipful Grand Master in November, 1879.

From this record it will be seen that Mr. Foster has presided over all the Grand Masonic bodies in Tennessee. He has filled all these offices with credit to himself and honor to the fraternity, and fairly deserves the confidence and esteem in which he is held by the craft. In his private life he exemplifies the teachings of the Order he so much loves. There are in Tennessee about four hundred chartered lodges, with a membership of 16,000. If to these we add non-affiliated Masons, and those who are members of lodges in other jurisdictions, it is safe to say that there are 25,000 Masons in the State of Tennessee.

During the Centennial month the Masons of Nashville had a spacious and elegantly fitted-up room for Masonic headquarters, which was visited by thousands of the fraternity from all parts of the Union, and formed a pleasant feature of the Centennial.

Grand Master Foster entered the Confederate Army as a private in Company C, Rock City Guards, First Tennessee Regiment, and was several times promoted, so that at the close of the war he was a Major of Engineers, and Chief Engineer of Stewart's Corps. He is at present, and has been for many years, City Engineer of the City of Nashville.



WILBUR F. FOSTER, GRAND MASTER OF MASONS IN TENNESSEE.
FROM A PHOTO. BY POOLE.

VERY REV. FATHER BECKX, GENERAL OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS.

FATHER BECKX.

PETER JOHN BECKX, General of the Jesuits, was born at Sichem, in Belgium, February 8th, 1796, and educated for the priesthood. Shortly after receiving priest's orders he was admitted into the Society of Jesus, at Hildesheim, in October, 1819. His superiors soon perceived that he possessed rare abilities, and employed him on several delicate missions. When the Duke Ferdinand of Anhalt-Kothen became a convert to the Catholic religion, young Beckx was appointed his confessor, and he officiated for some years as priest of the new Catholic church which was built at Kothen. After the decease of the duke he continued at the court with his widow, the Countess Julia, whom, at a later period, he accompanied to Vienna. In 1847 he was appointed procurator for the province of Austria, and in this capacity he went to the College of Procurators at Rome. In the following year the Jesuits were temporarily driven from Austria, and consequently Father Beckx, being unable to return to that country, repaired to Belgium, and was nominated rector of the college belonging to his Order at Louvain. When the Jesuits were re-established in Austria, he zealously supported

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE GREAT PETROLEUM OIL FIRE AT TITUSVILLE, JUNE 11TH.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY J. G. GOETCHINS.—SEE PAGE 307.

Digitized by Google

the projects of the Government, which were highly favorable to the interests of the Church. He lent his powerful aid to the Primate of Hungary, Cardinal Scitowsky, who succeeded in obtaining the reinstatement of the Jesuits in that portion of the empire, and founding the noviciate at Tyrnau. Being sent to the assembly summoned at Rome in 1853, to choose a successor to Father Roothan, he was elected Superior of the Order. The success of the Jesuits since that time, especially in non-Catholic countries, is due, in no slight degree, to the ability and foresight of Father Beckx. Besides some minor writings and occasional discourses, he has published a "Month of Mary" (Vienna, 1853), which has passed through numerous editions, and been translated into many languages.

On the occupation of Rome by the late Victor Emmanuel, Father Beckx retired to Florence, whence he has since directed the movements of the Jesuit leaders.

The Wife of General Garfield.

MRS. GARFIELD is a lady who would honor the White House by her gentle presence. She is a woman of a sweet and winning spirit, and of bright and cultivated mind. As Miss Lucretia Rudolph she was an exceedingly pretty and interesting girl, and her marriage with the General was on both sides one of ideal affection. Her intellect has kept pace with her husband's; she has studied the books he studied, taken up languages with him, and has so trained herself as to fit her boys for college in the most thorough manner. She is an excellent Latin scholar, and is also proficient in several modern languages. She is a little lady, graceful in carriage, and having most frank and charming manners.

Jerusalem for the Jews.

ONCE more the project of gathering the Jews into Jerusalem is revived. There are rumors in London that among the projects which Mr. Goschen is to recommend for the Sultan's acceptance is that of forming into a united Jewish colony the districts of Gilead and Moab, which extend to about 600,000 hectares, and are at present inhabited only by a few nomad tribes. The Ottoman Government would retain its suzerain rights over this territory, which was formerly a part of the Promised Land set aside for the tribes of Gad, Reuben and Manasseh, and would receive in return for its concession a number of millions from certain capitalists, who have undertaken that they shall be forthcoming. Sir Moses Montefiore and several other wealthy Israelites favor this plan. The new colony would be subjected to the authority of a prince of Jewish race and religion, and would serve as the nucleus of a second kingdom of Israel.

The Army-worm.

THE army-worm which has been devastating parts of Long Island and New Jersey, is so called because it appears in such large numbers, and because, like others of its species, it moves in columns and follows a leader. It is a caterpillar, the larva of a moth, and is noted for its voracity, as it well may be, since it can eat, it is said, more than double its own weight in twenty-four hours. Although less gluttonous, as a rule, it is more destructive than the locust, from its greater fecundity and wider distribution over the vegetable world. It feeds on leaves, flowers, roots, buds, seeds, even the wool of plants; indeed, it is nearly omnivorous. The worm is asserted to march in regular and exact order; it lives in society, and moves in procession either in single file, or two, three, and four abreast, the line being so perfect in the columns that the head of one is never beyond the head of another in the row. It follows the leader, stopping when the leader stops, making journeys from plant to plant or from tree to tree in quest of food, and returning to its nest in the same order. The worms form ranks, march and halt with the precision of soldiers. When several nests are in the same neighborhood, the going forth and coming back of the creeping battalions at the same hour, commonly called nightfall, is very curious and interesting. Caterpillars include more than 1,000 varieties, there being 700 in New England alone. They all have thirteen segments; the first consisting of jaw and mouth; the second, third and fourth of the thorax of the future insect, and the other segments of the abdomen. Their rapid growth and extraordinary consumption are shown by the common silk worm, which, according to Vincenzo Dandolo's treatise on silk, increases, during the thirty days necessary to its full growth, from one to forty lines in length, and from 1-100 to about 95 grains in weight. In that time, therefore, it increases its weight 9,500 times, and eats 50,000 times its weight of food. In the Northern States there are about 1,000 kinds of butterflies and moths. As each female lays from 200 to 500 eggs, the-e species would produce, on an average, from each single female 300,000 caterpillars in a year. If one-half of these were females, the second generation would be 45,000,000, and the third 6,750,000,000. With such fertility, it is easy to see that the destructive power of caterpillars, particularly of the army-worm, must be prodigious.

NEW BOOKS.

REMINISCENCES OF AN IDLER. By HENRY WIKOFF, author of "My Courtship and its Consequences," "Adventures of a Roving Diplomatist." New York: Ford, Howard & Hulbert, 1880.

This book will win many suffrages. It is ably written, and moreover it bears the impress of that open confession which never yet failed to interest, if not to charm. It is full of fine touches of observation and description, while a certain amiability of tone in dealing with the many men and women whom Mr. Wikoff has jostled against, from a stage-coach journey of fifty years ago to a soirée at Lord Brougham's, proves that even in his gossiping he is invariably bon garçon. Mr. Wikoff is an admirable story-teller, his voice is never raised above the ordinary conversational pitch, and he talks to his readers as if he were leaning back in his easy-chair and recalling half a century ago, under the influence of a precious bottle of Clos Vougeot. One listens to his college career, his chat about President Jackson, the American stage of forty years ago, his adventures in Paris, Turin, Pisa, Genoa, Rome, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Sebastopol, Constantinople, Prague, Dresden, Berlin, Brussels, Amsterdam and a hundred other places, with thorough pleasure. His vivid descriptions of Talleyrand, Soult, Sydney Smith, Thiers, Guizot, the poet Rogers, Count Dorsay, Byron, the Guiccioli and Louis Napoleon, are as so many portraits in pen and ink; while the many startling incidents in his roving career are presented in language as telling as it is powerful. Seldom have we taken up a more thoroughly enjoyable book, or one that we can so confidently recommend to our readers.

FETES & LAURIAT, of Boston, have issued in popular form, with large, clear type, a number of strikingly original and fascinating stories by the famous detective novelist, Emile Gaboriau, including "The Widow Lerouge," "File No. 113," "Monsieur Lecoq," "The Clique of Gold" and "Other People's Money." M. Gaboriau has done the reading public a service in supplying a series of stories that are wonderfully exciting without being cursed with rude sensationalism.

FUN.

THE schoolchildren are opposed to a third term this spring.

JUDGE TO PRISONER—"You hear what the witness says?" "What signifies, mon juge, one of the population of thirty-six millions?"

AN ordinary woman's waist is thirty inches around. An ordinary man's arm is about thirty inches long. How admirable are thy works, oh, Nature!

A HOUSEHOLDER in Troy, in filling up his census schedule, under the column "where born," described one of his children "born in the parlor," and the other "up-stairs."

WHEN you see a man take off his hat to you it is a sign that he respects you. But when he is seen divesting himself of his coat, you can make up your mind that he intends you shall respect him.

THE DOCTOR'S DAUGHTER—"Janet, are you never going to leave off that unbecoming old bonnet?" Aged Pilliger: "Well, miss, I've wore it for thirty years, and the vicar says I may be took any hour!"

A CONTEMPORARY prints a poem called "Gather Ripe Fruits, Oh, Death!" And that would be best. It is so now that the small boy gathers the fruits before they are ripe, and Oh Death gathers the small boy.

"WHY is it you never go to see old Drinkhard any more?" "Oh, the road home is so abominably long." "It isn't any longer than the road there." "Oh, but it is—the road there is straight, coming home it is crookeder'n a ram's horn."

A YOUNG wife remonstrated with her husband, a dissipated spendthrift, for his conduct. "Love," said he, "I am like the prodigal son; I shall reform by-and by." "I will be like the prodigal son, too," she replied, "for I will arise and go to my father."

A WORTHY banker has separated from his wife who is recklessly extravagant. Presently he falls ill and she sends to inquire after his health. The maid is ushered into the dying man's chamber and begins her message: "My mistress has sent me to ask"——"For how much?" says the dying man with a sigh.

A LITTLE boy in a Sunday-school put a poser to his teacher. The lady was telling her class how God punished the Egyptians by causing the first-born of each household to be slain. The little boy listened attentively. At the proper interval he mildly inquired: "What would God have done if there had been twins."

LITTLE MARY had listened attentively to the exhortations of the revivalist. "And is it true, mamma," she asked after getting home, "that I can't go to heaven unless I am born again?" "Yes, darling: you must be born again, as the good man said," replied her mother. Mary looked thoughtful, but said nothing for some minutes. Finally, drawing a long sigh, and with resignation pictured on her face, she said, "I am afraid I can't go to heaven." "Why, what do you mean?" "I was thinking, mamma, that I shouldn't want to be a baby again, to be tossed up till I was all out of breath, as little Tommy is by every lady that comes into the house, you know."

FALSE REASONING.

SUPPOSE a machine should fail to perform its work, and the owner, instead of trying to ascertain the cause of failure and remedy it, should conclude to run right along, and argue that as the machine had heretofore come around all right it would soon be so again. If a general and permanent breakdown ensues, could anybody be blamed but himself? Now, precisely this way do people act and argue when the "human machine" is out of order. When the liver is torpid and bowels constipated, every one knows that Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Purgative Pellets afford prompt and permanent relief. Yet some guess the "machine" will come around all right, and do nothing. Could any system of false reasoning be more pernicious? Suppose the blood be out of order, and there be pimples, ulcers or running sores, with scrofulous tumors, swellings and general debility, and those thus affected should refuse to use Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, guessing that the blood would purify itself, could anybody be blamed but themselves if a general and permanent break-down of health ensued? No remedy yet known equals the Discovery in curing all scrofulous, throat, bronchial and lung diseases. Sold by druggists.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

IN NERVOUS DISEASES.

HAVING used it very considerably, I can testify to its great value in functional derangements of the secretory and nervous systems.

BUTLAND, VT. CHAS. WOODHOUSE, M.D.

SUMMER time brings Summer accidents. Keep an Accident Policy in THE TRAVELERS.

MORE economical, remarkable certainty of prompt action, in fact every good quality, is guaranteed for MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS.—The superiority of these extracts consists in their perfect purity and great strength. They are warranted free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the facetious fruit-flavors now in the market.

DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE is the popular Blood Purifier, Tonic, etc., because it is made by a regular Graduate of Medicine, is the result of scientific research, is accurately and elegantly compounded, wonderfully efficacious, is taken in very small doses, and is pure, clean, and pleasant to the taste. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch St., Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

ALL the Presidential candidates are certain to be right on the question of the protection of American industries; in other words, they will give their unqualified preference to "THE AMERICA" EXTRA DRY CHAMPAGNE of Messrs. A. WERNER & CO., of this city, over any of the foreign imported brands. Both as statesmen and connoisseurs of wines will they do this, the American people of all parties whom they represent having already pronounced the same verdict. Each season shows the superior excellence of the America, and, if party platforms omit a declaration on this point, it is merely because this truth is self-evident to every observant citizen.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Broadway, New York, so long the leading hotel of the great city, fully maintains its high standard of excellence, and in comfort and luxury has no superior in this country or in Europe. Its location, for healthfulness and the convenience of travelers, is the very best. On account of its thorough good order, safety and superior rooms, it is especially adapted for families and ladies traveling without escort, who are treated with every respect and consideration. The proprietor, with his family, resides in the Hotel, giving to it his constant personal supervision; the result is that the ST. NICHOLAS is, in every respect, the Model Hotel.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—Best relish in use for family use. Preferable to all others.

FAIRBANKS SCALES OBTAIN THE IMPERIAL RUSSIAN MEDAL.

ST. PETERSBURG papers, of June 21, announce that the jury of the St. Petersburg Permanent Exhibition of Machinery connected with the Russian Imperial Technical Society, have awarded to FAIRBANKS & Co., New York, on their exhibit of scales, the Society's Medal, this being the first prize. The jury and committee of experts examining the FAIRBANKS SCALES of various sizes, exhibited by their representative, Mr. Block, make the following statement: "We have found, first, a remarkable sensitiveness in the FAIRBANKS SCALES; second, a superior workmanship in finish of each and every part of the scales; and the committee, in consideration of these qualities, and taking in view the world-wide renown of the firm and also the popularity and wide distribution the scales have received, and seeing the great usefulness obtained in Russia from this invention, we award the firm of FAIRBANKS & Co., of New York, the medal of the Society."

The Secretary of the Society, speaking further in general terms about the exhibition and the distribution of prizes, remarked: "That those exhibitors who have received the Society's medal should not prize it for its intrinsic value, but for the honor it represents, as the Russian Imperial Technical Society has distributed only a very few medals and only to those who have brought deservedly a great benefit to Russia by their inventions."

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ½ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, LONDON, ENG.

UNITED STATES TYPE ELECTROTYPE FOUNDRY

JAMES CONNOR'S SONS,

PRINTERS' FURNISHING WAREHOUSE,

28, 30 and 32 CENTRE STREET, Bet. Reade and Duane Sts. New York.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS

Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays as follows:

*Pier No. 18, N.R., foot Cortlandt St.	Jewel's Wharf, Fulton Ferry, B'klyn.	Thirty-third St., East River.
10.00 A.M.	10.10 A.M.	10.25 A.M.
1.00 P.M.	1.10 P.M.	1.25 P.M.
3.00 P.M.	3.10 P.M.	3.25 P.M.
6.00 P.M.	6.10 P.M.	6.25 P.M.

Returning, leave GLEN ISLAND 7.30 A.M., 12.30, 3.30, 5.30 and 8.30 P.M.

* Pier No. 18, N.R., foot of Cortlandt St., is three blocks from 6th Ave. and two blocks from 9th Ave. L. road.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,

The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, CONSERVATORY, FISH PONDS, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents.

MANHATTAN BEACH,

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.25, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.30, 10.30 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.30 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.35 to 6.20 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M., and 10.40 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.35 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

BRIGHTON BEACH.

BROOKLYN, FLATBUSH & CONEY ISLAND RAILWAY.

TRAINS LEAVE FLATBUSH AVENUE, LONG ISLAND DEPOT, BROOKLYN, hourly from 6.20 to 9.25 A.M., and from 9.15 A.M. to 10.45 P.M. half-hourly. Separate trains run from BEDFORD half-hourly from 11.36 A.M. to 10.06 P.M. Last train from the Beach leaves at 11.10 P.M.

Flatbush Avenue, L. I., Depot is reached via Flatbush Avenue cars from Fulton Ferry, and Atlantic Avenue cars from South, Wall and Fulton Ferries.

Bedford Station is reached via Grand and Roosevelt Street Ferries by the Franklin Avenue cars and Rapid Transit trains.

W. E. DORWIN, General Superintendent.

400 PER CENT. PROFIT.

QUICK! SURE!! EASY!!!

Agents Wanted all over the U. S. to sell magnificent Crayon Portraits, on tinted plate paper, Heroic Size (22x28), of the Republican Nominees,

Garfield and Arthur!

Will sell everywhere, in city and country, both for only 25c., insuring the largest profits ever made by agents. Sample, with terms, only 10c. Address,

SHIPMAN & CO., 8 Reade St., New York.

☞ Wholesale by all News Companies.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Amusements.

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
MONDAY, JUNE 14th, W. C. Mitchell's Pleasure Party in OUR GOSLINS.

HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.

HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera Stars (with or without company). Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,

Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Goshen Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

MRS. M. J. COLLEY, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,

Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. Six thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females.

JNO. L. EUBANK, Proprietor.

Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.

JAMES A. FRAZIER, Owner and Proprietor.
CORNELL N. COBB, General Manager.

The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and preserved by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professor T. Gaillard Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville.

Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

Get off at Covington for the

HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails and telegraph office. Board, $2.50 per day; $15 per week; $50 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station, $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. E. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.

H. C. EUBANK, Proprietor.

TO THE PUBLIC.

BOKER'S BITTERS.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS

In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their firmness as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will hereafter be put up and sold not only in quart, but

ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,

for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes to be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,029.

EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS!!

5,000 BUILDING LOTS,

Surrounding depot at Somerville, near Garden City, 23 miles from New York; price, $125 each. Also 10,000 at West Deer Park, 35 miles from New York; price, $50 each. Weekly payments—25 cents a lot. Unusual facilities for building on weekly payments. Call or send stamp for circular to

R. WILSON, Attorney, 57 Broadway, N.Y.

FOR SALE.

Bound Volumes of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER published during the Civil War.

Address, T. LITTLE, 312 West 23d St., New York.

THE SUMMER FASHIONS

JUST RECEIVED FROM PARIS.

COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES

IMPORTED MONTHLY EXCLUSIVELY FOR

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S MAGAZINE

—AND—

Gazette of Fashion,

THE ACKNOWLEDGED FASHION STANDARD OF AMERICA.

Every Number contains full and accurate descriptions of the prevailing styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, Hats, Bonnets, etc., etc.; the latest styles of Fichus, Colerettes and Jabots; the latest style of Hairdressing, etc., etc.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as its reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each number is embellished with beautiful engravings finished in the highest style of art, and the contents are highly interesting and entertaining, consisting of stories, sketches, poems, anecdotes, amusing cartoons, etc., etc.

Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 43, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 32, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.

General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,

Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.

SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.

KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

THE
Mohave Mining and Milling Co.

MINERAL PARK AND CERBAT DISTRICTS,

Mohave Co., Arizona.

Organized under the Laws of the State of New York.

Capital, $1,000,000, in 100,000 Shares, at $10 each.

STOCK NON-ASSESSABLE.

OFFICERS.

EDWARD M. CLARK, Pres't. WILLIAM B. CRAPO, Treas.
MAJOR GEORGE CLENDON, M. E., Sup't.
RICHARD W. G. MARRINGTON, Sec'y.
LOUIS DAVENPORT, Arizona, Eng'r.
BANKERS—National Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average bar in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 140 Broadway.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST.

Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW; apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and doctors, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervousness and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. Bissette, M.D., President of the National Medical Association.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

DYKES' BEARD ELIXIR will in 3 weeks time produce a heavy beard on the smoothest face, or hair on the head, or whiskers, or moustache, or no money back. Sent by express, secure from observation, on receipt of $1. Circulars free. Address, H. DYKES, Box 2659, Boston, Mass.

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp,
H. RICKBORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

AU BON MARCHÉ.

Maison Aristide Boucicaut
THE LARGEST AND BEST ASSORTED
DRYGOODS AND NOVELTY STORES
IN PARIS,
RUE DU BAC, RUE DE SEVRES, RUE VELPEAU AND RUE DE BABYLONE.

The system of selling everything at little profit and entirely in confidence is absolute in the stores of the BON MARCHE.

This principle, sincerely and loyally applied, has gained them a success non-interrupted and without precedent till this day.

Obliged to enlarge almost every season to face their always increasing business, the stores of the BON MARCHE are completing, even at the present moment, very important constructions.

The stores of the BON MARCHE are the only buildings specially constructed for and entirely devoted to a great business in DRYGOODS and NOVELTIES. They include all that experience has been able to produce of utility, convenience and comfort, and are visited by strangers as one of the curiosities of Paris.

Interpreters in all languages.

ELGIN WATCHES.
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $2 to $150. Diamonds, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$8, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 226 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3686.

ELEGANT AUTOGRAPH ALBUM, bound in Gilt, 48 pages, Engraved in Colors, and 64 select Quotations for name, 15c. 12 Photograph Cards, name and photo on, 50c. Send photograph. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

50 Fancy Cards, 10c., or 30 Gold and Silver Chromos, 10c. Stamps taken. J. B. HUSTED, Nassau, N. Y.

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts. postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO. Nassau, N. Y.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY

A NEW VOLUME.
Increased Attractions, Literary and Artistic.

THE JULY NUMBER NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

"THE BRITISH HORSE OF COMMERCE." By N. Robinson. Twenty Illustrations and portraits.

"THE FANS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT." By Dora de Blaquiere. Eleven Illustrations.

"HOW THE JAPANESE AMUSE THEMSELVES—ITINERANT PERFORMERS." By Edward Greey. Eight Illustrations.

"AMONG THE MANGROVES." Illustrated.

"SALT LICK AND THE ONLY LAKE IN VIRGINIA." Five Illustrations.

"W. C. MACREADY." By J. Brander Matthews. Six Illustrations and portraits.

"THE EYE AND ITS USE." By Wm. Ackroyd. Sixteen Illustrations.

SERIAL, SHORT STORIES, SKETCHES, ETC.—"Not Guilty," by Ella W. Peirce (Chaps. XIX. to XXIII.); Illustrated. "The Romance of a Rose." "Till the Sun Grows Cold" by E. V. Hastings; Illustrated. "Doris"; Illustrated. "Head-over, Haughty, Euclid Harry Halsted d," by Harriet P. Spofford; Illustrated. "A Strange Cruise"; Illustrated. "An Woman's Love"; Illustrated. "The Lazy Unquart"; Illustrated. "Faithful to the Last"; Illustrated. "A Mystery of the Sea"; Illustrated. "Winning in Spite of Himself," by Richard B. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger"; Illustrated. "Ulderic's Wife"; Illustrated. "Poindexter's Vow"; Illustrated. "The Lehigh Valley"; Illustrated. "A Murder Discovered by Touching a Dead Body"; Illustrated. "Traveling in the East"; Illustrated. "The Skeleton of Holar Church—An Icelandic Legend"; Illustrated.

POEMS.—"Myrrala." "The Maiden's Reverie"; Illustrated. "The Child in the Waves"; Illustrated. "The Bonnie Brig o' Balgowrie"; Illustrated. "Twilight"; "Outside the Window," by Nellie C. Hastings. "Hark"; Illustrated.

MISCELLANY.—"The Mastiff Elm Tree." "An Unauthorized Tabak's Colleguer"; Illustrated. "Human Nature in a Load of Wood." "Rose Legends." "In a Palm Grove"; Illustrated. "The Metamorphoses of the Canals on Locust"; Illustrated. "The One-Thousand-Mile Tree"; Illustrated. "Blind Metcalf, the Engineer." "The Largest Workshop in the World." "A Bearish Goldcock"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

128 Pages Quarto—Over 100 Embellishments.

A HANDSOME COLORED FRONTISPIECE—"A MORNING KISS FOR DEAR MAMMA."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3, postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

White's Patent Lever Truss

Is the best Truss in the world for holding and curing Rupture. Its lifting power is just the thing—no pressure on back. Every ruptured person should have one. Pamphlets free. Address,

WHITE'S LEVER TRUSS CO.,
61 Warren St., New York.

THE POPULAR FAMILY JOURNAL.

Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER.

A Constant Succession of New Literary and Artistic Attractions!

This favorite publication has, for the past fifteen years, continuously enlarged its popularity, and is now admitted to be the

LEADING LITERARY FAMILY JOURNAL.

It is the ONLY weekly that gives, with Healthy Fiction, Attractive Novels and Stories, Biography, Travels, Incidents of all Times and Countries, Foreign Manners and Customs, Essays, Well-chosen Matter for Young Readers, Examples for the Aspiring Youth of Both Sexes, Natural History in a popular form, the Wonders of Nature, Science, Art, and Human Ingenuity, Adventures with Wild Men and Beasts, Narratives of Daring and Peril, Social Hints, etc., etc.

Frank Leslie's Chimney Corner is thus, from week to week, a Library for a Household that forms a perfect museum of attractions, the illustrations being of the highest character.

Each Number contains sixteen pages, eight of which are embellished with beautiful engravings.

Published every Monday. For sale by all newsdealers. Price, single copies, 10 cents. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION, $4; three months, $1—postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

THE
Commonwealth Distribution Co.

Has always drawn

June 30th.

Its Capital Prize has always been

$30,000!

IT HAS BEEN DECLARED LEGAL BY ALL THE COURTS OF KENTUCKY.

IT HAS BEEN DECLARED LEGAL BY THE UNITED STATES COURT.

ITS DRAWINGS HAVE BEEN DECLARED FAIR BY A UNITED STATES JUDGE.

AND

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,

AFTER

CAREFUL INVESTIGATION,

HAS ALSO

DECLARED ITS DRAWINGS FAIR,

And has therefore

RESTORED TO THEM THE USE OF ALL THE MAILS.

R. M. BOARDMAN,

Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky.; or some person at 309 Broadway, New York; or W. FORTER, 1,227 Broadway; or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION!

THE ÆOLIANETTE. A new musical instrument—perfect substitute for the Clarionet. Valuable addition to Bands and Orchestras. Splendid accompaniment to the voice—can be played in any key (flats, sharps, or minors.) It requires no skill. Any one can play it. Can play any tune, heard in a handsome French Morocco Case, embossed and lined with silk, with full instructions, post paid, for 50 cts; stamps or silver. THOMAS & CO., LEROY, N. Y. (Agents wanted.)

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELT BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 35 cents, with age, height, color of eyes and hair, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage.
Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE

THE FAMILY WASH BLUE.
For Sale by Grocers.
D. S. WILTBERGER Prop.,
218 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. 30 Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

40 PAGE BOOK OF WONDERS for a 3-cent stamp. Address, H. FOX & CO., 391 Canal St., N. Y.

Agents Wanted.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

$10 PER DAY can be made by male or female agents. Address, with stamp, S. D. HOLLISTER, 417 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 150—156 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

52 Gold, Crystal, Lace, Perfumed & Chromo Cards name in Gold & Jet, 10c. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

EDIFYING AND INTERESTING READING FOR EVERYBODY.

Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

The July Number Now Ready.

CONTENTS.

"A QUARTER-MILLENNIUM." By Rev. Edward Hale. Illustrated.

"THE CHRISTIANS OF ST. JOHN."

"THE CHILDREN OF THE BIBLE—No. VI. The Widow's Son." Illustrated.

"MODERN JEWISH LIFE." Illustrated.

"THE ENGLISH BIBLE BEFORE THE TIME OF WYCLIFFE." By the late Rev. H. Dobbins.

"EDUCATION IN THE ORIENT." By Rev. Ross C. Houghton, M.A. Etc., etc.

SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES, ETC.—"Be-Be the Nahmaster's Daughter," by the Author of "Gideon's Rock" (Chaps. XXIX.-XXXI.); Illustrated. "Little Nigger" (concluded); Illustrated. "Dolly," by Mrs. M. A. Deighton; Illustrated. "How She Found His"; Illustrated. "Mrs. Phillips's Hods," by Ellie Rogers; Illustrated. "The Lady of Leigh," by Jane G. Austin; Illustrated. "Bluebell," by Ella W. Peirce; Illustrated. "Who was the Hero?" by F. M. Holmes; Illustrated. "The Spider that Longed for a Good Name." Etc., etc.

SKETCHES, ESSAYS, ETC.—"Obsolete Words in the English Bible." "Of Novels." "The Fortescue Tragedy"; Illustrated. "Franz Lenz," by Alberton Harvey. "Tiberton Casey," by Herbert Lee; Illustrated. "St. Anna." "A Mother's Devotion"; Illustrated. "The Beggar of Cava"; Illustrated. "The City of Toledo, Spain"; Illustrated. "Bruges"; Illustrated. "Orchids, or Air Plants"; Illustrated. "Robert Raikes—1781-1880." "Matthew the Publican." "Aaron"; Illustrated. "The Arrest of the Poet André Chénier"; Illustrated. "The Church of the Madeleine, Paris"; Illustrated. "The Monastery of St. John of Ryla." "Old St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

POEMS.—"Hidden Joys"; Illustrated. "The Evening Thought"; Illustrated. "July," with Illustrated border. "The Cherry Drink," by Adelaide Strat. "Friends and Foes"; Illustrated. "The Lord's Prayer" said to have been written by James I.] "The Golden Wedding," by Rev. Anson G. Chester. Etc., etc.

MISCELLANY, ETC.—"Curious Marriages." "Religion of Japan." "The Useful and the Beautiful." "A Fetich Boy of Lake Jonanga"; Illustrated. "The Sparrow on the Mountop"; Illustrated. "The Fortress of Gwalior"; Illustrated. "Harry the Lion"; Illustrated. "Hints from Longfellow." "Humiliation and Glory of Christ." "The Pieta"; Illustrated. "Hindoo Women"; Illustrated. "Justice Marshall and the Turkey." "A Shooting Force in the East"; Illustrated. "Curious Facts in Animal Life." "The Sailor and his Dog Friend the Lion"; Illustrated. "The Sculptor and the Painter"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

"Right Rev. Monsignor Doane"; Illustrated. "The Bishop Foster Memorial"; Illustrated. "Library of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore"; Illustrated.

"Religious Notes and News," "At Home and Abroad," "Editor's Portfolio," "Obituary Notices," "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon," "Music," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Single copy, 25 cents; $3 a year; $1 50, six months; $1, four months—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

THE OLDEST AND BEST OF THE JUVENILES.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly.

A Constant Succession of New Stories!

The following admirable serial stories are now in course of publication in its columns:

"NELLY BLAKE'S SCHOOLDAYS."

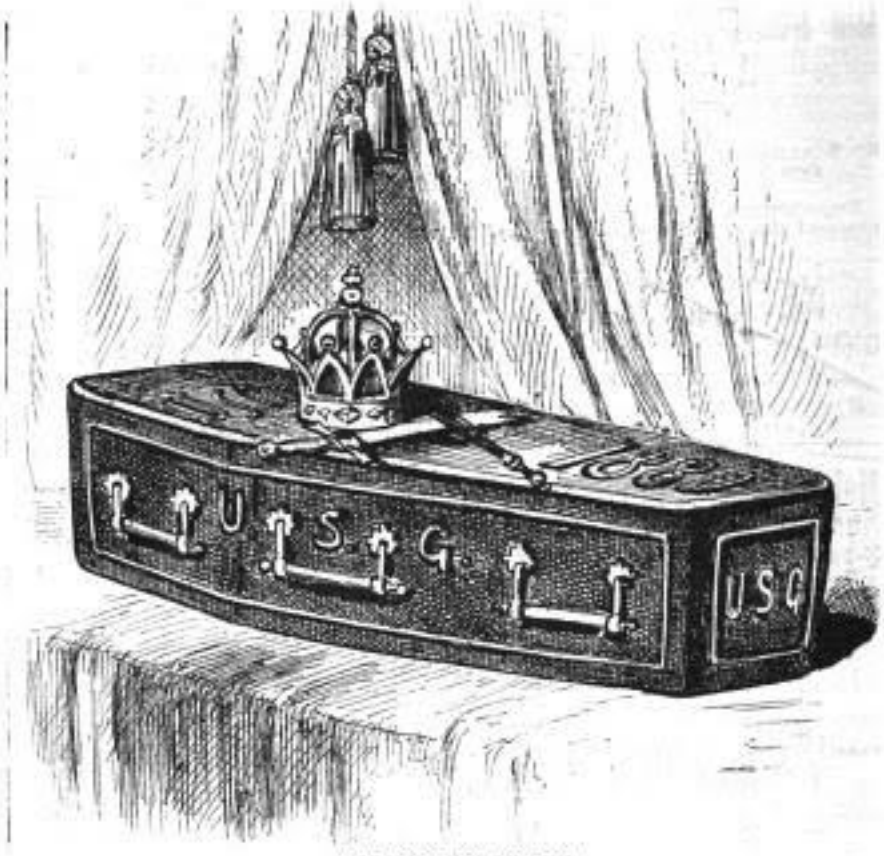
"THE BRAVE BOY of THE COASTGUARD,"
By ROGER STARBUCK.

"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays,"
By BRACKENRIDGE HEMYEN (Jack Harkaway).

"LEFT TO HIMSELF,"
By COMMODORE AP-LOGK.

"Cicero the Second; Or, Talked into Bad Luck,"
Being the remarkable adventures of Lysimachus Cicero Chinn, the Orator,
By JACK HARLY.

The contents are of a varied, amusing and highly instructive character. Each number has portraits and sketches of Distinguished People as the Public Schools, Notes of Travel, Adventures, Incidents, Legerdemain, etc., etc.



Published every Monday, price 5 cents. For sale by all newsdealers.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE FACTORS OF THE GREENBACK-LABOR-SOCIALIST-WOMAN-SUFFRAGE PARTY.

"LE ROI EST MORT!"

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
130 to 134 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

KIDNEY-WORT

PERMANENTLY CURES
KIDNEY DISEASES,
LIVER COMPLAINTS,
Constipation and Piles.

Dr. S. H. Clark, South Hero, Vt., says, "In cases of Kidney Troubles it has acted like a charm. It has cured many very bad cases of Piles, and has never failed to act efficiently."

Nelson Fairchild, of St. Albans, Vt., says, "It is of priceless value. After sixteen years of great suffering from Piles and Costiveness it completely cured me."

C. S. Hopkins, of Berkshire, says, "One package has done wonders for me in completely curing a severe Liver and Kidney Complaint."

IT HAS WONDERFUL POWER. WHY?

Because it Acts on the LIVER, the BOWELS and the KIDNEYS at the same time.

Because it cleanses the system of the poisonous humors that develope in Kidney and Urinary diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, or in Rheumatism, Neuralgia and nervous disorders.

KIDNEY-WORT is a dry vegetable compound and can be sent by mail prepaid.

One package will make six qts of medicine.

TRY IT NOW!

It May Be Had at the Druggists. Price, $1.00.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,

12 (Will send post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

14-Stop ORGANS

steel back & music, boxed & shipped only $85.00. New Pianos $210 to $1,000. Before you buy an instrument be sure to see my Mid summer offer Illustrated, free. Address, Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, N. J.

The Summer Fashions Just Received From Paris.

Frank Leslie's
LADY'S JOURNAL.
THE
Best & Most Attractive Fashion Journal
IN THE COUNTRY.
The Acknowledged Authority in European and American Fashions.

Elaborate Articles illustrative of
"What New Yorkers are Wearing."

Each Number contains Serial Novels and Short Stories, Sketches, etc., etc.; Illustrations of Home and Foreign Subjects; Poetry; Fashionable Intelligence; Social Gossip; Useful Information on Family Topics, etc., etc.

Published every Friday. For sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cts. per copy. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Chesapeake & Ohio Railway

A favorite route for freight and passenger traffic between the East and West, in connection with packets on the Ohio River; railroads diverging at Cincinnati to West, Southwest and Northwest, and with various roads intersecting it; also with steamers and sail-vessels on the coast connecting at Richmond, Va.

Particular attention is called to the
GREAT REDUCTION
IN EXCURSION FARES
TO THE
Various Springs and Summer Resorts
IN THE
MOUNTAINS OF VA. AND W. VA.
DURING THE SEASON OF 1880.

Tickets on sale at the Freight and Passenger Office of the Company, 229 Broadway, New York, and at the principal Ticket Offices throughout the country.

CONWAY R. HOWARD, G. P. & T. A.,
Richmond, Va.

Rates will be given and contracts made for freight to or from all points reached by the C. & O. Railway and its connections, by

H. W. CARR, Gen'l Eastern Ag't,
229 BROADWAY.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE
A practical road machine. Indorsed by the medical profession as the most healthful of out-door sports. Send 3c. stamp for 24-page catalogue with price list and full information, or 10 cts. for catalogue and copy of "The Bicycling World." THE POPE MFG. CO.,
59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

FRESCO STENCILS Colored Sketches and Mixed Colors to match. Also, Pamphlets of Instruction. Address J. L. Gifford, 141 E. 25th St., N.Y.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

Mining Trust Company
OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.

Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests: The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stocks, payment of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.

American Mining Stock Exchange
(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company),
EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

$3 Printing Press
Prints cards labels &c. (Self-inker $5) 15 larger size. For business or pleasure, young or old. Do your own advertising and printing. Catalogue of presses, type, cards, &c., for 3 stamps. Kelsey & Co. Meriden, Conn

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.
PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.
P. O. Box 4272, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!
Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of
TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

WILHELMS-QUELLE
IMPORTED
NATURAL MINERAL WATER
FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.
LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.
SOLE IMPORTERS,
MACK & BRUNLER,
7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,
Near Post Office.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS
For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.
NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all season of the year.
CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, June 26, 8:30 A.M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Thursday, July 1, 12:30 P.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, July 8, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, July 17, 1 P.M.
From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.
Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.
Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.
These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.
JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULE, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH
SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail, 50 cents. Circulars free. J. Bacon & Co. 38 Dey St., N.Y.
AND NOT WEAR OUT

A CHEAP, HUMOROUS AND DELIGHTFUL PUBLICATION.

Frank Leslie's
BUDGET,
CONTAINING HUMOROUS AND SPARKLING STORIES,
NARRATIVES OF ADVENTURE,
STARTLING AND ROMANTIC INCIDENTS,
TALES OF HEROISM, etc., etc.

A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,
Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

The contents are of so varied, interesting and thought-provoking a character, that it is universally acknowledged as a means to relieve the tedium of travel.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50, single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

FOR SALE,
"INTERLAKEN,"
THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. Englant, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,293.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, JULY 10, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

OPENING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.—THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.
MAJOR-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK, U.S.A., AND HON. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH, OF INDIANA.
From Photographs by Gutekunst and Judkins.—See Page 318.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, JULY 10, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

New York, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

CAUTION.

Subscribers, in sending subscriptions for any of our publications, should be careful to direct their letters plainly to FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE, 57 Park Place, New York, in order to insure their safe delivery.

THE DEMOCRATIC NOMINATION.

THE Democratic Party, in the nomination of General Hancock for President, has abandoned the one paramount issue upon which for nearly four years it has rallied its supporters in every State of the Union. Of that issue Mr. Tilden has been the absolute embodiment, and a profound conviction has pervaded the masses of his party that the wrong believed to have been done to him and it in the seating of President Hayes ought to be righted by his renomination and election. That conviction, reinforcing the popular appreciation of Mr. Tilden's ability and experience as a publicist, would have given an immense impetus to the Democratic canvass, and in all probability would have placed the party success beyond a peradventure. There is in the American mind a pronounced abhorrence of injustice and an honest, controlling love of fair play; and this sentiment, once definitely appealed to and fully aroused, is practically invincible, no matter by what or whom antagonized.

General Hancock, to whom the leadership of the Democracy of the Union has been intrusted, is in all respects a worthy type of the best American character. His patriotism is unquestioned, his ability beyond dispute. The one has been tried in the crucial tests of internecine war, while the other has been illustrated in the loftiest spheres of public duty. In point of integrity and purity of character, he is the peer of any man named before the Convention which made him the party standard-bearer. It is true that he has had little experience in civil life, and is unfamiliar with the responsibilities of civic administration. He would not bring to the discharge of the duties of the Executive office that thorough and practical knowledge of purely civil affairs which is possessed by General Garfield; but if elected, there can be no question that he would perform these duties conscientiously and with reference to the highest welfare of the people. While a soldier by education and profession, it is to be remembered that General Hancock has always, so far as he could do so consistently with the public interests, subordinated the military to the civil authority, holding that the rights of the citizen should never be invaded by sumptuary processes unless the highest considerations of public safety demanded the suspension of ordinary and constitutional prerogatives. While in command in the South during the critical period of reconstruction, General Hancock displayed a moderation and magnanimity which elicited the warmest approval of all right-thinking citizens. Probably his influence while commanding the Department of Louisiana contributed as largely as that of any man in public life to recall the country to a proper appreciation of the principles of constitutional government, then so seriously menaced by the irresponsible administrations of the Southern States. The support that he received in the Cincinnati Convention from the section whose armed attempt against the Union he so bravely resisted not only shows that his integrity of purpose as a soldier, while thus in command with really absolute powers, is appreciated, but affords a ground of positive hope for the future in the proof which it gives of the abatement of resentments once as bitter and as strong as death. When Confederates urge the nomination and give their support to a Union General as a candidate for the highest office in the land, we may conclude that "the bloody chasm" is, indeed, pretty effectually closed.

There is, it is true, something inconsistent in the nomination, by the Democracy, of a soldier for the Presidency. That party has for ten years or more vehemently opposed the selection of military Presidents as contrary to sound policy and as dangerous to the liberties of the people. To set up in business now as a soldier's party is, on the face of it, an abandonment of a cardinal tenet of the party faith. But the logic of events is stronger than the prejudices of partisans, and the Democracy shows a higher wisdom in confessing that it has given an exaggerated importance to an idea possibly right in itself, than in adhering stolidly to a fictitious issue, and so endangering the advantages offered by a great historic opportunity.

Upon one question of conspicuous concern, that of the finances, General Hancock's position, owing probably to his careful abstinence from political controversies, is not defined with the clearness which will be necessary to secure for him the support of the great financial interests of the country. So, too, his opinions about the tariff, Civil Service reform, State sovereignty, are unknown. But his views on these questions will, no doubt, be definitely stated in his letter of acceptance, and it is only fair that he shall have full opportunity to satisfy the public anxiety as to these and all cognate matters.

One thing, at least, is assured by General Hancock's nomination. It gives the leadership, in both parties, to the more conservative elements, and secures a cleanly, decent canvass, in which there will be no excuse for the brutalities which have only too often characterized our campaigns. That will be a gain of vast significance and value in its relations to the politics of the present and the future. That is the safest administration, always and everywhere, which is based upon character, ability and conscientiousness, and a contest which assures the triumph of these qualities, and the incarnation of these elements in the governmental policy, can have in it nothing to appeal to prejudice or passion—nothing to excite alarm or anxiety in the mind of the most sensitive or timid.

COMMERCIAL CO-OPERATION.

THE masses of the American people earn their bread, as scripturally enjoined to do, by the sweat of the brow. As the country has grown, and competition has been sharpened, the difficulties of obtaining an equitable share of the comforts and necessities of life have been increased to the many. Wealth in an organized capacity, and with a greed natural to riches, steps in to grasp the lion's share of whatever labor produces. Everywhere it resists wholesome regulation, evades its just share of the public burdens, multiplies its profits by fictitious representations of expenditure, and sacrifices the claims of labor to the increase of dividends. Great corporations and manufacturing establishments too often treat men, with their wants and feelings, with the same consideration that they bestow upon raw material and machinery.

The tendency of all this is to create unrest in the country, to provoke a struggle which from time to time brings disastrous consequences to individuals and communities. The great railroad strike which occurred in 1877 cost the country, in its several interests, not less than ninety millions of dollars; and this, perhaps, is a low estimate. To labor, the result of a strike is simply disastrous. If workingmen should now come to the belief that a strike for the next three months would end in securing an advance of twenty per cent. on their wages, the whole body of labor would be ready to co-operate. But here comes in this important fact: They would be obliged to work nearly one year before the increase could make good the amount of money lost during the continuance of the strike.

Angry contention now, and revolution and bloodshed in the future, will not bring about a more equitable distribution of wealth. The solution of that question must come through peaceful methods and practical means. Those who seek to improve their condition must respect the invested rights of property, for it is only by the enforcement of those rights that they hold the little wealth they now have, or may expect to gain in the future.

Capital alone is incompetent to the production of wealth. To be of use, it requires the assistance of both labor and consumption. To carry on wealth-producing operations there must necessarily be an investment of capital, the employment of labor, and the demand of a consumer. Each needs the assistance of the other, and each is entitled to an equitable share of the profit arising from the transactions in which they have mutual interests.

Commercial co-operation offers itself as an agent to secure even-handed justice. It says to capitalists, You shall have employment and receive a stipulated price for the use of your wealth; to laborers, You shall have work and be paid an agreed-upon price for your services, whether rendered by the strength of muscle or intelligence; to consumers, You shall have all articles or goods at market price and without misrepresentation. If there be a profit after capital has received its wages—interest dividend—and labor has been paid as agreed, it shall be fairly divided between the three—capital, labor and custom. It is the policy of commercial co-operation that all parties assisting in production shall participate in the distribution of profits they have jointly helped to create. In this it does no injustice to individuals or communities.

Commercial co-operation is no untried experiment. Pioneered by the Englishmen of Rochdale, it has, in that country, for the past forty years, been engaged in solving the vital problem of the age. The Rochdale store, on the co-operative plan, was opened in 1844 with a capital of only $33.97. The purchases for two weeks from the opening amounted to $123.64. This was, to be sure, an humble beginning. But mark the growth of the enterprise in the course of twenty-two years:

	Weekly Sales, 1844.	Weekly Sales, 1866.
Butter	60 lbs.	220 firkins, or 15,400 lbs.
Sugar	40 lbs.	170 cwts., or 19,040 lbs.
Flour	2 sacks	468 sacks
Soap	56 lbs.	2 tons, 13 cwt., or 5,936 lbs.

The weekly receipts during the first fortnight of the society's operations did not average $50. In 1866 the average weekly sales amounted to $24,110, and the total for the year to $1,253,720.

Unheralded by pomp or show, unsupported by titled names or by men of commercial or social distinction, co-operation has gone far towards effecting radical changes in the condition of England's working classes. That a just idea may be formed of the magnitude to which commercial co-operation has attained in England, we call attention to the following return made to Parliament in 1879:

Number of societies in operation	1,381
Number of members	851,364
Funds invested, share capital	$27,439,790
Funds invested, loan capital	5,366,325
Total investment	$32,806,115
Total sales, wholesale and retail	$106,870,663
Total profits	$9,333,555
Total retail distribution, sales	$77,845,280
Total retail distribution, profits	$8,480,533

The per centage of profit on the amount invested in the wholesale and retail business equaled twenty-eight per cent., and these profits have gone to the benefit of workingmen and their families.

The workingmen of this country are no less intelligent or energetic than those of England. Both have wrongs to right and grievances to redress; but while the former hope to find relief through some sort of political machinery or governmental action, the latter, with a firm reliance on their own efforts, are attaining to a higher and better condition. Just what co-operation is doing for the operatives of England it is capable of doing for the workingmen of the United States. We commend the system to the earnest consideration of the more intelligent and thoughtful among our industrial classes.

THE CANDIDATES FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

THE tendency of our politics in recent years has been to belittle the office of Vice-President. The standards of capacity by which nominees for that office are measured have been steadily lowered until now the politicians hold anybody who can control votes to be "good enough for Vice-President." There could be no more grievous mistake. The office is, in point of fact, one of vast importance. The incumbent is liable at any moment, in the hazards of human life, to be called to the Chief Magistracy, and he should be equipped in the largest sense for that possible exigency. Under the present method of counting the Electoral vote, he exercises an authority and influence as to the determination of the Presidential issue which are practically absolute. In an evenly balanced Senate, his vote may finally decide questions affecting the interests of millions of people. Surely, no man without experience in affairs, or destitute of capacity to grapple with the broadest and weightiest issues, should occupy a place at once so dignified and so important.

Of the candidates now in nomination for the Vice-Presidency, Mr. English, the Democratic nominee, is unquestionably the more worthy of support. He has ability, experience and marked independence of character; he is without unsavory partisan entanglements, and he is more truly abreast of the dominant opinions of the country than the great majority of the Democratic leaders. When during his Congressional career he was called to face the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution, which did not prohibit slavery, he courageously opposed the policy of his party, and finally, by his resolution, secured the passage of a Bill under which the people of the Territory, to whom the whole subject was referred, voted to assure its broad acres to freedom for ever. During the recent war, Mr. English was thoroughly loyal to the Union, and it may be said, comprehensively, that his public career has been in every way honorable, exhibiting throughout high statesmanlike qualities.

It will not be pretended by the most pronounced partisan that Mr. Arthur, the Republican candidate for the Vice-Presidency, has any claim to public support based on considerations of peculiar fitness, experience or sympathy with the higher politics of the time. He is, undoubtedly, a gentleman of capacity and integrity of character, but he represents influences which have debauched our political life and is, admittedly, the candidate of "a machine" which has nothing whatever to recommend it. Personally, we believe him to be a better man than he is considered to be in the general conception of him, but he certainly would not bring to the office for which he is named either that acquaintance with affairs or that freedom from questionable alliances which must be regarded as essential to a proper discharge of its duties. To transfer the methods of the New York "machine" to the theatre of the national Senate, would be to invite the derision of all intelligent observers everywhere, and the country cannot afford thus to confess to a degeneracy of character which does not really exist.

We speak on this subject, as on all others of a political nature, from a purely non-partisan standpoint, and with no other motive than a desire to see the Vice-Presidential office restored, in the popular appreciation, to the high place which it should legitimately occupy. Let us elevate rather than degrade it, increase rather than diminish its dignities, making qualifications and character the controlling considerations in determining all our action concerning it.

OUR SHORTSIGHTEDNESS.

WHEN the people of a great city like New York adopt the happy-go-lucky plan in the conduct of their affairs, they must not be surprised if the experiment turns out badly. It never yet turned out well. It is of a piece with the folly of the man who brags of his contempt for the laws of health. Yet it seems a hopeless task to wake up the men who have a stake in this city to any adequate sense of the risks they are running and the calamities they are inviting. In vain the newspapers warn and exhort and scold; vainly a public-spirited citizen here and there lifts up his voice in the streets. Like Wisdom, he cries, and no man regards him. New Yorkers of intelligence and influence, of property and standing in the community, are too busy, apparently, too much absorbed in their private affairs, to have any time to spare for the affairs of the public, for looking after the common welfare and the common safety.

Take a single matter of vital importance—the preservation of the harbor. What does not New York owe to this harbor? What would she be without it? To it she is indebted for her position as the commercial capital of the Union, and one of the great trading cities of the world. Its hurt is her hurt; its destruction would be her destruction. For years, under the happy-go-lucky plan, ignorance and recklessness have been at work upon this harbor. The refuse of the city has been dumped into it, or just outside of it, to be washed in by the next flood tide. Shoals are found now where once was deep water. Year after year this work of destruction and ruin has been going on. How many New Yorkers, of the class we are referring to, have done anything towards stopping it? How many have given more than a passing thought to it?

Take another matter—our seaside resorts. New York is fortunate in having several fine ocean beaches almost at her doors. Millions of dollars have been invested in them. Some of the largest hotels in the world line them. If they are properly cared for—if due regard is had to sanitary laws—they will give pleasure and health to millions of people yet unborn. But if sewerage is neglected, if the filth of the city is dumped where it will drift in upon the beaches, if the excursion steamboats have to go on running the gantlet of the pestiferous stenches of Barren Island, which poison the air for miles around, the prosperity of these resorts will be as brief as it is phenomenal.

Take a more important matter—the condition of the streets, especially in those sections the city where the population is densest. If any New Yorker does not know what this condition is, let him take a walk through the heart of the East side. So many years have passed now since the pestilence was here that it has become to most of us as unreal as an ugly dream. But what assurance have we that this immunity will last? Even during this respite, rich New York is paying dearer than it has any notion of for its neglect of poor New York. The night-winds are no respecters of persons. They gather up the poisons that reek and seethe in these uncared-for tenement-house streets, and carry them far—as far as Murray Hill, as far as the furthest stately mansion on Fifth Avenue. Yet

Digitized by Google

Summer follows Summer, and the streets are not cleaned, and New York grumbles and does nothing!

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

ALTHOUGH almost ten years have passed since the crimes committed by the French Commune brought down the general denunciation of mankind, there are many persons who still believe that those engaged in it should not be amnestied. Even since that time the French Ministry has always been opposed to a complete amnesty, and M. Gambetta, who is in many ways the foremost man in France, was strongly against it. The rapid spread of radical opinions in France has now made these statesmen change their views, and the Chamber of Deputies has granted a full pardon to all the persons engaged in the Commune. Gambetta, in a speech of wonderful power, supported the side of the Communists, and it must have been a bitter pill for the great orator to be obliged to take up the cause so long identified with his rival Clémenceau, and to vote for the return of such a man as Rochefort. The principal immediate cause of the granting of the amnesty is the growing political sagacity which the extreme Radicals have shown. At Lyons, Blanqui received a plurality of votes but not a sufficient majority to return him. He was opposed by two other candidates, one an Ultra-radical, the other a radical Opportunist, supported by Gambetta and the Government. When it appeared that Blanqui could not beat these two candidates, they were withdrawn, and Ballue was nominated and elected. Ballue is the President of the Lyons Municipal Council, a body rivaling the similar councils of Paris and Marseilles in the intensity of the socialistic sentiments of its members. The new deputy is as irreconcilable a Radical as Blanqui himself, but he is a believer in diplomacy instead of barricades. His election at once opened the eyes of the Government to the advanced political sagacity of their opponents, and the plenary amnesty has been the outcome of the election at Lyons.

Another reason why the granting of the amnesty was hurried forward was to enable the exiled Communists to be in Paris upon the 14th of July—the anniversary of the capture of the Bastille—which day has been made a national holiday. Upon that day a political oath is to be imposed upon the whole army, and flags will be distributed. The choice of the day for the military performance is criticised as a particularly unfortunate one. The part which the army took upon that day was certainly not that of freedom, as the massacre of Sombreuil and his soldiers proves. These, no matter what we may think of the cause they defended, at least died in the performance of their duty. The distribution of flags on a national holiday seems to be in even worse taste. While France is recruiting her forces after the terrible disasters which befell her arms in the Franco-Prussian war, it would have been wise to have avoided all mention of the flags which were so gallantly carried through the Crimea, Italy and Algeria. Those flags are now in Berlin, and the presentation of new colors upon the first national holiday can do nothing but stir up unpleasant memories of the past and make July 14th a day of sorrow and fasting rather than a holiday.

In England the Bradlaugh case, as elsewhere shown, still continues to excite great interest. It is not as yet certain what course Mr. Bradlaugh will pursue, but there is little chance of his retiring quietly from the field. Meantime, Mr. Gladstone has injured himself by the vacillation of his conduct and by the lukewarm support which he gave Mr. Bradlaugh. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Opposition, was obliged to take the initiative and to ask the House to deal with the case. This was properly Mr. Gladstone's duty as Prime Minister and leader of the House of Commons, and his failure to act decisively is very severely commented upon.

The scandalous Tichborne case has been raked up once more. It will be remembered that a butcher named Arthur Orton came to England and represented himself as Roger Tichborne, the heir to the great Tichborne estates, who was supposed to have been lost at sea many years before. This person began a lawsuit in which he laid claim to the estates, and after a trial, which for duration and exciting incidents has never been equaled, a verdict was given against him. The claimant's perjury was so flagrant that the judge who presided ordered him to be tried on the criminal charge of perjury. There were three separate charges of perjury in the indictment, and he was found guilty upon them all. The Chief Justice of England, before whom the trial took place, sentenced him to two consecutive terms of imprisonment of seven years—one for each of two of the charges. The first seven years has now expired, and an attempt has been made to show that it is illegal to sentence a man twice for what was absolutely the same offense. On the other hand, it was pointed out that the two charges referred to two entirely different things, and that because a man has been punished once for perjury he has not a consequent right to commit perjury for the remainder of his days. The Court of Appeals, on June 26th, gave judgment denying the application of the claimant to have the two sentences passed upon him made concurrent instead of consecutive.

The Jesuits who have been expelled from France are seeking homes in other countries. Many of them have gone to Spain, and King Alfonso has issued a circular to the governors of different provinces ordering them to prevent any Jesuits expelled from France from establishing colleges or houses near the French frontier. In the other provinces the Government reserves to itself the right to inquire into their claims and to authorize them to establish themselves if everything is satisfactory. The crusade against religion in France is by no means over, and Monseigneur Freppel, who has just been elected a Deputy from Brest, is exactly the kind of man to stir up more trouble. He is one of the most combative members of the Church Militant, and his presence in an Assembly where there is an overwhelmingly Republican majority will probably lead to anything rather than to inspire moderation among the enemies of the Church.

THE tide of immigration continues to pour in with unabated volume. In one day last week, 2,715 immigrants landed at this port, the majority being Germans, Swedes and Scandinavians.

NOW THAT both political parties have pledged themselves to maintain "a free ballot in every part of the United States" may we expect that rifle-clubs shot guns, etc., will no longer be employed as electioneering arguments in the South, and that factory operatives in Massachusetts will be permitted to vote as they please and not as their employers command?

THE census returns for this city, now complete as to a few small districts, place the total population at 1,207,215. This is a gain in ten years of 264,973, and of 691,668 since 1850. In other words, the population of the metropolis has doubled within thirty years. The population of Brooklyn is stated at 560,000, a gain of 78,000 since 1875. Counting the population of all our suburbs, it may fairly be said that our metropolitan supremacy is in no danger whatever of successful rivalry.

JULES VERNE'S "Around the World in Eighty Days" has been outdone by Mr. Ismay, of the White Star Line, who, leaving Liverpool March 13th, reached this city by way of Egypt, India, China and Japan on June 19th, having traveled 22,320 miles in sixty-six days, exclusive of stoppages at different points. After allowing for nine days' passage to Liverpool, the total time required for the trip around the world would be seventy-five days, or five days less than the time required by the traveler in Verne's story.

THE Democratic platform declares for "honest money, consisting of gold and silver and paper, convertible to coin on demand." Down in Maine, where the party has surrendered to the Greenbackers, this declaration will scarcely awaken a very cordial response. The truth is that, on the financial question, the Democratic Party occupies a position which, so long as the votes of its Representatives in Congress contravene its declarations, must repel the sympathy of the real friends of a sound financial policy.

FEDERAL office-holders in this city are already being assessed for campaign purposes by the Republican Congressional Committee. The rate of contribution demanded is two per cent. on the salaries of officials. The circulars issued by the committee say that it is "authorized to state that such voluntary contribution from persons employed in the service of the United States will not be objected to in any official quarter." This probably means that the President and heads of departments have made up their minds to ignore all Civil Service promises and regulations in order to "save the party."

THE steamer Gulnare, which is to convey the Howgate expedition party to the Polar regions, sailed from Washington, June 21st. She will touch at Halifax and St. Johns, and then proceed directly to Greenland. After landing the permanent colony on Lady Franklin Bay, the steamer will return to the United States and be loaded with supplies and such other articles as may be needed, and will then sail again for the Bay with another land party to take the place of the one now sent out, which will explore the interior of the Arctic country. An abundance of dogs and sleighs have been provided, together with experienced guides, who will be employed in the advance towards the Pole.

THE Cobden Club of London has undertaken to enlighten American farmers as to the evils of the protective system. To this end the Club is publishing pamphlets for distribution throughout the West in which the advantages of free trade are set forth in glowing terms. In one of these pamphlets, the writer estimates that the farmers of the great Central and Western States expend annually $1,400,000,000 in manufactured goods; and these our British cousins would, of course, be only too happy to supply. We suspect that it is not so much solicitude for the American farmer as anxiety to build up British manufactures that impels the Cobden Club to engage in the distribution of its pamphlets on this side of the water.

THE United States Minister at Madrid has been instructed to make an energetic protest against the conduct of the Spanish gunboats and revenue cutters in Spanish waters in molesting and otherwise interfering with American vessels. The case of the Ellen Merrill, referred to by us last week, is not the first instance in which foreign ships have been fired into, chased and stopped by Spanish war cruisers even outside the waters over which Spain has jurisdiction. Within a period of less than eighteen months Spain has had to pay $10,000 for a similar aggression on an English steamer, $23,000 for aggressions on German vessels, and one heavy fine for having stopped an American ship. It has now been determined by the Governments of the United States, Great Britain and Germany that these repeated aggressions by the Spanish cruisers shall come to an end, and it is said that those Powers will, in the event of a repetition of the outrages, insist not only on the payment of damages, but also on the punishment of the Spanish officers by whom the offenses may be committed.

THERE are a good many people who believe that the Grant managers are not particularly solicitous for the success of General Garfield in the coming canvass. It is said, indeed, that Senator Cameron may consent to serve as Chairman of the National Republican Committee; but he may do so rather to retain his hold upon the "machine" than from a desire to promote the fortunes of the party candidates. Garfield's defeat would enable the "triumvirate" to exclaim: "We told you so; if you had rallied on Grant, we could have won"; and this would prove a perfect solace for all the woes suffered at Chicago. Conkling, Logan and Cameron still believe in Grant for 1884, and any disaster that would reconcile the party to his nomination then would be welcome to them.

MANY of the excursion boats running to the seaside resorts within reach of the city are utterly unfit for the service in which they are employed. Some of them are old and are run in utter violation of the laws of safety. Inquiry by a World reporter seems to establish the fact that when a boat has grown too old and unseaworthy to be employed in any regular service, she is turned into an excursion boat. Many of the steamers now advertised for excursion boats are running without having obtained the permit required by law from the United States Inspector of Steamboats, and none of them ever pretends to comply with the State laws in all respects. One of these days there will be a wholesale disaster on one of these overloaded and dilapidated "rattle-traps," and then the authorities will wake up for a time and demand that the laws shall be complied with, only to lapse again into indifference when the public excitement has subsided. Individual citizens can do a good deal to compel obedience to the requirements of law by prosecuting the owners and managers of steamers which habitually disregard them, and disagreeable as the work may be, it should be taken up and carried forward in the interests of public safety now so generally endangered.

THE Cincinnati Convention snuffed out a good many burning ambitions. The most conspicuous victim was, perhaps, Senator Thurman, whose public career may now be considered at an end. The fate of this distinguished gentleman is certainly lamentable. One of the ablest men of his party, and representing its best impulses as to every question except one, he has gone into eclipse because, as to that one issue of supreme importance, he permitted his ambition to lead him astray, and sacrifice both his own record and the traditional principles of the party faith. Had Mr. Thurman vigorously resisted the financial craze which for a time swept over the country, menacing every great public interest, he would stand to-day among our foremost and most influential statesmen, and, even in retirement, would be remembered with gratitude and profound respect. But he subordinated principle to expediency, and he is to-day, with all his commanding intellectual ability and his admitted personal purity, a completely baffled and disappointed man. That a career which promised such grand results should have this termination is pitiable indeed.

THE survey of the proposed ship canal across the Florida peninsula has just been completed by General Gilmore and his corps of engineers. The official report estimates the cost of the work at $50,000,000, and says that, with the canal dues fixed at twenty-eight cents per ton of registered tonnage, the tolls on a little more than two-thirds of the amount of tonnage which passed through the Straits of Florida during the last fiscal year would enable the canal to pay its current expenses. It is added, however, that in order to pay, besides five per cent. interest on the construction capital, four times the tonnage of last year must pass through the canal. It is very doubtful whether, under the most favorable circumstances, the canal tonnage can be thus quadrupled, and at any rate it is quite safe to conclude that the Government cannot afford at this time to invest $50,000,000 of the people's money in any such enterprise as is here proposed.

THE recent Commencement exercises at Princeton College were saddened by the fact of the death of six students, and the sickness of fifteen others from malarial fever, arising from the defective drainage of the college buildings. Friends of the institution, however, will be gratified to learn that efficient measures have been taken to remove the causes of disease, and that by the opening of the Autumn term all the buildings will be placed in a perfectly healthy condition. The finances of the college are reported to be on a sound basis. During the past year gifts have been received amounting to $200,000, and there is no debt. A new telescope has been ordered at a cost of $30,000. Plans have been prepared for a new chapel, the gift of Mr. Henry Marquand, and work is to be begun upon it immediately. Anglo-Saxon has been added to the curriculum, and new courses for past graduates will be established. The influence which Princeton has exerted upon the thought and culture of the country has been very great, and the fact that its future promises to be no less brilliant than its past is full of encouragement for all who understand the intimate relation between the highest education and the development of the best forms of national life.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

TWENTY-FIVE buildings at Kendall, Pa., were destroyed by fire on June 25th.

THE army-worm has appeared in some parts of of New York and New Hampshire.

THE wheat crop now being harvested in Ohio will, without doubt, be the largest one ever raised in the State.

THE census makes the population of Boston about 352,000. In 1870 that of the same territory was 295,599.

THE ship Constellation, which carried American bounty to Ireland, arrived at this port June 25th, from Queenstown.

PRESIDENT HAYES attended the Commencement exercises at Kenyon College, Ohio, on June 23d, and made a brief address.

THE two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Order of the Christian Brothers was celebrated in Baltimore on June 24th.

THE combined anthracite coal interests have decided to continue the present plan of working three days alternately in each week during July.

THE Republicans of the Second Maine District have nominated W. P. Frye for Congress, and those of the Fourth have nominated Captain C. A. Boutelle.

THE Greenback-Labor Party of Vermont has nominated M. O. Heath for Governor. In Texas the Greenback candidate for Governor is W. H. Hammon.

OUR Consul-General at Shanghai reports that an American manufacturing company has met with remarkable success in the introduction of clocks into China.

THE Supervising Inspector of Steamboats for New York reports that he has already taken steps to ascertain whether the inspections of the Narragansett were properly made by the local board.

THE report of the West Point examinations recommends the dismissal of Whittaker. It has not yet been acted on at Washington. Whittaker may be granted a court-martial on the subject of his mutilation.

NEARLY 600 passengers for Europe sailed from this port on Saturday last. Among them was Receiver Jewett, of the Erie Railway, and family. The tide of European travel has scarcely ever been greater than now.

THE Mexican authorities declined to sanction the request of the United States that General Hatch be permitted to follow Victoria's band of hostile Apaches across the border into Mexico, where they have taken refuge.

GOVERNOR DAVIS has been nominated for re-election by the Republicans of Maine. In Vermont the Republicans have nominated Colonel Roswell Farnham for Governor, and John L. Barstow for Lieutenant-Governor.

THE Democracy in all parts of the country manifest great enthusiasm over the nomination of General Hancock, and have overwhelmed him with congratulations. Ratification meetings have already been held in several cities.

OUR Minister at Vienna reports that the large and increasing emigration among the Hungarians is attracting public attention, and that the advisability of checking it by granting public lands in Hungary to the destitute is under discussion.

THE Grand Jury of this city has indicted Henry J. Dudley, Superintendent of the Department of Public Buildings, for alleged persistent violation of the laws of the State in allowing buildings to be erected in such a manner as to endanger the lives of the citizens.

THE steamboat City of New York, of the Alexandre line, between New York and Mexico, took fire on June 23d at Roberts's wharves, Brooklyn, and was towed into the stream, where she and what cargo she had on board were destroyed. The loss is estimated at $200,000.

AT an Emigration Convention held in Iowa last week it was shown that there are hundreds of thousands of acres of choice lands still open to settlement which may be had at $3 to $10 an acre, and that the immigration of thrifty settlers to Northwestern Iowa was never so large as now.

Foreign.

THE Spanish Cortes was prorogued April 22d.

THE Burial Bill has passed the British House of Lords.

M. BILLE has been appointed Danish Minister to the United States.

THE American colony in Paris will celebrate the Fourth of July as usual.

THE murderer of Hon. George Brown, at Toronto, has been sentenced to death.

THE Spanish Council of State has adopted a Bill forbidding the corporal punishment of negroes in Cuba.

HENRI ROCHEFORT will establish a radical newspaper in Paris if the amnesty proposition shall prevail in the Senate.

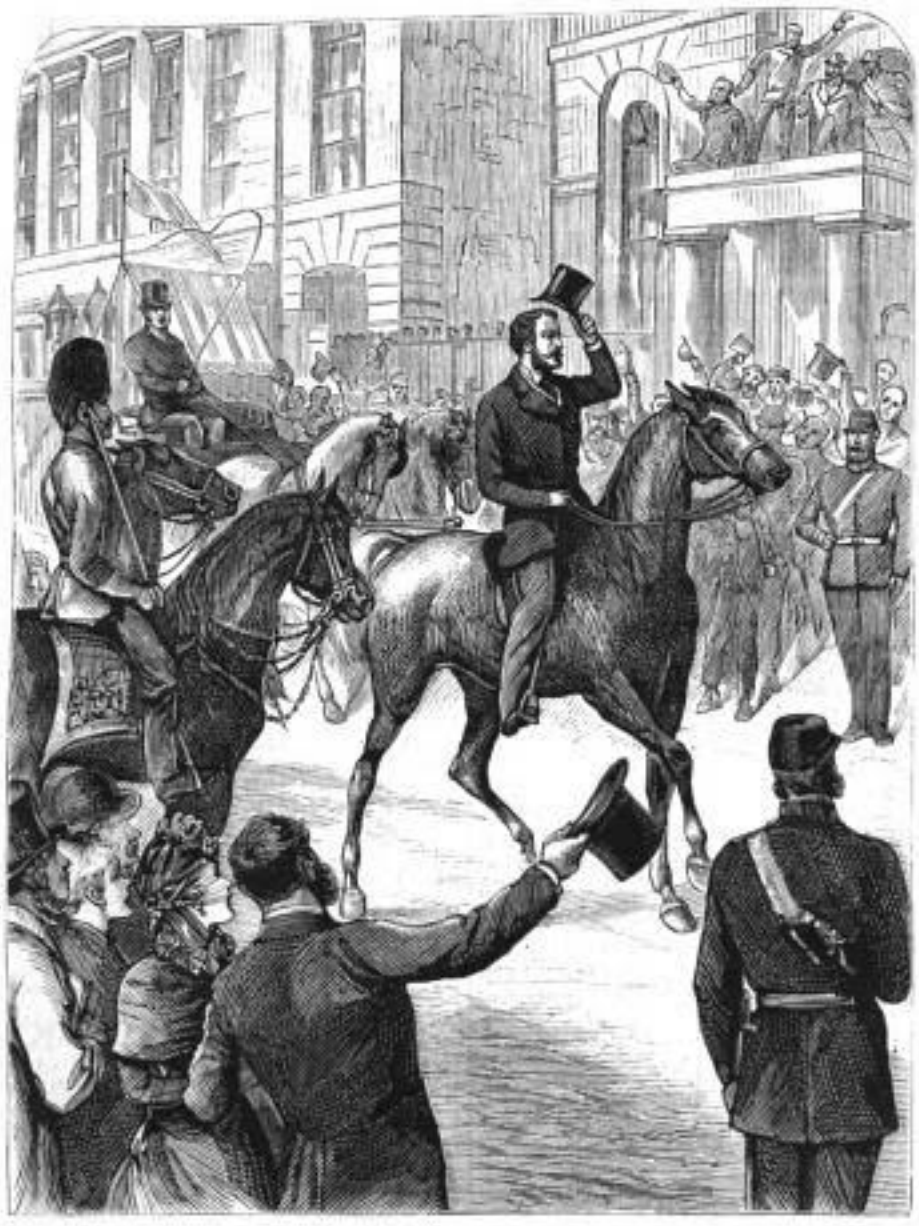
REPORTS from Ireland assert that eight months of severe distress remain to be faced, and that contributions have greatly fallen off.

THE triumph of the Italian Clericals in the late municipal elections was overwhelming and was due to a coalition with the Conservatives.

ADVICES have been received at the Department of State that the Egyptian obelisk is expected to reach New York about the 15th of July.

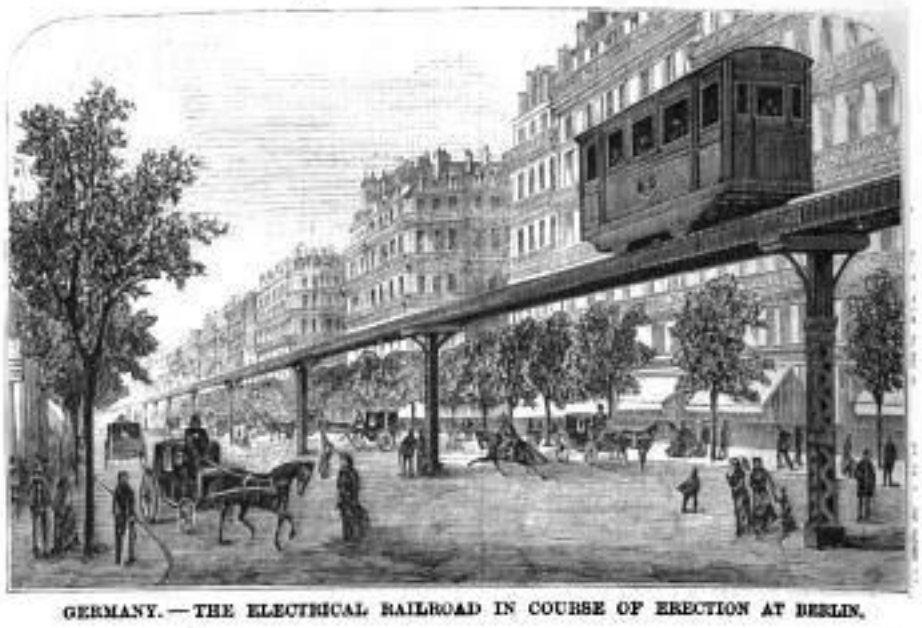
THE news from Buenos Ayres is that the Federals won a victory on June 22d, but were repulsed in an attempt to enter the city on the 24th.

THE Supplementary Berlin Conference has practically concluded its labors by adopting a new frontier line for Greece, which the Powers will require Turkey to carry into effect.



FRESH labor troubles are imminent in the north and northwest Lancashire districts of England, where a promised advance of five per cent. in the wages of the operatives is insisted upon.

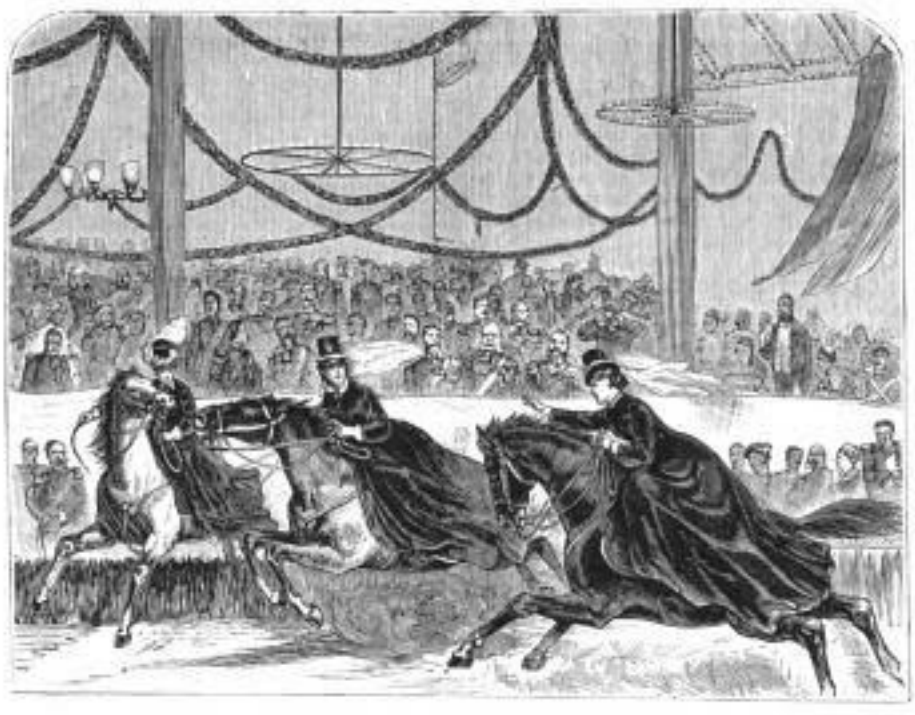
THE House of Lords has rejected by 101 to 90 the Bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister. The House of Commons has passed the Bill for closing public houses on Sunday in England and Wales.



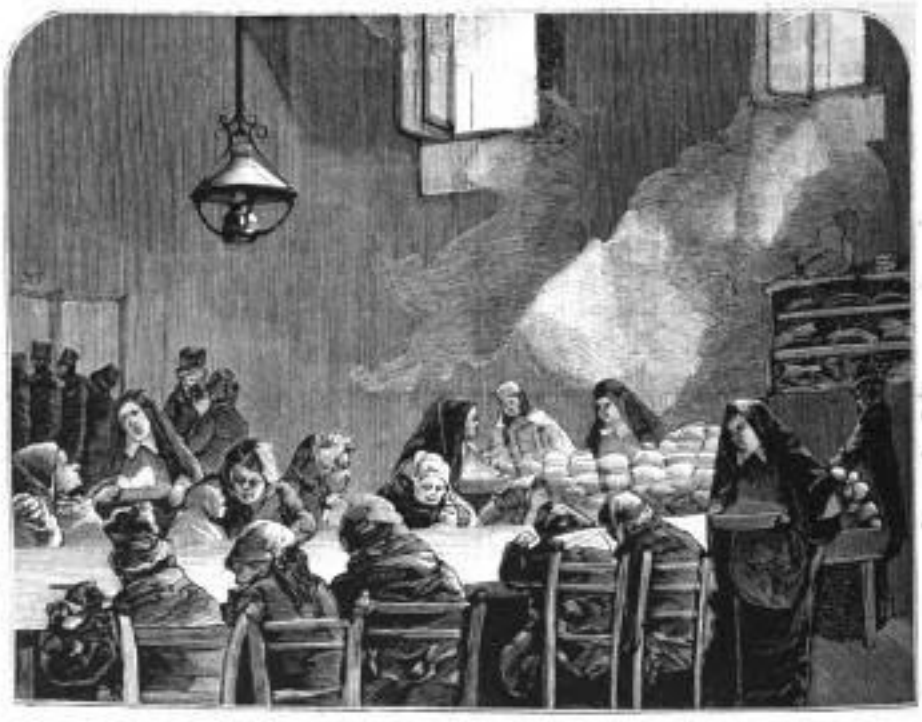
IT is believed that Gambetta's action on the amnesty question will hasten a general election in France. All the judicial officers of the court of Versailles have resigned to avoid carrying into effect the decree concerning religious societies.

Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 319.



IRELAND.—FORMAL ENTRY OF THE LORD-LIEUTENANT INTO DUBLIN.

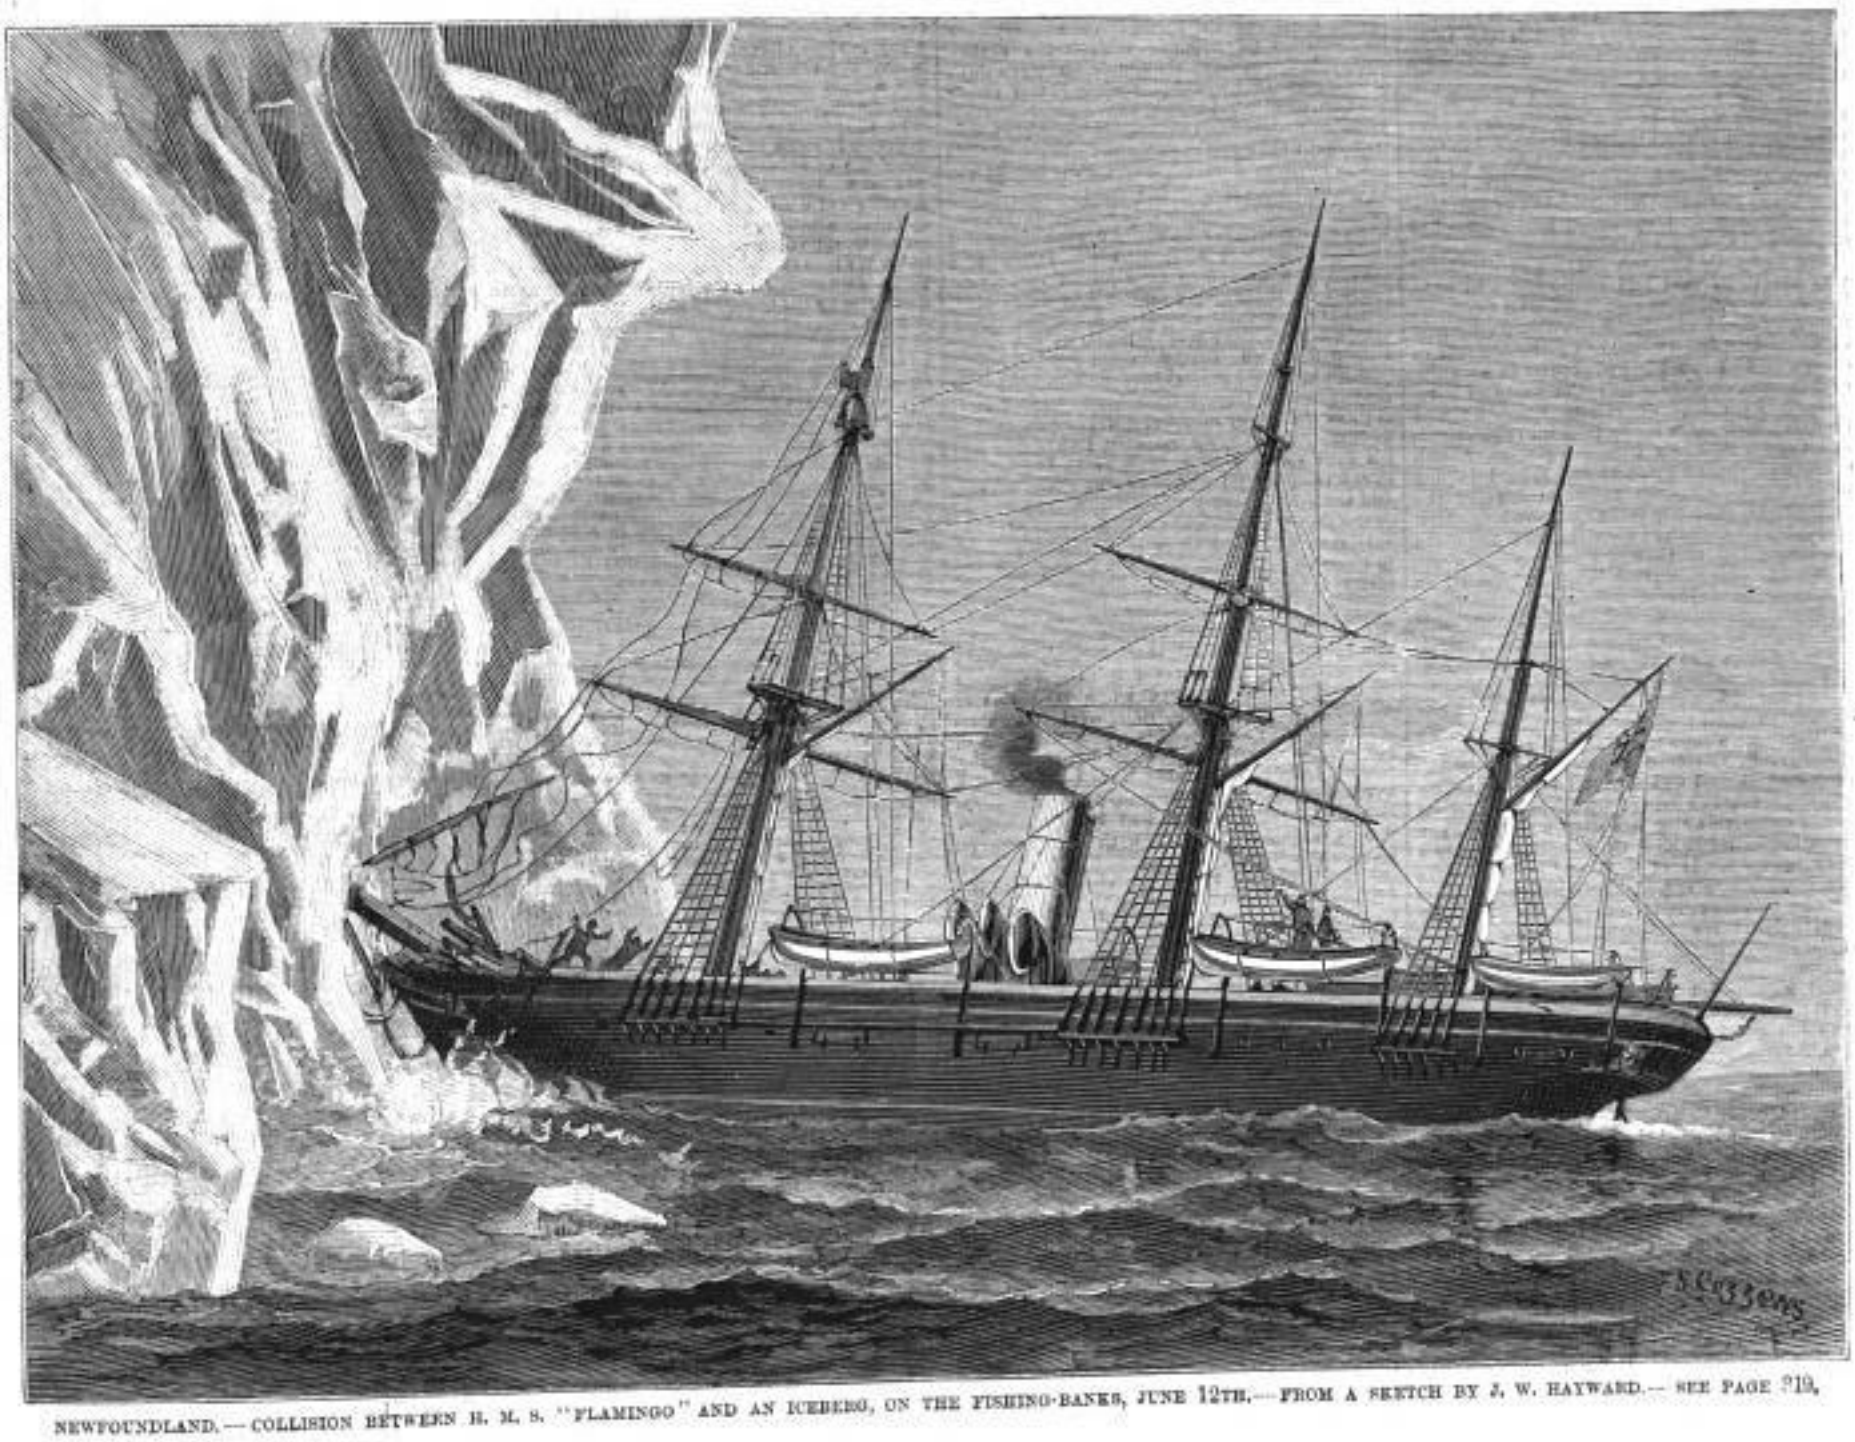


GERMANY.—THE ELECTRICAL RAILROAD IN COURSE OF ERECTION AT BERLIN.

ENGLAND.—OFFICERS' QUARTERS IN THE KNIGHTSBRIDGE BARRACKS, LONDON.

GERMANY.—A CHASE FOR A KNOT BEFORE THE IMPERIAL FAMILY.

ITALY.—FEEDING THE POOR IN THE SAN LORENZO DISTRICT, NAPLES.



BELGIUM.—THE JUBILEE OF INDEPENDENCE—THE NATIONAL EXHIBITION BUILDING AT BRUSSELS.

Digitized by Google

RHODE ISLAND.—THE CHILDREN'S NEW DIVERTISEMENT—PAYING HOMAGE TO THE QUEEN IN A PRIVATE GARDEN AT NEWPORT.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN AMATEUR ARTIST.
SEE PAGE 319.

NEWFOUNDLAND.—COLLISION BETWEEN H. M. S. "FLAMINGO" AND AN ICEBERG, ON THE FISHING-BANKS, JUNE 12TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. W. HAYWARD.—SEE PAGE 319.

Digitized by Google

ONLY FRIENDS.

"I TELL you, Rita, this is nothing more nor less than a flirtation!"

It was a very decided voice that gave utterance to this sweeping assertion, and the lady who possessed it was one of those bright, up-and-down girls, essentially American, who, having an immensity of "go" in them, have nevertheless hearts in the right places; but for once it would seem that she had allowed sincerity to push discretion to its limits, for a flush of anger came into the clear white cheeks of her companion, and a steely gleam of indignation flashed into the generous blue eyes confronting her as their owner answered:

"You should be well assured of your position to bring such an accusation against me, Annah!"

"There is not the slightest occasion to put yourself in a rage, Rita. You have all our lives given the freest expression of your opinions in the matter of such 'goings on' of mine as did not quite suit your exalted ideas of propriety, and I have every right to hold my tongue and be happy when, for once in a way, I see you stepping a trifle down from your immaculate position in imitation of the prevailing fashion of this naughty world. But, Rita, I know you in and out too well to believe you capable of coming comfortably through an 'affair' as another woman would. Your ideal views of men and things are sure to bring you to grief when you undertake to put them into effect in real life, and—and—well, the truth is, I cannot afford to lose faith in everything, nor am I so shallow a friend as to be able to look calmly on and see you play with a fire that I know will end in burning you!"

This was a long and a surprisingly serious speech for impulsive, volatile Annah Clare, and before it was finished something like tears trembled in the eyes of both speaker and listener. All resentment had faded out of the face of Rita Anstice, but there was a shadow of nervous impatience disturbing her voice when after a moment she spoke.

"I do not think you quite comprehend, Annah, that my relations with Ernest Forsyth hold nothing that you could condemn. We are simply and only the most congenial and best of friends, and it is absurd that you who know me so well should imagine anything else possible."

"If you for a moment believe that I think you capable of willfully trifling with your own honor or Ernest Forsyth's happiness, you do me a wrong. You are a much wiser woman than I, Rita, but for once I think my practical knowledge of life more to be relied upon than your beliefs. Depend upon it, there is no such thing as friendship between a man and woman unless youth has passed for one or the other, and you will come to my way of thinking when some morning you awaken to find that society has transformed your tame cat into a lover!"

"Annah!"

"Rita! You are shocked and indignant at the idea, and, perhaps, I have wounded you to no purpose—needlessly, even—but the thing was on my conscience and must out. Let me make my peace now and go."

Then the two friends kissed each other amicably as might be, the one having tested her devotion to the uttermost in thus braving the displeasure of the woman whom of all her friends she most valued; the other sorely touched in her pride and tried in her patience that any one had so dared to become her censor, and so they parted.

The thing that Annah Clare had predicted was the thing that had really come to pass. One of those stinging creatures who purchase immunity from the world's criticisms by constituting themselves judge of the morals of others had elevated her eyebrows in a significant manner in coupling the name of Mrs. Anstice with that of Ernest Forsyth; and knowing how such looks pass into assertions, and these assertions into allegations, Annah Clare had rushed away to her friend, hoping by a word in season to warn Rita of the danger and save her from all knowledge that slander had threatened. Alas, as is too often the fortune of these well meaning, but overdirect people, she had only succeeded in touching the pride of Rita Anstice, making what had before been but the simple, natural indulgence of congeniality a matter of principle to be defended and vindicated at any cost or pains.

And Miss Clare must have met the object of contention upon the disputed ground had she waited there a moment longer, since she had scarcely left the door before Ernest Forsyth rang its bell, and was ushered into the pretty Egyptian boudoir where Rita Anstice still sat in her chair, thinking intently—a little shaken from her usual calm it may be, but making a very pretty study of light and shadow, with her clear white complexion, golden hair and clinging white garments, defining exquisite outlines against the black satin lining of her chaise longue.

Something in the young man's face as he stood a moment regarding her from the portière, or something, perhaps, in the young man himself, further disturbed the current of Mrs. Anstice's meditation, because a flush of color which she angrily tried to control surged up under her milk-white skin, and there was more of constraint in her greeting than she would have willed had she full control of her faculties at the moment.

"This is the effect of Annah Clare's absurd gossip!" she told herself, resentfully, and straightway rushed to the other extreme, proudly confident of herself, of her motives and her friend.

Such a pleasant afternoon as these two human creatures passed together comes rarely to the highly organized of earth, because the true charm of all thoughtful intercourse lies in that near approach to the inexpressible in which two minds attain the power of filling in the blanks for which language has furnished us no adequate forms of expression.

Inheriting a nature at once poetic, imaginative and thoroughly true, Rita Anstice half married her direct opposite in all these things simply and solely for the incomprehensible reason that she loved him.

Her husband was eminently a good fellow—honest, downright and correct of habit; handsome, too, and strong, but—

"A primrose on the river's brim,
A yellow primrose was to him!"

and, while she had known this to be true of him, Rita entertained some utterly impossible views in regard to the growing together of husband and wife, which the first few years of her married life had made holocaust of.

At first this task of disillusionment had filled her with dread of the future, and given her an ache of heart; but her natural good sense had lifted her over this slough. Reason taught her that all the qualities by which Harry Anstice won her love he still possessed; therefore she could but go on loving him, which she did with such satisfaction to either party as brought them to the consideration of themselves and their friends a model pair.

Nevertheless, it is in us to long to talk our hearts out to some one who comprehends and who also sees more of life than its chrysalis, if we chance to be of the spiritual rather than the material order of beings; consequently when chance, or whatever it may be called, threw Rita Anstice and Ernest Forsyth together in a crowd, out of the multitude each singled the other by some subtle unseen sympathy, and immediately they were friends.

No one was more bitter against the species of woman denominated as married flirts than Rita Anstice; no man held in such utter detestation those creatures who think no game worth pursuing unless the marriage bond proscribe it as Ernest Forsyth; and yet at receptions where Rita did not dance because, forsooth, her husband was not a dancing man, Ernest invariably sat the German out with her, absorbed in conversations in which they found so much in common. Was there a picture incomprehensible to everyday minds they must see it together, and each day brought some new mutual interest in the world of books, music and speculation, that they must discuss until the pair had become the shadows of each other, foolishly confident in their own irreproachable souls and ignoring the eyes of the outer world most completely.

And who will say that big, self-sufficient Harry Anstice was not somewhat to blame for this state of affairs. He had never taken the trouble to interest himself in the things that interested his wife, and which appeared to him marvelously like nonsense. Proud of her high-bred grace, her winning face, charming manner and cleverness, and assured of her affection, he could see no reason why these qualifications in themselves should not make and keep her happy. Therefore, the days when her head was in the clouds, and her arms outstretched themselves eagerly for human help to reconcile with it the earthy where her feet were stumbling on, were days which he rather avoided, finding better cheer with those other fellows who talked of such tangible matters as the four-in-hand club, the last yacht race and the stock market.

His position demanded it, and it suited his pride that his wife should shine in society; yet he hated balls and high teas with equal heartiness, and whenever he could escape them did so, and Rita was altogether too young and agreeable a woman to be allowed to confine herself to the elderly among her associates, however correctly chaperoned. The wonder was, said the dear world, that she got on so long without an "affaire" upon her hands.

Without knowing it, Rita had drifted into revealing her inmost thoughts to Ernest Forsyth as she never could and never had to her husband, and surely no man had ever laid his soul so bare to woman as he to her. In every trouble and perplexity he came to her, and the strength of his claim upon her rested in the fact that she had found him one of those rare men who hold their own purity as vital to their moral health as in the religion of women it is made imperative.

"Assuredly two people so rigid in principle and so faithful in practice might trust each other to do no wrong," thought Rita, and yet she experienced a certain self-consciousness under her husband's eye when they met at dinner after her long, delightful afternoon with Ernest Forsyth, and a certain sense of reassurance in his presence which led her weakly to beg him to spend the evening with her, recalling with some little self-commiseration that such evenings had been some ages ago—evenings in which both had believed themselves happy.

But blundering Harry felt something in the atmosphere that was foggy—he felt it to be his duty to get out among the "bulls and bears" in order to get the tone of the "market." Forsyth, or some one else, would be in, he thought, and he would make a point of coming in early.

A species of desperation seized hold upon Rita when she could no longer hear her husband's footfall upon the stairs. "It was all that nasty preachment of Annah's," she told herself; but all the same she was miserable, and for the first time shivered in her soul, assailed by doubts of herself, of Ernest—even of her husband, whose love seemed grown lukewarm in these latter days.

Forsyth would undoubtedly be in, and for a moment she was coward enough to think of denying herself to him. But, if she did this to-night, to-morrow would come when she must inevitably meet him, and it were better to see him now, in some way to rest her of these miserable doubts, and be at peace.

"If he were only married," she thought; then, "Why is he not—why should he not be?" And then he came, unannounced, unceremoniously, as was his habit, into the room.

Heavens! how horrible were the blanks to be filled in to-night. She wondered in dismay if, as so often had been the case, his thought were following her own. At last, with a courage born of desperation, she said:

"Ernest, why is it that you do not marry?"

It was a fatal question. He had never asked it of himself, but a reckless, aimless hand had broken through the crust of his inner consciousness, smothering the words upon his lips, but drawing his eyes resistlessly to the face before him whereon his answer was written.

"Is it that you have never loved any one?" asked she, with maddest persistence, doing the very thing she was trying to escape in her frantic eagerness to get on and over that awful first blunder, the full mischievousness of which had flashed upon her intelligence, even as the gates were unlocked.

How terrible the moment that followed! Crouching low in her chair, Rita lifted two piteous hands as if to ward off a mortal danger, while Ernest Forsyth, white as if death had suddenly smitten him, withdrew himself a pace, and, shivering in all his frame, pressed one hand tightly upon his eyelids as though a sudden light had blinded him.

It was an awful silence in which those two met and drew back from a chasm yawning black at their feet; but no unseemly word was spoken—nothing that careless Harry would have been hurt to hear, or that the Recording Angel might blush to write. Presently Ernest Forsyth got unsteadily upon his feet, and, with his hat in his hand, said in a voice that no effort could make clear:

"I am going to California immediately. No one will be surprised that I start precipitately, since the journey has been long in contemplation. Good-by!"

"Good-by!" a whisper echoes, and the door is shut. They have not spoken each other's name, nor trusted nature with a handclasp, and there is no particular damage done, perhaps; but Harry, notwithsanding that he made a point of doing otherwise, is unavoidably late upon this particular night, and is rather rejoiced to find the lights burning low and Rita silent upon her pillow, while Annah Clare, who watches the course of events narrowly for some days, concludes that she was wrong in all but her hypothesis, and is happy that circumstances prevented a scandal. And, how wise we all are, to be sure!

THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

RESULTS OF THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION.

THE National Democratic Convention, held at Cincinnati last week, was marked by a degree of confidence and enthusiasm not at all unnatural in view of the grand opportunity which the present condition of our politics affords that party for the recovery of power in the nation. The Convention was fairly representative of the best and highest character of the party, including among its members many persons of conspicuous ability and prominence. The preliminary canvassing of the delegates was a good deal confused by the letter of Mr. Tilden withdrawing from the contest, many regarding it as sincere in its expressions, while others interpreted it as an appeal to the sympathy of delegates and as an artful bid for the nomination on that basis. Difficulties in the Ohio delegation as to the claims of Senator Thurman and Mr. Payne respectively also aggravated the confusion and uncertainty, the smaller States naturally inclining to follow the lead of the great States of Ohio and New York. Encouraged by the collisions and disagreements among the friends of the leading candidates, the supporters of less prominent aspirants labored vigorously to boost their favorites into prominence, and the result was that when the Convention met at noon, on June 22d, the prize was open to the field, no candidate apparently having a sufficiently formidable vote to justify a belief in his success.

The work of the first day's session was devoted simply to the completion of the temporary organization. The Convention was called to order by Mr. Barnum, Chairman of the National Convention, after which prayer was offered by Rev. Charles A. Wendte, of Cincinnati. Hon. George J. Hoadly, of Ohio, was then made temporary chairman, and made a brief speech. He said that he had his favorite for the nomination, but while in the chair he should be neither the friend nor the foe of any candidate; he lauded the National Democratic Party, which, if again successful, could not again be defrauded, and when he referred to Mr. Tilden, there was a great demonstration of enthusiasm. He declared that the delegates were there, not as representing Congressional Districts, but indestructible States—a sentiment which provoked further applause.

F. O. Prince, of Massachusetts, was then made temporary secretary, with six assistants. The rules of the last Convention of the party were adopted pro tem., and the roll was then called for the appointment of the regular committees. When the State of New York was called, John Kelly rose from a seat back of the delegates, and asked that he might be heard. At this there was a great deal of confusion. Cheers and hisses broke out all over the hall, and there were shouts of "Regular order," "Sit down," "Put him out." The chairman refused to recognize Mr. Kelly, and said the call must proceed. John B. Haskin also tried to be heard, but, like Mr. Kelly, was not permitted to speak. Mr. Kelly stood up until after the call of New York was completed, when he sat down. At a subsequent meeting of the Committee on Credentials the demand of the Tammany Hall delegation for one-half of the vote of New York was rejected by the decisive vote of 32 to 4. Having completed its organization, the Convention adjourned until 10 A. M. on Wednesday.

The second day's session opened with prayer, which was followed by the presentation of the majority report of the Committee on Credentials. This report advised that both delegations from Massachusetts be seated, and that the sitting delegates from the Twenty-sixth District of Pennsylvania and from the State of New York be allowed to retain their places. A minority report was read by Mr. Carroll, of Kansas, advising that Tammany Hall be allowed to have twenty seats. Arguments in behalf of each of the reports were made. Mr. John Kelly was asked to present the case of Tammany, but he was not present, and the argument on that side was made by Geo. W. Miller, ex-Governor Hubbard, of Texas, and Judge Amasa J. Parker, who declared that he and his associates from the rural districts would support any ticket that might be nominated. The Tammany report was opposed, in behalf of the regular delegation, by several speakers, among whom was Mr. John B. Fellows, of this city, who declared that Mr. Kelly had publicly threatened to bolt and put up a separate electoral ticket if Mr. Tilden were nominated. The conclusion of the whole matter was that the regular majority report was adopted, the regular delegation was admitted, and Tammany was excluded—permission being accorded, however, to the Tammany contestants to occupy seats on the floor. The vote to substitute the minority for the majority report was lost by 265½ to 457.

The report of the Committee on Permanent Organization was next adopted, ex-Governor Stevenson, of Kentucky, being made permanent chairman. Colonel Stevenson urged the selection of the strongest possible candidates, closing his speech as follows: "The people want a change. They are tired of misrule. They are tired of interference with the popular right of suffrage. They are sickened and disgusted with the military which attempt to coerce them. They are tired of onerous taxation, and all that you have to do, my friends, gentlemen of the Democratic Party, is to nominate two tried, enlightened, pure and experienced Democrats who every inch shall be patriots worthy of the support of yourselves, and worthy of the support of the country. That I know you will do. Not attempting to delay you longer, I close with a simple appeal to let your nominees demand your support, and there will be triumphal joy from every delegate and from every Democrat.

The Committee on Resolutions not being ready to report, the roll of States was called for the presentation of names of candidates. Judge Field was nominated by California; Senator Bayard, by Delaware; Mr. Morrison, by Illinois; Mr. Hendricks, by Indiana; Mr. Thurman, by Ohio; and General Hancock by Pennsylvania. The names of Mr. Tilden and Mr. Payne were not formally presented. One ballot was taken, resulting as follows:

Whole vote cast	738½
Bayard	153½
Field	65
Morrison	62
Hendricks	69½
Hancock	171
Thurman	68½
Seymour	8
Loveland	5
Payne	81
McDonald	3
Randall	6
Tilden	38
Lothrop	1
McClellan	2½
Black	1
English	1
Parker	1
Jewett	1
Ewing	10

Not being prepared for a second ballot, the Convention then adjourned until 10 A. M. on Thursday.

The third day's session opened with a statement from Mr. Peckham, of New York, that Mr. Tilden's withdrawal was absolute, and that the New York delegation would, therefore, support Mr. Randall. The Convention then proceeded to ballot for a nomination, with the following result:

Whole number of votes	738
Necessary to a choice	493
Hancock	319
Randall	129½
Bayard	113
Field	65½
Thurman	80
Hendricks	31
English	19
Tilden	6
Scattering	3

Before the vote was announced officially, Wisconsin asked permission to change and cast her 20 ballots for Hancock. The Convention was instantly in a state of great excitement and confusion. New Jersey next gave her 18 votes to Hancock, and Pennsylvania, following, cast her vote for him solid also. The excitement was now intense. The Hancock banner was advanced to the front; the band played "Dixie" and "Hail to the Chief," and the delegates cheered with wildest enthusiasm. A New York delegate changed the 70 votes of that State to Hancock. Rapid succession followed, no man knowing how the vote stood exactly. When Ohio cast her vote for Hancock, the General had two-thirds of the Convention and the nomination.

The confusion was at this time of the wildest kind. All the State banners were waving and being massed in front. There was continuous shouting and cheering, and the band and great organ were adding to the din. The chairman, after vainly trying to restore order, refused to recognize anybody until the confusion had been subdued. The clerks being unable to make up the lists, the roll was called a second time. The result was as follows:

Whole number of votes	738
Necessary to a choice	492
Hancock	705
Hendricks	30
Tilden	1
Bayard	2

Mr. Mack, of Indiana, moved to make the nomination unanimous. Speaker Randall and Senator Wallace appeared together on the platform and seconded the motion. Wade Hampton pledged the support of the solid South. Others seconded the nomination, and it was made unanimous amid great cheering by the entire Convention, the band meanwhile playing "Dixie." John Kelly and Colonel Fellows, of this State, made speeches and shook hands. The band played "St. Patrick's Day" when Mr. Kelly appeared, and "Auld Lang Syne" after the reconciliation.

Kelly's pledge that Tammany would do everything in its power for the ticket, and that all controversies in New York were now ended, contributed greatly to the prevalent enthusiasm. When the result was announced the Tammany flag, back of the Convention, was waved in the air, and a Massachusetts delegate got possession of the Virginia and Massachusetts flags, and, standing on his chair, held one in each hand, turning them slowly about so that the whole Convention might read the names of those historic foes united for Hancock. Several of the State banners were caught up into the galleries and waved there until the cheering had ceased, when they were handed down to the floor below.

The excitement having in a measure subsided, the Convention proceeded to select a candidate for Vice-President. Hon. W. H. English, of Indiana, was nominated by acclamation, on the motion of Alabama, seconded by a large number of States.

The platform, reported by Henry Watterson, was then adopted. It repeats the cry of fraud in 1876-'77; it denounces the Government of President Hayes; it opposes Chinese immigration and sumptuary laws; and it calls for free trade, free ships, a free ballot, home rule and "honest money, consisting of gold, silver and paper, convertible in coin on demand." It also expresses regret at Mr. Tilden's withdrawal.

After appointing a committee of one from each State to notify the candidates of their nomination, the Convention, at 3 o'clock P. M., adjourned sine die.

THE CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT.

Major-General Winfield Scott Hancock was No. 6 in our Gallery of Possible Presidential Candidates in the issue of May 22d. From the biographical sketch which then accompanied the portrait we extract the subjoined summary of an eventful and honorable career: General Hancock is a native of Pennsylvania, having been born in Montgomery County, in that State, on the 14th of February, 1824. He graduated at West Point in 1844, and served mainly on frontier duty until 1846, and afterwards in the war with Mexico, being brevetted as first lieutenant for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco. From 1848 to 1855 he was again employed in frontier duty, and from 1858 to 1861 was quartermaster of the southern district of California. In August of the latter year he was recalled to Washington, and when the Army of the Potomac was transferred to the Peninsula in 1862, he was already a brigadier-general with the appropriate command, in the Fourth Corps. His first opportunity to make a mark occurred at Williamsburg, and he made a brilliant one. He next distinguished himself in the Battle of Fraser's Farm, and subsequently took an active part in the campaign in Maryland, at the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. Being made a major-general, he commanded a division at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. At Gettysburg he did magnificent work. On the first day of the battle, July 1st, 1863, he was sent by General Meade to decide whether a decisive battle should be given, or whether the army should fall back. He reported that Gettysburg was the place to fight, and took immediate command until the arrival of Meade. In the decisive action of July 3d he commanded on the left centre, sustaining the terrific onset of Longstreet's Confederates, and being severely wounded.

Digitized by Google

The thanks of Congress were formally tendered him for his conduct in these engagements. Being disabled by his wounds, he was on sick leave until March, 1864, being meanwhile engaged in recruiting the Second Army Corps, which was placed under his command. At the opening of the campaign of that year under General Grant, he took the active command of this corps, and bore a prominent part in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House and North Anna, the second battle of Cold Harbor, and the operations around Petersburg until June 19th, when, his wound breaking out afresh, he was for a short time on sick leave. He afterwards resumed command, and participated in several actions, until November 26th, when he was called to Washington to organize the first corps of veterans.

The names of every great battle in the East is inscribed on Hancock's flags. After the close of the war he was placed successively in command of the Middle Department, the Department of Missouri, of Louisiana and Texas, of Dakota, and of the Department of the East. He has his headquarters on Governor's Island. In the Democratic National Convention of 1868 he received 144½ votes for the Presidential nomination. In 1876, in the National Convention of the same party, he received 75 votes for the same nomination.

General Hancock has uniformly maintained the doctrine that the military power should in time of peace be subordinated to the civil law. This was particularly shown in his address to the court of inquiry constituted to try General Babcock, in 1875, in which he urged that that officer having been formally indicted at St. Louis, it was right and proper that the military inquiry should be adjourned in order that the ordinary civil processes might take their course—which suggestion was duly adopted. In 1864, while in command of the Fifth Military District, General Hancock, in a letter to Governor Pease, said: "On them (the laws of Texas and Louisiana), as on a foundation of rock, reposes almost the entire structure of social order in these two States. Annul this code of laws, and there would be no longer any rights, either of persons or property, here. I say, unhesitatingly, if it were possible that Congress should pass an Act abolishing the local codes for Louisiana and Texas, which I do not believe, and should it fall to my lot to supply their places with something of my own, I do not see how I could do better than follow the laws in force here prior to the rebellion, excepting wherein they shall relate to slavery. Power may destroy the forms, but not the principles, of justice; these will live in spite even of the sword."

General Hancock is a man of handsome presence and most agreeable manners. He is perfectly straight; a blonde, with a rich skin and blue eyes, and light hair, now turning gray; and his address is both courtly and simple.

THE CANDIDATE FOR VICE-PRESIDENT.

William H. English, the Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency, was born in Lexington, Scott County, Ind., August 27th, 1822, and commenced his political career before he had attained his majority as a delegate from Scott County to the Democratic State Convention at Indianapolis, by which General T. A. Howard was nominated for Governor of Indiana. Mr. English's father, Major Elisha English, was a native of Kentucky, as was his mother, née Mahala Austin, a descendant of Lieutenant Phillip Austin, who served in the Fourth Virginia Regiment during the war of the Revolution. His early education was only such as could be picked up in the common schools in the vicinity, supplemented by a course of three years at the South Hanover College. At 18 years of age, having studied law at odd times, he was admitted to practice in the Circuit Court of his native State. He was subsequently admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana, and at the age of 21 he made his first appearance before the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. English began his official career, shortly after attaining his majority, as Postmaster of Lexington, his native village. In 1843, while only 21 years old, he was elected principal clerk of the Indiana House of Representatives. The young Democrat threw himself into the political canvass of 1844 with energy, and was rewarded with an appointment in the Treasury Department at Washington. Here he remained for four years, resigning his office when Taylor was inaugurated President, because, having supported Cass in the National Convention, he could not, he said, consistently hold office under his successful rival. In the Democratic National Convention of 1848, Mr. English made the acquaintance of Samuel J. Tilden; in 1850 he was Clerk of the Claims Committee of the United States Senate, and secretary of the convention which met at Indianapolis to revise the Constitution of the State of Indiana. In 1851 he was a member of the State Legislature, and in 1852 he took his seat in Congress as a supporter of Franklin Pierce. Mr. English was a member of the House Committee on Territories, and as such participated in the debate on the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. It is claimed that he, not Senator Douglas, was the first to enunciate the doctrine of popular sovereignty. He was elected to Congress a second term, against the Whig and Know-Nothing candidate, Judge Thomas C. Slaughter, and continued to support the political measures of Mr. Pierce during the Thirty-fourth Congress. His third term covered the period of the controversy respecting the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution, which he opposed until that Constitution (which did not prohibit slavery) had been ratified by the people. In 1858 he was elected to Congress for the fourth time, retiring in 1860, just as the secession movement assumed menacing proportions. Understood to support the Union, he was offered the command of a regiment by Governor Morton, but preferred to start the First National Bank of Indianapolis, which went into business in 1863 under the national banking law. In 1877 he resigned his presidency of the bank on account of his health and retired from business.

THE WELSH EISTEDDVOD.

THE Welsh National Eisteddvod was held at Hyde Park, near Scranton, Pa., on June 23d and 24th. The opening exercises were attended by large audiences, no fewer than five thousand persons being present at the afternoon and evening sessions. Hyde Park, the scene of the great musical and literary tournament, was gay with banners and bunting, and all business in mines and stores was stopped at noon to give the masses an opportunity of attending and taking part in the festival. The mammoth pavilion erected for the Eisteddvod was gayly adorned with flags and flowers, while numerous mottoes adorned the walls and clustered around the extensive platform on which the exercises were held. The opening session was conducted by H. M. Edwards, of Scranton, and the exercises were preceded by a choice bit of favorite airs played by a full military band. The feature of the forenoon, however, was the choral competition on Handel's "Hound about the Starry Throne," by four choirs, of about fifty voices each, namely, the Bellevue, Taylorville, Fourth Ward and Wilkesbarre Choirs. The adjudicators, Dudley Buck, George Simpson, of New York, and Carlyle Petersilea, of Boston, awarded the palm and the prize to the Taylorville Choir.

The conductor then invited Mrs. Davis, wife of David H. Davis, of the Philadelphia Custom House, on the platform, and she presented Reese Price, the conductor of the Taylorville choir, with the prize, a purse containing seventy five dollars in gold. For the metrical poem, in Welsh, the feature of which was its alliterative qualities, the adjudicator awarded the prize of twenty dollars in gold to Rev. G. H. Humphreys, A. M., of New York City. There were a number of competitors entered under nom de plume, that of Mr. Humphreys being "Karuney," and the subject of the poem was "The Artist."

The afternoon session was presided over by Senator Horatio Gates Jones, of Philadelphia, Rev. Fred. Evans, of Franklin, Pa., acting as conductor of the exercises. Senator Jones delivered a happy speech, in which he claimed a pride in his Welsh lineage, and expressed his great pleasure at meeting such a vast and intellectual gathering of his kinsmen. Bardic addresses, in which several participated, came next, followed by competitive English speeches on the subject of "National Characteristics of the Welsh People." The prize was awarded to John E. Richards, of Hyde Park. Miss Lizzie Harris, of Hyde Park, took the prize for a Welsh recitation, "The Drowning of Pharaoh," participated in by a large number, and Benjamin Thomas, of Taylorsville, a miner, who had been working all the forenoon in the mines, took the prize of forty dollars for an essay, entitled, "The Influence of the Greatest Scientific Discovery on Theology." Miss Josephine Rogers won the prize for a soprano solo.

The feature of the afternoon was the band competition for a prize of one hundred dollars, offered for the best rendition of "The Heavens are Telling." Four organizations competed, and the prize was awarded to Bauer's Band, of Hyde Park. Dudley Buck then led the four bands of one hundred pieces, and elicited great enthusiasm in the performance of the prize piece. The pavilion was again crowded in the evening, and many were unable to gain admittance. The united choirs of 300 voices sang "Ye Haf" (" The Summer ") with fine effect, and George Simpson, the well-known New York tenor, gave a recitative and air from "The Creation;" also Braham's ballad, "The Anchor's Weighed," and was enthusiastically received. Carlyle Petersilea, of Boston, and Dudley Buck and J. Parsons Price, of New York, also took part in the performance. The piano-playing of Petersilea created a perfect furore.

On the 24th the choral prizes were awarded. No. 3, or the winning choir, is the Hyde Park Choral Society, and takes a prize of $300, while No. 2, or the Wilkesbarre Choir, takes second prize of $125. The proceeds of the Eisteddvod will be applied, by the Welsh Philosophical Society, to the founding of a free library in Hyde Park.

A CHILDREN'S GARDEN FETE AT NEWPORT.

TENDER little maidens in all the glories of brand-new toilets, befrilled and bedounced like fairy princesses! Bright-eyed little boys putting on the airs of very daring men, and leading it over the little ladies! Here is true love. Here are flirtations with a vengeance. Here is the heartless coquette and the wanton lady-killer! Joy beams upon every face save, perhaps, on one or two, for ice-cream has its limits, and too many strawberries have been known to disagree with the inner little man! What games they have had! What dancing, and kiss in the ring, and marching in two's to pull the cracker bonbons at a given signal! What mob-caps and night-caps and jockey-caps, and aprons and collars and capes and sacques come forth at a pop! What ringing of silvery laughter as Maudie does her headgear the wrong side foremost, and Ernest invests his curly head in an infant's cowl! Ere the sun sets those two ruddy boys will have thrown down gage of battle for the sake of the bright eyes of yonder fairy queen. That romantic-looking youth in the corner will have proposed to the tiny maiden by his side to fly with him, and, alas for the days of chivalry! that other little lad now so demure will have deserted his companion! What a picture of life in miniature, with the master passions all in the bud! Give the little ones their bright hours; let the background of their lives be happy, for behind the curtain of the future lie many shadows!

ANOTHER COLLISION WITH AN ICEBERG.

HER MAJESTY'S ship Plumper left St. John, Newfoundland, at 6 A. M. on Saturday, June 12th, bound for her cruise on fishery protection service on the coast of Newfoundland, intending to anchor at Trepassey, eighty-eight miles from St. John, that night. Outside a dense fog was experienced, requiring an extra lookout. Men were accordingly placed on the fore yard-arm and jibboom. The ship was making six to seven knots an hour, so as to make her anchorage before dark the same evening. Suddenly an iceberg, computed to be 200 feet high by 600 broad, was sighted right ahead. The engines were immediately ordered to be put full speed astern, and the water-tight compartments to be closed. The size of the berg was such as to prevent any turn of the helm to port or starboard being of any use to prevent a collision. The engines had just begun to move astern when the bowsprit struck the mass. Little or no effect was felt by those on board. She rebounded from the icy mass, and backed out. Upon the fore part being cleared away, she was found to be making no water, but had sustained serious injury. She returned to St. John for repairs. Although the accident was similar to that which befell the Arctic, it was not so damaging.

The "Dark Horse" in Politics.

ONCE upon a time there lived in Tennessee an old chap named Sam Flynn, who traded in horses and generally contrived to own a speedy nag or two, which he used for racing purposes whenever he could pick up a "soft match" during his travels. The best of his flyers was a coal-black stallion named Dusky Pete, who was almost a thoroughbred, and able to go in the best of company. Flynn was accustomed to saddle Pete when approaching a town and ride him into it to give the impression that the animal was merely "a likely hoss," and not a flyer. One day he came to a town where a country race-meeting was being held, and he entered Pete among the contestants. The people of the town, not knowing anything of his antecedents, and, not being over impressed by his appearance, backed two or three local favorites heavily against him. Flynn moved quietly among the crowd, and took all the bets offered against his nag. Just as the "flyers" were being saddled for the race old Judge McMinnimee, who was the turf oracle of that part of the State, arrived on the course, and was made one of the judges. As he took his place in the stand he was told how the betting ran, and of the folly of the owner of the strange entry in backing his "plug" so heavily. Running his eye over the ruck, the judge instantly recognized Pete, and he said: "Gentlemen, there's a dark horse in this race that will make some of you smell h— before supper." The judge was right. Pete, the "dark horse," lay back until the three-quarter pole was reached, when he went to the front and won the purse and Flynn's bets with the greatest ease.

The English Franking Privilege.

AS TO the question of the privileges of members of Parliament, it may be observed that one of them, now extinct, that of franking, dated from the commencement of the reign of Charles II. The House conferred the revenues of the Post Office on the Duke of York, or, to put it more exactly, gave his Royal Highness a monopoly of the letter-carrying trade. At the same time they claimed that letters sent by members of either House should go free. Chief-Justice Abbott, on being raised to the peerage, naturally received the congratulations of the Bar. The new Lord (Tenterden), in returning thanks, observed that nothing in his elevation gave him greater pleasure than the privilege of being able to frank the letters of his friends of the legal profession. Members of the junior Bar soon availed themselves of his lordship's kindness in a way that grieved him much. It was not the number of franks he minded, but the remarkable addresses to which the signature "Tenterden" found itself appended. A few years later, Macaulay, giving his sister an account of how he spent the day, mentions that he regularly devoted a portion of his time to franking letters. The system was at length abolished in 1840, with the introduction of the penny post.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The New Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

Earl Cowper made his state entry into Dublin on May 27th. The day being a holiday, large crowds had assembled at every place along the route by which the cavalcade passed, and greeted the arrival of the Viceregal visitors. At noon His Excellency landed, and there was a salute of twenty-one guns fired by the battery on the East Pier. Alderman Tarpey, Mayor of Dublin, who was unwell, received the Lord Lieutenant on the platform, and the customary ceremony of presenting the keys of the city was performed. At Westland Row a guard of honor was drawn up, which was furnished by the Fifty-seventh Regiment and a field officer's escort of one squadron of the Scots Greys, and the bands of both the cavalry regiments in Dublin. Earl Cowper mounted a beautiful black horse which was in waiting, and the carriage for the Countess Cowper was then drawn up. She was received with another hearty cheer, the bands of the two cavalry regiments struck up "God Save the Queen" and then "Patrick's Day," and the procession started. The route taken was the old one which has grown time honored in Viceregal displays, through Westland Row, Nassau Street, College Green and Dame Street, to the Castle. When the procession arrived at the Castle the troops drawn up in the square saluted, and the bands again struck up "God Save the Queen" and "Patrick's Day," and amidst the storring scenes the new Chief Governor of Ireland and Countess Cowper entered their official residence in the Irish capital.

The Electrical Railroad in Berlin.

During the past Winter an experimental line was built in Berlin to test the practicability of adapting electricity to the propulsion of passenger cars. This enterprise was received with so much favor that the projectors were induced to form a company for the purpose of constructing a roadway around the city, after the elevated pattern. We give an illustration of a section of the road now in process of construction, showing the car containing the electrical apparatus and the general style of the raised track-bed.

New Barracks at Knightsbridge.

The buildings for the Household Cavalry which have been constructed on the site of the old barracks at Knightsbridge have been occupied by the Royal Horse Guards (Blue), under Colonel Owen Williams, removed from the Albany Street Barracks, Regent's Park. They have been erected under the direction of the War Department, and for architectural features and completeness of design are the best in the United Kingdom. Built of red brick and stone, the new quarters form an irregular oblong, the quadrangle for the troops on one side, the married soldiers' quarters on the other, the riding-school and other buildings further on towards the Albert Memorial, and then the officers' quarters and stables. The principal feature of the officers' quarters is the mess-room, the frontage of which is to the Exhibition ground in Hyde Park—a handsome apartment, 56 feet long by 24 feet wide. Over the principal window are busts of former commanders, including Wellington, Marlborough, Anglesea, Combermere, Oxford, Raglan and Hill; and the principal entrance to the barracks, also facing Hyde Park, contains representations in stone of troopers of the past and present times.

A Chase for the Knot.

One of the oldest and most famous regiments in the Prussian Army—the Ziethen Hussars—celebrated recently the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of its formation. Among the items of the equestrian performance, which, as will be seen, was witnessed by the Emperor and Court, was a race of ladies for a knot, lightly attached to the shoulder of one of them. Two of the competitors in the present instance are the daughters of Colonel Rosenberg, a gentleman well-known in the sporting world—Frau von Rydow and Fraulein von Rosenberg—and the third is Fraulein von Bredow, the representative of an old and very wealthy family.

Feeding the Poor at Naples.

To those of our readers who remember the illustrations we gave of Mr. Bennett's soup kitchens, or who for any cause visited them during that Winter of suffering, the engraving of the scene in the San Lorenzo district of Naples, where cooked food is supplied to the poor, will have quite a familiar look. There is no evidence of a liberal supply, and there is also an evidence of appreciation and satisfaction. Tottering, wrinkled age and leaping youth are gathered to partake of the physical nourishments, while the good Sisters do Cid's service in feeding His lambs.

The Brussels National Exhibition.

There are to be great festivities this year in Belgium to commemorate the jubilee of Belgian independence, it being just fifty years since the good citizens of Brussels raised the standard of revolt against Holland, and driving Prince Frederic, the King's son, who commanded the troops, from the city, declared their country independent, and elected a Provisional Government. The festivities will last for some months, and were inaugurated on June 15th by the opening by the King and Queen of a grand National Exhibition, a handsome structure, which has been built on the Champs des Manoeuvres, and which will contain chiefly exhibits of what Belgium and the Belgians have produced, either in the way of manufacture or of inventions or of art, since 1830. The façade of the building, as may be seen in our sketch, chiefly consists of two pavilions, united by a semi-circular colonnade, in the centre of which stands a triumphal arch. In these pavilions, amongst other things, there will be a curious exhibition of specimens of the manufactures and art products of bygone ages—such as jewelry, furniture, costumes, porcelain, carpets, armor, coins, etc., all of which will be curious and interesting to compare with similar articles of the present day. Foremost amongst modern exhibits will be objects relating to education, and in these at least we moderns may boast of having achieved a vast improvement. Behind the pavilions and the arcade are numerous temporary buildings containing exhibits and collections of various kinds, ranging from leather and pottery to railway carriages and fruit and vegetables. The applications for space have been great, and there are no fewer than 7,000 exhibitors. The gardens are prettily laid out, and, together with the buildings, occupy an area of some 70,000 square metres.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE population of the District of Columbia is shown to be 175,000, a gain of 43,000 since 1870.

—IT is said that the famine fever has appeared in some parts of the West and South of Ireland.

—THE Jesuits expelled from France have purchased a house at Prague, Bohemia, at a cost of $25,000.

—THE unofficial census returns of Rochester show the population to be 87,057. In 1875 it was 81,722, and in 1870, 62,386.

—ABOUT 20,000,000 shad have been hatched at the hatching establishment of the American Fish Commission at Washington this year.

—THE total amount of appropriations made by Congress for the next fiscal year is $186,805,058, being some $6,000,000 less than last year.

—THE Wesleyan Chapel in City Road, London, founded by John Wesley, which was partly destroyed by fire in December last, has been restored, and was re-opened on Sunday.

—FROM the first of July foreign vessels entering the port of Port-au-Prince, Hayti, will be charged six cents per ton, and Haytian vessels three cents per ton, the receipts to be used towards sustaining two light-houses at the entrance of the port.

—DEAN STANLEY is said to be willing to withdraw his permission for the erection of a memorial of the late Prince Imperial of France in Westminster Abbey, if anything like a general expression of opinion in favor of that course is elicited in the House of Commons.

—RED CLOUD and Spotted Tail were so well pleased with what they saw at the Indian schools at Hampton and Carlisle that, before leaving Washington, they earnestly requested Secretary Schurz to enlarge the school facilities so that more of their children may be accommodated.

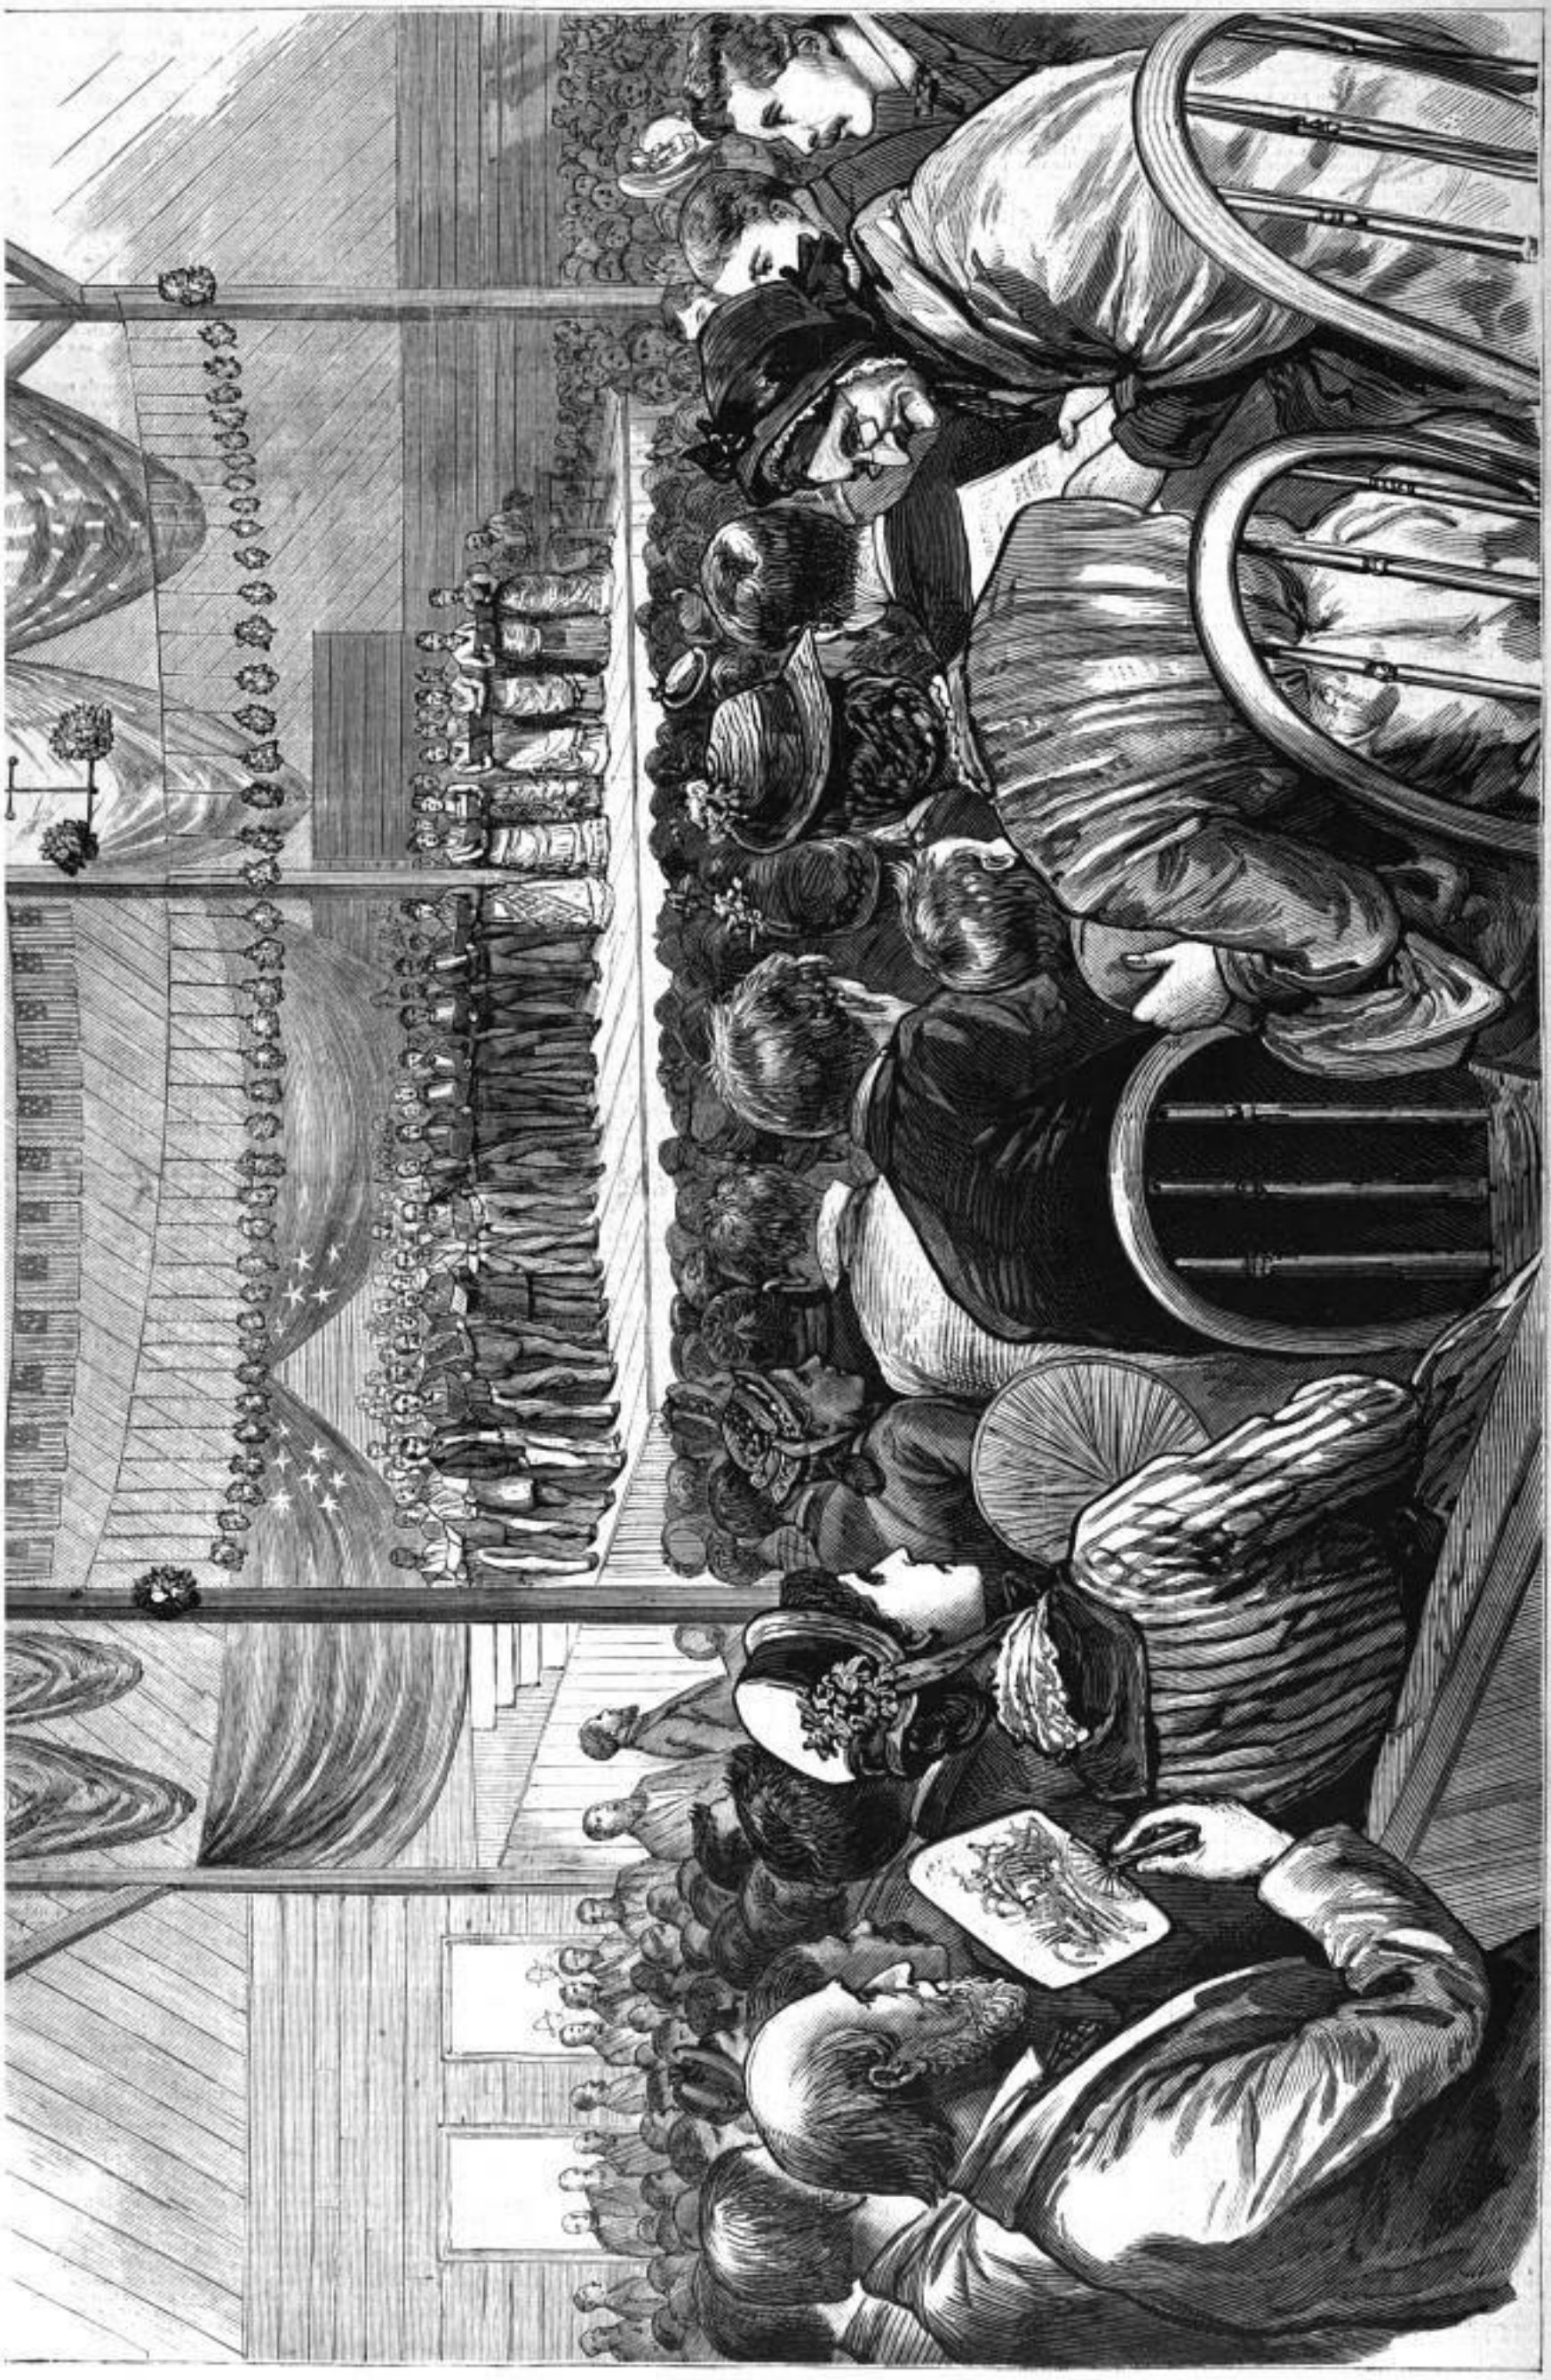
—THE Greek Government is taking measures to increase the army from 12,000 to 40,000 men. A number of officers have gone to France, Italy, Hungary, Algiers and Syria, to purchase horses, ammunition and clothing. The infantry are to be provided with 1,500 cartridges apiece.

—SERIOUS negotiations are proceeding between the Albanian League and the Debri and Tirana tribes. The latter are willing to send to Thy 8,000 men, all armed with Martini-Henry rifles, and undertake to furnish the tribes with provisions and munitions of war for two months, but only on condition that Hodo Bey will attack Podgoritza at the earliest opportunity.

—AN interesting series of documents connected with William Cobbett have been added to the British Museum. Among them are contributions to the Political Register, public addresses and notes for speeches in Parliament, letters of Cobbett to J. Wright, his publisher, with a statement of the lawsuit between them, 1807-1811, and letters to his children and others in America, 1820-1827.

—THE export of champagne to foreign countries has greatly increased of late. According to an official return, the champagne stored in the cellars of Rheims amounted on the 1st of last April to 68,649,668 bottles. From the 1st of April, 1879, to the 1st of April, 1880, 19,171,254 bottles were sent out, of which 16,050,000 were for foreign countries—1,750,617 more than in the corresponding period from 1878 to 1879.

—ROOKS in the Orkney Islands were only imported a year or two ago, but have taken so kindly to their new quarters as to form a colony of some thirty nests in one garden. What a fine home the magnificent elms of New Haven would make for them! Canterbury, New Zealand, imported them to found a colony around the cathedral precincts. They are a regular feature of "the stately homes of England," and the surroundings of ancient lanes.



—NOTWITHSTANDING the increase in the clerical force of the Pension Bureau, the claims which are presented far exceed those disposed of. In the division of Illinois alone the accumulation of cases over and above those acted upon amounts to 950 a month. During the session of Congress just closed this increase has amounted to over 6,000. It is reasonable to suppose that the increase in the other divisions is in the same proportion. The Commissioner of Pensions says that with the present force it is physically impossible to prevent this large piling up of business before the department.

—LEADVILLE now has a population of from 25,000 to 30,000, and with regular streets and substantial buildings. The city government was organized April 14th, 1879. Already it has established a fire department, introducing a fire-alarm telegraph, and created a good police force. A system of graded schools has been adopted, affording instruction for about 1,500 pupils; and a new school house, to cost $30,000, is soon to be built. There are thirty-two street lamps lighted by gas, and the principal public and many private edifices have the luxury of gaslight. The city, in its work, has gone on the pay-as-you go principle. The rate of taxation has been two cents on a dollar.

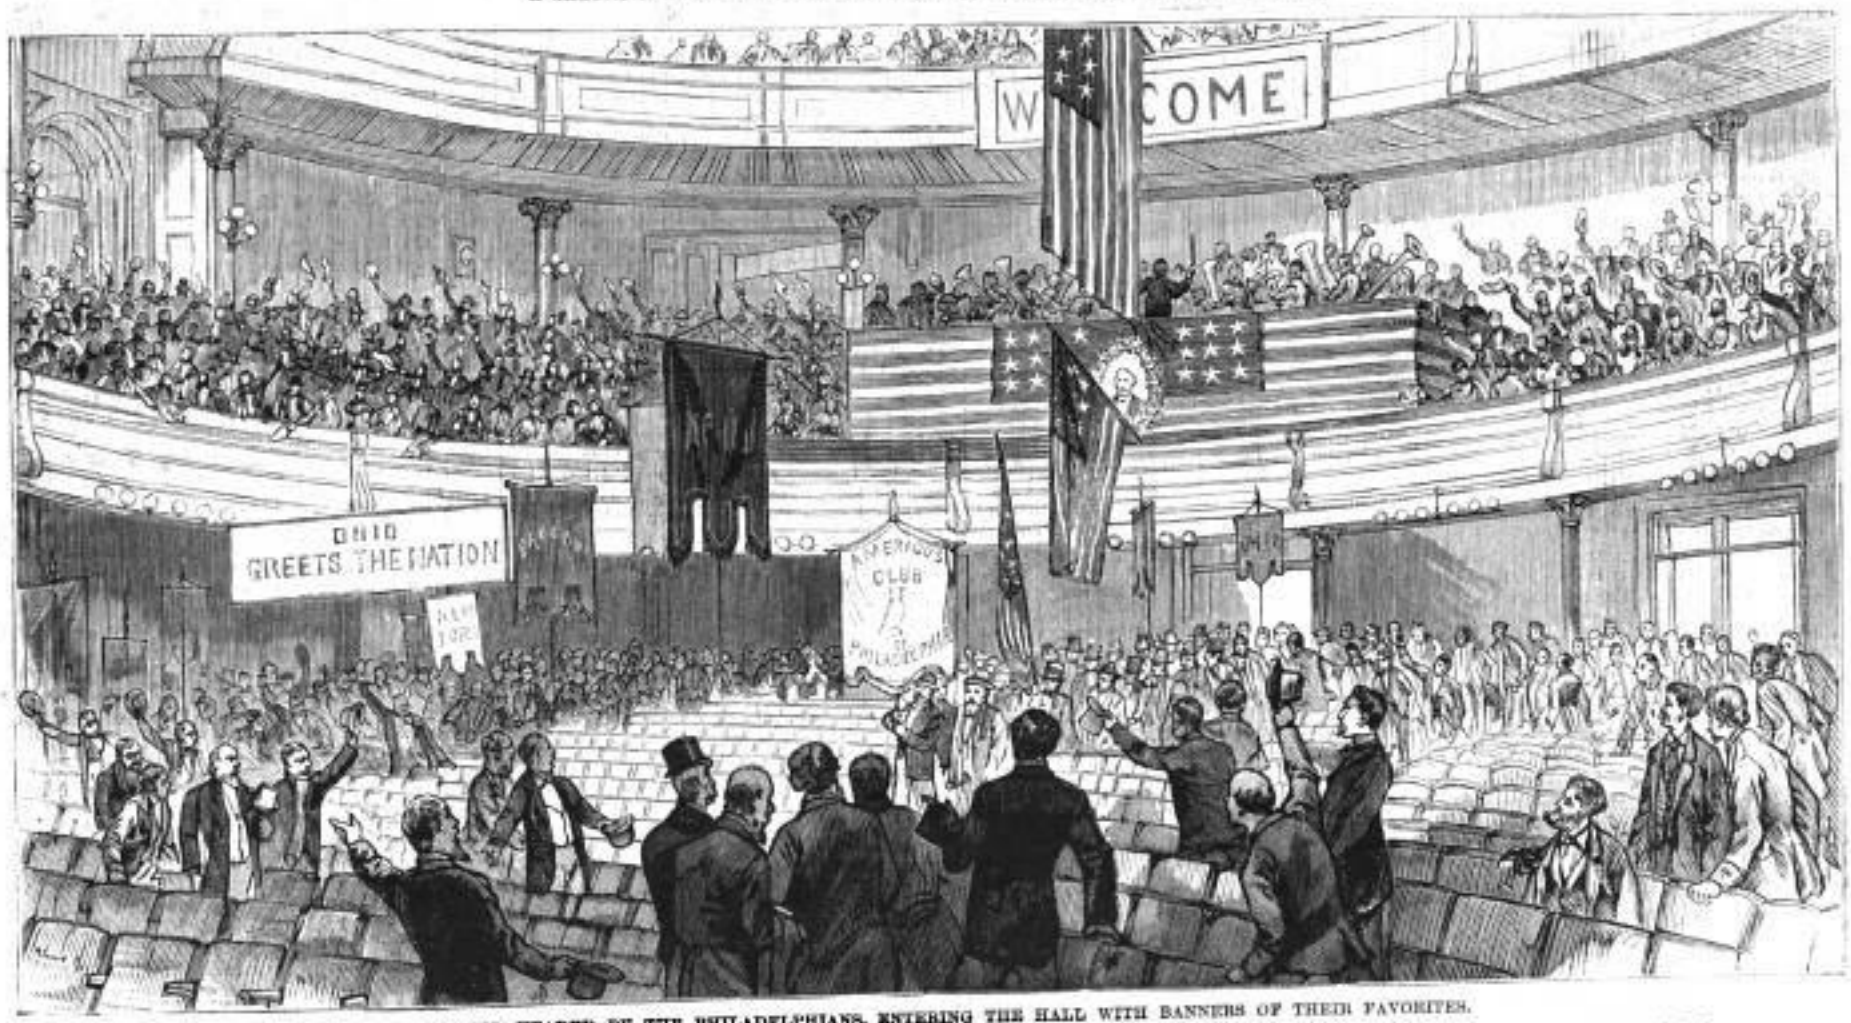
—A VERY valuable library of Methodist books, being the entire collection gathered by the Rev. Dr. George Osborn, author of "Bibliography of Methodism," of Richmond, near London, has just been presented to the Drew Theological Seminary at Madison, New Jersey. All the works relate to the history of Methodism either directly or indirectly, and many of them have long been out of the market, and are the only copies existing. A number of works in the collection were Wesley's private property. The collection was examined last Summer at Richmond by Bishop Hurst, and, on his return to the United States, Mr. Anderson Fowler, of New York, entered into negotiations for its purchase as a gift by him to the Drew Theological Seminary. The books arrived in good condition, and, by the action of the Trustees of the Seminary, will be called the Fowler Collection of Methodist Literature.

—GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, where General Hancock's headquarters are, is one of the pleasantest places in the neighborhood of New York. It is only ten minutes' ride from the city by the Government cutter Atlantic, which makes about a dozen round trips daily. From the city the island can be seen plainly—a shady, grassy spot, with a few frame buildings at the northern end, and old Castle William at the southern extremity. The boat landing is at the northern end of the island and faces Brooklyn. From the landing a wide avenue extends southward, to the right of which are rows of cannon and cannon balls. An avenue leading from the left of this winds through a delightful grassy lawn, made shady by many trees, fronting upon which are a dozen or more plain but roomy frame dwellings occupied by the various officers quartered on the island. The General's headquarters are in a building near the lower end of this avenue. General Hancock's house is a large, pleasant frame building, situated about midway between the general headquarters and the boat landing. It has a wide piazza extending along the front, a wide hall, to the right of which are double parlors and to the left the dining room, with General Hancock's private sitting-room in its rear. The house is handsomely furnished; in the parlor is an excellent painting of Mrs. Hancock.

Digitized by Google

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE WELSH NATIONAL EISTEDDVOD, AT HYDE PARK, SCRANTON.—THE CHORAL COMPETITION, JUNE 23D.—FROM A SKETCH BY JOSEPH BECKER.—SEE PAGE 319.

Digitized by Google



THE RANDALL CLUB OF PHILADELPHIA MAKING THE ROUNDS OF THE HOTELS.

PRESS REPORTERS WAITING FOR TICKETS OF ADMISSION TO THE HALL.

A SKETCH IN THE ROTUNDA OF THE GRAND HOTEL, AFTER THE FIRST BALLOT.

DELEGATES, HEADED BY THE PHILADELPHIANS, ENTERING THE HALL WITH BANNERS OF THEIR FAVORITES.

OHIO.—OPENING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN—THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION AT CINCINNATI.

FROM SKETCHES BY JOS. B. BEALE.—SEE PAGE 318.

Digitized by Google

A DEAD FRIEND.

THIS dead man, soon to seek oblivions earth,
Was loyally my firm friend, and loved me well.
For him no shadow of blame that could repel
His reverence in my honored life had birth.
Like some famed knight, admired for brawn and girth
By the young warrior, eager to excel,
Ideal in his fond heart I seemed to dwell,
The exemplar and high paragon of worth!

Now deeply, while I linger where he lies,
A burdening shame upon my bosom weighs.
Perchance he watches me, in calm surprise,
Far from the turmoil of terrestrial days—
Piercing my faulty spirit with the gaze
Of supernatural and clairvoyant eyes!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.—GYPSY'S BONDAGE.

THEY are all together an hour later—Jack, Gypsy, Valentine, Maize and Toboskie. You never could believe that ten years had gone since last they sat thus together, and you could fancy that they were all back in England, save for the absence of Chetewood, and the presence of a certain young lady who, in those days—construing it the most charitably—was a troublesome child.

Time, with his havoc, seems to have made exception in all their favor. Gypsy, he could swear, is not a day older than when in the madness of a weak moment, she precipitated herself into his—giving him his due—unwilling arms. She was sweet, charming, beautiful as ever, and nothing in her greeting of him—of which he has had secret misgivings—bears a shadow of that past folly.

Jack is hale, handsome and jolly as of old, though a trifle stouter; and in his eye Toboskie is pained to observe a fishy, film-like thickness, that bears silent but incontrovertible evidence of his dissipation.

Valentine is as dark and silent as when first he met her. Her hands, as they lie idly in her lap, or toy over some wool, are, he remarks, more waxen, more delicate and beautiful than of old.

She is very silent, though the rest talk incessantly, and occasionally all at once. Jack and Toboskie are installed in huge armchairs, while Maize and Gypsy occupy smaller ones at a proximity very comforting to the Russian, whose gaze seldom leaves the proud face of the girl. He is very pleasantly placed, and altogether is insanely glad that Jack Ashhurst has come to Petersburg.

"We are invited to the English Consul's to-morrow," says Gypsy, in a brief lull, "and the next day to Count Moskowa's. Invitations are just pouring upon us. I suppose it is due to the fact that the English Ambassador is Jack's friend."

"I had hoped to have brought a celebrity with me this evening," says Toboskie, rather aimlessly.

"Who?" inquires Gypsy, with interest.

"Count Nicholas Lagors."

"And he did not deign to honor us?"

"He was compelled to remain at home through sudden illness. He is of one of our oldest and wealthiest families, and altogether a lion in Russia."

He looks up as he speaks, and by accident meets the full gaze of Valentine's eyes. They are cold, and gleam with a peculiar light like that bluish shadow of ice. He is not weak, nor is he impressionable, yet that look strikes a cold chill to his vitals. Though she is full of a magnetic power that is, to some extent, marvelous, he is conscious that he is for ever above and beyond that power; that his will, which controls a nation, makes powerless hers, though in her he comes nearer finding his equal than ever before; yet in some vague way, and for some indefinable reason, he dreads her. He is conscious that a woman possessing the peculiar attribute that characterizes her, holds in her hand an almost limitless power for evil. He does not believe her vulgarly sinful or meanly malicious; she would not descend to petty vileness; she is elevated, refined, elegant. Yet the germ of a great crime is in her nature, which holds no shadow of weakness. She could slay ruthlessly and without mercy.

Though there is that in her that would cry out against a blow in the dark, dealt even to an adversary, she would not hesitate to trample upon the hearts of a nation slain by her hand, if any great aim exhorted her to the crime.

Though she would scorn to steal a crust even in starvation, without the slightest remorse, the smallest pang, she could rob a world of its honor, its pride and its birthright.

Something of this swift conviction settles upon Toboskie, while he also realizes that for him she has her hatred

"Lagors!" says Jack, musingly, "Lagors! seems to me I have heard that name somewhere before."

"And he is a lion," observes Gypsy, with pleasurable interest. "Handsome!"

"Rather, distinguished."

"At what an inopportune time his illness seized him," she continues, with a pout. "Now, could it have been feigned? What a brute he must be!" the conviction of Count Lagors's duplicity being by this time fully established. "At least he shall not escape in that way. I will avenge us! Count Toboskie, bring—your—friend——"

She ceases, and, quick and suspicious, Toboskie gazes swiftly at Valentine. At a glance he reads the cause. Valentine's eyes are fixed steadily and in that peculiar light upon Gypsy. Though unnoticed by the others, it is clear as day to him that Lagors's presence is not desired by this woman; and that by bringing the mighty force of her brain to bear upon the weaker nature, she has thus prevented the invitation that was about to be extended.

He also, with that swift intuition, has divined that she is agitated—though her agitation is restrained by a powerful hand. Looking at her keenly, he is forced to confess that her face is an icy blank. Yet it is not to her face that he looks for emotion, but always to her hands; and these latter, though lying carelessly upon her lap, shiver occasionally like wind-tossed leaves.

"Yes, fetch him along by all means," says Jack, heartily, unconscious that he is finishing his wife's sentence, so well aware was he of the spirit of hospitality to which she had intended to give expression.

"Have you taken any measures towards claiming your estate?" inquires Toboskie, after a pause.

"Not decided ones," replies Jack. "You know it is Maize's property, and the English Consul tells me that she will have to formally become a citizen of Russia before she can claim the estate, which is really very fine, though it has almost gone to wreck and ruin. It has been shamefully neglected. The corn and wheat have not been gathered for years, but were principally allowed to rot on the grounds. The serfs were idle and thriftless. After innovations innumerable and incomputable trouble, persons who are judges say it will make very fine land. Years ago it was noted for its richness. Of course all this will incur both time and expense. And I believe I regret the former more than the latter, as this girl of ours"—he looks at Maize with a glance that bears testimony to that quiet and strong abiding love that exists between them—"this foolish girl is so susceptible to the cold. Your icy climate, Toboskie, is an abomination to Maize."

"Not only an abomination," says Maize, with a dainty shiver, "but positively a source of suffering. I cannot endure cold, it strikes me with actual pain."

As she speaks, she rises and hands Jack a chart of the lands that he has motioned for. Toboskie looks at her. She stands before him in the full glow of her matchless loveliness. Her figure is tall and drawn haughtily erect. She looks like a dream of Titians, clad as she is in some rich stuff of dull Venetian red, deeply embroidered with gold, while around her perfect figure falls her robe in straight, severe folds, peculiarly adapted to her Grecian beauty. Her head is small and regally poised; and beneath the crown of her matchless hair her proud young face gleams brightly in the wax-light.

He sees that she always has near her some article of fur to furthermore protect her delicate organization from the chill that will creep in, even with the heat of the fire. Gypsy and Valentine are busy over some dainty pretense of wool-work; but Maize makes no feign of employment. He sees that she is idle, with that sweet graceful idleness born in her—that dainty luxuriousness, the keen instincts of her Greek nature.

And as she stands thus, almost in the shadow of her eventful destiny, and he sees her small hands that are like twin rose-leaves, and her proud, rich loveliness, he wonders if any shadow of evil can ever touch her; if the proud spirit that rears her head can be broken—the steady fire in her eyes quenched! When he goes away late in the night he carries with him two convictions—that she has entered into his heart for all eternity, whatever the future may hold, and that Jack Ashhurst's wife is in a bondage worse than death.

CHAPTER XV.—A PICTURE.

"PETER," says Count Lagors, as he rises from his dinner-table. "Peter, to-night I am going to that cursed rascally Englishman's—Lord Jack Ashhurst!"

"Well, really!" says Peter, displaying signs of lively amazement.

Count Lagors is in one of his choicest tempers.

"What the deuce do you mean by presuming to comment upon my actions?" he shouts amiably. "Come and dress me, and see that you make me look as hideous as possible. Get me an olive-color coat, and mind that the gloves and cravat match. I always look beastly in olive." This address has its proper effect upon the faithful Peter; he understands at once that his master has motives for looking exceedingly well this particular evening, and, destitute of the remotest idea of obeying him, forthwith lays out from the luxurious wardrobe a suit of uncompromising black, conscious that the slightest suggestion of green upon his part would be at the risk of his life. No amount of madness on Peter's part would ever betray him into the indiscretion of adopting such reckless suggestions of his master.

When he is dressed Lagors surveys himself with pardonable satisfaction. His tall, slim figure is elegant in its fastidious attire. His dark and high-bred face is even more attractive than in its youth, and in his deep-set eyes is that fierce, fickle, half-passionate glow that burns like a volcano.

As he stands thus a knock sounds at the door, and Peter hastens to attend, opening the door narrowly as though he guarded the sacred precincts of some idol-god. In a moment he returns with a card which he gives his master.

"Ah!" murmurs that individual, turning from the glass. "Toboskie has come; he said he would call for me. He is a trifle early. Tell him to come up here."

"Be ready in a moment, Raoul," he continues, as the guest is admitted a few moments later.

"Had to come early," explains Toboskie, sinking in a chair, with a quiet adaptation of the surrounding luxury that bespeaks his own familiarity with such sybaritic ease, "because the Ashhursts go to the ambassador's to night, and our call will necessarily be short."

"Glad of it," says Lagors, crossly, whose existing mood never lasts a moment, and who is now intent upon examining a handkerchief of finest texture. "Peter, you rascal!" he finally shouts, "you have given me a soiled handkerchief! Do you presume so far upon my forbearance—which I confess has been limitless—that you expect me to carry about with me soiled handkerchiefs?" Under the nose of the suffering Peter he thrusts the obnoxious linen, which bears the slightest suggestion of a spot, and glares at that individual murderously.

Peter, guilt-stricken, turns away to remedy the mistake; he proceeds leisurely to the costly trifle of a box in whose sacred depths usually reposes these very necessary appendages to his master's toilet; it is empty. With a slight acceleration of speed he next investigates a certain drawer in the wardrobe which has never been known to be without its dozen scented, dainty squares of linen; not a handkerchief is visible!

It is the first time that such carelessness has ever been chronicled of Peter; nevertheless, upon the present occasion it must be confessed that amidst all that wealth and extravagance not a pocket-handkerchief can be produced! For a moment he stands aghast. Then his leisurely-conducted search resolves itself into a desperate exploration. He investigates every cranny of the various wardrobes; he explores every similar receptacle that graces the chamber; he reverses that treacherous box where his search had ought to have been but is not, and gives it two or three smart blows with the vain hope of dislodging a handkerchief from some hidden depths; he scrutinizes the walls, the ceilings, the floor, while the count stands by storming like a madman.

"He is the most reckless, careless, dishonest man that ever cursed a master," affirms Lagors, to his friend, who is too used to these scenes to be anything but amused. "He is a thorough and unscrupulous villain! The money I have squandered through his carelessness! I have wasted half of my fortune upon handkerchiefs, yet never have one! I never have anything that he can possibly take from me. See here, you villain!" addressing himself to Peter's heels, which is the only part of him visible as he frantically dives into an enormous chest, still bent upon his hopeless search, "in the lower drawer of that secretary yonder, is a box of handkerchiefs. There are six of them—all there are left of a collection of forty years. I locked them up to keep them from your thieving fingers. Here, take the key and be quick, or I'll make you suffer yet for your dishonesty."

Peter speedily emerges from the cavernous depths of the chest, his sedate gray hair in a state of wild disorder and turns his attention to the secretary, the anxiety with which he pursues his last hope plainly visible in his respectable face. He turns out the contents promiscuously, is seized with a panic as his search appears to be fruitless, then with a face beaming with triumph fastens upon a handkerchief box, and, while he approaches his master, frantically wrests off the fastening and raises the lid.

He stands directly before the two men, but presents it to Lagors. Toboskie's eyes idly fasten upon the box. Then he realizes that the troubles of the indefatigable factotum are not yet over. He has evidently got the wrong box, and there, bared to their vision, instead of the smooth surface of the expected linen is a sight that, for the instant, so sudden has been its appearance, startles him.

It is the picture of a girl—scarcely more than a child—and taken in an attitude wildly beautiful, yet with an almost too great exposure of limb and form to suit the taste of a particularly fastidious observer.

She is beautiful, with something of the wild native grace of the jungle clinging to her, as she lies in a mass of crushed grass and nodding ferns. It is evidently a warm climate in which she is represented, for her form is clad in some thin, short garment that does not conceal the perfect curves and soft roundness of her figure. Her limbs are rounded and as beautifully shaped as marble fresh from the sculptor's chisel. From her small, perfectly-shaped feet, in themselves a marvel, to her dimpled knees not the faintest suspicion of clothing intercepts the view, and the arms and full white throat are as bare. Her face is a picture of lovely, defiant, passionate youth, holding a dash of sweet, shy shame, while from the tangled mass of hair, held back by one little, strong hand, gleam up two dark-blue eyes, bold with the sunny, sensuous insouciance of her nature, yet holding a half-abashed light, that bears weak testimony to her womanly dignity.

The whole affair is almost as quick as a flash of lightning, yet Toboskie has noticed every point in the picture, with its soft sensuous beauty; then from Peter's nerveless fingers drops the fatal box, and the contents fall on the floor, the picture dropping face downwards. Then he perceives that the portrait is fastened to the back of a legal-looking document, now clearly revealed, across which, written in a clear, firm hand, he read "The Schaffuskie Lands!"

He looks first at the paper, then at Lagors, who stands white as death, his lips drawn tightly across his teeth, his eyes literally blazing with a lurid flame and his hands clinched. Peter confronts him, his face bleached to the hue of his master's, and in his eyes a great shrinking pain and prayer.

Then, maddened with pain or memories of an unpleasant past, without a word, Lagors lifts his clinched hand and strikes Peter square in the temple.

It is a cruel blow, and its object drops to the floor without so much as a groan. And, suddenly sobered by his act, Lagors stands for an instant appalled, then, stooping, lifts the head of the prostrate man and rests it upon his knee.

All the fierceness and wrath of his peculiar nature are swept aside, and in this moment the pure affection for this man shines forth—this man, faithful through abuse and neglect, returning blows with caresses, and bitterness with love.

Nicholas Lagors is, perhaps, a man wrecked, soul and body; yet through all the incontinencies and excesses of the past has burned the sincere tenderness for Peter, the faithful—Peter who, when love and pleasure and lust failed him, remained stanch and true. He lifts his head and brushes back the coarse gray hair, while his remorse and horror stupefy him. Toboskie, however, is more collected; and, hastening to a dressing-table, returns with a bottle of scented water, with which he copiously dampens the withered, gray face resting on the count's arm.

Under this treatment the sturdy life in Peter asserts itself, and his eyes unfasten and fix upon his master, but with a shudder speedily reclose, and his head moves wearily to and fro.

Across the prostrate figure of the man whom his ungovernable fury has stricken down, Count Lagors looks at Toboskie with eyes weary with a ghastly, haunting pain, and bitter memories raked up from the past. With trembling fingers he touches the gray hair, the gray face, the gray clothes, and his lips quiver. He is almost childish in his misery and repentance.

"Grown gray in service—in my service!" he says, hoarsely. "Raoul, those words ring in my ears! Oh, God! what a brute I am! This man has worked for me, sinned for me, and would die for me if I wished it. Yet how have I returned his fidelity? Peter—poor, miserable, abused man! After all the past," he shudders as he speaks, "after all the past, I strike him down like a dog!"

Toboskie cannot refrain from gazing at the dark, wretched face of his friend as he speaks, and, slowly as he gazes fastens upon him the conviction that the hidden life of this man is branded with its secret guilt and its pain. And all this time the picture, with its sensuous, Southern grace, lies hid upon the floor, while staring at the miserable man like things of life are those three magic words, destined to work so much misery, "The Schaffuskie Lands!"

"We must get him up," observes Toboskie, prosaically enough. "He may die! It was a frightful blow, Lagors."

"It was; I wish you would shoot me for it," groans Lagors, in his new-born humility. "And yet of what avail is my repentance? To-morrow, before the sun rises, I shall have been in a rage with him a dozen times, and without the slightest provocation."

"Help me lift him."

Together they carry Peter to a divan piled high with silken cushions, upon which they place him, and again he looks up, and this time in a feeble, groping way, takes his master's hand. It is a simple gesture, yet replete with an humble fidelity—a love that will outlive death.

"Are you better, Peter?" asks Lagors, in an unsteady voice.

"All right—nothing in the world is the matter with me," cheerfully affirms that individual. There is still a dazed look in his eyes, yet his instincts of fealty are stronger than pain.

"Peter, I was a brute!" exclaims Lagors, vehemently.

"My lord, you were not," contradicts Peter, promptly. "But you must not be late. I will look for the handkerchiefs." His master groans as his factotum gets upon his feet. In passing, Peter stoops and picks up the package. He does it quickly and passes on, taking with him the picture and papers, but Toboskie sees that there is an inestimable pain and sadness in his face as he locks them away in a drawer.

Lagors follows his companion and bends above him as he is deep in the recesses of the secretary.

"Peter," he says, almost gently. "Peter, are you really better, or have I killed you?"

"I am better, sir," says Peter, frantically rumaging amidst the contents of the drawers. "I'd be well if I could only find those cursed handker——"

"Never mind, Peter," interrupts his master, wearily. "I will go now. But, mind you, I would not leave if you were sick. I have been a brute, but you will have your revenge. Peter, I am going to see her—Jack Ashhurst's wife!"

CHAPTER XVI.—A MEMORY OF THE PAST.

TOBOSKIE and Lagors gain the house of the English peer in silence. As they come in the light of the vestibule, the former looks in keen scrutiny at his companion; he sees that his face is pale and a trifle hard, but perfectly composed, though his eyes are fiery and restless. As they are admitted to the hall, which is dimly lighted, they hear a flutter as of woman's garments; something brushes swiftly past them, they both turn quickly and see a woman rush past—a woman with a hard, drawn, white face and hands locked tightly before her. Toboskie sees that it is Valentine.

A moment later Gypsy, who is standing by her toilet-table, is startled by her door being suddenly thrown open. She looks up; upon the threshold stands Valentine—Valentine like a phantom, her eyes filled with a fierce pain and a bitter, shrinking fear, her face ghastly and piteous in its misery, and her hands stretched out in front of her like a person blind—her beautiful hands, now flushed until they seem to have concentrated all the blood in her body, and quivering and twitching as though seized with a mortal pain.

At this sight Gypsy drops the cut-glass bottle she has raised to her nostrils and stares in horror at her friend.

Digitized by Google

THE LATE GENERAL SUTTER.

GENERAL JOHN A. SUTTER, the California pioneer, upon whose land, on American River, D. W. Marshall discovered the first beads of virgin gold, died in Washington D. C., on June 18th. He had been sick about a week with inflammation of the kidneys. He was born in Switzerland in March, 1803, and came to the United States in 1834. On landing at New York he started on an overland journey, striking the Pacific coast at Oregon, and thence going to San Francisco. Remaining there but a short time, he set sail for the Sandwich Islands; thence he went in turn to Vancouver's Island, Alaska, and back to California, landing at what was then known as Yerba Buena, and "dropping my anchor on the same spot which is now well known as the corner of Montgomery and Clay Streets, City of San Francisco."

THE LATE GEN. JOHN A. SUTTER.—FROM A PHOTO. BY ULKE.

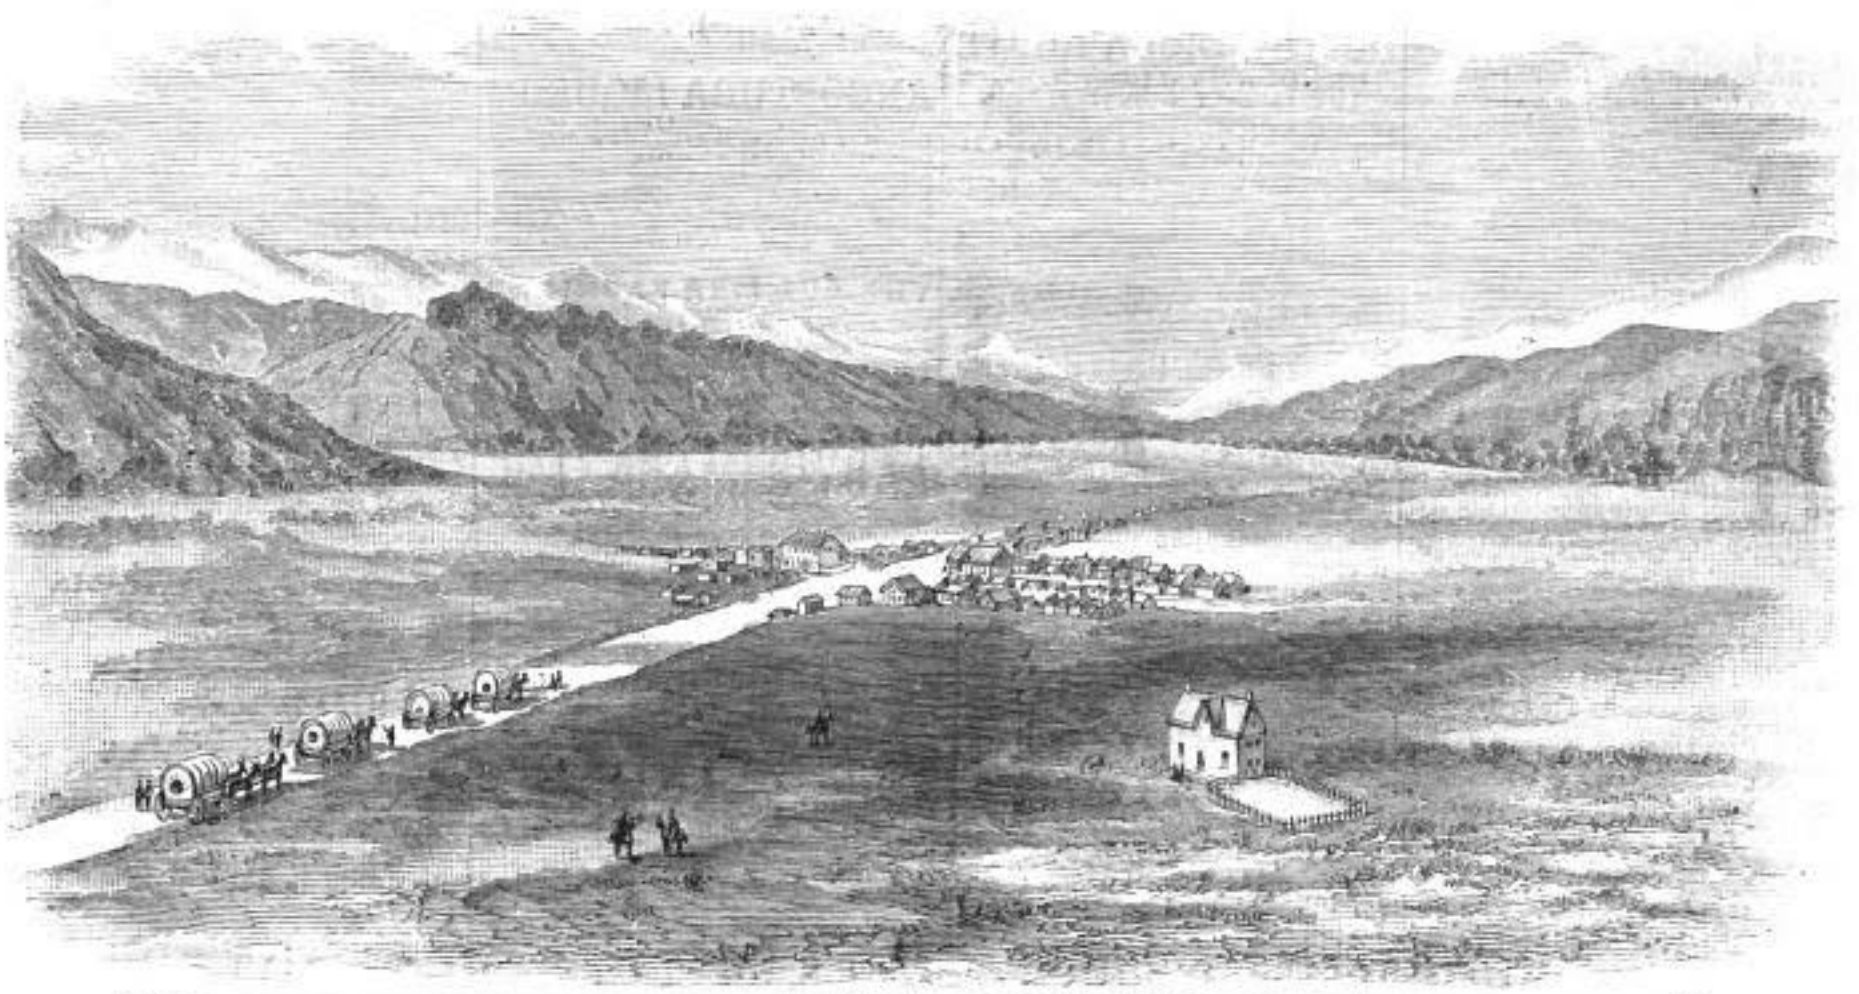
His first appointment was as a kind of Indian agent, ranking as a captain, and bearing a commission from the Mexican Government, which at that time held possession of California proper, with its capital at Monterey. He erected a fort at Sacramento, supplying it with cannon at his own expense, and, while regarding that town as his headquarters, he went into the interior, began farming on a large scale, and gradually created a strong desire for agricultural pursuits among the Indians he expected to fight.

In 1845, as commander of a brigade of four hundred men, he marched from Sacramento down to Monterey to aid in quelling the Revolution. The insurgents were pursued to San Fernando, where they turned and defeated the regular troops, taking Sutter prisoner, and deciding to shoot him the next day. His life was saved, however, through the intercession of an American gentleman—Stearnes by name—and Sutter returned to his headquarters. His Government positions were retained, notwithstanding there was a change of administration, and again he turned his sword into a ploughshare and his spear into a pruning hook. Later on, he saved Fremont's hardy explorers from starvation, sending a vessel down to Yerba Buena, and providing an abundance of clothing, food and other requisites. On General Kearney's arrival, Sutter was appointed Indian Agent; shortly after, Commodore Stockton made him Alcalde, and Colonel Montgomery invested him with the military command of the district.

The General's troubles began with the discovery of gold. All his misery has been crowded into his life since that day—to him, most unlucky; to the world, most fortunate. He had in his employ a man named D. W. Marshall, who, one day, seeing small yellow lumps in the race near the spot where they were building a mill, gathered a quantity, and seeking the General, made him enter a room and lock the door, and there displaying his little beads which had been wrapped in a piece of dirty paper, said he believed they were gold.

General Sutter entered quite heartily into Marshall's excitement, as much to please the man by a sign of sympathy as from sheer curiosity. He applied all the tests he could think of, ending with that of aqua fortis, and assured Marshall that the lumps were indeed pure gold. An attempt was then made by the two to keep the matter a secret at least for a couple of months, at the expiration of which time the General hoped to have his mills finished. But the secret leaked out—through an old woman, of course—and, as Sutter said: "The scum of the world came. They cared nothing for law, property, or anything. They took from me what they wanted, and I was powerless. After a year or so civil authority was established, but in the meantime my stock had all been taken, and my land occupied by squatters."

Neither Mexico nor the United States disputed his proprietorship before this event. Afterwards the United States tribunals decided in his favor when he laid claim to his own property; but when the case was taken to the Supreme Court, the squatters won. He maintained the contest for his rights up to the time of his death, living in Washington while Congress was in session, and at Lititz, Pa., the remainder of the year. He was buried on the 24th by his old comrades, the pioneers.



CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, who just now occupies so conspicuous a place in the attention of Englishmen, was born forty-seven years ago, the son of a solicitor's clerk, at Hoxton. In his early years he was an errand-boy, a clerk to a coal merchant, a teetotaller and a Sunday-school teacher. But at the early age of sixteen he discovered in himself certain atheistical and revolutionary opinions, together with a certain sense of power, which led to his becoming the man he is to-day. He enlisted as a soldier and nearly revolutionized the Seventh Dragoon Guards; but he purchased his discharge and became clerk to a solicitor, writer and lecturer under the name of "Iconoclast." The creed he has developed during his career is that of Atheism, "Malthusianism" and Republicanism. He has, in the advocacy of this creed, said and published much that is shocking and unsavory to the least squeamish, and he is at this moment the leader of all the strongest and most irreconcilable forces in Great Britain.

Mr. Bradlaugh is a man of great physical strength, of very considerable ability, and of inordinate boldness. He is not by any means a statesman, but he has made himself into a very good lawyer, and he is a powerful speaker and a fearless advocate of the most nauseous opinions. His influence, which is great with the lower classes of the populace, arises partly from his audacity and partly from an unlimited belief in himself, which he has communicated to many others. At the last election he was chosen to represent Northampton in the House of Commons. Upon the meeting of Parliament he declined to take the oath, proposing to affirm. This proposition encountered strong opposition; and on a motion that he be not received, the matter was referred to a committee. Upon the case coming up for action in the House, it was moved that Bradlaugh be permitted to affirm. Sir Harding Gifford moved an amendment forbidding him either to take oath or make affirmation. This was adopted by a vote of 275 to 230. On the announcement of the vote, which has the effect of unseating Mr. Bradlaugh, there was an extraordinary scene of excitement, the Opposition cheering tremendously and waving their hats. Sixty-five Liberals, including Home Rulers, voted against Bradlaugh's right to affirm. One Conservative and ten Home Rulers voted with the minority. On June 23d Mr. Bradlaugh was called on to hear the decision of the House, and, taking his place at the bar, eloquently combatted the resolution arrived at against him. He said it was unprecedented to condemn any one unheard. He argued against being accused of atheism. He said he would not forego either his opinions or his claims to his seat. The House might afterwards expel him, but until he had taken his seat it had no jurisdiction over him. The House could not override the law which permitted him to take the oath. If an appeal should be necessary, as he hoped it would not be, it must be made. He asked the House to give him the justice which the judges would give him if appealed to. He was loudly cheered.

At the conclusion of Mr. Bradlaugh's speech the Speaker demanded that he should withdraw; but he replied: "I insist, respectfully, on my right, as a duly elected member for Northampton, to take the oath, and I respectfully refuse to withdraw." To a second request he made a like response. Sir Stafford Northcote moved that the Speaker be authorized to enforce his withdrawal, and the motion was adopted by a vote of 326 to 36. Mr. Bradlaugh refused positively to obey. He was thereupon removed beyond the bar. He returned twice, declaring that the House had no right to exclude him; that it could only imprison him. Finally the COLORADO.—VIEW OF GUNNISON CITY, THE NEW MINING RENDEZVOUS ON THE GUNNISON RIVER.—FROM A SKETCH BY CHAS. H. GOESSING.—SEE PAGE 323.

Digitized by Google

Speaker called upon the Sergeant-at-Arms to remove Mr. Bradlaugh below the bar. The Sergeant-at-Arms approached and touched Mr. Bradlaugh on the shoulder. Mr. Bradlaugh moved away, but turned back and shouted, "I claim my right as a member of this House." The Sergeant-at-Arms took more forcible possession of the prisoner, and moved him to the bar, from which Mr. Bradlaugh again advanced, reiterating his claim. At last he was forcibly removed and locked up in the prison under the Clock Tower, being followed by three policemen and a procession of members of the House. Mr. Bradlaugh stated to friends that he did not yet contemplate legal proceedings, though he had received numerous offers of aid.

On the 24th, in the House of Commons, Sir Stafford Northcote moved that the House, having asserted its authority, orders Mr. Bradlaugh's release. Mr. Labouchère said that Mr. Bradlaugh, when released, would reassert his legal right.

Sir Stafford Northcote's motion was adopted unanimously, and Mr Bradlaugh was released. In the evening he was present in the House, but sat under the gallery, outside the bar. Mr Bradlaugh has received a message from many of his Northampton friends sympathizing with him, and assuring him of their undiminished determination to support him. A petition to the House of Commons will be largely circulated, and signatures invited praying that he be allowed to take his seat in the House. It is thought by some that he will eventually obtain his seat now denied him.

FUN.

FLATTERY.—Artful Tailor (after measuring customer's arm): "Dear me! Very, sing'lar sit!—Ex; act' the measurement of the 'Apollier Belvidere,' sir!" Customer orders a second suit.

ONE day during an eclipse of the sun a boy sold smoked glasses at six cents apiece. "You ought to make money," said a purchaser. "Yes," said the young merchant, "ours would be a good business if the dull season were not so long."

"I AM an independent voter, and I can't support you until I've seen your platform," she said as he finished proposing. A couple of hours later it dawned upon the young man's mind that she wanted to know the amount of his salary.

AT a camp-meeting lately a venerable sister began the hymn: "My soul, be on thy guard! Ten thousand foes arise." She began too high. "Ten thousand," she screeched, and stopped. "Start her at five thousand!" cried a converted stock-broker present.

AN Irishman once said to another: "And ye have taken the temoral pledge, have ye?" "Indade I have, and am not ashamed of it, either." "And did not Paul tell Timothy to take a little wine for his sodmach's sake?" "So he did; but my name is not Timothy, and there is nothing the matter with my stomach."

VERY LIKELY.—"Good-morning, Betty. Fine morning. Father pretty well?" "No, sir. I'm sorry to say he ain't at all the thing." "Sorry, indeed, to hear that. What's the matter with him?" "Well, sir, the fact is, he and Master Revill drav over to Canterbury the other day, and the trap got turned clean over, and I thing that upset him."

TENDER WIFE.—"Say, look here! I've got to have a new velvet skirt right off. Got to have it. This old thing is all worn out—actually threadbare down the front." Bride of a Husband. "Just the thing, my dear. All the rage. Fashion item says velvet skirts will be very much worn this season. Sand-paper the back of your dress and you're setting the style.

PROFESSOR GEIGER sat in an easy-chair on the deck, looking very pale. The compassionate captain asked how he felt. "Miserable, miserable; I'm sick, captain, I'm sick. I have paid tribute to Neptune till I have lost everything." "But," said the captain, "I see you still have your boots left." "Yes," said the professor, faintly, "but they were on the outside."

AN AN innocent-looking old man was going up a Vicksburg street, a draytman nodded at him and asked, "Want a dray, mister?" "No-o, I guess not," replied the old man; "I'm too fur from home, and can't pay freight on it. Much obleeged, though. Vicksburg is a powerful nice town. A fellow back there asked me if I didn't want a coat; a nocher inquired if I wanted a hack, and now you offer me a dray. I wish I lived here."

F "WILLIAM, do you know why you are like a donkey?" "Like a donkey?" echoed William, opening his eyes wide; "no, I don't." "Do you give it up?" "I do." "Because your better half is stubbornness itself." "That's not bad. Ha! ha! I'll give that to my wife when I get home." "My dear," he asked, as he sat down to supper, "do you know why I am like a donkey?" He waited a moment, expecting his wife to give it up. But she didn't. She looked at him somewhat commiseratingly as she answered: "I suppose because you were born so."

THE TORTURES OF NEURALGIA.

THESE are being mitigated, and in a large number of cases wholly removed, by the use of "COMPOUND OXYGEN," the new revitalizing agent which is now attracting such wide attention. Our "Treatise on Compound Oxygen" sent free. DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard St., Philadelphia, Pa.

IT was a colored preacher who said to his flock: "We have a collection to make this morning, and for the glory of Heaven whichever of you stole Mr. Jones's turkeys don't put anything on the plate." One who was there says: "Every blessed nigger in de church came down wid de rocks."

THE PREMIER SHOT GUN.

WE wish to call special attention to the advertisement of the PREMIER SHOT GUN. We have personally examined and own one of these guns; it is the handsomest and best single breech-loading shot gun in the market, equal in all particulars to high-priced double guns, and much better than a cheap double barrel. They are exactly as represented in the advertisement in every particular, and are well worth $18 to $20. No sportsman should neglect to purchase one, for, at the advertised price, they are a rare bargain. The advertisers are one of the best known and most reliable firms in the trade, and manufacture the PREMIER GUN themselves. They are offered at the wholesale price, to reduce a very large stock during the Summer months.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE promotes the growth of and beautifies the Hair, and renders it dark and glossy. The COCOAINE holds, in a liquid form, a large proportion of deodorized COCOANUT Oil, prepared expressly for this purpose. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair.

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Broadway, New York, so long the leading hotel of the great city, fully maintains its high standard of excellence, and in comfort and luxury has no superior in this country or in Europe. Its location, for healthfulness and the convenience of travelers, is the very best. On account of its thorough good order, safety and superior rooms, it is especially adapted for families and ladies traveling without escort, who are treated with every respect and consideration. The proprietor, with his family, resides in the Hotel, giving to it his constant personal supervision; the result is that the ST. NICHOLAS is, in every respect, the Model Hotel.

A BUSY LIFE.

THE World's Dispensary at Buffalo, N. Y., is a great institution, having its auxiliary Invalids' Hotel for accommodation of patients, costing its founder nearly half a million dollars, and its branch in London, England, of similar proportions, where Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, Pleasant Purgative Pellets and other remedies are manufactured for the foreign trade, which extends to the East Indies, China and other far-distant countries. All this mammoth business has been organized, systemized and built up by Dr. R. V. Pierce, who has associated with himself as a Faculty, under the name of the World's Dispensary Medical Association, a most competent staff of physicians and surgeons, who annually treat many thousands of cases of chronic diseases, not by prescribing any set lot of remedies, but by using all such specific remedies as have, in a large experience, been found most efficacious. Besides organizing and directing this mammoth business of world-wide proportions, Dr. Pierce has found time to write a work on domestic medicine, entitled "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," 1,000 pages, 300 illustrations, selling at $1.50; and also to serve a term as State Senator, and later as Member of Congress. Surely he must be competent, if he were to take the lecture platform, to discourse upon "the recollections of a busy life."—National Republican.

BALDNESS.

A SURE sign of approaching Baldness is an abnormal amount of Dandruff, accompanied or followed by "falling hair." When these unmistakable signs manifest themselves, immediate action should be taken to restore the normal functions of the scalp and glands, as that is the first stage at which these symptoms yield most readily. Dr. Scott's ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH immediately vitalizes the decaying glands or follicles, and produces a rapid and long growth of hair. It is positively guaranteed to cure nervous or bilious headache in five minutes, and the price, $3, will be refunded if not as represented. Its sale is wonderful. See testimonials and advertisement on sixteenth page.

HALFORD SAUCE.—Unrivaled by any relish. Intended for family use. Recommended by the best families.

IMPURE BLOOD, General Debility, Scrofula, Erysipelas, Pimples, Carbuncles, Unhealing Sores, and other diseases demanding a treatment essentially Tonic, Absorbent, Alterative, Blood Cleansing, Blood Making and Health Restoring, yield readily to that most perfect and elegant of medicinal preparations, DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 2117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE is more convenient for making "lemonade" than lemons or limes, and is healthier than either.

BALDNESS, grayness and other imperfections of the Hair will be regarded as inexcusable after a trial of MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

THE TRAVELERS pays for business time lost by accidental injury, and a policy doesn't cost much.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., June 19, 1880.
H. W. Johns M'f'g Co., 87 Maiden Lane, New York:
GENTLEMEN.—The asbestos paint I got of you last Fall is entirely satisfactory. I want nothing better.
Yours respectfully,
(Signed) D. T. CLIFFSIDES, Druggist.

EPPS'S COCOA.

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ¼ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, LONDON, ENG.

To New York.

BOUND BROOK ROUTE

The Pioneer 2-hour Route.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 7.30, 8.30, 9.30, 10.15 A.M.; 12.10, 2, 3.30, 3.45, 5.00, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 9.20, 11, 11.50 A.M., 1, 2.45, 4.25, 6.30, 6.17, 8.20, 10.20 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

LEAVE NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 6.45, 7.45, 9, 11.15 A.M.; 1.30, 4, 4.30, 4.45, 5.30, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.25, 10.10, 11.30 A.M.; 1.40, 4, 6.10, 6.50, 7.20, 8.10, 10.55 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

To Long Branch, Ocean Grove, etc.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.30, 10.15 A.M.; 2, 3.30 and 3.45 P.M.

LEAVE OCEAN GROVE: 6.12, 6.27 and 7.28 A.M.; 2.57, 4.13 and 6.07 P.M.

Trains connect at Jersey City by Annex Boat for Brooklyn, where a connection in addition to that from New York is made with steamers for Rockaway, Brighton and Manhattan Beaches.

H. P. BALDWIN, G. P. A., New York. C. G. HANCOCK, G. P. & T. A., Phila.

A CHARMING NEW NOVEL

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"PHYLLIS," "MOLLY BAWN," etc.,

Beauty's Daughters

A Novel. 12mo. Extra cloth $1.50. 16mo. Paper cover. 60 cents.

"The great success of 'Molly Bawn,' 'Phyllis' and 'Airy Fairy Lilian' prepossess for this last work a capital run. The great charm of her writings consists of strong characterization, clever dialogues, and simple yet interesting plots, combined with a fine power of description."

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Philadelphia.

LA BELLE CHOCOLATIERE.

One Hundred Years Old.

1780 — 1880

WALTER BAKER & CO.

Dorchester, Mass.

CHOCOLATE, BROMA and COCOA

In their best and purest form, contain every ingredient that is needful for the sustenance and growth of the human system, being composed, as determined by chemical analysis, of starch, gum, gluten, oil, and a white crystallizable substance called theobromine, similar to theine in tea, but containing more nitrogen and being an important adjunct to nutrition.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

Our Book of Choice Chocolate Receipts will be sent free to any address.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS

Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays as follows:

*Pier No. 18, N.R., foot Cortlandt St.	Jewell's Wharf, Fulton Ferry, B'klyn.	Thirty-third St., East River.
10.00 A.M.	10.10 A.M.	10.25 A.M.
1.00 P.M.	1.10 P.M.	1.25 P.M.
3.00 P.M.	3.10 P.M.	3.25 P.M.
6.00 P.M.	6.10 P.M.	6.25 P.M.

Returning, leave GLEN ISLAND 7.30 A.M., 12.30, 3.30, 5.30 and 8.30 P.M.

* Pier No. 18, N.R., foot of Cortlandt St., is three blocks from 6th Ave. and two blocks from 9th Ave. L. road.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,

The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, CONSERVATORY, FISH PONDS, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENSPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half-hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 1.35, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.35 A.M. hourly to 8.35 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M., and 10.40 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.55 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

BRIGHTON BEACH.

BROOKLYN, FLATBUSH & CONEY ISLAND RAILWAY.

TRAINS LEAVE FLATBUSH AVENUE, LONG ISLAND DEPOT, BROOKLYN, hourly from 6.30 to 9.15 A.M., and from 9.15 A.M. to 10.45 P.M. half-hourly. Separate trains run from BEDFORD half-hourly from 11.24 A.M. to 10.04 P.M. Last train from the Beach leaves at 11.30 P.M.

Flatbush Avenue, L. I., Depot is reached via Flatbush Avenue cars from Fulton Ferry, and Atlantic Avenue cars from South, Wall and Fulton Ferries.

Bedford Station is reached via Grand and Roosevelt Street Ferries by the Franklin Avenue cars and Rapid Transit trains.

W. E. DORWIN, General Superintendent.

UNITED STATES TYPE ELECTROTYPE FOUNDRY

JAMES CONNOR'S SONS,

PRINTERS' FURNISHING WAREHOUSE,

29, 30 and 32 CENTRE STREET, Bet. Reade and Duane sts. New York.

ANGOSTURA LIQUEUR

The Finest and Purest Sweet Cordial in existence. Prepared by DR. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS, the manufacturers of the world-renowned

ANGOSTURA BITTERS

J. W. HANCOX, Sole Agent, 51 Broadway, New York.

THE SUMMER FASHIONS

JUST RECEIVED FROM PARIS.

COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES

IMPORTED MONTHLY EXCLUSIVELY FOR

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S MAGAZINE

—AND—

Gazette of Fashion,

THE ACKNOWLEDGED FASHION STANDARD OF AMERICA.

Every Number contains full and accurate descriptions of the prevailing styles of Ladies' and Children's Dresses, Hats, Bonnets, etc., etc.; the latest styles of Fichus, Collerettes and Jabots; the latest style of Hair-dressing, etc., etc.

The readers of the LADY'S MAGAZINE have the earliest information of the constant change in Fashions, as the reports appear simultaneously with those in the journals of Paris.

Each number is embellished with beautiful engravings finished in the highest style of art, and the contents are highly interesting and entertaining, consisting of stories, sketches, poems, anecdotes, amusing cartoons, etc., etc.

Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,

53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Amusements.

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Asst. Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
MONDAY, JUNE 14th, W. C. Mitchell's Pleasure Party in OUR GOBLINS.

HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ATKINSON, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.

HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 41, N.R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N.R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.

General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,

Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Goshen Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

MRS. M. J. COLLET, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,

Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. Six thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females. JNO. L. EUBANK, Proprietor.

Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.

JAMES A. FRASER, Owner and Proprietor.
COLONEL N. CORE, General Manager.

The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and prescribed by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professors T. Gaillard Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville.

Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

Get off at Covington for the

HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails and telegraph-office. Board, $2.50 per day; $15 per week; $50 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station, $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. E. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.

H. C. EUBANK, Proprietor.

400 PER CENT. PROFIT.

QUICK! SURE!! EASY!!!

Agents Wanted all over the U. S. to sell magnificent Crayon Portraits, on tinted plate paper, Heroic Size (22x28), of the Republican Nominees,

Garfield and Arthur!

Will sell everywhere, in city and country, both for only 25c., insuring the biggest profits ever made by agents. Sample, with terms, only 10c. Address,

SHIPMAN & CO., 8 Reade St., New York.

☞ Wholesale by all News Companies.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS!!

5,000 BUILDING LOTS,

Surrounding depot at Stewartville, near Garden City, 23 miles from New York; price, $35 each. Also 10,000 at West Deer Park, 27 miles from New York; price, $50 each. Weekly payments—25 cents a lot. Unusual facilities for building on weekly payments. Call or send stamp for circular to

R. WILSON, Attorney, 57 Broadway, N.Y.

Digitized by Google

SEASON 1880.

STOCKTON HOTEL,

Cape May, N. J.

CHARLES DUFFY (of Continental Hotel, Philadelphia), Sup't and Gen. Manager.

OPENS JUNE 19.

Music by HASSLER'S CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA—SIMON HASSLER, Leader.

NOTE.—Our patrons have the use of a PASSENGER ELEVATOR, and each room is supplied with ELECTRIC BELLS.

CATARRH Is a Terrible Disease. Its fearful effects—corruption, running down the throat, weak eyes, deafness, loss of voice, loss of smell, disgusting odors, nasal deformities, and finally consumption. From first to last it is ever aggressive. Ordinary treatments are worse than useless. If neglected while a cure is possible, it may rapidly develop into quick consumption. The most thorough, successful and pleasant treatment is Dr. M. W. CASE'S

CARBOLATE OF TAR INHALANT

FOR CATARRH, ASTHMA, CONSUMPTION, BRONCHITIS' & DEAFNESS.

It does not require ten minutes to demonstrate the value of Carbolate of Tar, the most healing remedial agent known to science. Balsams and Cordials of the most healing and soothing properties are so combined with Pine Tree Tar, that the mere breathing converts them into a dense smoke or vapor. This is inhaled—taken right to the diseased parts. No heat, no hot water, simply inhaling or breathing it, and you feel its healing power at once. This treatment is endorsed by physicians everywhere, and highly commended by thousands, who have used it with perfect satisfaction. FULL TREATMENT sent. SATISFACTION ALWAYS GUARANTEED. Address,

(When writing for circular, name this paper.)

Dr. M. W. CASE, 933 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Chesapeake & Ohio Railway

A favorite route for freight and passenger traffic between the East and West, in connection with packets on the Ohio River; railroads diverging at Cincinnati to West, Southwest and Northwest, and with various roads intersecting it; also with steamers and sail-vessels on the coast connecting at Richmond, Va.

Particular attention is called to the

GREAT REDUCTION

IN

EXCURSION FARES

TO THE

Various Springs and Summer Resorts

OF THE

MOUNTAINS OF VA. AND W. VA.

DURING THE SEASON OF 1880.

Tickets on sale at the Freight and Passenger Office of the Company, 329 Broadway, New York, and at the principal Ticket Offices throughout the country.

CONWAY R. HOWARD, G. P. & T. A.,

Richmond, Va.

Rates will be given and contracts made for freight to or from all points reached by the C. & O. Railway and its connections,

H. W. CARR, Gen'l Eastern Ag't,

329 BROADWAY.

White's Patent Lever Truss

Is the best Truss in the world for holding and curing Hernia. Its lifting power is just the thing—no pressure on back. Every ruptured person should have one. Pamphlets free. Address,

WHITE'S LEVER TRUSS CO.,

61 Warren St., New York.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

---

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL

An unequaled toilet preparation. Restores, preserves and beautifies the complexion. Used and indorsed by Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Clara Louise Kellogg, Lotta, Janauschek, and hundreds of others. Contains nothing that will injure the most delicate skin. Sold by all druggists, 50 cents per bottle. Beware of imitations.

CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N.Y.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.

H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

THE PHILADELPHIA PREMIUM BOOK CO., No. 600 Chestnut St., Phila'a, Pa., is advertising new and standard Books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and its list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises. Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

THE

Mohave Mining and Milling Co.

MINERAL PARK AND CERBAT DISTRICTS,

Mohave Co., Arizona.

Organized under the Laws of the State of New York.

Capital, $1,000,000, in 100,000 Shares, at $10 each.

STOCK NON-ASSESSABLE.

OFFICERS:

EDWARD M. CLARK, Pres't. WILLIAM H. CRAPIN, Treas.
MAJOR GEORGE GLENDON, M. E., Sup't.
RICHARD W. G. MARBURTON, Sec'y.
LOUIS DAVIDSON, Arizona, Eng'r.
BANKERS—NATIONAL Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Office, 280 Broadway.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in FRANCE. (L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

Imitation Gold Watches.

$6, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D. by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. GOLD LEVER METAL WATCH FACTORY, 226 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3986.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENG. LAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

$10. The Finest Single Breech-Loader in the World. $10.

THE PREMIER. PRICE TEN DOLLARS.

All Improvements, TOP SNAP, LAMINATED TWIST BARRELS, RECOIL-LESS LOCK, BLOCK STRIKER, PISTOL GRIP, PATENT FIRE-END CARTRIDGE HAMMER, (drop gun), and CHOKE BORED. 28 Yards Range.

The PREMIER is the best single barrel breech-loading shot gun that has ever been made, possessing as it does all the extras and improvements of a Belgian double gun. The Premier is the only single gun with all modern improvements in the market, and is the only single gun that looks, handles, or is shaped like a double gun, and in many respects it is preferable to a double gun, especially for glass-ball shooting. Choke bored to the best and most scientific manner.

We are, ourselves, the sole manufacturers of the Premier Gun, and have been making them constantly for the past six months, and we now have the largest stock of single guns in the U. S. In order to reduce our stock during the summer months, we shall retail the Premier Gun at the closest wholesale price, which is $10. The regular retail price being $15. No further reduction will be made, and none will be retailed at $10 after September 1st. This is a rare opportunity to get the finest shot gun of its kind in the World at the wholesale price. They can be readily sold at from $18 to $20 in any town in the United States. THE PREMIER is the only single breech-loader that will satisfy a sportsman; it is in every way up to the standard of a $25 double gun, and we use over $30,000.00 worth of special tools and machinery in its manufacture. The barrel is FINE LAMINATED TWIST, equal to those in $50 guns, and the stock is fine walnut, hand checkered, frames either nickled or case-hardened, fore-ends are rosewood and blued. Every one is carefully shot bored, and an ATTESTED TARGET goes with each gun. If bore, 10 and 12 inch barrel, weight from 6 ¾ to 7 ¾ lbs. 2¾ to 3 ¼ inch drop. Use paper or brass shells centre fire. Remember, that the Premier, unlike all other single guns, has all the modern improvements or extras, and we warrant it up to the standard of a $25 or Parker double gun. SPECIAL PRICE UP TO SEPTEMBER 1st, $10, and when cash comes with order, we give, free, a hard wood compartment gun case, and a set of reloading tools. These are not given free when sent C. O. D. Will send C. O. D. on receipt of the Express Agent's guarantee that the gun will be returned free, if not taken. We ask no cash in advance on C. O. D. matter, as we have never yet had a Premier Gun returned. Every gun warranted. Circulars forwarded. Address G. W. Turner & Sons, Mfrs. and Dealers in Firearms, 15 & 17 Dock Sq., Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

WITH

$5

YOU CAN BUY A WHOLE

5 per ct. Imp. Austrian 100fl. Gov't Bond

Issue of 1860.

These bonds are guaranteed by the Imperial Government of Austria, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

They are redeemed in two drawings annually, in which 100 large premiums of 60,000, 10,000 5,000,

etc., florins are drawn.

Every Austrian 5 per cent. 100 florin bond, which does not draw one of the larger premiums, must be redeemed with at least

120 Florins,

as there are no blanks, and every bond must draw something.

The next drawing takes place on the 1st of August 1880,

And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of August is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that day. Country orders sent in Registered Letters and inclosing $5 will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address

International Banking Co.,

150 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK CITY.

Established in 1874.

N. B.—In writing, please state that you saw this in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 25 cents, with age, height, color of eyes and hair, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

Agents Wanted.

$950 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—To sell selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses paid to SELL our NURSERY STOCK. Permanent position. Stock warranted. Address at once, S. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 159—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. S. WELTBERGER, Prop., 233 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

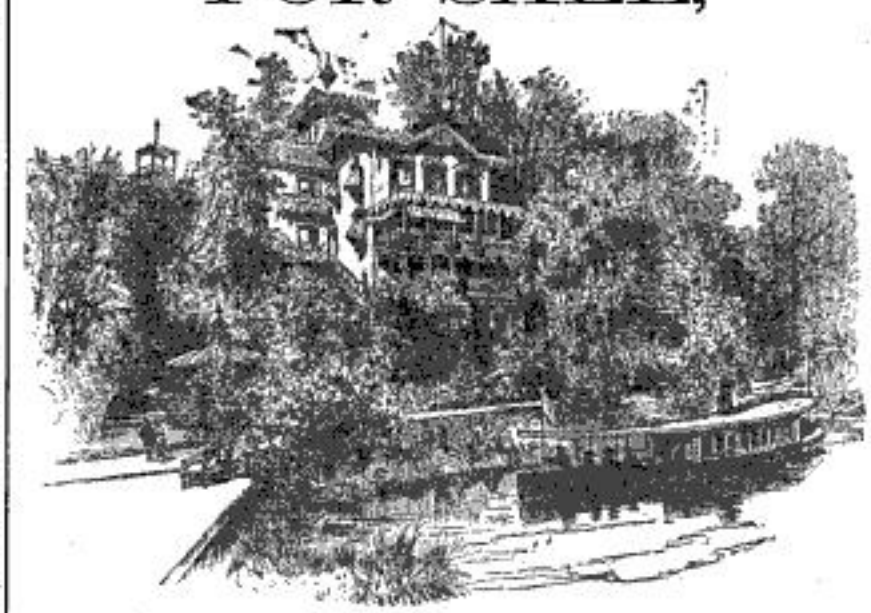
---

50 Elegant Cards. New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 5c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

---

40 PAGE BOOK OF WONDERS for a 3-cent stamp. Address, S. FOX & CO., 391 Canal St., N. Y.



---

10 Actress Photos, 10 Comic Songs, 10 Transp't Cards, Game Authors, 15c. Chromo Co., Northford, Conn.

---

20 Lovely Enriched Chromo Cards, or 40 all Floral Motto, with name, 10c. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF

THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

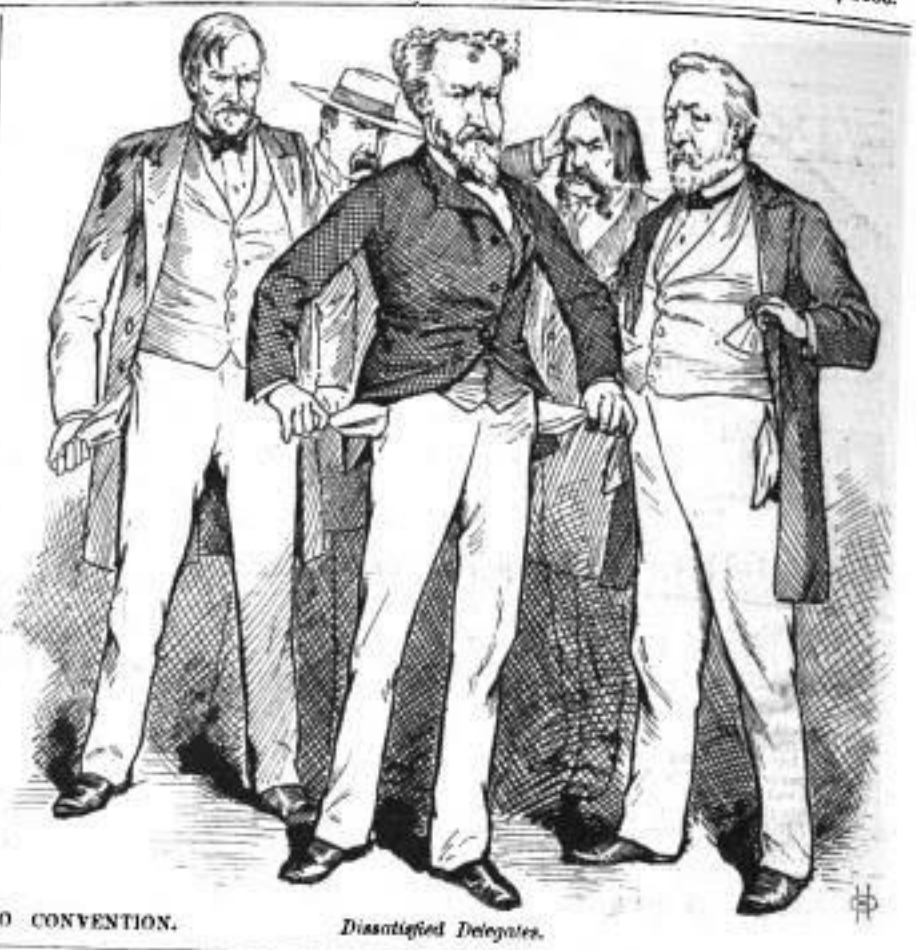
Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,



V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

Satisfied Delegates.

AFTER THE CHICAGO CONVENTION.

Dissatisfied Delegates.

FIFTY CENTS FOR THE CAMPAIGN.

THE LOUISVILLE COURIER-JOURNAL

(HON. HENRY WATTERSON, Editor),

Proposes to do its full duty in the present Presidential Canvass. It will be in the front ranks, and will pour its hot shot where they will be most effective. As the Representative Democratic Paper of th Union, and the Representative Southern Paper,

It will be a necessity to the Democratic patriots throughout the land, valuable to the fair-minded everywhere, and full of instructive points for Republicans. It will be sent, POSTAGE FREE, from the date order is received to December 1st, for only 50c. per Copy, or 11 Copies for $5. All orders should be addressed to W. N. HALDEMAN, Pres't Courier-Journal Co., LOUISVILLE, KY.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each; five for $1; or per dozen, $2. GEORGE D. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

WILHELMS-QUELLE

IMPORTED

NATURAL MINERAL WATER

FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.

LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.

SOLE IMPORTERS,

MACK & BRUNLER,

7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,

Near Post Office.

Mining Trust Company

OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.

Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests. The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stocks, payment of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.

American Mining Stock Exchange

(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company),

EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

FRESCO STENCILS Colored Sketches and Mixed Colors to match. Also, Pamphlets of Instruction. Address, J. Z. GIFFORD, 141 E. 92d St., N.Y.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially endorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances producing a permanent electric voltaic current which acts immediately upon the hair glands and follicles. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is WARRANTED to

Cure Nervous Headache in 5 Minutes!!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 Minutes!!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!!
Prevent Failing Hair and Baldness!!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!!
Immediately soothes the wearied Brain!!!
Money returned if not as represented!!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.]

Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.

"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cures have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,300,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"ROUND LAKE CAMP-MEETING GROUNDS, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1881

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Bristol, England, Feb., 1879.

"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH,

PURE BRISTLES, NOT WIRES---LASTING FOR YEARS.

Name this Paper. SENT POSTPAID on RECEIPT of $3, Or by Express, C. O. D.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

Remittances should be made to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.

Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,

MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,

AND

139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement SENT BY MAIL.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. D. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

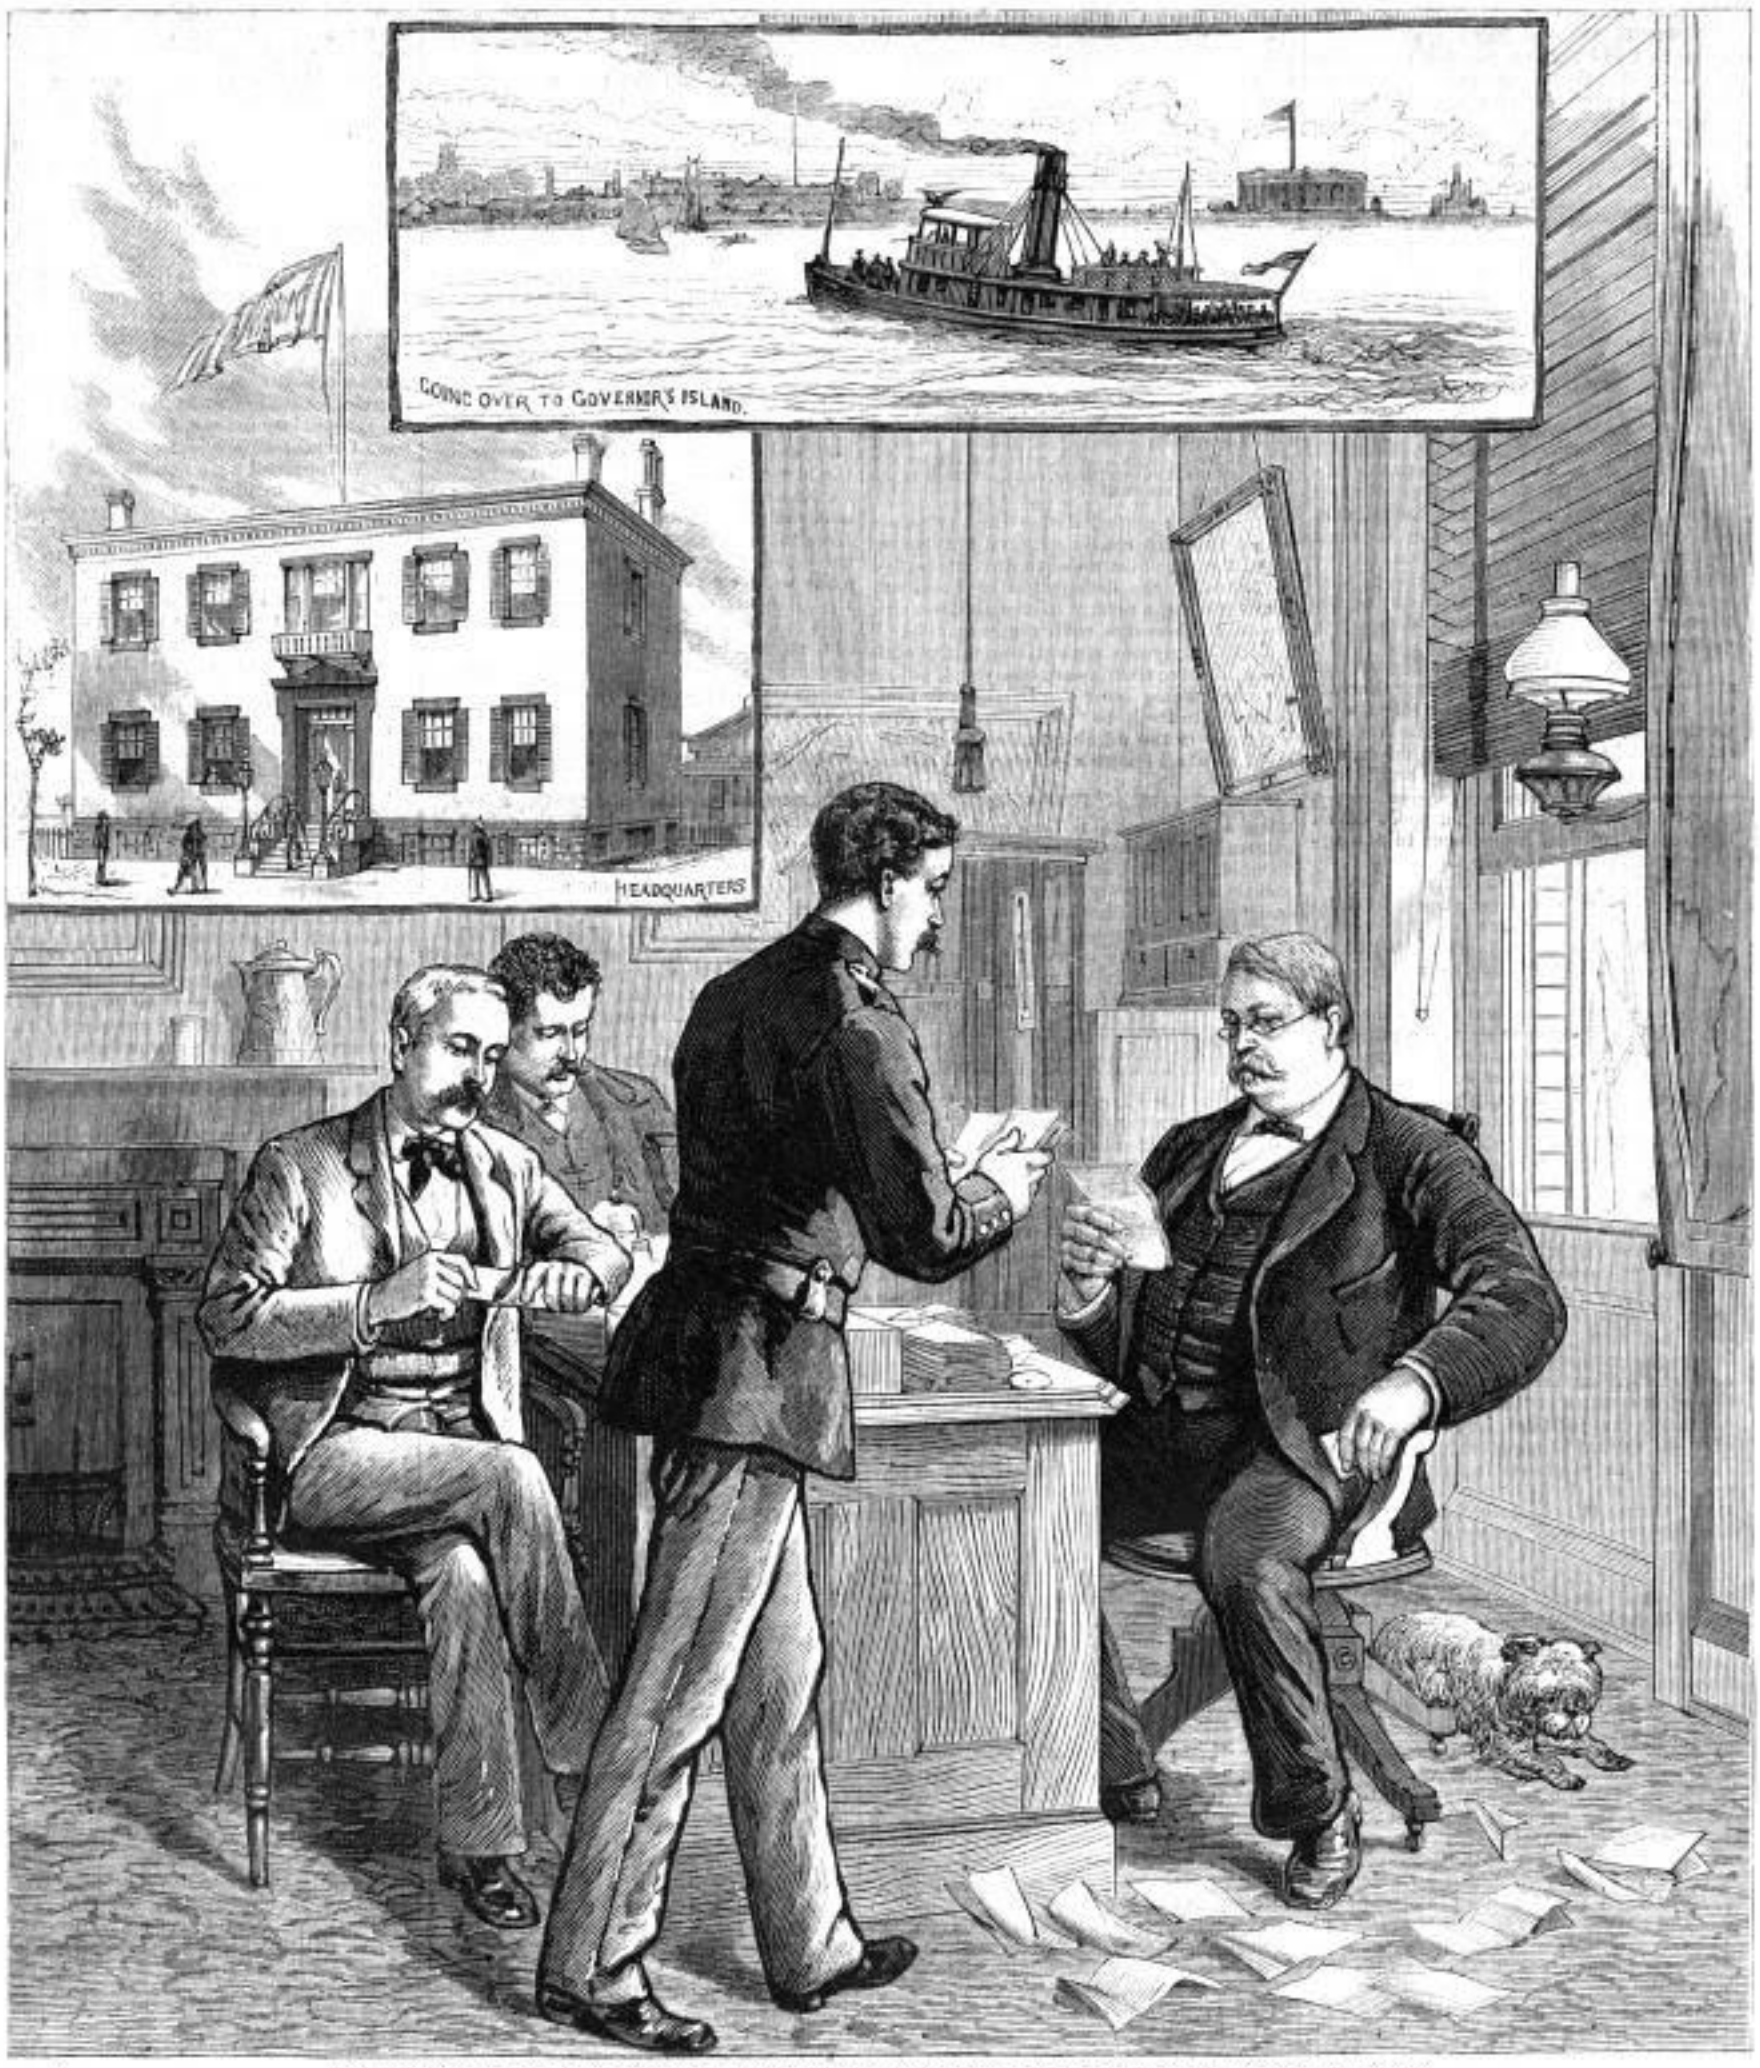
$3 Printing Press

Prints cards, labels, &c. (Type, etc., $2) 12 larger sizes for business or pleasure, young or old. Do your own advertising and printing. Catalogue of presses, type, cards, &c., for 2 stamps. Kelsey & Co. Meriden, Conn

KIDNEY-WORT

The Great Remedy For THE LIVER, THE BOWELS, and the KIDNEYS.

These great organs are the Natural cleansers of the System. If they work well, health will be perfect. If they become clogged, dreadful diseases are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should have been expelled naturally. KIDNEY-WORT will restore the natural action, and throw off the disease. Thousands have been cured, and all may be. For sale by all Druggists.



SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Hydrometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1019 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 140 pages. Mention this paper.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. ENGLAND, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,294.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, JULY 17, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly; 13 Weeks $1 00.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT RECEIVING THE CONGRATULATIONS OF HIS FRIENDS IN HIS OFFICE.

NEW YORK.—OPENING OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN—GENERAL HANCOCK AT HIS MILITARY HEADQUARTERS ON GOVERNOR'S ISLAND.—See Page 335.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, JULY 17, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.,
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE TWO PLATFORMS.

THE modern political "platform" is a political manifesto in which each party puts its best foot forward, and makes its highest bid for the popular confidence and support. Generally speaking, we may say that the promises of a platform are a good deal broader than the performance of the party which has carried the election on it, and the principles of a platform are a good deal narrower than the real principles and conduct of the party supposed to be covered by it. For instance, the performance of the Republican Party under the pure and generally excellent administra- of President Hayes has fallen, in the single matter of civil service reform, very far behind the promises of the Republican platform of 1876; and that the principles of a party platform are always narrower than the real opinions and tendencies of the men who stand on it, was made apparent by the recent public confession of Mr. Edwards Pierrepont, when, in submitting to the late Chicago Convention the platform adopted by that party, he stated that its framers had endeavored to put nothing in their resolutions on which they could not agree among themselves, and "nothing that would tend to disturb the harmony of the Convention, or awaken angry debate, or cause long delay."

It is in this view that political platforms afford us a good standard by which to measure the strength and the weakness of parties—the strength which results from the fairness and breadth of their promises, and the weakness which results from an obvious compromise of principles and opinions—a compromise made for the purposes of an immediate political expediency in the approaching Presidential election.

The chief points upon which accuracy and precision of definition were to be desired in the coming Presidential contest seem to us to be these: the currency question, the tariff, civil service reform, and the perennial issue raised in our politics by the relation of the Federal Government to the States; and on each of these points it seems to us that the platform-makers of both parties have fallen somewhat below the measure of their duties and of their opportunities. The question of the currency is relegated by the Republican platform to the domain of history, as if it were no longer a "living issue." The only references made to this vital subject is as follows, found in what purports to be a "brief report" of the administration of the Republican Party during the last twenty years: "It has restored upon a solid basis a payment in coin for all the national obligations, and has given us a currency absolutely good and equal in every part of the country." How far this statement falls below the truth is known to all who do not wear political blinders on both of their eyes. The present basis of resumption in coin is not a solid one, so long as it is menaced by more than three thousand millions of dollars in uncanceled greenbacks, retained in circulation against the solemn promise of the Republican Party as made when it first issued them; and our present currency is not "absolutely good and equal in every part of the country," for the Secretary of the Treasury finds it impossible to keep the depreciated silver dollar in circulation, and that impossibility results from its depreciation alone, and from the superadded threat which its mere coinage and its accumulation in the vaults of the Treasury at Washington are seen to suspend over the solidity of the basis on which resumption rests.

And the deliverance of the Democrats on this subject has been adroitly framed, we fear, to keep the word of promise to the ear and to break it to the hopes of the people. It professes to favor "honest money, consisting of gold and silver and paper convertible in coin on demand." This would be an excellent test if it only were accompanied by a commentary which should indicate that by "honest money" the Democrats mean something better than the money promised by the Republicans; but everybody knows that they do not mean any such thing. The whole phrase is little more than a "glittering generality," unless, in pledging itself "anew to the constitutional doctrines and traditions of the Democratic Party, as illustrated by the teaching and example of a long line of Democratic statesmen," the Cincinnati Convention has openly recanted the financial heresies with which the Democrats of the West and South have been infected for the last decade or longer. And such a recantation should be made in express terms, and not by implication.

On the question of the tariff the advantage seems clearly to rest with the Democratic platform. It pledged the party to "a tariff for revenue only," and to "free ships," with "a living chance for Americans on the seas and the land," while the Republican platform clings to the exploded dogma of protection — that "the duties levied for the purpose of revenue should be so discriminated as to favor American labor." As such "discriminations" in the nominal favor of American labor are really taxes on one kind of American labor for the profit and advantage of some other kind, we see that in this specious declaration the Republicans commit themselves to a perpetuation of the class legislation embodied in our present revenue system—a system which works private injustice and public detriment in a thousand directions.

On the subject of civil service reform there is little to choose between the two platforms. The framers of the Republican Platform had purposed to ignore the topic entirely as one of the things they could not agree about among themselves, but a member from Massachusetts, having insisted on thrusting the disagreeable matter before the faces of the Chicago Convention, a declaration on the subject was finally adopted, with this clause stricken out:

"That the tenure of administrative offices (except those through which the distinctive policy of the party in power shall be carried out) shall be permanent during good behavior, and that the power of removal for cause, with due responsibility for the good conduct of subordinates, shall accompany the power of appointment."

After having excluded this vital principle of all true and consistent civil service reform, the Republican Convention proceeded to indorse "the declaration of President Hayes that the reform in the civil service should be thorough, radical and complete," and that Congress should co-operate with the Executive to this end.

On this same score the Democratic Platform limits itself to "the promise of such a change in the administration of government as shall insure a genuine and lasting reform in every department of the public service." That is, the Republicans promise a "thorough, radical and complete reform" of the civil service by continuing to hold all the offices of the Government, and the Democrats promise "a genuine and lasting reform" in the same service, by turning all the present incumbents out and putting Democrats in their places! Each of the parties has only juggled with the question in its platform.

THE FUTURE OF BUSINESS.

IT is in the experience of many a man that, convalescing after a prolonged illness, and rejoicing in his returning strength, he has over-exerted himself, bringing on a relapse, which, if it had no other effect, admonished him that he must be more prudent, and probably not expect an early return to his original strength. Nations are composed of individuals, and often exhibit the characteristics of individuals. The experience of the imprudent convalescent has been the history of the business of the United States in the past two years.

Following the panic of 1873, there were nearly five years of as severe commercial depression as was ever suffered by any people at any time when no active and continuing causes of disaster existed. There were no bad failures of crops, no widespread epidemics, no general wars, and yet trade was everywhere suffering. Business men were ruined in hundreds. There had been overwork in building railways, and the credits of railway corporations had been unduly extended, and the result was a panic, which was followed by stagnation.

But our business men suddenly awoke, during the Spring of 1878, to the fact that a slow process of recuperation had been going on, and that the movements of great crops of cotton, breadstuffs, provisions, and other staples of agriculture, were bringing about a better state of affairs. An active speculation began, which was carried to its height in the Autumn of 1879. It was most active in iron, some descriptions of which tripled in price. It extended to railway stocks and bonds of little or no value. It became rampant in wheat, based on the failure of the crops in Western Europe.

Then came the conviction in many minds that we had been going a little too fast. A halt was called. To pause at such a crisis is to recede. There has been a severe shrinkage of values of merchandise and securities in the past few months, and much money lost.

Yet all is well. The convalescent is in good heart. The business of the country is on a sounder basis than it has been in twenty years. There has been a sharp lesson given against excessive speculation. We are admonished that we are on a specie basis, and inflated prices cannot be maintained. We are promised large crops, and, if prices are somewhat lower than they have been, they are not ruinously depressed. If obstacles are interposed to a general or important advance in wages, the cost of living promises to continue low. Food and clothing will not be dear. Manufacturers are fully employed, and are generally making money. So long as this is true, there can be no lack of employment.

The reverses of the past few months are in some respects a blessing. Our exports again exceed our imports. The advance in iron had been so great as to threaten to put a check upon railway building, so necessary to the development of the resources of our country. The return of iron to a moderate price will reduce the current expenses of railroads in operation, thus swelling their net earnings. It will also encourage the building of new roads as well as the extension of old lines. A serious burden has been removed from those employing all kinds of machinery.

Those who would get rich rapidly must be content with a slower and safer progress. We have but to look about to note how promising is the general position. We must, therefore, work out the elements of prosperity spread before us with renewed energy and confidence, but in a more sober mood, in the full assurance that a new career of business activity is before us, more solid, if less brilliant, than the history of the past years affords, yet in all respects the subject, justly, of assurance and congratulations.

THE BRADLAUGH CASE.

TO an American, at first thought, it seems altogether strange that a gentleman, the legality of whose election to the British Parliament is unquestioned, should, on account of his religious opinions, be debarred from taking his seat. The strangeness of this phenomenon, however, passes instantly away when we remember that in England the State is wedded to the Church, and that in a time not far remote from the present, no man in that country could hold any important office without avowing his belief in the creed of the national Church. We may well remind ourselves, also, that in several of the American colonies, before the Revolution, no man could be either a legislator or a magistrate who was not a communicant of the Church. A provision better calculated to destroy both Church and State by the dry-rot of insincerity could scarcely be devised. It inevitably brings Christianity into reproach as leading to proscription and persecution, when in fact everything of this sort is wholly foreign to its spirit.

The ancient English rule has been much relaxed within the last century, but it is still held by conservatives to be rigid enough to exclude an open and avowed atheist from a seat in Parliament. The terms of the oath prescribed for members of that body are indeed such that we do not see how an atheist can take it without stultifying himself; while the form of affirmation, provided for Quakers like John Bright, is thought by many to be inapplicable to Mr. Bradlaugh's case. The course of the latter in first boggling at the terms of the oath, and then offering to take it without modification, was a very stupid blunder on his part, not only because it brought his own sincerity into doubt, but because it greatly embarrassed the party to which he belongs. He ought to have determined from the first whether he would take the oath or not, and to have stood firmly by his position when once taken. If, upon conscientious grounds, he had firmly refused to take it, his appeal to Parliament for relief would have rested upon very strong grounds. Or if, when he first presented himself to be qualified, he had quietly, without a word of explanation or protest, offered to take the affirmation provided for the relief of those unwilling to take the oath, he would probably have been admitted without serious objection.

A conservative Englishman is a natural stickler for ancient forms and precedents, and apt to think the bottom of things must drop out if they are disregarded. And so Mr. Bradlaugh found his way to the seat he was chosen by the electors of Northampton to fill closed and barred before him, and for a time it seemed to be doubtful whether the barriers would be broken down. But the final issue has been in harmony with the spirit of the age. The Christian Church is rapidly outgrowing the old notion that heresy of religious opinion is a crime to be repressed by civil penalties and deprivations, and coming to regard it rather as a misfortune and a calamity, to be overcome by the spirit of kindness and good-will. There is no more sense in persecuting a man for his lack of faith in spiritual things than for being born deaf or blind, or for having lost a leg or an arm. Our feeling towards such a man should be those of compassion rather than of indignation. The whole system of religious persecution has been a direful mistake from first to last. It is contrary to the very genius as well as to the precepts of Christianity to force it upon men's acceptance by pains and penalties. Of all the hindrances to the growth and extension of our religion over the whole earth, this is the greatest, the most inexcusable.

It does not surprise us to be told that Mr. Bradlaugh, standing at the bar of the House and pleading for his own rights and those of his constituency, "is considered to have made a splendid effort of oratory." He is, no doubt, a man of exceptional ability, and he certainly represents a great principle, that of religious liberty. There is no reason to suppose that the electors of Northampton are atheists. They probably chose Mr. Bradlaugh as their representative, not because they sympathized with his religious opinions, but rather because, in spite of them, they thought him well qualified to serve them, and the country as well, as a legislator; and in this they are probably not mistaken. His very heresies create a presumption in his favor, so far as ability and character are concerned. A bad man, holding popular opinions, might easily be elected to Parliament; but in Christian England an atheist could not well be chosen unless his qualifications were of a high order. Mr. Bradlaugh represents a vital principle, and one that is sure to prevail, if not now, in the near future in England, as it has already prevailed in the United States. Individual voters must, of course, be at liberty to withhold their suffrages from a man whose religious opinions are odious to them. Others may think them narrow and bigoted for so doing, but their right to act even upon their prejudices is unquestioned. But when a constituency deliberately chooses a heretic for its representative, there can be no reasonable excuse for excluding him from his seat on account of his opinion. If Robert Ingersoll were nominated for a seat in Congress in almost any district of the United States, many Christian voters, in the exercise of their unquestioned right as citizens, would, no doubt, refuse to support him; but, if in spite of this opposition, he should be elected, there is not a Christian in the land who would seek to prevent him from taking his seat—nay, not one who would not contend to the last for his right to do so. As Christians we should be grateful to the Fathers of the Republic for establishing this as a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

THE gross receipts from internal revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30th, amounted to $123,623,251, an increase of $12,000,000 over last year. This increase is derived from whisky, cigars and cigarettes, and would have been greater but for the reduction of the tax on tobacco, which is said to have caused a falling off of $12,000,000. The growing prosperity of the country is very clearly shown by this gratifying statement. The customs receipts for the fiscal year were $185,108,611, an increase over last year of $10,061,640.

The total amount of United States currency outstanding on June 30th was $362,659,008. The total number of national banks organized during the fiscal year was sixty-one, with a capital of $7,352,070. The total number of banks which have gone into voluntary liquidation during the same period is twenty, with a capital of $2,601,000. No national banks failed from July 23d of last year until June 9th, 1880, since which time three banks have failed, with a capital of $700,000, all of which, it is believed will pay their creditors in full. The net increase of national bank notes during the year was $14,933,740. The amount of legal-tender notes now on deposit for the purpose of retiring national bank circulation is $19,782,387. The total amount of national bank notes outstanding June 30th was $343,157,937, not including national gold banks, amounting to $1,347,490.

The decrease of the public debt during the month of June was $10,214,424. The decrease during the year ending on the 1st instant was $85,034,961. This, considering the extraordinary expenditure for pensions and on other accounts, is certainly an excellent showing.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

CERTAINLY it ought to be possible to prevent disasters like that which occurred last week to the passenger steamboat Seawanhaka. Within a month seven "accidents" have happened within three hundred miles of this port to vessels plying in our waters. Others may occur, and will occur, unless something effective shall be done to insure a better class of vessels, greater caution in their navigation, and a more rigid enforcement of the laws regulating their inspection. In the case of the Seawanhaka, the officers seem to have done their duty bravely to the very last, and apparently all proper precautions against fire and other casualties had been adopted.

Digitized by Google

The captain especially displayed a heroic steadfastness and presence of mind in the face of extremest peril, which have justly elicited the hearty commendation of the Press and public. In the matter of the inspection of steamboats, it is now said that the local board is overworked, and is unable to make as thorough examination of vessels as the law contemplates. As an evidence of the pressure of work, it is stated that in one month recently two men inspected 165 vessels, working Sundays as well as other days, and yet were behindhand in their duties. The department, it is added, is now contemplating a reorganization of the steamboat inspectors' service in the Eastern districts, and steps in that direction are likely to be taken so soon as the Narragansett case is reported upon. Possibly something may be gained by this reconstruction of the system of inspection, but the inspection itself, to be effective, must be in the hands of honest, efficient men, who cannot be either bribed or intimidated. The law on the subject is explicit as to the criminality of "accidents," reading as follows:

"Every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on any steamboat or vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duties on such vessel the life of any person is destroyed, and every owner, inspector, or other public officer through whose fraud, connivance, misconduct, or violation of law the life of any person is destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof before any Circuit Court of the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor for a period of not more than ten years."

Under this law, it would seem that in very many cases, like that of the Narragansett, the conviction of officers and owners notoriously guilty of negligence ought not to be difficult, and it is to be hoped that a speedy test may be made of the exact measure of responsibility, in the interest both of the public safety and of the substantial business interests of the metropolis.

THE FATE OF TURKEY.

THE question as to what shall be done to secure the performance by Turkey of the engagements entered into under the Berlin Treaty is awakening increased attention among European statesmen. There are many who believe that the only way in which the will of Europe can be enforced, in the event that the Porte shall refuse to execute the desired reforms, is by the appointment of a commission representing all the Great Powers, which shall be charged with the full enforcement of the Berlin Treaty and the control of the finances, and the summoning of a new Turkish Parliament, fairly representing all the nationalities of the Empire, to carry out the principle of secularization and decentralization. It is certain that no hesitating policy, no half-measure, will be of any avail. The Powers must act together, and they must act with decision and force. It will be a slow and tedious process after Europe has done her utmost. It will be the work of years to restore peace, order, and such a degree of prosperity as will enable the people to pay the ordinary expenses of a peaceful and well-organized Government. It will take a generation to fairly start the work of the moral and intellectual elevation of the masses of the people. But it is a work that must be done, and in this work England must lead. A writer in the Contemporary Review says truly:

"England has shrunk from this responsibility too long already. It is a work which ought to have been completed at the close of the Crimean War, which was complicated throughout the long years up to 1876, during which time England upheld Turkey without attempting to reform the Government, and it has been still more complicated by the long series of mistakes made by the late Government, especially by the loss of those two golden opportunities—the Conference of Constantinople and the Congress of Berlin. A serious threat of coercion at either of these times would have settled everything and saved Turkey from untold misery. It is more difficult now, but this is probably the last chance, and it should not be the fault of England if Europe fails to improve it. If the other Powers refuse to unite in this work, nothing will remain for England to do but to make the best terms she can with Russia and France for a division of the Empire. What these three Powers agree to can be done, and there is no reason why the plan of division should not be made satisfactory to Germany and Italy. Austria will oppose any possible settlement. But why should not the great Powers agree to a united intervention, which will be exactly in the line of the Andrassy Note, the Berlin Memorandum, the Conference of Constantinople and the Berlin Treaty, and only one step in advance of the latter?"

The latest reports indicate that the mediatorial advice of the Powers as to the rectification of the Greek boundary will be met by the Porte by dogged and defiant disregard, a state of siege having already been proclaimed on the frontier. Meanwhile Greece is arming and evidently means to fight, if necessary, for her rights. But her struggle will be vain so long as Europe shall decline to act aggressively against the Turkish Government. It is five centuries and a quarter since the Turk landed in Europe and started on his career of conquest. If he shall, a quarter of a century hence, still remain on the shores he has desolated, England, the one Power which has done most to bolster his monstrous rule, will be justly held responsible at the bar of history for any added atrocities which he may perpetrate.

POLITICAL COMPLICATIONS ABROAD.

IT is an old proverb that one man can lead a horse to the water but fifty cannot make him drink. The truth of this saying is exemplified in the present state of affairs in Turkey. The conference at Berlin has decided that a large tract of country around Zanina shall be ceded to Greece, and that certain parts of Albania shall be made over to Montenegro. Now Albania is a long, wide strip of land stretching along the Adriatic Sea. In its midst lies Montenegro. The Montenegrins are a wild people, in the habit of raiding upon the Albanian valleys. The Albanians, on the other hand, are not more under the sway of Turkey than the Indians are under the rule of the Government at Washington. So it was that when Turkey agreed to cede part of Albania to Montenegro the Porte was perfectly aware that the cession could not be enforced except by force of arms. Another difficulty which lies in the way of any cession of Albanian territory is the difference in race and creed which exists in these countries. In Albania there are several separate nationalities divided up into clans, among which there are Roman Catholics, members of the Greek Church and Mohammedans. The latter have, however, only adopted Mohammedanism to show their dislike to some neighboring clan, and are ready to change again at a moment's notice. The Montenegrins, on the other hand, all belong to the Greek Church, and the Mohammedans and Catholic Albanians object to be transferred to Montenegro. According to the latest news both Montenegrins and Albanians are up in arms, and the Porte informs the other Powers that everything possible has been done to carry out the cession as ordered by the Berlin Conference, but that the people refuse to accept the interference of the Sultan. It now remains to be seen what action England and France will take. Obviously they must do something.

France and Germany are still in hot water with the Jesuits and the Pope. In Prussia the Church Bill is being manœuvred through the Assembly, but it is shorn of most of the features which were so objectionable to Rome. But in France the governmental decrees against the Jesuits have been carried out with unflinching severity. At several places the fathers refused to move, and loudly asserted that the colleges and establishments were their own property, either by purchase or by the gift of some benefactor. But the Government was deaf to their complaints; the doors were forced open, the police entered and the followers of Ignatius Loyola were ejected. The total number of religious establishments broken up so far is thirty-nine, with 475 members. There remain about thirty, which, being educational institutions, are allowed to exist until August 31st. It is expected that the Jesuits will immediately apply to the judges, complaining of the violation of their rights of property and domicile, and praying for an order of reinstatement pending the trial of the case.

From England there is but little new. The Bradlaugh excitement still continues. Fifteen thousand persons attended a sympathy meeting in London, June 28th. It is urged that a decision in favor of Mr. Bradlaugh would have an injurious effect upon the cause of Christianity in India, whither, it is said, he has been sending anti-religious books. The House of Commons, however, on July 1st adopted Mr. Gladstone's resolution allowing such members as choose to affirm instead of taking the oath, an adverse motion having been rejected by 303 to 249. This will enable Mr. Bradlaugh to take his seat, and remove an issue from British politics which should never have been raised.

THE proposition of Mr. Cyrus W. Field to introduce five-cent fares on the elevated railways of this city has been rejected by the directors of the Manhattan Company. It will be renewed, however, at an early day, and considerations of sound policy will ultimately, no doubt, lead to its adoption.

THE State election in Indiana does not take place until October, but the Republicans, if their organs are to be believed, have already carried it. So Pennsylvania, which does not vote until November, is already secured for Hancock, as we learn from leading Democratic journals. Perhaps both sides may be disappointed. It will be just as well for all concerned to wait until the votes are counted.

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND has never been regarded as possessing peculiar attractions, but it just now promises to become the most popular Summer resort of the country—for Democrats, at least. Prominent members of that party are now swarming to the island in shoals, and the tide is likely to increase as the Summer goes on. General Hancock is, of course, the magnet which draws the multitude of adoring politicians to the green island's shores.

THE principal Summer resorts are already filling up, and a season of unusual prosperity is anticipated by their proprietors. The tide of pleasure travel is especially great in the direction of the New Jersey coast resorts, and it is said that there is not a vacant or unlet cottage anywhere from Sandy Hook to Point Pleasant. The development of the shore region south of Long Branch is one of the marvels of recent enterprise, there being now seven or eight resorts, with a Summer population of at least 35,000, scattered along a beach which seven years ago was inhabited only by a few wreckers and fishermen.

THE nomination of General Hancock has certainly been received by the Democrats with greater enthusiasm than the nomination of General Garfield has awakened among the Republicans. There is an obvious coolness toward the Chicago ticket in many Republican circles, and there are not a few members of that party who will vote for General Hancock. It is Garfield's misfortune that he is handicapped by a machine candidate for the Vice-Presidency, and has, besides, been less positively partisan on some leading questions than the party managers wished him to be. The Republican ticket would have been much stronger had some such man as Hon. Levi P. Morton been named for Vice-President; and just this consummation would have been reached had it not been for the interference of Mr. Conkling—Mr. Morton having been definitely offered the support of the delegations of several leading States.

THE spectacle of Mr. John Kelly forgiving the regular Democracy of New York after he had beaten them at the Cincinnati Convention, was, to say the least of it, edifying. When the Tammany braves were refused admittance to the convention as delegates, a great many people declared that Mr. Kelly was dead—that he had been "sat upon and mashed"; but, in view of later events, he may be regarded as about the liveliest corpse of the season. If he shall now act with discretion, his power and influence in his party will be greater than ever before, and, being in "the odor of sanctity" once more, he is not likely to throw away his opportunity.

THE Democracy of Indiana will find it difficult to reconcile the views of their candidate for Vice-President and their candidate for Governor on the financial question. The latter, Mr. Landers, holds ultra soft-money sentiments, while the former has been conspicuous as a supporter of hard-money doctrines. Both are now compelled to stand for the same party, and, as either one or the other must be wrong, it is difficult to see how their leadership can produce anything but confusion and disorder. At all events, both cannot be consistently advocated from the same platform by anybody whose opinions on the financial question are at all pronounced.

THE young Texan, R. B. Buck, who shot the son of Hon. John G. Thompson, at Highland Falls, near West Point, some weeks since, has been indicted, and will be tried in due time. The Dallas (Texas) Herald, of a recent date, says that Buck was always regarded as a young man of gentle manners, and is neither a braggart nor given to oaths. It adds: "If he has changed since he left this section, it must be due to something, perhaps, contagious and peculiar to the atmosphere to which he has been transferred." It must be admitted that the West Point atmosphere has not seemed of late to be particularly favorable to the development of the gentler side of human nature, and it is certainly to be hoped that this young Texan may be able to show that his offense was the outcome rather of sudden provocation than of a passionate and vicious temper.

THE amount of capital which has been sunk in the business of fire insurance is much greater than is generally supposed. The Commercial Bulletin, which has just investigated the mortality experience of the joint stock fire insurance of twenty-six States, shows in a published table that within ten years the withdrawals have reached the large number of three hundred companies, representing assets estimated as aggregating some $87,400,000. Of these withdrawals, fifty-two were New York companies, with assets of $18,000,000. Of the total number of companies, one hundred—or just one-third—were swept out of existence by the Chicago and Boston fires of 1871 and 1872—leaving two hundred companies whose withdrawals cannot be charged to any exceptional disaster, but must be accounted for upon the obvious general principle that their business did not pay for the cost of doing it.

THE interoceanic canal concession which has been granted by Nicaragua to the American Provisional Society is one of great value, conferring, as it does, the exclusive privilege to construct a ship-canal across the territory of Nicaragua. The canal is to be of sufficient dimensions to accommodate steamers of the largest class used between Europe and America, and the locks are to be not less than five hundred feet long and twenty-eight feet deep. The concession is for ninety-nine years from the date of the opening of the canal for general traffic, and at the expiration of that period the Nicaraguan Government is to take possession of the canal in perpetuity, with the right reserved to the company to lease it for another ninety-nine years. During the period of the concession the company is to have the privilege of constructing a railway along the whole or any part of the canal, also such telegraph lines as it deems necessary for the construction and working of the canal, and these lines shall transmit public messages free of charge. The Government of Nicaragua will declare the terminal ports and the canal itself, throughout its length, to be neutral, and that the transit, in case of war between other powers and Nicaragua, shall be uninterrupted. In general, the canal shall be open to free navigation of all vessels, provided they pay the dues and observe the regulations of the company. An effort will be made to secure a guarantee from all Powers of the neutrality of the canal, and of a zone along it, and of the sea in the vicinity of the terminal ports where dimensions will be defined. It remains to be seen whether any immediate and practical result will come from this concession.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

GENERAL GRANT started last week on an excursion through Kansas and Colorado.

A TOTAL of 8,056 applications for pensions were filed at the Pension Office in one day last week.

THE National Board of Health announces that there is not a case of yellow fever in the country.

THE indications point to a thorough union of the Democrats of this city and State in support of Hancock and English.

THE Kentucky Court of Appeals has decided that no person can be lawfully excluded from any jury on account of his race or color.

TWO PERSONS were killed and several injured by the explosion of the boiler of a pleasure steamboat at Minneapolis, Minnesota, July 1st.

THERE is a Republican majority of twenty-two on joint ballot in the new Legislature of Oregon, against a Democratic majority of six last year.

GENERAL HANCOCK is said to feel embarrassed by his official position, as he cannot give the campaign the personal attention he desires to do.

UNDER a decision of the Supreme Court of the State, General W. F. Smith has been reinstated as one of the Police Commissioners of this city.

THERE were 553 people killed and 1,581 injured in Pennsylvania last year by the railroads. The horses cars killed seven and injured twenty-two.

AN insane mother, named Mary O'Connor, cut the throats of her three children at Jersey City, N. J., July 1st, in order that "they might go to heaven before her."

IT is said that Special Deputy Marshals of Elections will be appointed this year as usual, notwithstanding the refusal of Congress to provide for the pay of such officials.

HON. MARSHALL JEWELL, of Connecticut, has been elected chairman of the National Republican Committee which organized last week. Senator Dorsey, of Arkansas, is secretary.

THE annual eight-oared race between Yale and Harvard on the Thames, at New London, Conn., July 1st, was won by Yale by ten lengths, Harvard having closely pushed the winning boat for the first three miles only.

THE Lutheran churches of St. Louis with their Sunday-schools and a number of church societies from adjacent towns, on June 28th, celebrated the 350th anniversary of the Augsburg Confession and the 300th anniversary of the acceptance of the Concordat.

A BREAK occurred in the Mississippi levee below Quincy, Ill., June 30th, resulting in the inundation of a large extent of farming land, and enormous damage to the growing crops and to live stock. Many families narrowly escaped drowning by the sudden rise of the waters.

THE extreme hot weather of last week greatly increased the death rate in this city. On June 28th there were 42 cases of prostration by heat, of which 30 were fatal. The total number of deaths reported for the day was 186. The deaths on the day following numbered 212.

THE pleasure of regatta day at New London, Conn., last week, was marred by a painful accident which happened on the Northern Railroad and which resulted in the death of President F. W. Lincoln, of the Boston and Albany Railroad, and Mrs. Dr. William Appleton, of Boston.

THE forty-ninth exhibition of the American Institute will open on the 15th of September next, and close on the 27th of the following November. The work of amateurs and apprentices in all branches of mechanical, industrial and decorative art will be admitted for exhibition and competition free of charge.

PRESIDENT HAYES last week attended the commencement exercises of Yale College, and was the recipient of the hospitalities of some of the leading citizens of New Haven. In a speech at the Alumni banquet he attributed the method in which he had carried out his Southern policy to the advice of ex-President Woolsey.

A GALVESTON paper says that trouble is brewing on the Rio Grande, consequent upon the erection of dams on the Texas side near Brownsville. The Mexican authorities desire their removal, alleging that the current will be forced to the Mexican side and do great damage. Governor Roberts has referred the matter to the authorities at Washington.

AMONG recent nominations for Congress are the following: Hon. Joseph Jorgensen, Republican, in the Fourth Virginia District; Hon. Morgan R. Wise, Democrat, Twenty-first Pennsylvania District; Charles H. Joyce, Republican, First Vermont District; Hon. M. E. Cutts, Republican, Sixth Iowa District; G. H. Owry, Democrat, for Arizona Territory. Mr. George C. Sturgis has been nominated for Governor by the Republicans of West Virginia.

THE imports into the United States for the past eleven months of the fiscal year, including specie, amounted to $669,314,664, against $425,606,675 for the like period of the year preceding—showing an increase of $273,407,989, or at the rate of 64 per cent. The exports for the same period, including specie, show an increase of $91,277,323, amounting in all to $779,260,196. Thus there is a surplus of exports over imports of $80,265,532. For the same period of the fiscal year preceding the excess of exports was $261,696,188. For the month of May last, the returns show an excess of exports over imports of $1,290,312.

Foreign.

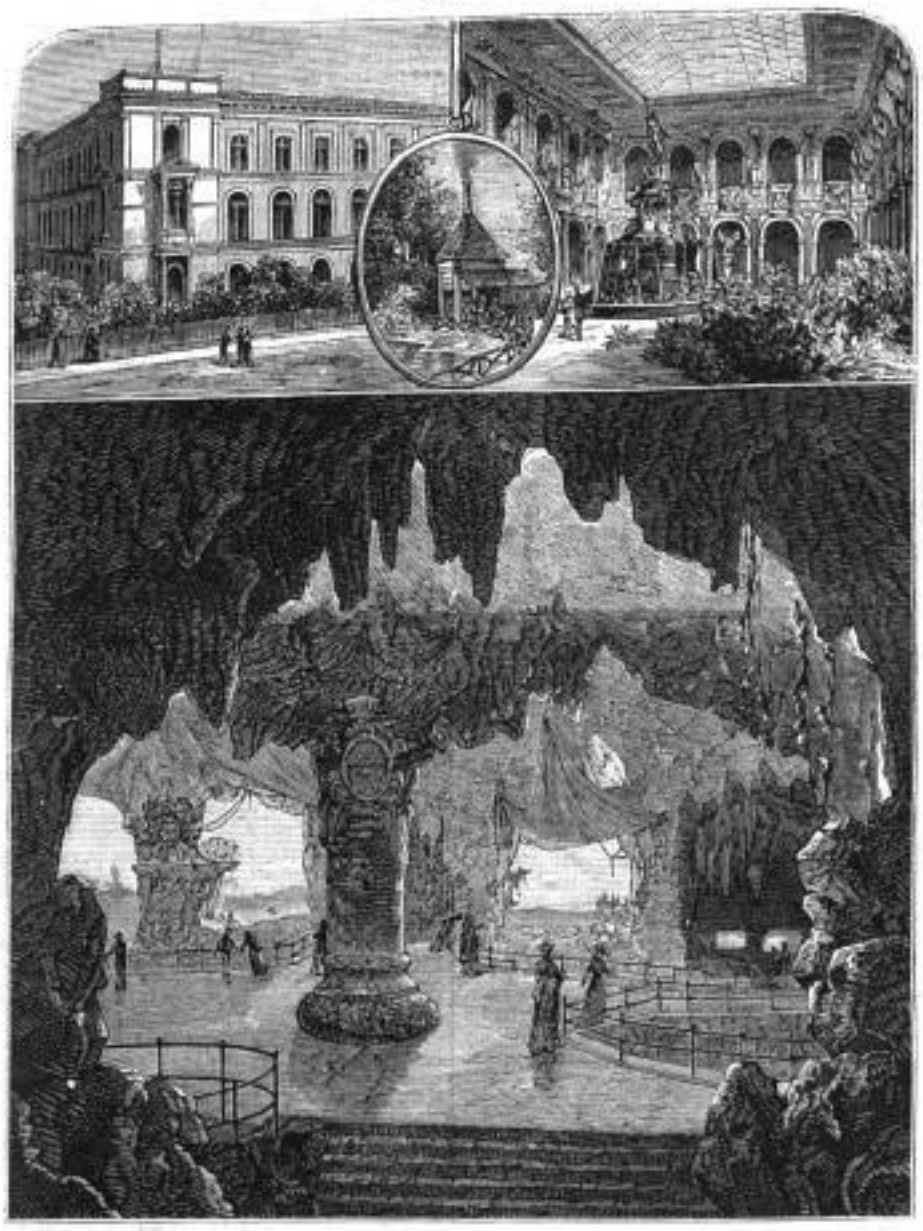
IT is reported that peace has been concluded at Buenos Ayres.

THE Belgian Government has given notice that diplomatic relations with the Vatican have ceased.

REPORTS from Turkestan state that the Russians have been twice defeated by the Tekke Turcomans.

IT is said the Pope has decided to accept the Prussian Church law and nominate bishops under it.

IT is estimated that the territory given Greece by the Supplementary Berlin Conference will include 300 square miles.



IN the House of Commons, July 1st, Mr. Gladstone said the time had not yet come for permitting exiled Fenians to return.

A PARIS dispatch says it is reported that the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, manufacturers of the famous Chartreuse liqueur, will not be interfered with under the anti-Jesuit decrees.

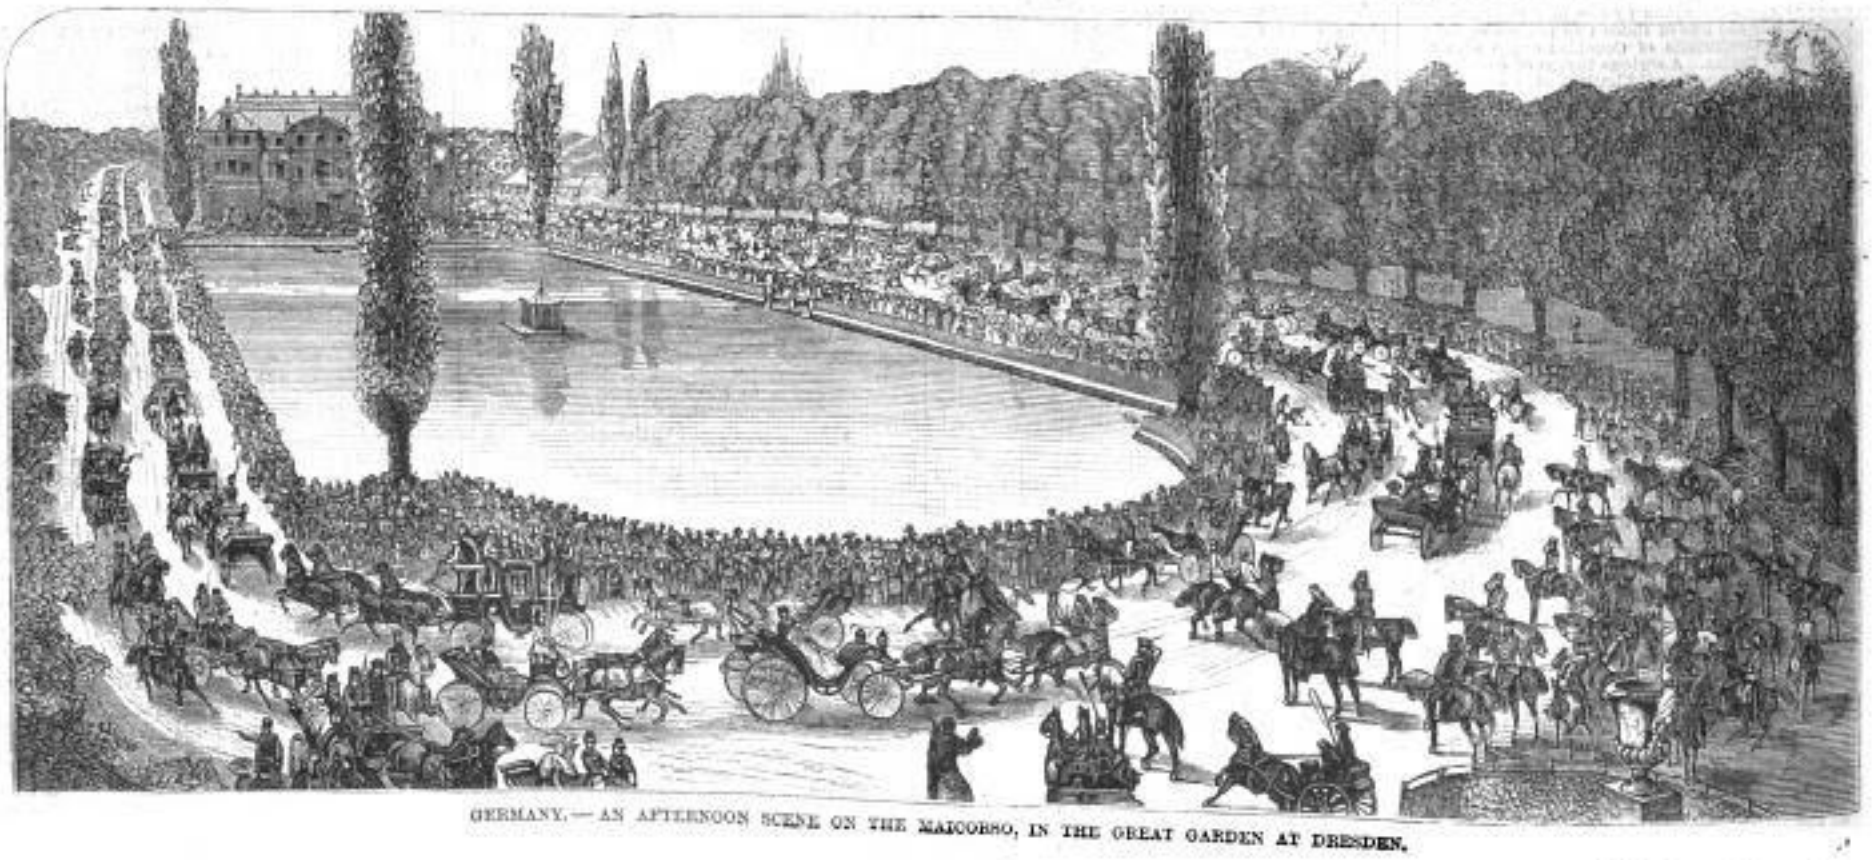
THE Envoy of Morocco has annexed to the protocol of the Morocco Conference a letter from the Sultan commanding him to denounce and punish the natives—officers, judges and other authorities—who may have refused justice and protection to the Hebrews.

Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 335.

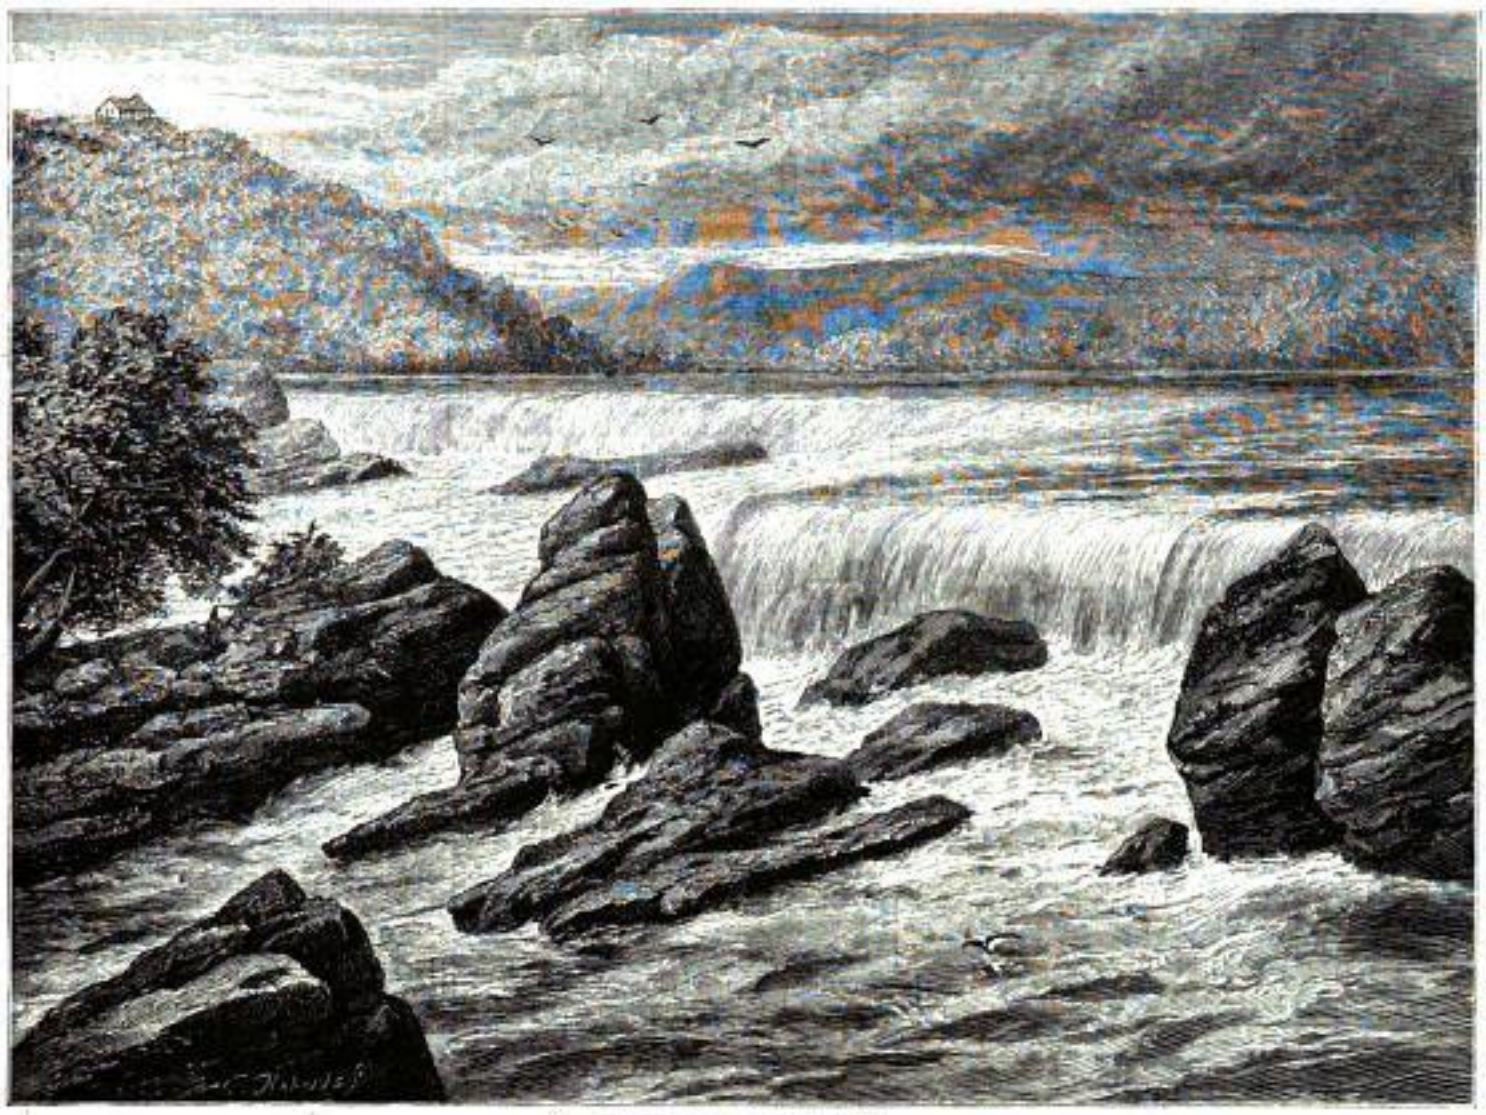
GERMANY.—THE INTERNATIONAL FISH EXPOSITION AT BERLIN.

BELGIUM.—THE APPROACHING JUBILEE—THE ART PAVILION.



BELGIUM.—THE APPROACHING JUBILEE—THE HORTICULTURAL PAVILION.

FRANCE.—THE SOCIÉTAIRES OF THE COMÉDIE FRANÇAISE IN THE GREEN-ROOM.



AFRICA.—ZULUS SWEARING TO PROTECT THE NAPOLEON MEMORIAL.

GERMANY.—AN AFTERNOON SCENE ON THE MAICORSO, IN THE GREAT GARDEN AT DRESDEN.

Digitized by Google

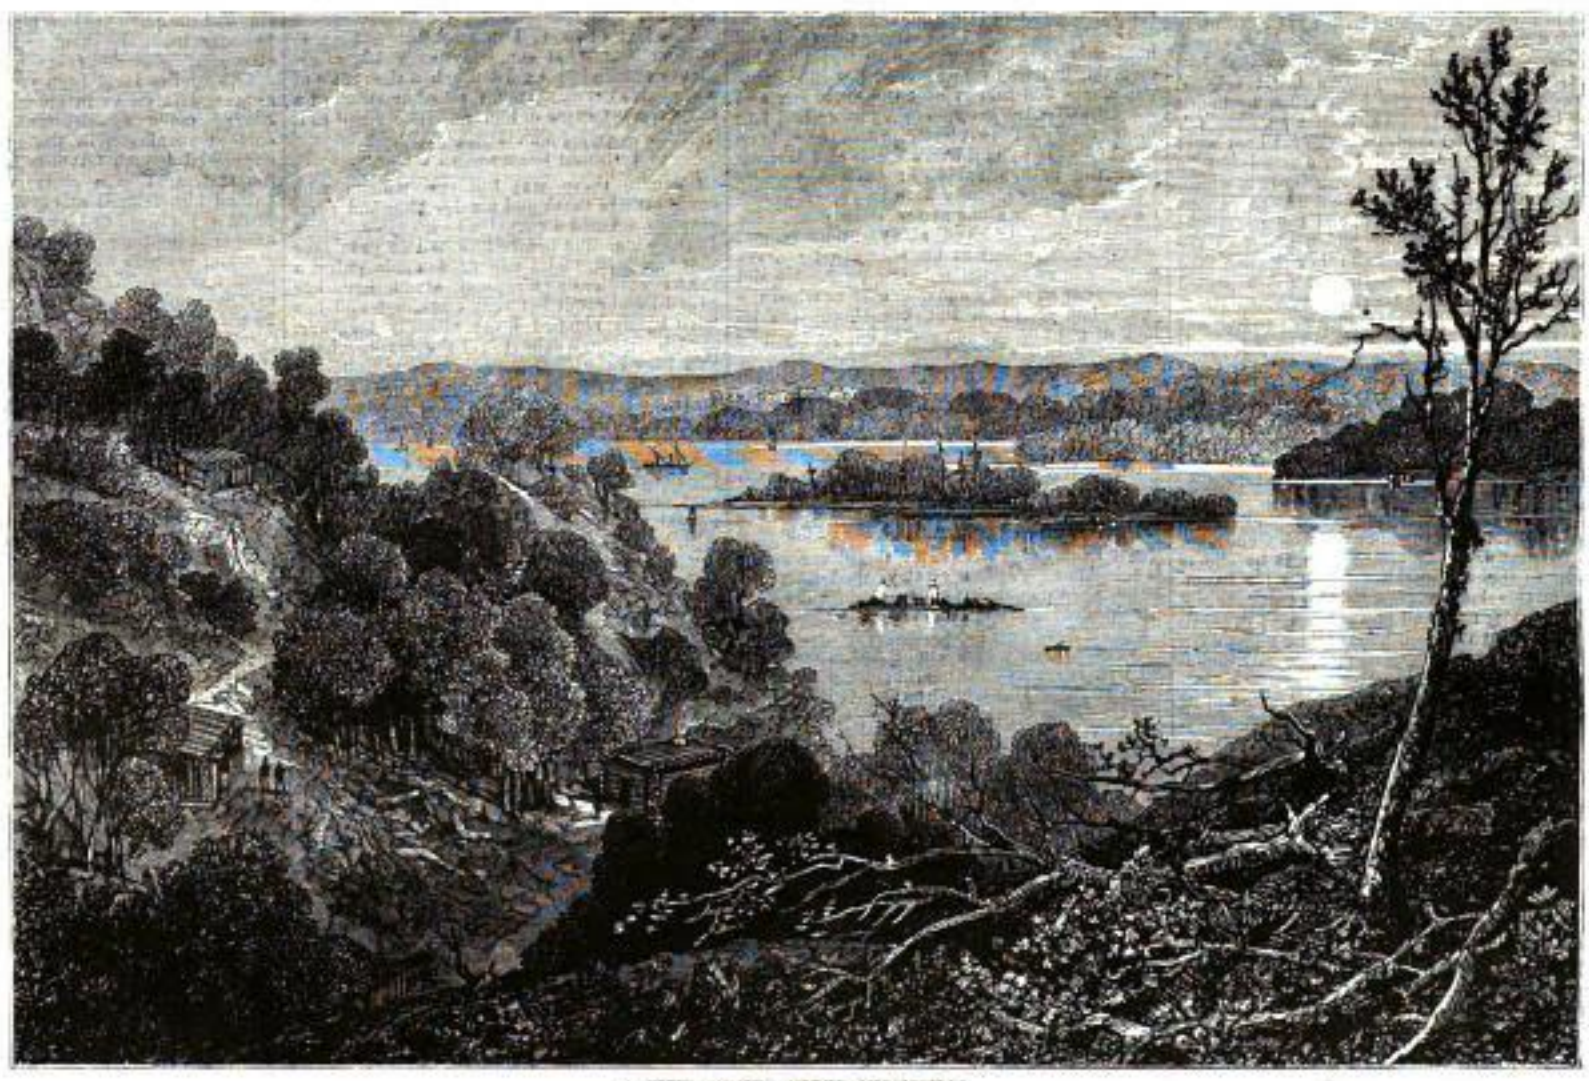
THE FALLS OF ST. ANTHONY.

THE FALLS OF ST. ANTHONY AND THEIR BICENTENARY.

THE Minnesota Historical Society commemorated at Minneapolis, on July 3d, the discovery of the Falls of St. Anthony by the adventurous Franciscan friar, Louis Hennepin, the first of white men known to have navigated the upper waters of the Mississippi to the cataract which for the first time interrupts its navigation. He was a native of Hainaut, in Belgium, one of the provinces which Louis XIV. wrested from the Spaniards. He was vivacious, more fond of travel than the cloister, with an observing eye, courage and a spirit of adventure. An offer to serve as a missionary was readily accepted, and in 1678 he was attached to the expedition of Robert Cavelier de la Salle. That ambitious man, hoping to find a river running to the Pacific, if the Mississippi did not, and thus open a way to enrich himself by capturing some rich Spanish mines, had rebuilt Fort Frontenac on Lake Ontario, and built a little vessel, the Griffin, above the Falls of Niagara, to convey his party Westward, and began a direct trade with Canada. Leaving his vessel at Green Bay he went on in canoes through the St. Joseph's to the Illinois River. Here he waited for news of the Griffin, which he had sent back to Niagara with a load of furs. When time passed and fears were entertained that she had been wrecked, he set out for Niagara and Frontenac, and dispatched Father Hennepin down the Illinois in a canoe with two companions, to visit the Sioux who had sent him messengers, and explore the river. For a month the canoe loitered on the Mississippi, making its way slowly up, when one day they saw an immense flotilla of Sioux canoes bearing down on them. They tried to elude observation, but were discovered, and were soon surrounded by yelling savages. Little respect was paid to any right of property. The goods La Salle had given the party to trade with soon found their way to Indian hands; but no equivalent found its way to the hands of Hennepin and his companions, whom their captors carried back in triumph to their country. In this way Hennepin reached the Falls, which he named in honor of St. Anthony, of Padua, next to St. Francis himself, the most honored saint of his Order. Two centuries have respected the name he bestowed, and it is still retained.

No cruelties were inflicted on the prisoners, but their position was irksome and humiliating. Hennepin, with ready cheerfulness, making the best of the situation and studying the country, the buffalo and other game, and testing the fertility of the soil by planting European seeds.

Fortunately aid was at hand. Greysolon du Lhut, a French officer, with a party, had reached the Sioux country from Lake Superior, and had wintered in or near it. Hearing of the position of his countrymen he struck across by river and portage, and, descending the Mississippi to the hunting grounds of the tribe, found Hennepin and one of his companions, whom he took away with him, and, following the Wisconsin to its head, reached the French post at Green Bay in safety.



Hennepin published in 1681 an account of his experiences in America, a book full of life, and movement, and picturesque in its description of the West.

We illustrate, in view of the occasion, the Falls of St. Anthony and a scene on the river.

CASTE PROPERTY IN INDIA.

JUDGMENT has been rendered in the celebrated Kapol Bania pot case. The trial of this suit lasted twelve days in February of this year, and excited great agitation and interest in the Banian and other Gujarathi sections of the community. The value of the pots in dispute is insignificant, being not more than a few hundred rupees; but the interests involved in the decision are considered by the Hindoo community of vital importance. For on the decision depends the solution of the question whether the Gujarathi Hindoos, who consist of about one thousand castes in Bombay and Gujarat, and constitute the wealthiest portion of the population of the Presidency, shall in future continue under the arbitrary power of their respective headmen, called shetts, who claim to have the sole control with respect to the property which in common belongs to each separate caste. The constitution of the Kapol Bania caste, as well as that of every other Gujarathi Hindoo caste, may be likened to the constitution of English clubs. As at the head of a club there is a president, so at the head of each of the castes there is a president called shett. When there are divisions in a caste on account of some dispute, each division has its own shett. The duties of a shett are to convene and preside over meetings of the caste whenever any dispute affecting the interests of the caste arises, to collect subscriptions from the members of the caste for caste purposes, and in general to do everything necessary for the welfare of the caste. Each Gujarathi Hindoo caste has its own funds and other property, more or less, according to the number and means of its members. The funds were raised originally for the purpose of assisting needy and invalid members, but owing to the apathy and indolence of the general body of caste men these funds have in most cases virtually become the private property of the shetts and their heirs. With the one exception of the Bhatia and Kapol castes, whose funds and other property have of late come under the management of Mr. Lakhmidas Khimjee and Sir Munguldas Nathubhoy respectively, the shetti of no other caste has ever rendered an account of the caste funds or applied them to the objects for which they were originally provided. The more enlightened and liberal-minded among the members of these several castes are dissatisfied with the conduct of their respective shetts, but lack the means or the energy required to face a tedious and expensive lawsuit for a matter in which they have, after all, little personal interest.

The office of shett in the Kapol Bania caste in Bombay has hitherto been filled by the members of a well-known family—that of Ruplee Dhunjee; and it appears that no account of the income and expenditure of the caste funds was ever rendered by any shett till Sir Munguldas Nathubhoy assumed the shettship in 1874. The Kapol caste has been in Bombay for the last two hundred years or thereabouts, and calculating the caste income on an average of only three hundred rupees per annum, the caste funds would have, at only 4 per cent. per annum, amounted during this period to several lakhs, but nobody can now say what has become of all this money. Mr. Gopaldas, however, admits in his evidence that he at present holds about 53,000 rupees on account of the caste. If all the former shetts of the caste had been conscientious in their stewardship an incalculable amount of good could have been done in the caste. During the shettship of Mr. Gopaldas, the caste became quite tired of the evils they had to bear, and at last the bulk of them appealed to Sir Munguldas to relieve them from their distress by consenting to accept the shettship. Sir Munguldas complied with their request in 1874, simply with a view to regain for them their just rights. Since his appointment he has conducted the affairs of the caste on enlightened principles, and the members of the caste are now allowed full and free voice—a privilege formerly denied to them—in all matters that concern their interests. Sir Mungaldas involved himself in this suit, and voluntarily undertook to bear all expenses that might be incurred in respect thereto, though the caste was willing to contribute, his object being to obtain a judicial declaration of the rights and privileges of the caste in regard to the disposition of their common property. The court has not thought proper to allow costs to the defendant, but the latter will not consider that of much consequence, seeing that he has obtained an authoritative decision as to the rights of the caste in regard to their property. The moral effect of the decision of the High Court will extend far beyond the limits of the Kapol Bania caste, whose pots and pans furnished the required cause of action.

A VIEW ON THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

MINNESOTA.—CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DISCOVERY OF THE FALLS OF ST. ANTHONY, MINNEAPOLIS, JULY 3D.

Digitized by Google

A DIFFICULT CASE.

JUDGE WARBURTON felt young, sentimental and romantic. The night was to blame for it, perhaps; the soft Spring air, with the faint odor of violets or a breath of the first wild roses, whose delicate blushes he could see among the thickest of the green at the wayside. The cool, soft plash of a stream near by added to the charm, and now and then a glitter of water shone between tall trees. But more than balmy airs and languorous perfumes were the delicious sensations that filled the judge's heart and thrilled his senses. There is nothing like a real absorbing, entrancing love to regenerate a man, and the judge was unmistakably in love.

Not that he was a fossil by any means. A handsome, well-preserved man of forty, who had earned his laurels young, had surely a good chance in the field even with younger suitors, and yet he had felt a strange timidity in showing his feelings—that sense of unworthiness that comes with all true love had come to him. We idealize the objects of our adoration, and then we abase ourselves and worship. If we did not worship so abjectly how often would we discover sooner that our idols are clay!

Somehow the judge's walks had lately led in one direction. The stream was running the same way, and, perhaps, he was following that—it is so easy to go with the tide, they say. But this road led past an old peach-orchard that was all covered now with drifts of rosy snow, and was really a charming sight. It might be the judge enjoyed watching the soft flakes of this Summer-snow drifting over the long grass. He used to stop often, and seem lost in thought as he gazed at it.

As he did so this night, a low laugh smote upon his ear. Unconsciously he stepped behind a great tree and stood still. He knew that laugh, for of course the peach-orchard belonged to a house, and the house belonged to a woman who owned his jewel—that is, she was the girl's godmother. It was very late—at least, eleven o'clock—and the laughter struck his heart with a dull pain. What was Gwen doing in the orchard so late? Miss Tabitha Dormer was as precise and methodical as a spinster of a certain age is wont to be. One hour ago she had tied her night-cap under her withered chin and said good-night to Gwen. The prim old dame was over-rigid with the young girl, having certain old-fashioned views of natural depravity quite out of vogue now. Yes, the judge knew the habits of the family perfectly, for he had been Miss Tabitha's legal adviser for years. He knew that Gwen had kissed her godmother good-night and gone up to her room in the most innocent way, and here she was galivanting in the peach-orchard with—yes, absolutely with a young man!

The delicious dreams and hopes that had been nestling in the judge's heart seemed struck dead at a single blow when he heard the low voice of Gwen's companion. He felt suddenly old and cold, then a great heat went over him. He could not hear a word, but he could see a slim, straight, girlish figure in white, with a sort of pale-blue cloud floating about her. Her head was bare, and the moonlight showed the bronze hair blown about by the soft air, and the outline of her girlish face with its soft outlines. Then the two parted and a hurried step came crashing by.

The young man was not long in passing, but the judge saw his face distinctly—a good-looking face, to be sure—even a rival must admit that—without much beyond regular features, and well-opened blue eyes, and blonde mustache, and short-cropped hair with a dash of red gold in it. There was little purpose or energy in the face, a good deal of jollity and self-pleasing and youthful folly, perhaps, if not anything worse.

"Ah, Rob Stirling!" said the judge, "if Miss Tabitha could see this, her dreams would not be so placid. Poor Gwen! can it be she is going to throw away her chances for happiness on this shallow, good-looking scapegrace."

The young man had no suspicion of the jealous eyes that watched him, and he whistled a strain from an opera as he disappeared under the trees.

As for the judge, something had gone out of the night, some subtle incense or influence. The stream dashed on as bravely as before, as soft an air touched the blushing cheeks of the wild roses, or sent showers of pale pink peach-blossoms over the green grass, as faint entrancing odors stole from dim nooks, purple with violets; but to the judge all had "Suffered a sea change,

Into something new and strange."

He had walked home as one carrying a heavy burden, the burden of disappointed hopes. His heart was heavy as lead in his bosom.

"Miss Tabitha will never consent," he thought, gloomily; "the fellow has nothing but expectations from that old aunt who makes a new will every three months, and will probably leave her money to found an asylum for cats. There were ten caterwauling on the fence as I passed the other night. Poor Gwen, I am sure I could make her happy." And with these thoughts worrying his brain like tiger-cats, the judge passed a very restless night.

He woke to hear the early sparrows—those detestable birds who are always after the early worm, and whose notes resemble the whetting of a knife on a stone, and set one's teeth on edge. They were all astir in the dim light, and talking noisily of the promise of the worm-crop for the season.

He lay for a moment half-bewildered at the vociferation and seeming profanity of the creatures, when a human voice broke in, which he recognized as the milkman's.

"Be the howly poker, it's not joking I am, Mary Mahoney. She's kilt an' murdered!"

"Och hone!"—it was the cook's voice that wailed out this—"and sure it's like 'The Green-eyed Monster; or, The Secrit Murder,' that I was a-readin' Biddy last night. Och! ye make me blood run cowld intirely. Did ye git a sight av her, Misther O'Dowd?"

"Faith an' I didn't, wid the crowner to the fore, but I was after spakin' wid the dacint woman who does the wurruk—they only kape an up-stairs gurrul besides. Sure Miss Stirling give them both the lave to go to a weddin' last night, and said she wouldn't be afeared, as Misther Rob would be home. But when they got back at eleven o'clock, they see the light a burnin' yet in the library, and so they looked in the door, and sure there was the poor owld crature a-lyin' cowld and stark, an' finger-marks like a black necklace on her poor owld wizent throat; but who the villain was that did it no one can guess."

"And where was Mr. Rob, at all at all?"

"Oh, he come walkin' in quite surprised, while they were a moanin' and cryin', and they do say he tuk it cool, and some thinks he——"

The rest of the words were said in a very low growl, and the judge felt as if he had had a sudden shower-bath.

Did suspicion really point to the young man? It was known that the two had frequent squabbles, and Miss Sterling was always threatening to cut him off for some other object. Could it be possible that, knowing the last will was in his favor, sick with impatience and longing to be able to make the beautiful Gwen his own, he had taken matters in his own hands and—— But suddenly the scene of the last evening came back to the judge's mind. At the time the poor old lady was in the death-grip of some villain, Rob was sweetly billing and cooing under the peach-trees five miles away. The judge set his teeth as he thought of it, and began dressing himself rapidly.

"He is the only person who had any real interest in her death," he said, musingly. "Suspicion will point to him, and then Gwen—it will make it possible. If I had not walked that way! If I had not met him! Good God! how my mind is traveling; and the poor fellow scarcely suspected yet!"

The judge was too restless to go to his law papers after he had swallowed his hasty breakfast. "I cannot be hard-hearted enough to sit quietly down to work while a neighbor has been killed in cold blood. I must see whether the man's story was correct."

But in his heart the judge longed to hear more about the case in its relation to the young man, and he rode over to the pleasant country house where Miss Stirling had presided, in somewhat feverish haste. It was wonderful how hot the blood still was that leaped through his veins although the chill of forty Winters had fallen upon it.

The house stood back from the road and hidden from it by an avenue of trees, but before the building was in view the judge saw the marks and tokens of an unusual stir and tumult about the grounds. A flower-bed had been trampled carelessly, roses had been plucked as if by children's hands and thrown over the path, a rabble of curious visitors had apparently already been there. A young man stood now alone at the open door. He had evidently ordered away intruders, and was looking about at his aunt's pet flowers with a somewhat melancholy glance. He did not appear so happy and debonair as when the judge had seen him last, but there was no look of guilt on the somewhat haggard young face.

He nodded in a friendly way as the judge approached, saying: "The bad news has reached you, I suppose?"

"Yes; somewhat indefinitely, but I see by your face it is true!"

"Too true! Poor Aunt Janet! It is too horrible," and there was a genuine ring of horror in the young man voice.

"Was the object plunder, do you think?"

"It does not seem so, for the silver is not touched nor my aunt's jewelry; the fellow may have taken money. Of course, I can't say how much of that may have been in the house."

"You were out, I suppose?"

"Yes," there was a slight embarrassment, "I was—over in your neighborhood."

"I suppose you would have no difficulty in proving that?" asked the judge, with sudden curiosity.

Rob Stirling hesitated and his eye did not meet that of his questioner.

"I don't know as that is any one's concern but mine," he answered.

"No, I suppose not, but in affairs of this sort one must be prepared for everything."

"Would you—would you care to look at the poor old lady?" asked the young man, with some hesitation.

"I would, indeed; poor Miss Stirling! I had a great respect for her. How very mysterious it seems that one who led so quiet a life should have so shocking and violent a death!"

The young man led the way to the door of a small sitting-room.

"Excuse me from going in," he said. "I have had so much of it, I am quite knocked up."

The judge looked at him curiously, but could read nothing in that boyish face save that its natural jollity was clouded over. He turned the knob softly, as one does everything in the house of death, and went in.

A stout lady was in waiting, whom he recognized as one who did the last offices for the dead in that neighborhood. There was one other occupant of course—one who lay upon a couch and made no sign, not so much as the trembling of an eyelid to greet him. Her face looked strangely calm for one whose last moment must have been a ghastly struggle of horror and amaze. Prim, straight and stiff, Miss Stirling had always been—she was scarcely primer, straighter or stiffer at this moment. There was, indeed, something like peace in her face spite of the ghastly marks at her throat that surprised the judge.

"I think, sir, as she died of fright before the willin had time to choke her," said the stout lady, bustling forward; "which she hasn't none of the signs of stranglin', poor dear! Her heart just busted moe'n likely at the fust sight of the wretch—she'd been a havin' palpitations lately, as I do myself, sir; and thought I would have died only last week when a white cat walked in in the dead o' night, which I thought was Gallus's ghost, as was a man made to torment folks, and would do it if allowed after death; and don't she look quite nateral, poor lamb?"

The judge bowed and hurried away from the garrulous female, feeling much more comfortable when he got out into the air again. Rob was pacing the garden-walk gloomily.

"You have offered a reward, I presume?" said the judge.

Rob started.

"Why, no. I never thought of that."

"That will be the right thing to do at once," answered the other. "If I can serve you in any way, call on me."

"Thanks! A fellow is all adrift at such a time."

The judge shook hands with the young man and rode away. His feelings were hard to define. He thought he would not decide just then upon any course of action, but stand aside and let events march on.

He rode that way a couple of days afterwards to the funeral of the murdered lady. There was a crowd, of course; the multitude who are always curious about crime. Standing among them after the clods had fallen with that dread sound upon the coffin-lid—that knell that goes to every heart—the judge heard various whispers and nods and cautious hints. He saw that the tide was setting against Rob Sterling. The servants had left him in the house when they went out. He had a night-key, of course, and went and came at will; but Miss Sterling was timid about burglars, and kept all doors locked when alone. How did any suspicious character get in, then? The young man knew that he might lose all by his aunt's whim on any day. He was hasty, and she was—some one whispered it very low out of respect to the dead—"a cantankerous old cat!" So, so; we would see when the will was read, and so on.

The ball was rolling, and the judge did not speak. It was none of his business, he said, and at the same time some words of Holy Writ echoed unpleasantly through his mind: "Am I my brother's keeper?" He heard in the course of a day or two that Miss Sterling had left a will—supposed to be her last; she was always making wills—and Rob was to have everything. The next was the news of his arrest.

This last came to him as follows: He was musing somewhat sombrely over his after-dinner smoke in his garden, when the rustle of a woman's dress, that soft, peculiar swish of a silk garment, came to him, and it seemed as if

"Suddenly the air grew denser, Perfumed by an unseen censer."

Of course there was but one woman who could change earth and air for him, and so it scarcely seemed a surprise to see Gwendoline Dormer standing before him, with a pale face that her dark, violet silk dress made paler, a shawl carelessly wrapped about her, her broad Rembrandt hat very one-sided, and her bare hands clasped quite pitifully together.

"Oh, Judge Warburton!" she cried, "have you heard the charge against poor Rob?—so absurd, so cruel! Rob wouldn't hurt a fly—and they have known him from a boy. You must help him! You will, for my sake, won't you?"

She had laid one slender white hand on his, little knowing how his pulse leaped under that cool touch. Her face had flushed with her appeal, and her sweet eyes looked up to him with an imploring glance that maddened him.

"I—I scarcely understand yet. You said Rob was arrested. Some one, I suppose, who is Rob to you—but to the rest of the world——"

"Oh, you must know; Rob Sterling. They accuse him of murdering his aunt because the poor old lady left her money to him. To whom else could she leave it? And, besides, I know—I know he did not do it!"

"Ah, and how do you know?" asked the judge, with a dull heart-throb. He did not feel like sparing her just then. It was, indeed, something of a relief to his tortured heart to torture hers.

Gwen blushed beautifully. The judge felt that he would have given a year of his life to be the happy man who brought that lovely rosy tide to her face.

"I know it—because—remember, judge, I am making you my father confessor." The judge winced. How old he must seem to her, but he did not speak. "And the secrets of the confessional are never revealed. It was impossible for Rob to have killed his aunt, even if he had been hardened villain enough to have done the deed, for he spent the hour between ten and eleven with me."

"Ah!" a quick, short exclamation, that sounded like surprise, but was only pain.

"Yes; I do not usually meet young gentlemen at that hour in the peach-orchard," she went on, with evident embarrassment, "but in this case it was—I might as well tell you that Miss Tab has taken a violent dislike to Rob, and if she knew of this meeting she would turn me out of the house."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the judge, with some bitterness. "It seems you were ready to risk considerable for the young man."

"Of course. I could not imagine that my sin would find me out in this way," she answered, with a forced laugh, "and you see how cruelly I am situated. My word would clear Rob and I am afraid to do it. He, poor fellow, has made me swear I will not, for he knows Miss Tab's venom, and that I should be cast out at once. You see, the doctor who examined the body at half-past eleven, gave it as his opinion that the poor woman had been dead about an hour, the very time that Rob was talking to me peacefully under the peach-trees."

"Well, my dear Miss Gwen, if you cannot or will not give in this very conclusive testimony, and Mr. Stirling maintains the same silence, I don't see that I can do anything."

"Oh, yes, you can. Because, now that you know positively of Rob's innocence, you can conduct the case so as to favor him as much as possible, and, at any rate, there cannot be much in the way of evidence against him. He is quite confident there will be no case made out. There was a tramp stopped at the house that day."

"Oh, my dear young lady, tramps stop at our houses every day."

Gwen looked very anxious. "Rob is confident, but I cannot help being terribly alarmed. But I feel better now that I have told you all. You are such an old friend."

The judge imagined an emphasis on the old.

"I will certainly do what I can for your sake," he said, and, musing on these words afterwards, he felt that if his course were not straightforward and honest he would perjure himself horribly.

All his life honor had been his watchword. He was a man who was very hard on a criminal. The people said he did not believe in the power of temptation because he had always been delivered from it. To his mind there was no excuse for crime, no palliation whatever. He had believed that he would lose his right arm rather than tell a lie. And now here before him, directly in his path, was a fiery temptation. He felt its lurid breath upon his cheek; it poisoned all the sweet, clear atmosphere of his life. If he won Gwen by means of such dishonor would life ever be sweet and pure and of good report again. And yet when he thought of her he understood how men rush madly into sin. He knew, for the first time, the deadly power of temptation. He felt that he was mortal like other men—that it was possible for him to fall like other men, or, rather, like Lucifer, son of the morning, from those mountain-heights of truth sublime in which he had dwelt.

And the evil one, who is so near us every moment, whispered:

"You need not speak; you will not tell a lie. You need only keep silence."

But the judge said, angrily:

"But I shall live a lie; and my brother's blood will cry out against me from the ground, as did the blood of martyred Abel!"

All that night the contest went on, and Herman Warburton fathomed depths of being in the darkness at which he had never guessed before. He fought the battle against self and sin, and the pure gold of his nature came out brighter from the furnace fire of that secret struggle.

Rob Stirling looked ten years older when he appeared in court to answer to the terrible charge made against him. There was an earnest manliness in the face that had only expressed boyish frivolity before. He made his statement in a clear, manly way, that gained him friends at once. He never hesitated till questioned concerning his whereabouts at the time of the murder.

"You say you were absent at the time the deed was done?" asked the lawyer, who was cross-examining the prisoner; "you will then be able to prove an alibi?"

"No, I cannot," answered Rob, hastily.

"You were then alone all that time?"

"I decline to answer."

"You must be aware that this course criminates you?"

"So be it," answered Rob, energetically. Gwen started and quivered from head to foot. She longed to rush forward and tell the whole story.

Miss Tabitha gave a sniff of disapproval. "He was after no good, you see. I always told you, Gwen, he was a no'er-do-well. A young man who cannot account properly for every minute of his time isn't fit for Christian society."

The judge glanced involuntarily at Gwen during this examination, and saw the pallor settling upon her face. When the witnesses for the defense were called she brightened again visibly. The judge wrote a few lines on a paper and handed it to the counsel for the prisoner.

That gentleman arose with a triumphant face. "I will open the defense," he said, by reading the following communication that has just been handed me:

"I wish to state now, and have only waited to this time to give proper effect to my words, that on the evening of the murder, I met Mr. Robert Stirling about five minutes after eleven o'clock, in the vicinity of Miss Tabitha Dorman's peach-orchard. The gentleman was absorbed in his own thoughts, and I was somewhat hidden from him in the shadow, but I trust this will prove a complete alibi, by showing that at the time the deed was committed he was five miles away from the spot. HERMAN WARBURTON."

A loud cheer greeted the news. Every one had been sure, of course, that Rob was innocent all the time. The most venomous turned to their neighbors and said, "I told you so." Friends crowded around the prisoner to congratulate him.

Digitized by Google

Coming out the judge felt his hand seized in a very soft, warm little clasp.

"You knew all the time!" whispered Gwen.

"Yes; may you both be happy!" answered the judge, with a weary smile. "You will never know what those few lines cost me."

Gwen flushed.

"I—I think you are making a mistake," she said. "I suppose you must have seen us that night and thought we were lovers?"

"Well, that would be natural," said the judge, with a forced smile. "You are both in life's golden prime!"

"Oh, he is only a boy!" said Gwen, grandly. "I used to like him. We played at being sweethearts when we were babies, and he had a lot of foolish letters and my picture that I wanted to get back. Miss Tab watches me like a hawk, and I could never get a chance for a word. So I wrote him a line fixing that time for him to bring all my belongings to me. He is a little sentimental yet, but he will get over it."

"Do you think it so easy for a man to get over loving you?" asked the judge, with an eloquent glance.

Then Gwen blushed again and her eyes dropped.

"But he is a boy!" she murmured, and she turned and disappeared.

"He is a boy, and it takes a man to win her!" murmured the judge, his heart throbbing with a delicious hope once more. The burden was lifted, the trial was over, and the way lay open before him to love and happiness.

Years after he had won his bride, a tramp died of a stab received in a drunken brawl. At the last moment he confessed having entered Miss Sterling's house for purposes of plunder. The old lady discovered him, gave one scream, and he sprang at her throat—with no idea of murdering her. The fright had killed her, however, for she dropped dead, he said, as if struck by lightning. And so ended what Judge Warburton called his most difficult case.

GENERAL HANCOCK AT HOME.

I WAS not alone on board of the Government steam-launch that plies between New York and Governor's Island on Friday morning last. Not a bit of it. The trim-built wherry conveyed about a dozen Cæsars and their fortunes, men who were able to take time by the forelock, and to offer worship to the rising sun in the burly person of General Hancock. The restless glance, the impatient movement, the numberless references to carefully folded papers, the brand-new garments, bespoke the office-seekers. They were already on the warpath. We had a fair sprinkling of the military element, too—a couple of stiff-backed veterans, with grizzly mustaches, neat as new pins, and two or three youngsters revelling in mufti, so soon to be exchanged for the grilling uniform. The island, as everybody does not know, lies right in the entrance to the East River, and is a mile in circumference. It contains Castle William, a fortress which would crumble to dust under the fire of the "infants" of the present day, Fort Columbus and South Battery, the latter commanding the entrance to Buttermilk Channel, at the other side of which lies Brooklyn.

A couple of sentries grimly gazed at us from beneath their white helmets as we sprang to land, and, devoted pilgrims that we were, strode forward in the blaze of a blistering sunlight to the Mecca whither we were all bound.

Governor's Island boasts of very green grass, broken by walks in red brick, and a fair sprinkling of shade-giving trees. The forts, departmental buildings and staff-quarters serve as a sort of irregular bordering. On the occasion of my visit, a croquet party lazily performed the sluggish evolutions of that Sleepy Hollow game, while at a little distance a bevy of fair ladies, attended by a single cavalier bearing a blood-red plume in his helmet, practiced the acrobatic intricacies of the five-step waltz. A detachment of "the regular army O" suddenly debouched from a sallyport of the fort, and the glitter of their arms as they marched through the trees was singularly effective. From the island can be seen any vessel that passes to or from the port of New York, and woe to the war craft of a hostile nation that might venture within range of the bite of the guns now so listlessly yawning in the sun. I sought General Hancock at headquarters, and found him in his private bureau engaged in conferring with the adjutant general and one of his aides-de-camp.

He is tall and of herculean mold, and although fleshy is by no means heavy-looking. His florid face is oval, the expressive forehead swept by a wave of yellow hair slightly tinged with white and worn full behind the shapely head. His eyes are soft and expressive, and when interested become aroused, sharp as those of a falcon's. His nose is delicately chiseled, and his mouth concealed beneath a tufted tawny mustache. You perceive that he is a man firm even to sternness, in moral uprightness in all matters of duty. A phrenologist would say that he was possessed of the power to combine means, to plan, arrange and organize; that if brought up to business he would have been keen as the keenest and upright to the last degree—a man whose word would be his bond. He was attired in a blue flannel suit, and wore a turn-down collar and a black tie of the pattern known as the butterfly. Of jewelry there was none.

The official sanctum is a well-lighted, airy apartment in the back, on the second floor, of the building, which was once the hospital, now used as headquarters. The house is two-storied, with basement. It is of brick, painted yellow, while the blinds are of vivid green. The approach is by a flight of granite steps. The lower floor is occupied by the offices of the adjutant-general, while the upper is devoted to those of the general commanding in chief, his aides-de camp and the judge-advocate general.

General Hancock's office is carpeted in Brussels of a gay and lively pattern. It contains one table-desk, which was literally piled with letters, and as for newspapers yet in the fold, they kept tumbling over one another at intervals like acrobats in a circus. At either hand of the chief stood two boxes, labeled A. D. C. and A. G. O. respectively, while dispatch-bags and other impedimenta block the entire table, just leaving the General a small open square wherein to manœuvre his pen and ink. The furniture is of walnut, plain and unpretentious. On the walls are a colossal plan of the Battle of Gettysburg, of which the famous soldier who is now engaged in perusing a paper just handed him by the nattiest of adjutant-generals could tell us the bloody story; a map of the Mackinaw Reservation and a plate of the badges of army corps of the Army of the Potomac.

The General, having, in a few quick words, disposed of the immediate business in hand, rose and led the way to his private dwelling, which is so situated that, from the piazza at the rear, one obtains an admirable view of New York from the Post Office to the East River, of the busy river itself, of the Brooklyn Suspension Bridge, and of the City of Churches. The house is of an old-fashioned pattern, and is covered with creeping plants, while in front, on the lawn, some rare flowers hang in festoons from caldrons, painted crimson. The stereotyped rockers and cane-bottomed chairs occupy the stoop. The hall is spacious, and on the right, in a superb frame, hangs the illuminated address to General Hancock presented to him by the Common Council of the Quaker City. The drawing-rooms are quietly but richly furnished, and contain portraits in oil of Mrs. Hancock, of the General's father, his son, his daughter, deceased, and of himself in uniform.

"I must be getting old," he laughed, "for this morning a gray-haired orderly-sergeant reminded me that he served in my company with me at the battle of Molino del Rey and the capture of Mexico. I was in command, for my senior was disabled early in the fight."

The General is very proud of his grandchildren, two chubby little darlings of three and five years, and it is not difficult to perceive that his home is a thoroughly happy one. His library is a snug little apartment in the rear, giving upon the piazza, and entered through a semi-official working room. He is a hard worker, and, as one of his aides said to me, with the suspicion of a sigh, "Always on deck." The office-seekers now descended upon him, and I left him to deal with them as he listed.

THE BURNING OF THE STEAMER "SEAWANHAKA."

THE record of the marine disasters for the past two months is an unusually sad one. The horrors of the collision between the Stonington and the Narragansett, in the Sound, never to be forgotten, were followed by an intense excitement, though fortunate escape without loss of life, caused by a collision between the ocean steamships the Queen and Anchoria. Then came the running down of a row boat by the Elbe Hoacuz, and the loss of two lives; next, the running down of the Adelaide by the Grand Republic, and shortly after the burning of the City of New York, and the threatened destruction of the Charleston steamship George W. Clyde by fire at her New York dock. As people began to talk of the epidemic of marine disasters word was received of the destruction of the Seawanhaka by fire in Hell Gate, and of the collision between the steamer Long Branch, bearing a Brooklyn Sunday-school on its annual excursion, and a barge in the wake of a towboat.

The most painful of these disasters were the burning of the Narragansett and the Seawanhaka. The former has been illustrated in this paper, and this week we devote a double-page to the destruction of the latter.

The Seawanhaka was one of the fastest and handsomest steamboats plying our harbor. Her course was between this city and the villages and Summer resorts on the north shore of Long Island. She left her dock at New York at 4:30 on Monday afternoon with some 250 passengers.

The boat was running at the usual speed. Captain Smith was in the pilot-house with his nephew, Stephen Vernon, who was assisting at the wheel while running through Hell Gate. Everything on board was going along as usual, when, at 4:50, the captain heard a heavy thud and shock, which shook the vessel from stem to stern. The report was a dull one, but it was heavy enough to make him fear its result. The boat was then just off Nigger Point.

In an instant a huge volume of fire enveloped the forward part of the boat. Captain Smith realized the danger at once, but was unable to turn either to the right or left for several minutes on account of the steamer Grenada State, which was running outside of her, and several schooners which were between her and the shore. Jets of flame darted up the chain-holes, cutting off communication with the engineer, and burning the helmsman's hands so that he was compelled to make quick snatches at the spokes of the wheel, being forced to drop them instantly again. With consummate bravery he held the burning vessel on her course between the obstructing vessels, while his hands and face slowly blistered, and, when he had succeeded in passing them, turned her nose sharply about and headed her direct for the Sunken Meadow that lies between Ward's and Randall's Islands. The spot was admirably chosen. On both islands were large hospitals, whose medical staffs could be counted on in an emergency like the present one; the distance from shore was not great, and there were ample means of succor in every direction. Taking into consideration the fact that the wind was blowing across the water, Captain Smith so steered his boat that when she struck she would lie broadside to the breeze. This was for the purpose of keeping the fire as much as possible on one side of the boat and giving those on board a better opportunity to save themselves. Had it been allowed to sweep from stem to stern, the disaster would undoubtedly have been much greater. The Seawanhaka ran with such force upon the meadow that forty feet of her lay high and dry before she stopped, and she was less than 100 feet from the main shore.

As soon as the boat reached the shore of the Sunken Meadow, the persons on the bow jumped into the marsh and most of them waded to dry land. A few who escaped alive from the steamboat, within a few feet of the land, were trampled down to perish in the weeds at the water's edge. No choice was left to the passengers in the stern of the boat except to jump into the water or be burned alive. Hundreds of persons were seen struggling in the water. Those who were able to swim made their way to the shore and many others were rescued by boats. Assistance was given to the helpless as soon as possible. The burning steamer had been sighted by the inmates of the Insane Asylum, the Homœopathic Hospital and the Emigration Hospital on Ward's Island, and by persons on Randall's Island. Boats from the two islands were dispatched quickly. Several rowboats were near the meadow when the Seawanhaka was run ashore, and one or two Sound steamers stopped to lend assistance. The rescuers worked with a will, and boatloads of men, women and children were soon on their way to the Homœopathic Hospital on Ward's Island and to the House of Refuge on Randall's Island.

Dr. A. E. McDonald, medical superintendent of the Insane Asylum, had been lying ill all day from an attack of cholera morbus, but when news of the disaster reached him he put on his clothes and hastened to the burning boat. He ordered out supplies and apparatus for saving life, and saw all the boats belonging to the Island properly manned for the rescue. He then examined the persons who were picked up from the water, and worked hard to restore consciousness to them. He was assisted in this work by Dr. Williamson, of the Homœopathic Hospital Department, and his staff, and Dr. Seaman, of the Emigration Department. Many of the rescued persons were suffering from exhaustion or severe burns, and they were sent to the Homœopathic Hospital.

Most of the survivors who escaped without injury were taken to Ward's Island, and thence to the city. Others crossed to the city from Randall's Island in small boats. No record or count of the persons saved could be made, and it was impossible to estimate the number of those who perished. It was believed, however, that more than fifty persons were either drowned or burned to death. The steamboat was burned to the water's edge, the flames from the hulk continuing to light up the water for miles around until nearly midnight.

Instances of the greatest heroism were displayed by both sexes. Nothing could exceed the Spartan bravery of Captain Smith, and those accustomed to traveling on the Seawanhaka for years pay the highest tribute to the coolness and proficiency of all the other officers. John Henry Bush, an East River boatman, saved some twenty-two lives from the stern of the burning boat as well as from the water; Patrick Doran, also a boatman, saved twenty, and W. Milliner, Jr., Nicholas Conrad and Patrick Gillon performed gallant service in the work of rescue. Mention should be made of the officers of the Grenada State, Osseo, the Massachusetts, General Newton's Hell Gate tug, and the Refuge, who promptly joined in the work. Too much praise cannot be given to the physicians and nurses attached to the institutions on Ward's and Randall's Islands for their prompt care of the rescued and injured.

The Distance of the Heavens.

THE methods of finding the distances of the stars of stellar parallax is one of the interesting problems of modern astronomy. In the days of old the stars were supposed to hold the same position in regard to each other from age to age, and were therefore called fixed stars, to distinguish them from the planets. Nothing, as the Providence Journal remarks, can be further from the truth. The telescope shows that the stars are in constant motion, but that the rate of motion is so slow that thousands of years must elapse before the eye can perceive any change. Some stars are coming towards us and some are receding from us. The sun, which is only a star, is moving, with all the planets in its train. Our earth, which is but an atom among atoms, is whirling, no one knows whither, through illimitable space. Even the serene heavens above us is this same space pervaded by an infinitely subtle ether, whose particles are seething and surging like the waves of a stormy sea. The motion of the stars once established, it must follow that some of them are nearer to us than others, and very persistent and painstaking have been the efforts to find out which of the shining suns of space are our nearest neighbors.

Success has, however, crowned patient labor. Among the 50,000,000 stars that glimmer in the firmament, there are about a dozen stars visible in our latitude that have a parallax ranging from a tenth to a half-second. It would be natural to suppose that the brightest stars are the nearest, but this is far from being the case. The nearest star in the northern heavens is a double star of the fifth magnitude in the Swan, known as 61 Cygni. The brilliant Sirius is nearly twice as far away. The nearest star in the whole heavens is Alpha Centauri, a bright star near the south pole. This has a parallax of nine-tenths of a second, and is twice as near as any other star. Its distance is computed as more than 200,000 times our distance from the sun, or nearly 20,000,000 of millions of miles. If such be the inconceivable distance separating us from the nearest star, what idea can the finite mind form of the immensity of space intervening between us and the more remote?

Vigorous work is now being done in stellar parallax by what is called Bessell's method. A star with proper motion, or one that has been found to approach or recede from the sun, is selected, and its position is compared night after night, by means of the micrometer, with other small stars in the vicinity having one proper motion, and therefore presumed to be further away. The star with proper motion will change its position in regard to the more remote ones when observed from different parts of the earth's orbit. Some interesting and intricate work of this kind has been successfully completed at Mr. Seagrave's private observatory by Mr. Waldo and Mr. Seagrave. The problem was to determine the parallax of a star called Theta Cassiopeia. This, by measuring its position and distance from two small stars in the vicinity, was found to be less than one-tenth of a second. These enthusiastic astronomers worked upon the problem from the first of September, 1878, to the first of November, 1879. During that time they made measurements of each star on 120 nights. A trained eye, keen perception and mathematical precision, as well as patience and perseverence, were involved in the solution of this delicate and intricate problem. These are the means by which astronomy has won its most brilliant triumphs, and those who would become practical astronomers must give their nights to observation and their days to study.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Berlin Fish Exposition.

The International Fisheries Exposition at Berlin has proved the most successful enterprise of its character ever attempted at that capital. The daily attendance has averaged 5,000, and on some days has reached as high a figure as 15,000. Our engraving represents several features, notably the Grotto of Neptune, with which our readers have already been made familiar.

The Belgian Jubilee.

Work is so far advanced upon the cluster of buildings required for the fêtes and exhibits that are to be prepared for the grand Belgian jubilee, that we are enabled to present views of the art and horticultural pavilions now completed at Brussels. The jubilee, being a celebration of the independence of Belgium, cannot fail to arouse all the patriotic ardor of the people, besides attracting thousands of tourists to the grand city.

The Green-room of the Comedie Francaise.

So much has of late been said about the Comédie Française, of France, in connection with the sudden secession of Mlle. Bernhardt and the imposition of a heavy fine upon her for that action, that a glance at a portrait group of the sociétaires, as the members of the company are known, in the famous Green-room at Paris, will no doubt prove an interesting diversion. The society is quite a close corporation, paying its members large salaries, dividing among them a goodly portion of the receipts and bestowing liberal pensions after a certain length of continuous service. It is, too, controlled by rules, so strict that they are seldom broken, and this fact makes Mlle. Bernhardt's action appear all the more striking amid her other eccentricities.

The Prince Imperial Monument in Zululand.

This memorial cross was sent out by Her Majesty the Queen as a token of her sympathy with the bereaved mother of the late Prince Louis Napoleon. It marks the exact spot upon which he fell when surprised and attacked by a party of Zulus who had been lying in ambush. The cross, which is of plain marble, bearing a simple inscription, is surrounded by a dwarf wall of rough stones, which also incloses the graves of the two troopers who were killed at the same time as the prince. Shrubs and violets (the Napoleonic emblem) are planted about the place, which thus becomes a kind of miniature cemetery. After the erection of the cross the Zulu chief, Gebeodo, and the chief men of his tribe, to which the party who attacked the prince belonged, assembled at the place, and, standing with their right hands uplifted, solemnly declared that the memorial and the graves should never be desecrated, a pledge which is likely to be faithfully observed, as the Zulus entertain a deeply-felt superstition regarding the spirits of the dead.

The Great Garden at Dresden.

One of the most attractive spots that Dresden possesses is the Grosser Garten, a well arranged and carefully preserved breathing place just outside the city proper. In the centre is an artificial lake, a broad and finely ballasted roadway skirts this, while surrounding the garden are a number of buildings more attractive and striking, architecturally, than imposing. Take roadway as the most popular of all the pleasant drives in the city, and is generally well covered Winter and Summer with gayly dressed officers, rich equipages and a cosmopolitan throng of pedestrians.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE strike of 10,000 Staffordshire potters has collapsed.

—THE wheat crop in the interior of Russia has been greatly injured by locusts.

—THE population of Louisville, Ky., is stated to be 126,556, a gain of over twenty-five per cent. in ten years.

—A DISPATCH from Vienna says that all the Powers have consented to the establishment of religious freedom in Morocco.

—OF the eleven iron furnaces in the Hocking and Shawnee region of Ohio, all but two have stopped on account of the high price of mining.

—THE French Chamber of Deputies passed the Amnesty Bill by a vote of 333 to 140, June 21st, after an eloquent speech by Gambetta in its favor.

—THE coinage at the Philadelphia Mint for the fiscal year ending June 30th, amounted to 43,845,070 pieces, of which 15,185,750 were in silver dollars.

—AN order of Prince Bismarck is published, prohibiting the importation of sausages and pork from the United States. The prohibition does not include hams, sides and bacon.

—IT is understood that both the President and the Secretary of War are dissatisfied with the administration of affairs at West Point, and have determined to reorganize the personnel.

—SOME of the residents of La Seur, Minn., believing a spiritual medium's prediction of a tremendous tornado, dug holes in the ground for refuge, and spent the whole of an unusually calm day in them.

—ST. LOUIS had in 1879 fifty-three flourishing kindergartens, with about 4,000 pupils, 130 paid teachers and sixty-five volunteer assistants. The entire cost for the year was a little over $20,000, $5.70 for each pupil.

—INTELLIGENCE has been received from Buenos Ayres that a treaty of peace has been signed. Tejedos has withdrawn as a candidate for the Presidency. The provincial forces have laid down their arms in Buenos Ayres.

—A FINANCIAL article in a San Francisco paper, referring to the newly-enacted law of New York taxing foreign bank capital, says: "We understand that the Nevada Bank balance at New York, from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000, will be ordered to London."

—THE Methodist ministers of Boston have formally requested the city authorities to cease giving free concerts on Sunday in the public parks for the reason that such music is "promotive of Sabbath desecration and injurious to public morals."

—THE Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has decided that solvent shareholders of national banks, which have gone into liquidation, cannot be assessed to make good any deficiency arising from inability to collect from other shareholders on account of their insolvency.

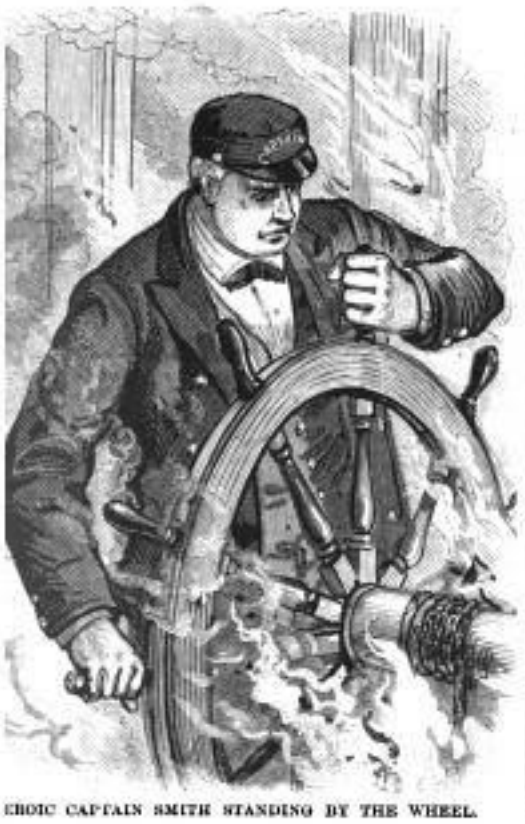
—THE census in California indicates an increase of 250,000 in the aggregate population of the State. The population of San Francisco will be brought far below the estimates of the directories. The number of Chinese in that city has also been greatly overestimated. Some of the interior towns, such as Stockton, have receded in population during the decade.

—THE quarterly return just published shows that the gross revenue of the United Kingdom for the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1880, was $409,810,315, against $416,101,655 last year, and for the last quarter of the present year, $98,095,290, against $94,610,250 for the same period of the previous year. There is thus a net decrease in the year of $6,291,320, and a net increase in the quarter of $3,484,040.

—THE positive denial of the Spanish Government that there was a vessel in its service by the name of Nancis, which was charged with firing on the American schooner Ethel Merritt, and the probability that the same vessel fired on the Boston schooner Eunice P. Newcombe, has caused the State Department to take steps to ascertain whether the Nancis was a privateer or really belonged to the Spanish navy.

—THE receipts of flour, wheat and corn at the seven Atlantic ports—New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, New Orleans, Montreal and Portland—for the week ending June 26th are the largest on record—being of wheat, 4,045,572 bushels; corn, 6,009,620 bushels; flour, 183,893 barrels. The exports from the same ports for the week and during the past eight weeks are also the largest on record, being for eight weeks, 19,678,555 bushels of wheat; 28,240,992 bushels of corn, and 649,933 barrels of flour.

—THE arrivals of immigrants at Castle Garden during the month of June aggregated 42,026, an increase of more than 26,000 over the corresponding month of 1879. For the six months of the present year, the number of immigrants who arrived at this port was 177,362, against 45,919 for the first six months of 1879. The aggregate arrivals thus far this year have been the largest for over twenty-five years past, the nearest approach to those figures being the arrival of 158,187 immigrants in the first six months of 1872.

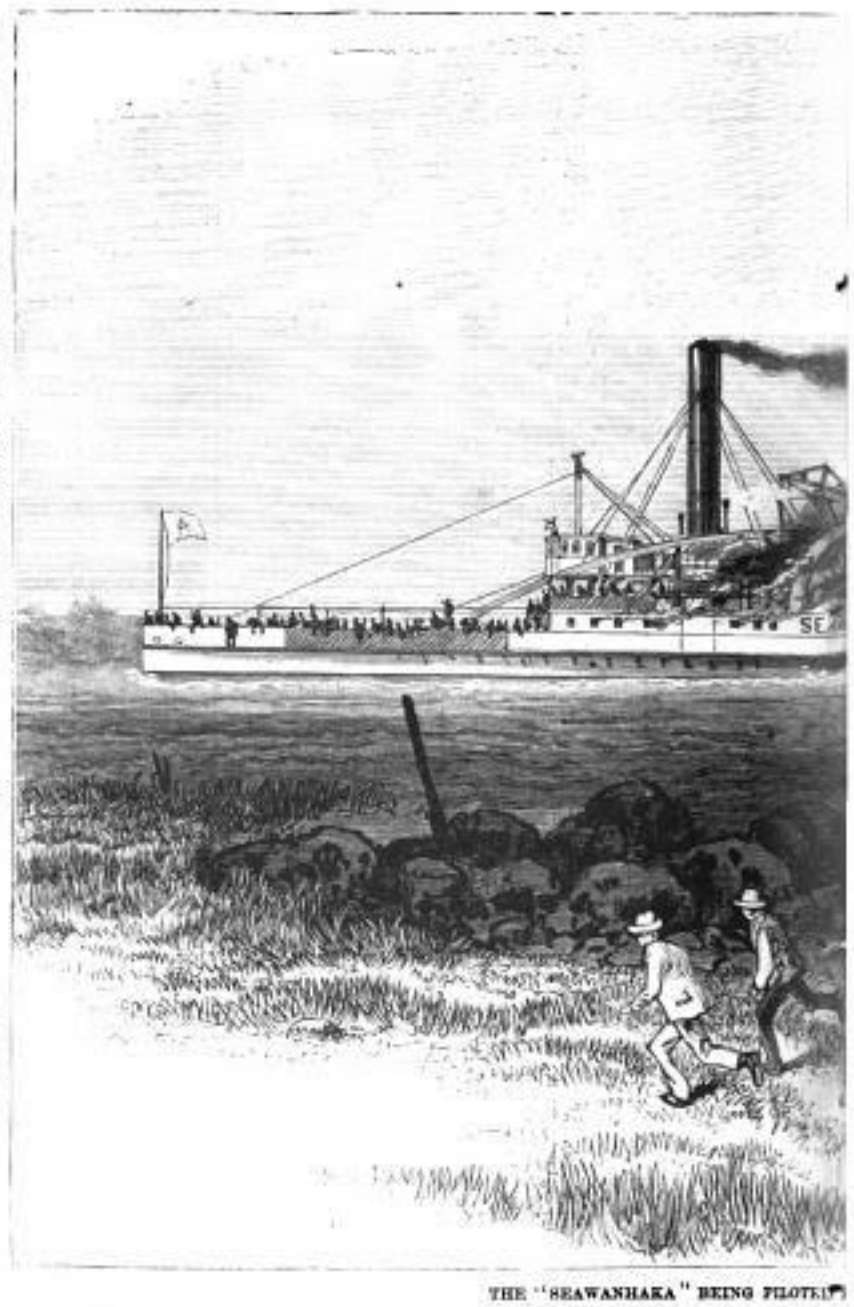


—EVER since the Papal States were made a part of United Italy the ultra-Clerical party has refrained by directions of the Pope from taking any part in elections. This policy is now to be abandoned. Seeing how successful the Clericals were in the recent municipal election in Rome, Pope Leo has decided to advise them to enter the field of general politics. This decision is a practical recognition of the Italian Government by the Vatican. At the same time it makes a fresh complication in Italian politics by introducing a powerful element which has hitherto held itself aloof.

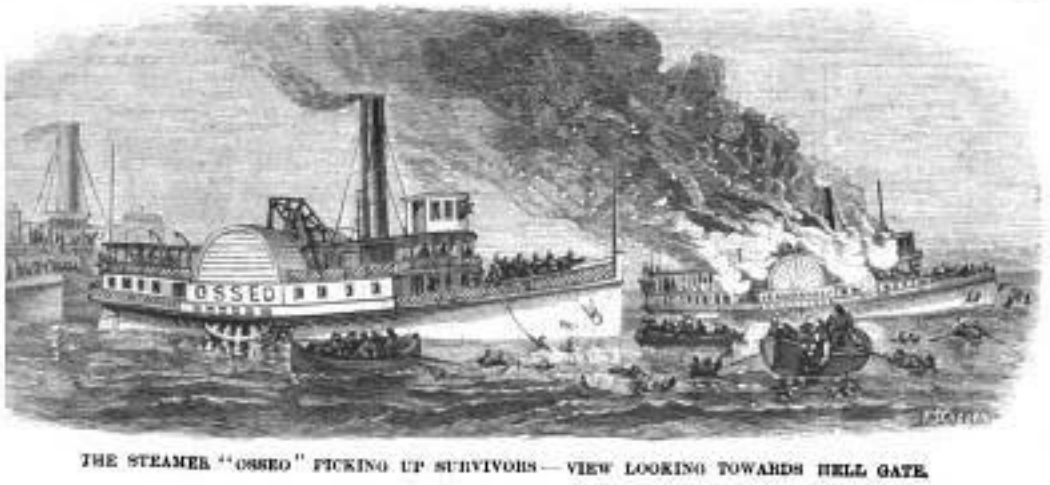
—M. LEPINAY has drawn up his report regarding the canal to connect the Bay of Biscay with the Mediterranean. He proposes that the canal start from Bordeaux, and, after traversing 252 miles, terminate at Narbonne. The number of locks would be sixty-two, and long enough to admit vessels of 439 feet in length. The depth would be twenty-seven feet nine inches, and the breadth at the surface, where the canal is to be of single width, 184 feet, and where it is to be of "double" width, 262 feet. The estimated cost is $110,000,000. By means of this canal ships using steam can go from sea to sea in fifty-four hours.

—A FRENCH paper points out that amnesty is more restricted than is imagined. Six thousand Communists who were transported in 1871 have already returned, and those of them who are free from criminal antecedents have resumed their full political rights. Scarcely 500 remain in New Caledonia, and no amnesty will only restore them to the status they held before the Commune such of them as had previously incurred forfeiture for life of their political rights will still be under disabilities. Scarcely 200 will be able to aspire to seats in the Chambers or local bodies, and only twenty of these are actually notorious, namely: MM. Rochefort, Félix Pyat, Jules Vallès, Blanqui, Trinquet, and others.

Digitized by Google

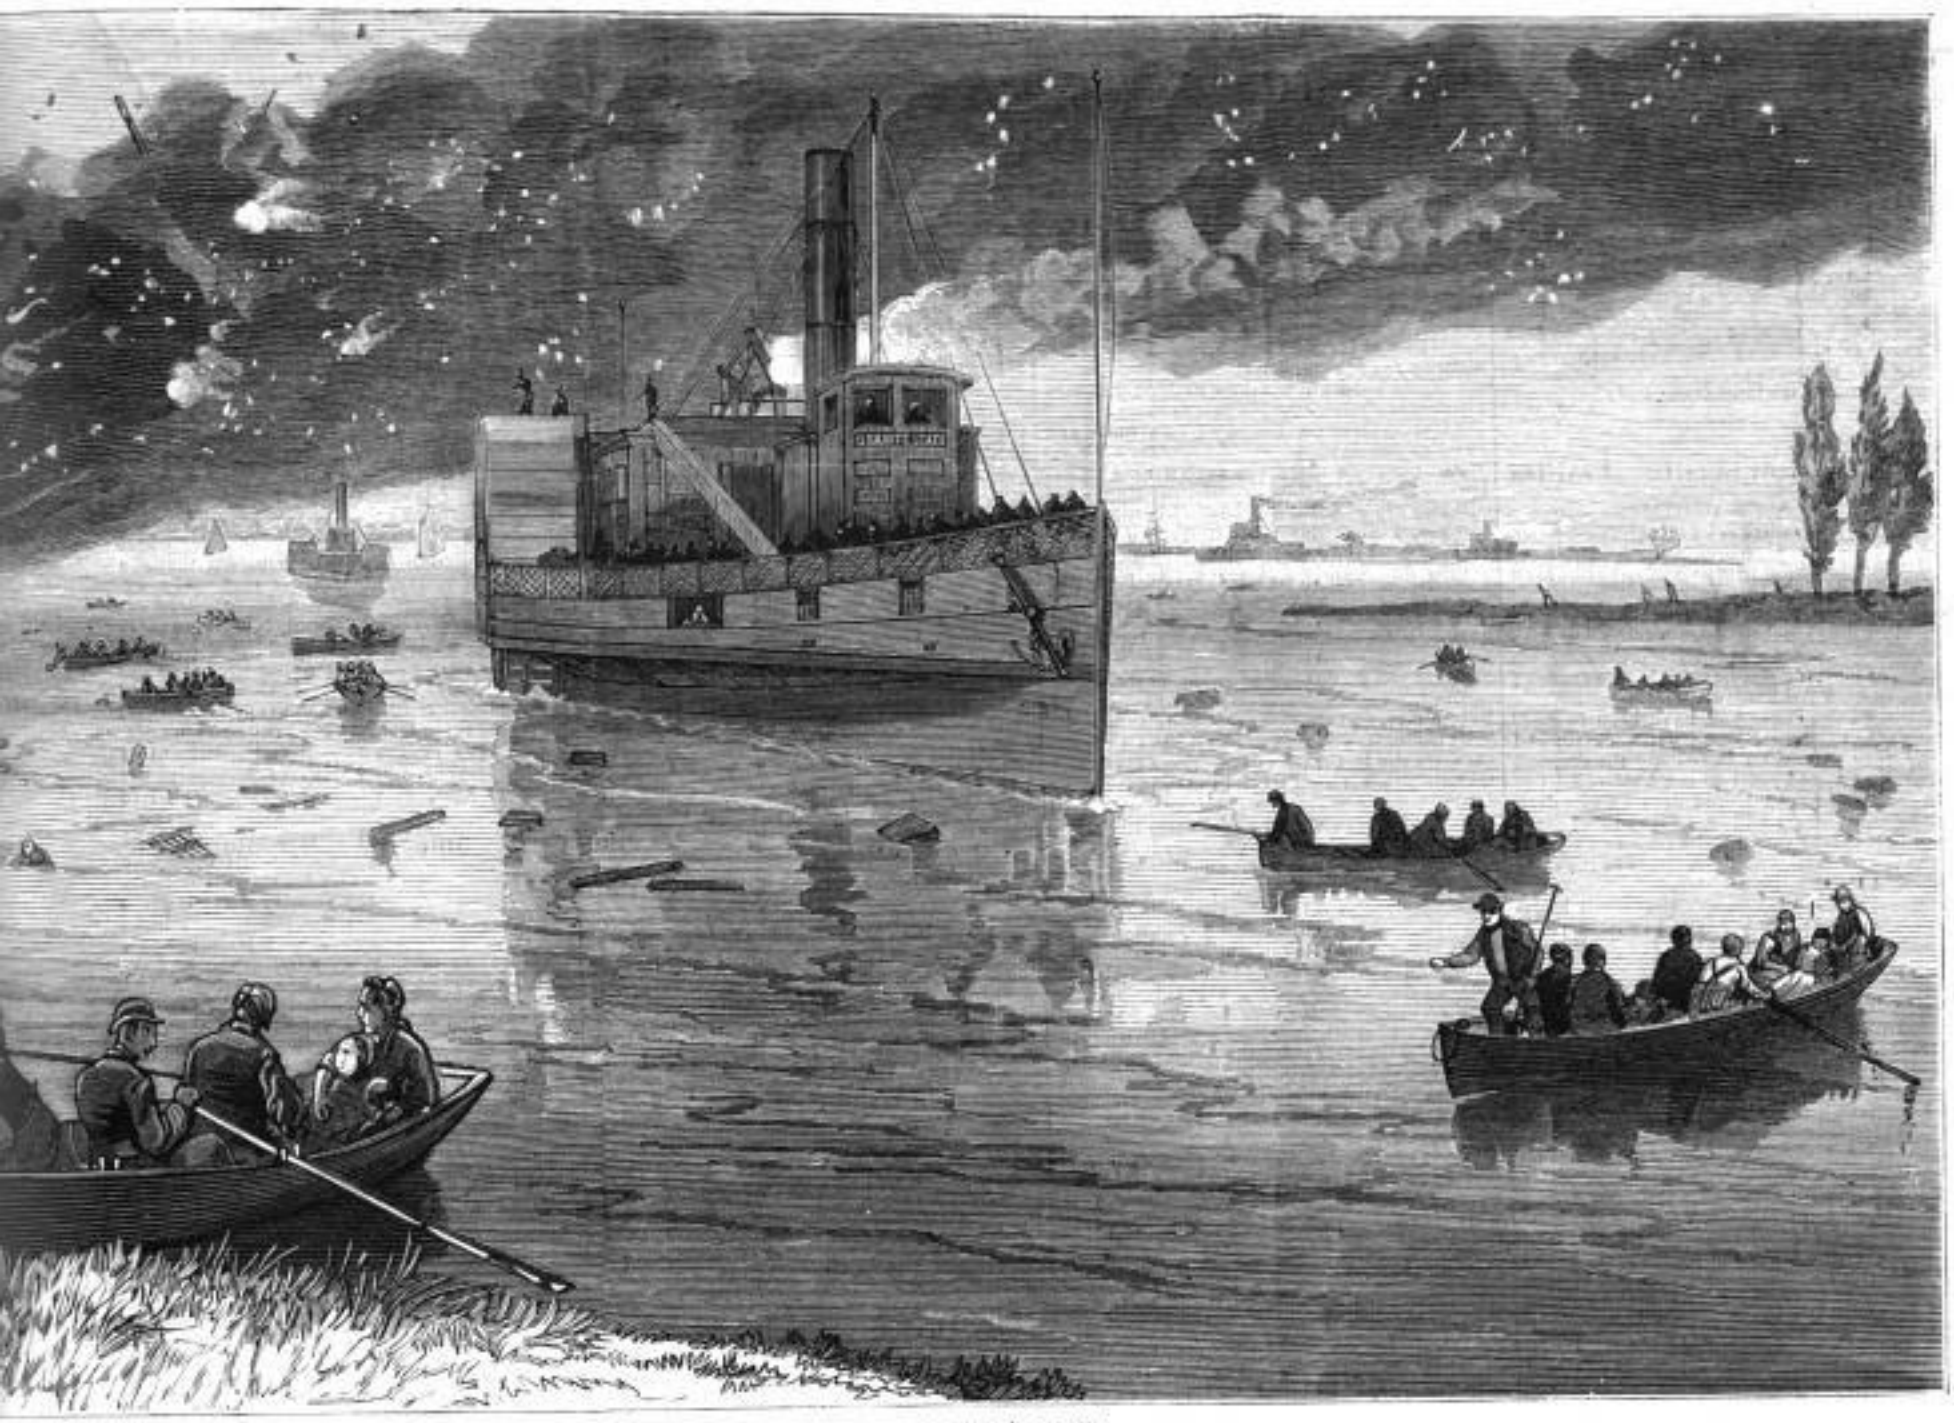


SCENE ON THE SHORE OF RANDALL'S ISLAND, AFTER THE BEACHING OF THE BURNING STEAMER — THE PHYSICIANS

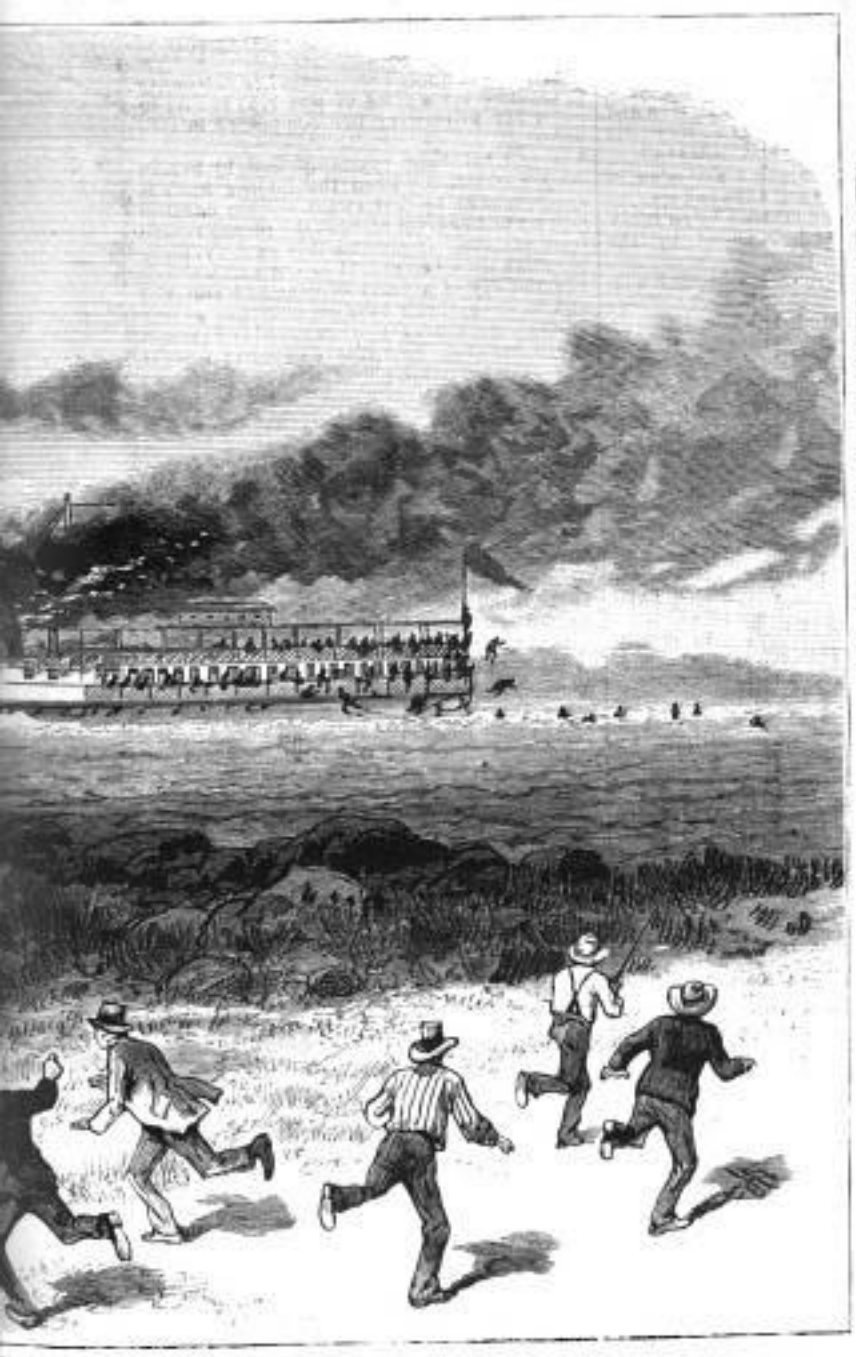


HEROIC CAPTAIN SMITH STANDING BY THE WHEEL.

JOHN W. BUSH TAKING OFF PASSENGERS INTO HIS BOAT.

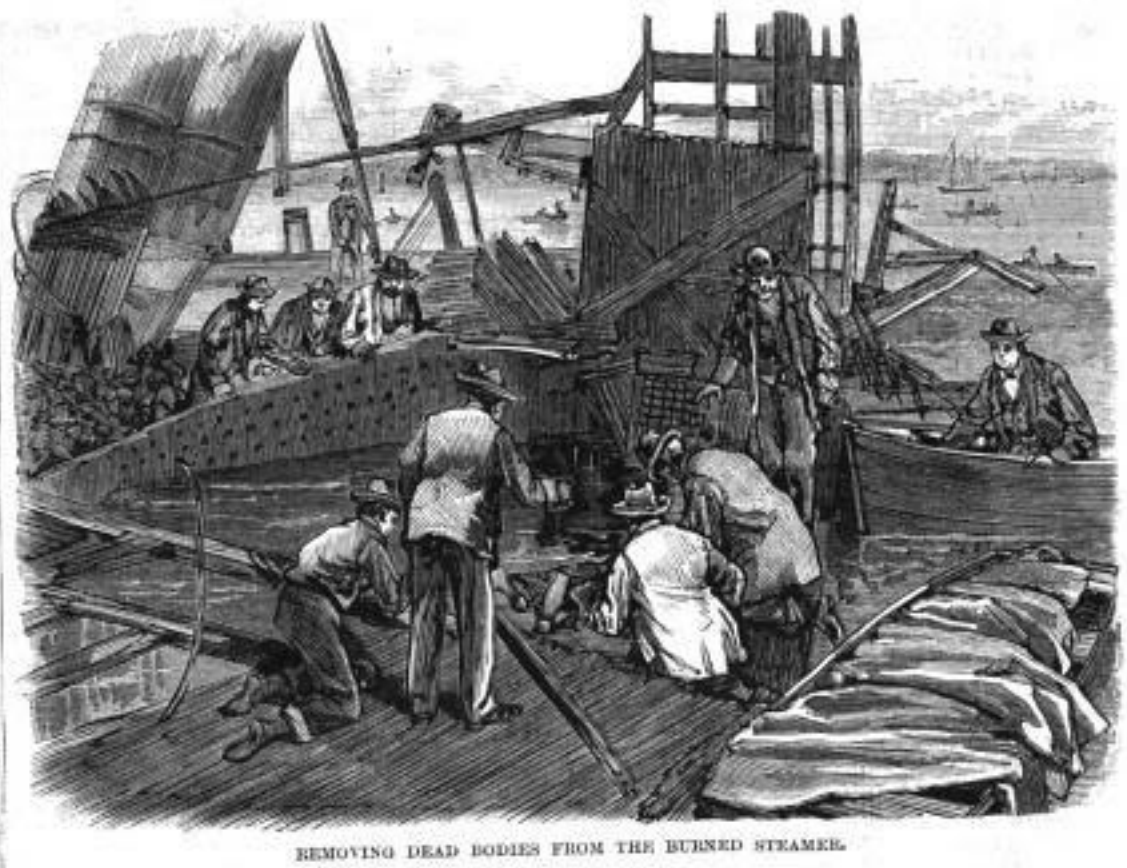


THE "SEAWANHAKA" BEING PILOTED



THE STEAMER "OSSEO" PICKING UP SURVIVORS — VIEW LOOKING TOWARDS HELL GATE.

NEW YORK.—BURNING OF THE STEAMER "SEAWANHAKA," OFF WARD'S ISLAND.



Digitized by Google

BLIC INSTITUTIONS RESCUING THE PASSENGERS AND CARING FOR THE INJURED — VIEW FROM WARD'S ISLAND.

UNKEN MEADOW TO BE REACHED.

REMOVING DEAD BODIES FROM THE BURNED STEAMER.

THE SEARCH AT THE MORGUE FOR MISSING FRIENDS.

THE AFTERNOON OF JUNE 28TH.—FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTISTS.—SEE PAGE 335.

Digitized by Google

WITH THE GIFT OF AN ASH-RECEIVER.

IS little basket, dear, is meant for you;
A very trifle, with its tender hue,
wers know that color true, they say,
cannot have forgotten, sir, to-day.

sentiment go by, and learn its use,
ile effect for a great abuse,
sold the ashes of cremated joys,
en naught is left but ashes of such toys.

ow in the ashes, then, as they appear,
y the baser things leave ashes here;
higher joys mount up like flames of fire,
I make no ashes for a heathen pyre.

row in the ashes of your cigarette, row in, besides, what's left of vain regret,
d may the perfume, incense like, become offering to the lares of our home.

J. W. W.

HE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

By ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.—(CONTINUED).

JOST a moment Valentine stands silent, then that mad eloquence again seizes her. She reaches down and touches the nut-brown nds of hair, the soft-tinted face, the rounded ms, of Jack Ashhurst's wife.

"Oh, what a curse you have been to me!" e says, passionately—"what a curse, and et I love you. You have done the greatest rong to me, and yet I do not hate you. Oh, aven, if the past would drift away—drift ar away from me and leave me alone! It is nly to be alone that I pray for—to be freed rom the memories and phantoms of the dead ast that torture me to death."

Gypsy is a pitiful sight. Her small hands are locked tightly in her lap; her form rocks to and fro, and down over the peach-bloom of her cheeks rolls a flood of tears.

"I thought you had forgotten," she says, sobbing. "It has been so long since last we talked of this, that I had no idea you still treasured it up. Oh, I thought you had forgotten!"

Again Valentine raises her face. It is wild and haggard. Again that dry, hollow laugh breaks from her.

"Forgotten!" she says. "For me there is no forgetfulness, no comfort. I have suffered—I do suffer—the tortures of a prolonged and endless death! Do you think the poor wretch, with his flesh pierced and wounded and torn by the rack, can forget the engine of torture? No more can I lose sight of my misery!"

Faster and heavier splash the tears down Gypsy's drenched face; yet through all her woe she glances resentfully at her companion.

"At least," she says, while her sobs increase and a perfect torrent pours down her cheeks—"at least there is one thing you find it very easy to forget, that I have also suffered."

Valentine looks at her, a perfect madness of pain and torture in her flashing eyes, whose pupils distend, while her dilated nostrils quiver like a wounded brute's.

"Suffer—you suffer!" she mutters, while her lips writhe as in bodily torment. "Oh, my God! In the sight of my blinding, endless torture; in the face of my ruined, shattered life, she dares mention her paltry grievances! It was nothing to you—I shielded you. I suffered and bore for you! I stood between you and the fire. It was nothing at all for you. It rolled away from you like oil from water. But for me—it has clung to me for ever and ever. I was the burnt one—the one ruined, scathed and slaughtered!"

"You are killing me!" moans Gypsy, wringing her hands. "Why must you go and rake up the past. It is lived and gone; let it be. If you intend to behave this way all the time; if you are going to entertain me with recounting those detested things that are gone, why, you had better kill me and have done with it. It would be kinder than to harass and shake my nerves in this manner."

This display of Gypsy's nature, whose weakness Valentine had for the moment forgotten—this utter incapability for any deep and lasting emotion, brings the agitated woman back to herself.

She straightens herself and her brows contract heavily, though she lays her hand upon her companion's arm and looks at her pityingly.

"Gypsy," she says, softly.

Lady Ashhurst's sobs increase, and, like a pettish child, she shakes off the hand.

"Gypsy," repeats Valentine.

The whole chamber becomes filled with the mournful sounds of Gypsy's vehement woe.

"Gypsy," continues Valentine, "listen to me; this must be stopped——"

"You have been cruel and wicked to me," interrupts Gypsy, raising her moist and crumpled handkerchief. "Just when I was expecting a pleasant evening, when I had got all dressed and the guests had arrived, you must needs raise such a row as this! Look at me! What a fright I am! Valentine, I wouldn't have believed it of you!"

Valentine is silent under these crushing reproaches, though the moving muscles of her countenance still testifies to poignant anguish.

"They have come, haven't they?" continues Gypsy, in mournful inquiry.

Valentine looks dazed.

"Who?" she says.

"Why, Count Toboskie and his friend, Lagors."

A brief, swift spasm shoots athwart Valentine's face.

"Yes, they are come," she answers, calmly.

"Oh, and how frightful I look! Valentine, I will never forgive you! Won't you fix my hair? It is coming down, and I have dismissed Lizette for the evening."

But Valentine stands motionless; she pays no regard to the disarranged tresses of that lovely head, but stares at its owner in a wondering, absent way, quite puzzling. At last she rouses herself, and a quick, searching gleam comes in her eyes.

"Gypsy," she says, and her voice is thoroughly cold and calm, as of old, "who do you expect this evening?"

"I have told you," replies Gypsy, testily, struggling desperately with an unruly braid.

"Have you ever seen Count Lagors?" continues Valentine.

"Never!"

"Ever heard of him before?"

"Often!" ungraciously.

Valentine pales.

"Where?" she says, and her recent agitation shows signs of returning.

"Count Toboskie has done nothing but talk about him; besides, he is a lion in Petersburg."

"Have you never heard of him until you came to Russia?"

"Never knew there was such a man in existence!"

"You are sure?"

"Yes, I am. But what difference does it make?"

"No difference. Had we better go down now?"

Gypsy looks up in delight. Valentine does not often frequent the parlors when visitors are present.

"Will you go down?" she says, eagerly.

"Yes," replies Valentine, carelessly. "I have a desire to see this great Russian lion."

Gypsy hastily bathes her eyes, and thus obliterates the last trace of her recent grief, and then, together, they descend to the parlors.

The introductions are got through with in the usual manner. Toboskie, naturally swift and suspicious, regards every one present with a keen eye. He sees that Valentine is a trifle paler than is even her wont, that she keeps close by Gypsy's side; also that in her eye is a strengthening, encouraging light, though what in the world there is in this meeting between Lady Ashhurst and Count Lagors to demand encouragement for the lady, is more than he can tell. He sees, too, that Gypsy is unconscious, that she is upon dangerous ground. Whatever be the secret mystery that he has grown to suspect, he believes that his hostess, it matters not how closely she may be connected and involved in it, is for the present in ignorance.

She is beautiful and charming as ever, and Count Lagors has succumbed to her witchery without a struggle. His eyes follow her, wherever she goes; he is hopelessly, palpably fascinated.

That night, when he reaches his castle, he staggers up to Peter like a drunken man. His face is haggard, his eyes wild, and his hands are clinched tightly.

"Peter," he says—and his voice is hoarse and unnatural—"Peter, I love Jack Ashhurst's wife. Oh, my God! I love her; it is my punishment."

And, with a great cry, faithful Peter flings his hands over his gray face, and sobs like a child.

CHAPTER XVII.—THE ABBOT OF ST. MICHAEL'S.

OUT of St. Petersburg a short distance, and crowning the summit of a steep hill, is the ancient monastery of the holy Order of St. Michael. It is an old and time-stained mass of masonry, grim and strong, like the nature of these holy recluses—high up above the surrounding country, even as they, themselves, have reared upwards above the lust and weaknesses of the world. Here, solitary and almost unknown, communing with God and His saints, they lead their simple, monastic life—these men who, through the agony of exquisite torture, have attained the highest pinnacle of earthly purity—struggling upwards through the weary, exhausted pain of temptation and self-denial, rigorously withholding from themselves all pleasures of the world, all comforts of the flesh.

The monastery is beautifully situated, and is certainly picturesque despite its hoary grimness. It covers the entire top of the hill, and is a long, low, broad structure, save directly in the centre, where the chapel rears its square and unpretentious tower. It is grim and dark, and bears the impress of the fierce Russian Winters, which for centuries have swept storm and wind upon the sturdy and massive walls. Lining the hill, and stretched far below, is a thick forest of fir and pine, through which the snow and the light struggle with resolute perseverance, and the latter with but poor success, though nearly at all times the ground beneath has a thick sheeting of snow. Through these trees the Winter winds sweep upwards to the monastery above—sweep with weird, strange calls as though from weary, sin-tossed souls in torment, petitioning aid from the monks who know no touch of guile, no thoughts of evil. And when the Winter deepens, and the storm and hurricane sweep down from above, these sighs and low calls give place to loud wailings, with something of melody, as if the elements were sounding requiems over the dead hopes and crushed ambitions of these holy fanatics—as if they were mourning for the life crushed down in its narrow but sacred groove, and the torture and trial and self-denial that have triumphed over the flesh.

A solitude intense enwraps the forest and the monastery—a solitude filled with the sanctity of the place, and the sweet, still peace of heaven.

Far below stretches the white, level country of this snow-girt land, and from the point of observation in the forest, not a sign of human life is visible; only that a wide, solemn expanse, white like the souls of those monastic saints above, whose world is comprised within the rugged walls of their sacred home. Afar off, the shadows of the on coming night are settling on the silent country, and in the opposite direction a few red lights begin to gleam, showing where the city lies.

And from the West comes the last crimson glow ere the darkness falls. It gilds the top of the chapel-tower; it rests upon the hoary walls as in a benediction; it lingers lovingly around the spot in a tender glow that speaks of the purity within; it touches the tops of the forest, until the pine needles gleam like a halo of glory. The whole country becomes bathed in a transcendent light, while from the tower sweeps the sweet, solemn chiming of the monastery-bells.

And now upon the scene appear a couple of figures. It is Maize and Toboskie; they are come upon a visit to the monastery, and, leaving the horses and sleigh below with the servants, they walk up the hill—walk slowly, side by side, with the awe and sanctity of the place shining in their faces.

When they stand almost in the shadow of the building, she turns to him, and so deeply is she impressed with the sublimity of their surroundings, that her voice is almost a whisper.

"Do you think they will admit us?"

"I have no doubt; several of my race have patronized this institution—in fact, have lived and died here. The Toboskies and the monks of St. Michael's have always been specially favorable to one another, in consequence of which I and any of my friends are always welcome." He does not tell her that he, himself, is in the habit of making generous donations to the institution; that at times it has been his charity alone that has kept them from hunger and cold.

She looks at him curiously—at the cold, haughty, majestic face, at the proud lips with their dominant will, at the broad brow with its grandeur and pride. He looks a king among men—haughty, commanding, unbending; and she doubts not that he is but a type of his predecessors. Therefore it must have been a power almost beyond earth that could bend their haughty spirits to the humility of a monastic existence, that could smite them in the supremacy of their glory, that could deaden life to them until, sickened with their exhausted torture, they turned to this living death—this refuge among the monks of St. Michael.

He divines her thoughts and almost pauses under the deepening shadows of the forest. Through the falling gloom he looks at her wondrous face with its pride and humility, its sin and martyrdom; he catches the full glory of her eyes that are wide, solemn, and filled with a boundless awe; he sees the shining of her golden hair, which gleams, he believes, like the glory of heaven. A momentary weakness seizes him to take her in his arms and tell her this great love that is the growth of years; but in another moment he conquers it, and brushes his hand across his brow; he feels weary, disturbed, oppressed.

"You see," he says, with a forced smile, "that we are not a fortunate race: in fact, I think we are rather noted for misfortune, and when any great calamity befell my ancestors, they always retired to the monastery of St. Michael. It is quite possible that I, myself, may immure myself within its sacred arms some day. No one can read the future."

He speaks lightly, but a shudder seizes her; she realizes how this haughty manhood must be smitten ere it could sink to the life of a monk—how the proud spirit must be torn and riven before, in sheer weakness, it would seek this shelter from earth and its travail.

But they stand now beneath the shadow of the portal; and the girl's soft silks and trailing furs brush the threshold crossed by so many weary feet, bruised and wounded by the rough hills of life.

The door is opened by a lay brother who affectionately greets Toboskie, but who stares at the girl, dazed and bewildered, and shades his eyes with his hands.

"It is a dear saint of God," he mutters, and stares after her, stricken by her splendor.

And down the hall she goes, chilled almost to the heart by the cold stones her feet press, making greater the coldness and severity of the atmosphere by contrast of her own rich, warm splendor that breathes of the South. She has brought her magnificence here, this child of Greece—here, where the floors are trod by the weary, naked feet of these righteous men; where the partitions have echoed to the bitter cries that none but God have heard; where, in the four walls of their humble cell, they have struggled in deadly conflict with their carnal natures, and tortured the spirit into agonized submission; here, where the atmosphere is fraught with fasting and prayer and sacrifice, and the very stones have become sanctified through the travail of their occupants.

And she realizes it as she walks silently beside her conductor, and feels her unworthiness.

"It is the hour for vespers," he says, in an undertone; "we will go right to the chapel."

Through many long, winding passages, bare and prison-like, he conducts her, until finally, opening a massive door, they stand in the chapel.

She glances quickly around and in the vast expanse feels her littleness. All the ease and comfort they have denied themselves, keeping their natures down with an iron hand and a merciless vow, these devotees have showered upon their religion, intensified to glory. The floor is richly inlaid with marble. The ceiling a frescoed heaven, with God and His saints. On the walls rare paintings show dimly through the accumulated darkness of age, while at every few steps shines forth those dear faces, ever grand and new, ever old and dear, of Mary and her Son.

Over the sacred interior hovers a purple dusk, pierced at intervals by the soft flame of a burning taper as it glistens before some favorite saint. From afar the altar gleams in iridescent beauty, and the smell of the burning incense is sweet upon the air; while in front of the Christ-head kneels the dark and solitary figure of a priest in prayer.

An intense silence reigns through the church, upon which silence at last breaks a sobbing distant murmur like the chant of a far off sea. Toboskie hears and draws her aside; they stand together in a niche, while nearer and nearer draw those wondrous sounds—sounds that seem to come from heaven down through vistas that send back ten thousand echoes of the seraphic music.

She is amazed, bewildered, enchanted. It seems as though the gates of heaven had opened wide and let forth the melody of its hosts of archangels.

"It is the monks," whispers Toboskie, noticing her agitation.

Never in all her life does she forget that scene and those sounds. Down the aisles, heralded by a lay brother swinging censers, tread the monks, one after the other, their long, dark gowns brushing the floor, their hands meeting upon their breasts, their calm, penitent faces stamped with the peace of heaven, looking whiter and holier in the black shadow of their cowls.

And as they come they sing, and the whole church becomes filled with a melody that she has never before heard, that she never expects again to hear until she stands before the white throne of the Lord. It is sweeter than the triumphant notes of an hundred organs—this sound of many and perfect voices—and floats through the shadow-draped church until it seems as if every human and heavenly thing had risen in praise to God.

Her very soul is roused and lifted out of itself. It yearns to burst its confines—to get away to a life in which this hour shall live eternal.

And all the while that rich, solemn, sacred singing floats through the air. It rises like the vast supplication of a multitude; it floats through the air like the voice of God; it gives life to the marble and the paintings, it robs her of utterance, of strength—it loses her in a transport of ecstasy, of admiration, of holy awe, and at last dies away—far away in the distance which sends back in a whisper the echoes of the final "Amen."

Through a mist of tears—and seldom do her eyes know weeping—she looks at the monks as they kneel in devotion at the altar rail—these men whose souls know no stain of lust, no shadow of evil; and she sighs for the simple, pure, devout faith that lifts them so far above the danger of sophistry, the darkness and misery of perfidious doubt. A great, vast, aching pain seizes upon her—a hopeless yearning for this same purity; and Toboskie, who watches her every glance and gesture, sees that she is deeply agitated and a trifle faint.

With inestimable tenderness he takes her hand and, placing it upon his arm, leads her out of the church into an outer hall far away, and seats her upon a stone bench.

"The walk up the hill has exhausted you," he says, and, despite his pride and strength, his tone vibrates with a tenderness to which no other woman has ever listened.

"I shall be stronger in a moment," she replies, smiling faintly. "It is very silly of me."

He excuses himself and leaves her, ostensibly to procure her a glass of water, in reality to allow her to recover her composure in solitude.

A full half-hour passes—passed by her in deep meditation. Then the intense hush is again broken by that sweet, solemn cadence coming to her from afar, as the monks return from vespers. If possible it is sweeter, more plaintive than before. It is sad and wailing, like the cry of a great supplication, softened and made pathetic by distance. But as the monks draw nearer it bursts grand and powerful on her ear. Now it is the song of a great victory—the triumph of a host moved to religious enthusiasm, and filled with a grand thanksgiving, a tumult of rejoicing, all mingled in one clear, sweet voice.

Louder, clearer, sweeter swells that divine song of the invisible singers, and she half springs to her feet. A vast yearning is upon her to join these righteous men—to adopt the simple purity of their lives. Her cheeks flush, her eyes sparkle, her lips quiver with emotion. She has caught the enthusiasm. There is in her nature a sublimity of sacrifice, a steadfastness of purpose that claims affinity with the rigor and self-sacrifice of their lives.

But even as she half-rises, the full, resonant triumphant shouts of victory die away into a softer cadence, as the monks pass down the hall. The rich and splendid sounds—the power and majesty of those wondrous voices, soften into a wail. The air changes; it has in it a ring of victory, yet a victory blood-purchased despite the devotional exaltation—a low, wailing, piteous cry of the wounded soul, weary with its struggle and its pain—of the altar and its sacrifice, the flame and the rack. All the pain, the torture, the patience; all the grandeur of purpose, the immolation of self, that mark the hidden lives of these men these last wailing notes hold a memory of. They speak to her soul as nothing else has ever done, and while she sits trembling with emotion she hears the loud and final "Amen!" It echoes through the silent air, and she hears it in her soul long after the monks have locked themselves in the gloom and stillness of their cells, in which to continue their fasting and prayer through the dark and silence of the night. Then upon her ear smites another sound—the tread of feet—and, looking up, she sees coming towards her Toboskie and a monk. This latter instantly rivets her attention, and involuntarily she rises. He is a man of immense stature and impressive appearance, dressed in the customary long, black robe of his Order; but there is a dignity, and even pride, in his bearing that, try as he may to suppress it, is in ill accordance with the gloom and severity of a monastic abode. His head is unusually massive, but even the tight-fitting cowl cannot conceal the perfectness of its shape. His brow is low and broad, denoting intellect of the highest order; his features modeled after the Greek statues of old. The expression of his countenance is grave, amounting almost to severity; yet when he smiles, which he can do with the sweetness of a woman, the gravity is put to flight, and the face is winning, with a purity and beauty almost divine. He is, judging from appearance, sixty years of age. Such is Father Salvatori, the Abbot of St. Michael.

Digitized by Google

Maize looks at him in awe, as his massive figure rears beside Toboskie. They are very like, yet very dissimilar these two men—the one clad in the gloomy, severe garb of his Order, the other well wrapped in his priceless furs; yet there is a certain similarity between them—a certain bearing of hauteur and dignity that claims kindredship.

"This is the young lady, father," says Toboskie, by way of introduction—"the English young lady—my friend."

The abbot reaches out and takes the small, jewel-flashing hand the girl extends, and his manner is stately and composed, like one used to the world and its ways. Indeed, his appearance is much more suggestive of a throne than a monastery.

"You are welcome, daughter," he says, and that warm radiant smile lights up the severity of his face, "quite welcome; but I fear that the gloom and lowly surroundings of our abode will find but little favor in the eyes of one so used to worldly ease and comfort as your appearance denotes you to be. Yet such hospitality as is ours we freely offer to you. It is the soul and not the body that finds comfort here."

"I have been pleased more than I can tell you, father, with my visit here. The sight of the monks at vespers roused in me a desire for emulation, hopeless as it is. Father, I wished I could stay here always!"

She raises her eyes wet with the tears; they are glorious with that outpouring of the soul, with that heroism of sacrifice, that grandeur of martyrdom! And above all is that great yearning, aching pain, that vast discontent with self, that wondrous uprising of the spirit in its sudden aim to step upwards unto that high pinnacle of saintliness!

In that one glance the abbot reads aright this peculiar nature that has come under his knowledge—this soul with its wondrous capabilities of good and evil, its heights of light, its depths of darkness. And he shudders for the unlived life of this girl which stretches far away into the mystic future.

A silence falls upon them, as these three, bound together with an invisible chain, stand side by side in the gloom of the monastery, and the priest studies the face that just now shines like the Madonna's in the chapel. It may be that the sight of this warm, rich loveliness, these dazzling, gorgeous robes of this offspring of Greece, rouse memories of the past—that past that crushed the soul and spirit of this man and sent him to his living death. It may be that the sudden sight of this girl has awakened a maddened regret for that world he has for ever forsworn, outcryings of that nature which, through the pain and torture of years, he has struggled to renounce. It is often thus that a woman's face destroys the work of years, yet if so, his stern, serious countenance gives no tokens of it.

He studies her face, it is true, but only with a vast anxiety for her future—that future which he knows will hold for her a great struggle between right and wrong, and which may bend her haughty spirit to the dust, may rob her of her proud omnipotence, her haughty supremacy. Ah! he has seen so many shipwrecks—this man weary and wounded with the world—what wonder that he, with his inner knowledge and swiftness in reading human nature, what wonder that he shudders for this girl who bears misfortune in her face.

"I am glad that you were pleased," he says, slowly, "yet I fear that you would soon weary with the strictness of the monastery. Daughter, our life embraces sacrifice!"

And where she stands in the shadow of the grim stone walls, the girl looks steadily at the abbot; her eyes are firm and lustrous.

"And if ever I was at that point where I sought refuge in the arms of the Church," she says, quietly, "I would not fear the sacrifice."

"I believe you; there is in your nature the groundwork of great devotional exaltation. Yet the work of God must pursue its own course; the spirit must be bent and purified through tears, the metal scourged through the furnace; then, when the fire and the spirit have done their work, you will be prepared to accept the sacrifice; you will come home to the Church like a desolate child!"

"Then I hope she may never trouble you, Father Abbot," says Toboskie, almost fiercely. Something in the words of the monk have struck a cold chill to his vitals.

"Heaven cannot be gained without the cross, my son," replies Father Salvatori, solemnly "The experience of your own proud race must confirm this. And I would that she be saved."

Those words awaken the Russian to a knowledge of himself. There is a fierce and undying love in his soul that cries out for this woman with all the madness of passion—all the purity and steadfastness of true affection. It is the first time in all the years of his life that love has ever touched him. Now, for all the future, he loves this woman by his side!—loves her with that fierce, immutable affection that more often brings shipwreck than aught else, whose very intensity insures misery and ruin for its object. It is not love, it is a fierce Pagan worship, that craves her at the expense of all earthly things—that would trample upon the mandates of heaven to call her his own.

I would that she be saved! These words ring persistently in his soul. He looks first at the dazzling loveliness of this matchless woman, for whose sake he is ready to forswear his salvation, and then at the calm and patient face of the monk, and before God he cannot echo that wish. No! better eternal perdition for her and for him than that she be saved and taken from him.

(To be continued.)

PSI UPSILON CHAPTER HOUSE AT ANN ARBOR, MICHIGAN.

WE give elsewhere an illustration of the new Chapter House of the Psi Upsilon Fraternity at the University of Michigan, recently completed and dedicated at the forty-seventh general convention of the Fraternity at Ann Arbor last month. The building is the largest and best adapted to its purpose of all the many edifices of the sort connected with various American colleges. The house faces the college campus, having a double front upon West and South University Avenues, and stands upon a lot 196 feet long by 66 feet wide, having itself an average length of 65 feet, with width varying from 35 to 56 feet. The material is pressed brick, the foundation being of blue stone, with water table of light sandstone; the trimmings are of terra cotta, with bands of black brick. The roof is of slate. Above each window in the second story is the chapter letter, and in the gable facing the north a shield, bearing the fraternity symbols and surrounded by an owl and faces, rests upon an ornamental ground of terra cotta. The interior is finished in natural woods. A large dining-hall, kitchen, janitor's rooms, furnace-room, etc., are in the basement. Upon the first floor are the reception-room, library, two other rooms for guests and for general purposes, and several smaller apartments. Seven rooms for students are on the second floor, with bath-rooms and closets, and on the third floor are three more rooms for students, besides a large and elegant chapter lodge-room. The tower is eighty feet high, and from its windows a fine view of the city and surrounding country may be obtained. From the flagstaff above floats the garnet-and-gold banner presented to the Chapter by the Psi Upsilon ladies of Detroit. The building has been carefully built, and contains every convenience for the comfort of its occupants. The total cost, inclusive of ground and furniture, is $15,000. The Psi Upsilon Fraternity also owns costly buildings at Yale, Wesleyan and Amherst, and similar ones will soon be erected at Cornell, Dartmouth, Union, Columbia, and other chapters. The society is to be congratulated upon the successful completion of the first building of the sort at the great university of the West, in which its members hold, as elsewhere, a leading place.

The American Riflemen at Dollymount.

OUR American riflemen have achieved another victory abroad. In the match at Dollymount, Ireland, on June 29th, the American team defeated the Irish team by twelve points. At the 800 yards range, the record showed a tie—each side scoring 456. In the contest at the 900-yard range, the Americans scored 436 and the Irishmen 428. The firing at the 1,000-yards range resulted in a score of 420 for the Americans and 416 for the Irish team.

It is now twenty years since Queen Victoria inaugurated a series of contests in long-range shooting with her personal attendance on Wimbledon Common, where, by means of a silken string, she fired the first rifle-shot ever fired there. The gallant and accomplished Lord Elcho, the founder of the British volunteer system, originated these contests. But is only within the last seven years that rifle contests at any range have been frequent or popular in this country. In 1873 an Irish team won the Elcho Shield in a contest with English and Scotch teams. During 1874 the Irish team had a close contest at Creedmoor with an American team, in which the Hibernians were beaten by three points. In 1875 the American team visited Ireland, where it was again victorious. In 1876 occurred the centennial contest open to all nations. From this the English team was absent because it could not separately recognize the Scotch and Irish teams in an international match. This centennial contest also resulted in our favor. In 1877 Sir Henry Halford's Imperial British team came here to meet an American team, and was defeated. During the two following years there was no crack of friendly rifles between contesting teams. This year's contest came about upon an Irish invitation.

It was not only one of good headwork and cool nerve, demanding an exercise of judgment which requires the marksmen "to see the wind—like a pig," as the Irish proverb runs. It was also a trial of the quality of rifles. All of the Irish team save one member shot with breech-loading rifles adapted by Rigby, one of the Dublin contestants. One of the team who persisted in using a muzzle-loader shot only one point below his next highest comrade, who used a breech-loader. The members of the American team used breech loaders of three different patterns and won by twelve points. The official scores seem to indicate that the highest average shooting was done by the American rifles. There were 12 times 45 shots at ranges of 800, 900 and 1,000 yards, and only one of the shots missed the target! This is as much as to say that if the twelve marksmen had successively emptied their rifles from rifle-pits with those ranges at 540 hostile military officers they would have killed or wounded 539 of those officers.

Raising Peanuts.

PEANUTS are not as delicious eating as the nuts that are produced on trees and bushes. They have, however, their advantages. A crop of them may be harvested the Fall after the seed is planted, while it is necessary to wait many years for a crop of those kinds of nuts that are produced on trees. A large proportion of the peanut is meat, while the larger portion of most nuts is a hard substance that can not be eaten. Most nuts are hard to crack, but the thin, soft shell of the peanut is very easily removed. They require to be roasted before they are in a condition to be eaten, but this operation is easily performed in a common corn-popper.

The peanut is of tropical origin, but by slow degrees it found its way into semi-tropical and temperate portions of the globe. It was brought from Africa to the Southern States, and was cultivated there many years before the civil war, which was the means of popularizing it in all parts of the Union. During the past few years peanuts have been extensively raised for the market in North and South Carolina, Virginia and Tennessee. Their cultivation on a limited scale has extended throughout all the Southern States and into most of the States bordering on the Ohio River. Within the past two years they have been raised, more for curiosity than for profit, in nearly all the Western and Middle States.

It seems certain that the peanut, like the sweet-potato, will become acclimated to a northern latitude. The plant is hardy and is easily raised. It has a long tap-root that enables it to grow in times of severe drought. A soil that is somewhat sandy is best adapted to its growth. If it contains considerable iron or dark-colored vegetable matter the pods will have a bad appearance. It should be moderately rich and well pulverized. In raising peanuts on a small scale it is customary to throw up small ridges about two and a half feet apart. In the tops of these the nuts are placed two inches deep and eighteen inches apart. It is best to remove the pods from the nuts before planting them, care being taken not to break the skin that surrounds them. Four seeds are usually dropped in a hill, but only two plants should be allowed to grow.

The general culture of peanuts is substantially the same as that generally given to sweet-potatoes. The ground must be kept free from weeds and grass during the entire season. If the patch is small, all the work should be done with a hand-hoe. If it is large, the cultivator may be used between the rows. The blossoms proceed from branches near the ground, and as soon as pods are formed, the flower-stems turn toward the earth, and the pods are buried beneath it. The pods will mature better if some light earth is drawn over them with a hoe as soon as they begin to form. The entire season is required for the pods to mature. Late in the Fall the plants are pulled with the roots and pods that are attached to them. They are cured in the sun a few days, when the pods are picked off and stored in a dry place.

The World's Productions.

A TABLE has been carefully compiled, which gives an estimate of the world's annual production of leading articles in 1780 and at the present time. It furnishes a key to the great changes which have occurred during the last century in the producing and consuming power of mankind. The increase in the production of wine and tea is but little greater than the increase of population, which is estimated to be not more than two hundred per cent. in Europe, nor more than fifty per cent. in the entire world. Of iron, 15,000,000 tons are now produced, against 180,000 tons in 1780. The increase in the production of steel is almost equally remarkable, as it has risen from 40,000 tons in 1780 to 2,000,000 tons in 1880. Of printing paper, the estimated annual product of a century ago was 10,000 tons, against 500,000 tons at the present day; and about the same advance has been made in the number of watches manufactured. The production of coal has increased from 10,000,000 tons to 300,000,000 tons per annum, and the production of cotton in the same proportion, rising from 60,000 bales in 1780 to 150,000 bales in 1880. The two other leading articles in which production has increased with remarkable rapidity are sugar and beer, the product of sugar increasing from 100,000 tons in 1780 to 2,000,000 tons in 1880, and the product of beer from 2,000,000,000 gallons in 1780 to 30,000,000,000 gallons in 1880.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Lord Aberdare, it is understood, will succeed the Earl of Northbrook as President of the London Geographical Society.

Twelve Miles south of Sciacca, on the coast of Sicily, an exceedingly rich bank of corals has been discovered, which is even more important than the one found in 1876 in the same waters.

The Nights of May 18th and 19th were fatal to almost all vineyards on the banks of the Rhine and its tributaries. The young shoots on most of the vines were killed by the frost, which was intense.

A Large German Horticultural Exhibition is planned for the Summer of 1882. It will be held at Bremen in connection with the twenty-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Horticultural Society of that city.

Experience has shown at the Petroleum Iron Works, Titusville, Pa., that a barrel of petroleum will generate heat sufficient for making a ton of iron, while a ton and a quarter of coal would be required for the same result.

The Twelfth Meeting of the Scandinavian Naturalists and Physicians will take place at Stockholm on July 7th to 14th inclusive. A numerous attendance is expected from Denmark and Norway, as well as from other countries.

M. Hu'sens, of Paris, recommends, for the protection of workmen handling lead and mercury compounds, small daily doses of iodide of potassium. This salt, he says, dissolves the lead or mercurial compounds and effects their removal.

A Test for the discovery of adulterated sugar is to place a pinch of pure sugar in the mouth and when it is dissolved a pinch of suspected sugar. If this contains starch, glucose or chloride of tin a distinctly bitter taste will be present.

M. Marche has invented in Paris a telephone, which he calls electrophone, and which works with an induction coil. The induction current is sent from a distance which is said to be very long, and the hearing is said to be satisfactory.

On May 11th last the statue of the late M. Quetelet was unveiled in the gardens of the Brussels Academy buildings. He is represented in a sitting posture, his left hand rests upon a large celestial globe, and he holds a pen in his right.

On the Schleswig Coast in the Little Belt the establishment of oyster beds is engaging the active attention of the authorities. One million and a half of small oysters have been "sown out" between the Glenner Bay and the Danish frontier near Hollenlade.

A Prospecting Party, dispatched by the Queensland Government, is stated to have discovered a very rich gold-field on the Selton River in the north of the colony. An examination of the country along the east coast of Cape York Peninsula has not, however, proved successful.

On the Shores of the Lake of Constance the rare phenomenon of a perfect solar halo was noticed on May 4th at noon. The large ring, which from time to time assumed splendid rainbow tints, remained visible for more than two hours. At Berlin the phenomenon of mock suns was observed on June 9th inst. at 5 A. M.

It is Stated that at Wickham, about 120 miles south of Sydney, New South Wales, two surface beds of metallic stone of considerable width have just been discovered. On analysis it is found that there is a large amount of gold and silver in one of these, while the other contains over 60 per cent. of iron with traces only of gold. A large and enormously valuable diamond is also said to have been discovered in the same locality.

The Swiss Naturalists Association have decided to erect the Meteorological Observatory, the establishment of which was recommended to them by the International Meteorological Congress which met at Rome last year, upon the Saentis Mountain, in the canton of Appenzell. This peak is better adapted for the purposes of meteorological observation than any other one in Switzerland, on account of its comparatively isolated position. The observatory will cost about $1,600, besides which $1,800 will be spent annually for its maintenance and staff.

A New Skating Surface, called "crystal ice," has been invented by Dr. Calantariente, of Scarborough. Considering that after all ice is merely a crystalline substance, and that there is no lack of substances that are crystalline at ordinary temperatures, Dr. Calantariente experimented with a variety of salts, and after a time succeeded in making a mixture consisting mainly of carbonate and sulphate of soda, which, when laid as a floor by his plan, can be skated on with ordinary ice-skates; the resistance of the surface is just equal to that of ice, it looks like ice, and indeed, when it has been skated on and got "cut up" a little the deception is quite astonishing.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

BARON VON CALICE has been nominated Austrian Ambassador to Turkey.

CARL PETERSEN, the celebrated Danish explorer of the Arctic regions, is dead.

THE wife of Governor Williams of Indiana died June 27th, after a long illness.

THE Rev. Mr. Mackenochie, the famous ritualist, is about to visit America for his health.

TWENTY-THREE American clergymen sailed from this port for Europe in one day week before last.

SENATOR WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, is named for Chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

M. CHALLEMEL-LACOUR, the newly-appointed French Ambassador to England, has arrived in London.

GENERAL HANCOCK has been relieved, at his own request, from further service on the Warren Court of Inquiry.

JOHN A. KASSON, United States Minister at Vienna, has been nominated for Congress by the Republicans of the Fifth Iowa District.

REV. DR. GEORGE R. CROOKS, late editor of the Methodist, succeeds Bishop Hurst as professor of historical theology at Drew Seminary.

AT the late Harvard Commencement the degree of LL.D. was conferred on Oliver Wendell Holmes and Governor Long of Massachusetts.

IT is announced that the Emperor of Japan has conferred upon the Austrian monarch the highest decoration of the Order of the Chrysanthemum.

THE Marquis of Anglesey married, June 26th, at the British Embassy, Paris, the widow of Hon. Henry Woodhouse, formerly Miss Minnie King, of Georgia.

M. GAMBETTA will again advocate in the Chamber of Deputies the scrutin de liste system of voting. It is believed this system will be adopted, and that M. Gambetta will be the next President of France.

THE foundation of a monument in memory of Benedict Spinoza, the greatest of modern pantheistic philosophers, was laid at the Hague on June 7th. The monument will be set up early in September.

THE two hundredth anniversary of the landing of William Penn on the soil of Pennsylvania is to be celebrated in 1882. An association, with Colonel John W. Forney at its head, has the matter in charge.

SECRETARY THOMPSON left Washington last week for the Pacific coast by way of his home in Terre Haute, Ind. Commodore Jeffers has been designated as Acting Secretary of the Navy during his absence.

REV. DR. EDWARD WILSON, formerly pastor of St. James's Church, New Brunswick, N. J., and at present the rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, Montreal, has been elected Bishop of the Synod of Canada.

SECRETARY SCHURZ purposes leaving Washington about the middle of July. He will go to the Pacific coast, visiting various Indian reservations on his way there and back, also passing through the Yellowstone National Park.

THERE are now three Hebrews in Congress—Messrs. Jonas, Morse and Einstein. In the House there are six German Representatives, among whom are Hellman, of Indiana; Poehler, of Minnesota; Muller, of New York, and Deuster, of Wisconsin.

MR. W. H. VANDERBILT has created some excitement in Paris art circles by paying M. Villegas $20,000 for the latter's new large painting, "A Baptism in the Cathedral of Seville." There are a multitude of figures and a rich variety of bright costumes.

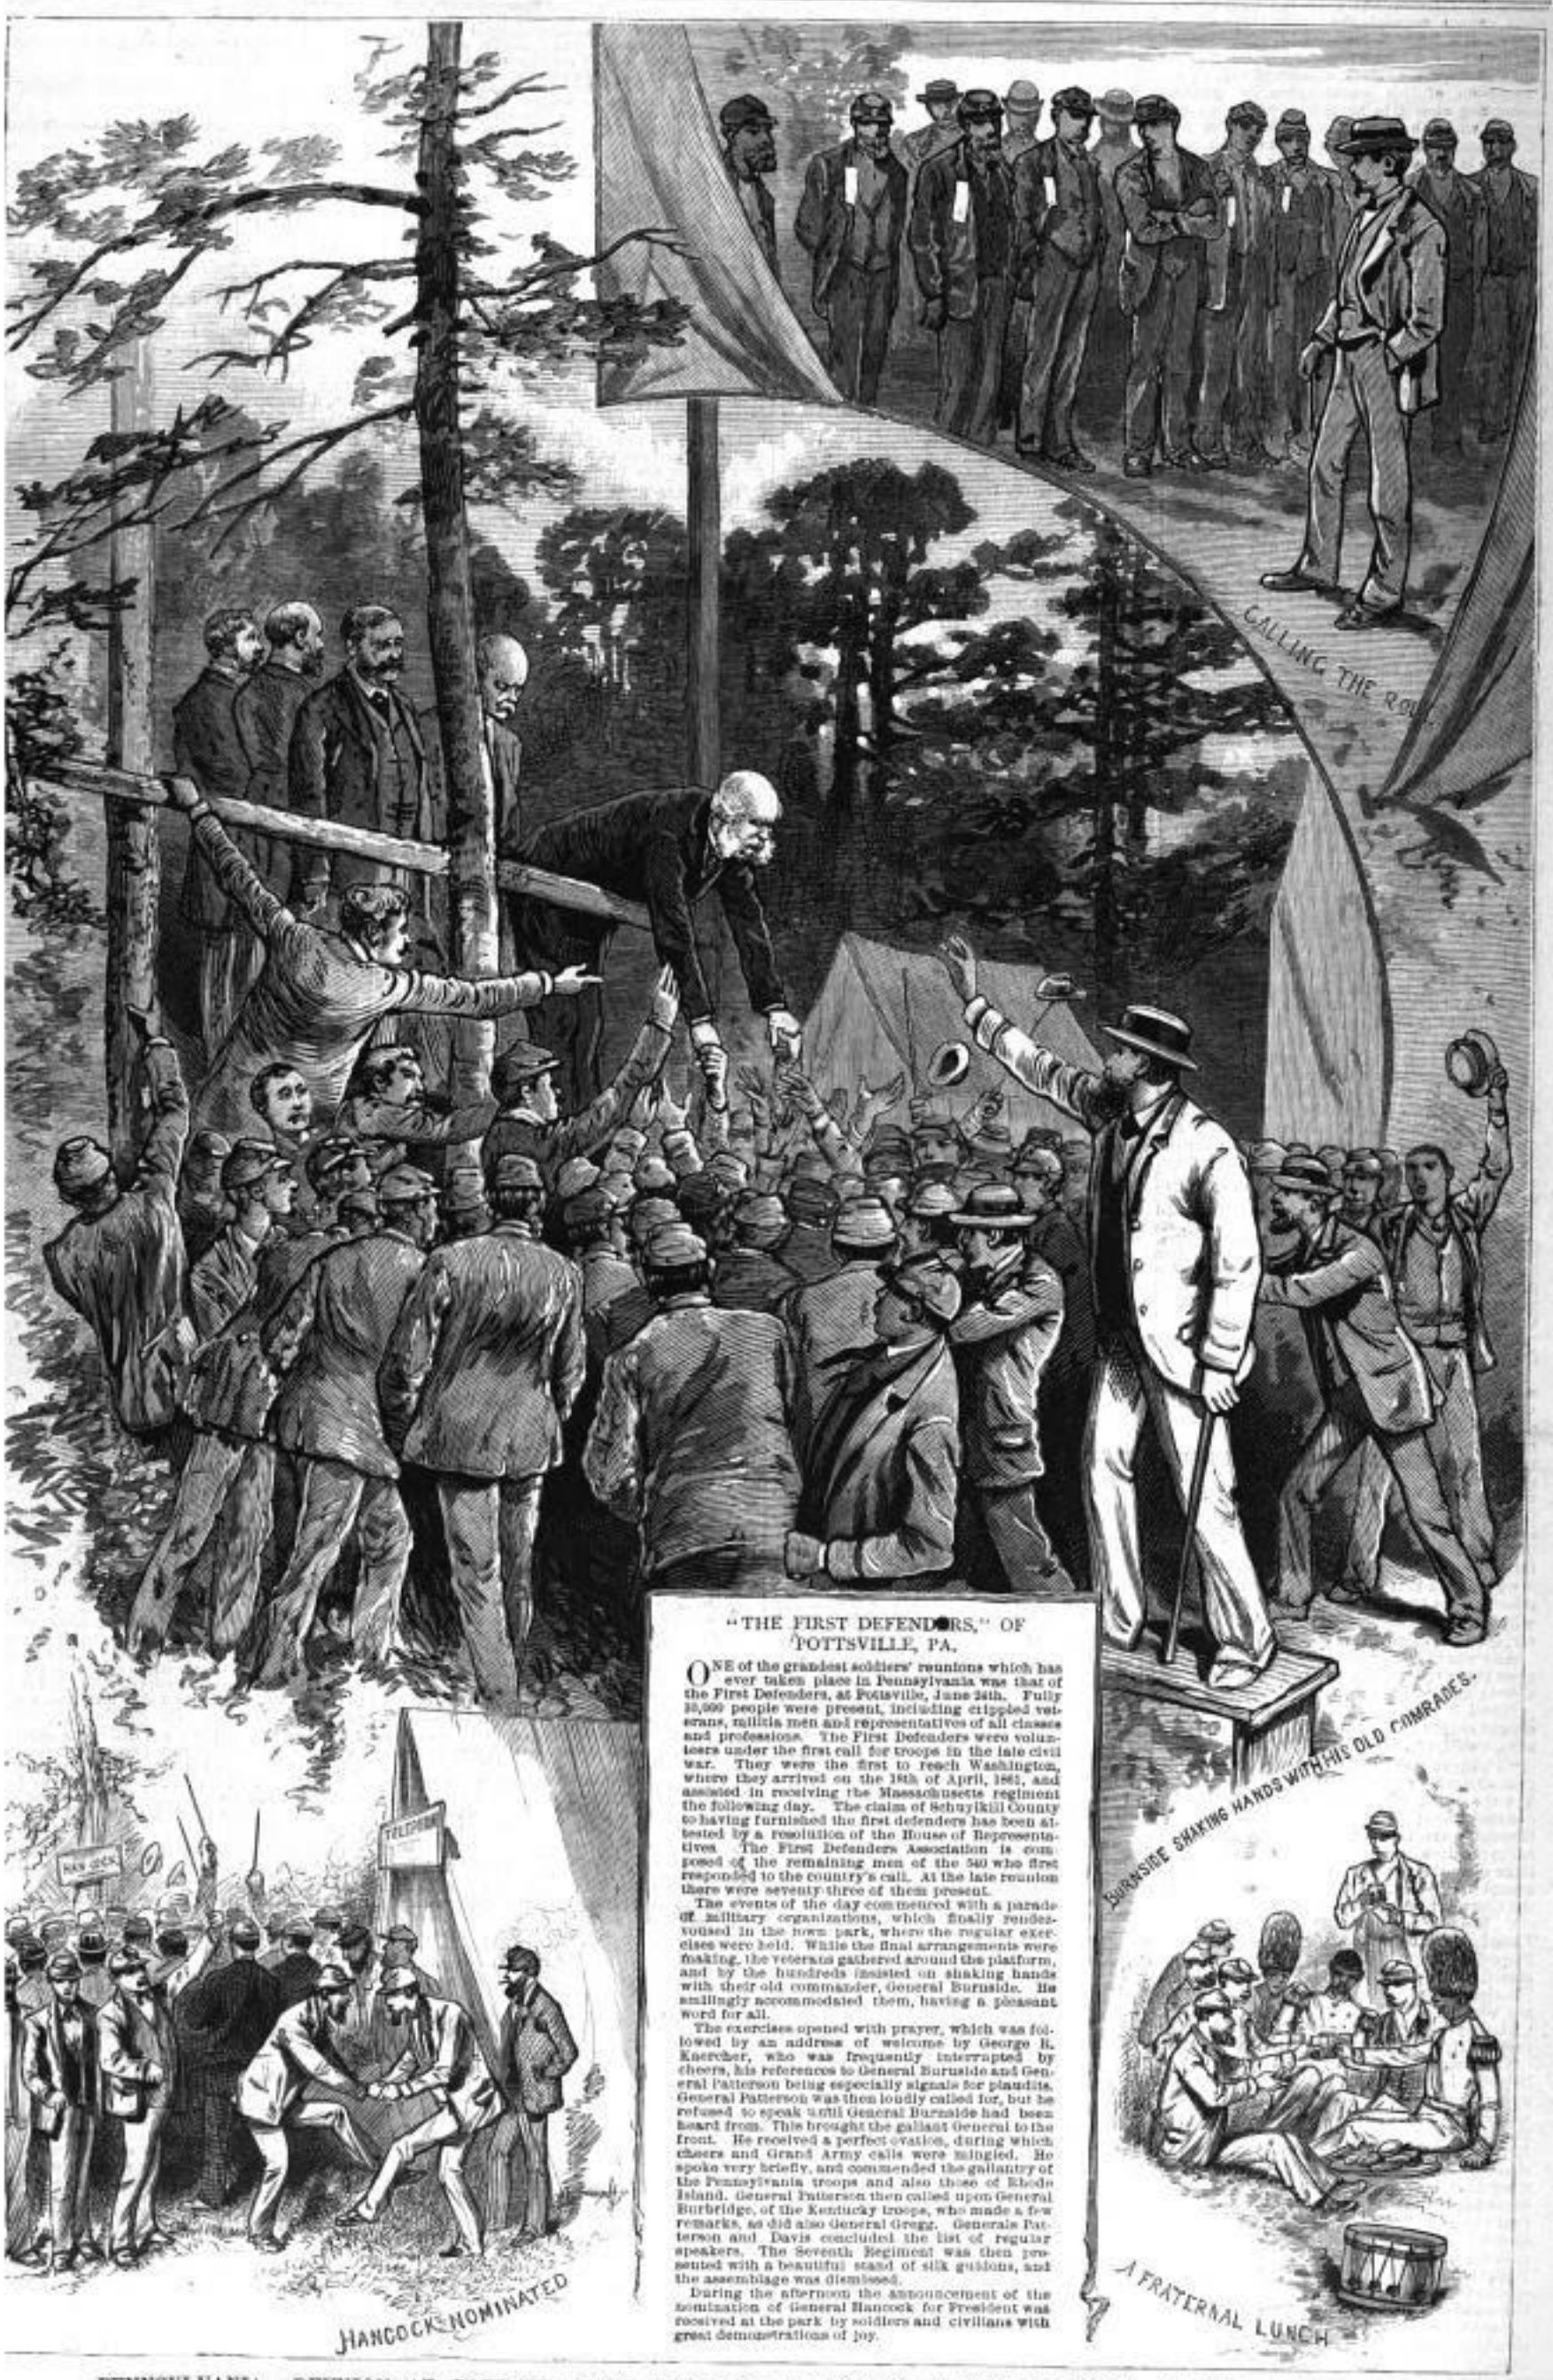
DR. THOMAS S. LAMBERT, president of the defunct American Popular Life Insurance Company, who was sentenced to five years in State Prison for perjury in swearing to a false statement of the condition of the company, has been released from legal constraint under a decision of the District Attorney.

KING POMARE V., of the Society Islands, has of late years been a ruler in name rather than in fact. The natives regard him as their rightful sovereign, but the German and French traders have acquired control of affairs. Pomare has now abdicated in favor of Governor Chesse, the French representative.

THE Duke of Buckingham intends soon to resign the Governorship of Madras. He is a widower with daughters only, and if he does not marry and have a son his dukedom will be extinct. His father collapsed financially, but the duke inherited a great sum from an uncle, has been very prudent, and is well to do.

PRINCE ORLOFF, the Russian Ambassador at Paris, has been requested by President Grévy to transmit to the Grand Duke Nicholas the highest French military order, which has never been given to any foreigner except Victor Emmanuel, and was refused to the Prince of Wales, who sought it after the Crimean campaign.

TEXAS JACK, as fierce and dashing a scout as ever "made up" in the dressing-room of a theatre, died in Leadville, Colorado, last week, and was buried with military honors. Texas Jack's real name was J. B. Omohundro, and he was descended from the first (Indian) families of Virginia. His wife was a Morlacchi, the famous dancer.



GEORGE, King of Greece, received as the inclosure of the address of the London Corporation a casket of eighteen-carat gold, designed in the Greek style and decorated with the Greek arms, the jeweled crown, and tablets bearing the names of Greek poets, philosophers and orators. The box rests upon a blue velvet cushion ornamented with gold roses.

MINISTER MAYNARD is expected to return from Turkey about the middle of July, to immediately enter upon his duties as Postmaster-General. Judge Key will then receive his commission as District Judge for Tennessee and will leave for his home at once. General Longstreet will at the same time give up the post office at Gainesville, Ga., and sail for Turkey to take Mr. Maynard's place.

JUDGE JAMES GARLAND, of Lynchburg, Va., has just completed his eighty-eighth year. Of him a paper in that city says: "He practiced law fifty-eight years, for ten years was Judge of the Corporation Court of this city, and for eleven years was in public life as a member of the Legislature or of Congress. To-day he is sitting and patiently trying cases and delivering opinions, showing great vigor of mind and considerable physical force.

A HANDSOME fountain has just been erected as a memorial of General Sir Thomas Biddulph. It is placed between the Victoria and chain bridges at Balmoral, and bears this inscription: "To the honored memory of General Sir Thomas Middleton Biddulph, K.C.B., P.C., this fountain is erected by Queen Victoria in grateful and affectionate remembrance of his faithful services to the Queen and royal family for twenty seven years. Born July 27th, 1809, died September 25th, 1875."

Digitized by Google

"THE FIRST DEFENDERS," OF POTTSVILLE, PA.

ONE of the grandest soldiers' reunions which has ever taken place in Pennsylvania was that of the First Defenders, at Pottsville, June 24th. Fully 30,000 people were present, including crippled veterans, militia men and representatives of all classes and professions. The First Defenders were volunteers under the first call for troops in the late civil war. They were the first to reach Washington, where they arrived on the 18th of April, 1861, and assisted in receiving the Massachusetts regiment the following day. The claim of Schuylkill County to having furnished the first defenders has been attested by a resolution of the House of Representatives. The First Defenders Association is composed of the remaining men of the 340 who first responded to the country's call. At the late reunion there were seventy-three of them present.

The events of the day commenced with a parade of military organizations, which finally rendezvoused in the town park, where the regular exercises were held. While the final arrangements were making, the veterans gathered around the platform, and by the hundreds insisted on shaking hands with their old commander, General Burnside. He smilingly accommodated them, having a pleasant word for all.

The exercises opened with prayer, which was followed by an address of welcome by George R. Knercher, who was frequently interrupted by cheers, his references to General Burnside and General Patterson being especially signals for plaudits. General Patterson was then loudly called for, but he refused to speak until General Burnside had been heard from. This brought the gallant General to the front. He received a perfect ovation, during which cheers and Grand Army calls were mingled. He spoke very briefly, and commended the gallantry of the Pennsylvania troops and also those of Rhode Island. General Patterson then called upon General Burbridge, of the Kentucky troops, who made a few remarks, as did also General Gregg. Generals Patterson and Davis concluded the list of regular speakers. The Seventh Regiment was then presented with a beautiful stand of silk guidons, and the assemblage was dismissed.

During the afternoon the announcement of the nomination of General Hancock for President was received at the park by soldiers and civilians with great demonstrations of joy.

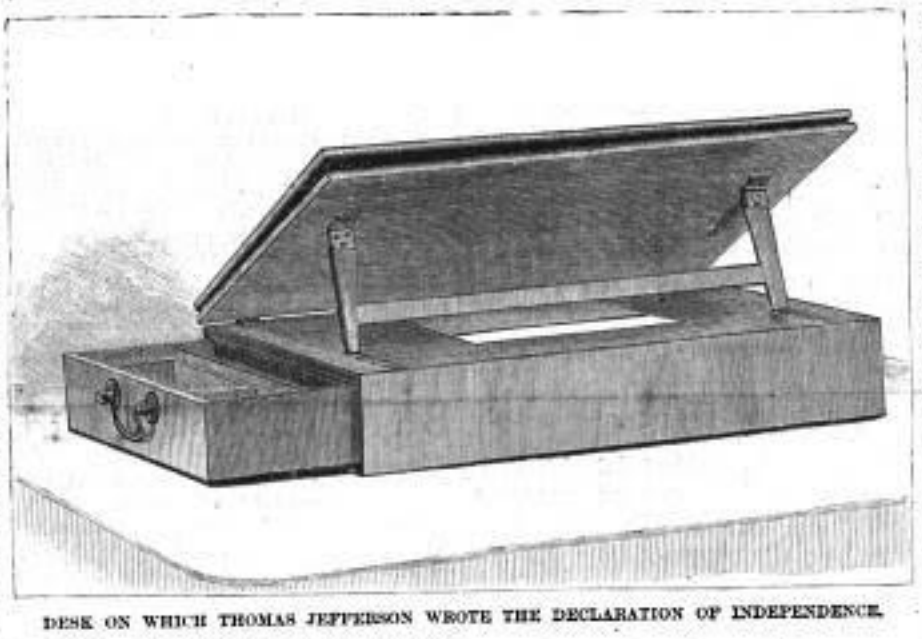
PENNSYLVANIA.—REUNION AT POTTSVILLE OF THE FIRST DEFENDERS OF THE NATIONAL CAPITAL, JUNE 24TH.
FROM SKETCHES BY JOSEPH BECKER.

Digitized by Google

KENTUCKY.—THE CONFEDERATE MONUMENT AT LEXINGTON.
FROM A PHOTO. BY W. E. JOHNS.

THE CONFEDERATE MONUMENT AT LEXINGTON, KY.

LEXINGTON, Kentucky, is a city which no one "doing the grand tour" of the South can afford to neglect. There the stranger can see the great distilleries where the notable "Bourbon" whisky is made; enormous "horse hotels," where board the world-famous racers of that region; the blue-grass plantation where Henry Clay used to rest during the recesses of Congress; the college which is pointed out as the place "where Jeff. Davis went to school," and, in addition to other features, a cemetery remarkable for its natural beauty, for the number of its distinguished dead, for a lofty column erected in honor of Clay, and for a monument which marks the spot where a number of Confederate soldiers are buried.



This last-named monument, an illustration of which we present, though excelled by others in size, is probably the most perfect thing of its kind in the South, and owes its existence to the devoted energy of an association of Southern ladies of Lexington and vicinity, under the presidency of Mrs. General Breckinridge. Viewed under the influence of its surroundings and associations, it presents a picture which challenges criticism. In the midst of several concentric circles of soldiers' graves rises a rocky mound, upon which, represented in pure Carara marble, stands the solitary trunk of a blasted tree which, with its two naked arms, booms boldly up against a background of green elms and pines in the form of a natural cross. Resting against the rugged base is a nameless scroll and a broken sword, and clustered about them are luxuriant Southern foliage and vines. Planted at the foot of the cross is the shivered staff which once upheld the Conquered Banner, but the flag has fallen to rise no more, and its stricken folds, caught by the arms of the cross, but with the stars and bars still showing, droop as lifeless as the martial forms which are moldering around.

This monument exhibits in its design one of the highest qualities of true art, for it tells its own story—the tragic story of the Lost Cause—without the use of a single word upon its front. The conception of this exquisite poem in stone is the result, strange to say, of a purely amateur effort, and originated with George W. Hanck, of Lexington, well known as a brilliant writer, but who neither claims nor attempts anything in the line of art. The design was admirably carried out by Muldoon & Co., of Louisville, Ky. At the dedication of the monument General William Preston delivered an eloquent and impressive address, and H. T. Stanton, of Frankfort, Ky., read a poem of rare beauty.

JEFFERSON'S WRITING-DESK.

ON the 13th of April last, Hon. Robert C. Winthrop delivered to President Hayes, as a gift to the United States, the mahogany writing-desk upon which the Declaration of Independence was written by Thomas Jefferson. It was given in the name of the children of the late Mr. Joseph Coolidge, of Boston, to whom it was given by Jefferson himself in 1825, whose granddaughter Mr. Coolidge had married. The desk was transmitted to the House of Representatives by the President, with a message stating that the owners were anxious to present it to the Government that it might have a place among the archives of the Department of State, and on the 22d of April interesting proceedings were had in both houses of Congress in connection with the presentation. In the House, Mr. Crapo, of Massachusetts, offered a joint resolution of acceptance, and he and Mr. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, delivered appropriate speeches. That of Mr. Tucker was especially fitting and altogether worthy to be handed down with the history of the causes which led to the revolt of the colonies. The galleries were so crowded that Mrs. Hayes, who came with a party from the White House, was unable to reach the seat usually reserved for the President's family. In the Diplomatic Gallery Secretary Evarts occupied a front seat with Mrs. Evarts and Sir Edward Thornton, the British Minister. The latter was an attentive listener, especially to Mr. Tucker's defense of the colonies for revolting against English oppression. Both orations were loudly applauded, after which the members crowded about the Speaker's platform to examine the historic desk, which is not more than eighteen inches long and is of the simplest construction. Subsequently the resolution and desk were sent to the Senate. Senators Dawes, of Massachusetts, and Johnston, of Virginia, made speeches, and the House resolution of acceptance was concurred in.

We are indebted to Mr. Winthrop for the photographs of the desk and Jefferson's autograph inscription. We agree fully with that distinguished citizen of Massachusetts that this precious heirloom has its fit and final place among the choicest and most cherished treasures of the nation, with the title deeds of independence it so proudly asserted.

DESK ON WHICH THOMAS JEFFERSON WROTE THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Th: Jefferson gives this Writing desk to Joseph Coolidge Junr as a Memorial of affection. it was made from a drawing of his own, by Ben Randall cabinet maker of Philadelphia with whom he first lodged on his arrival in that city in May 1776 and is the identical one on which he wrote the Declaration of Independence. Politics as well as Religion has it's superstitions these gaining strength with time may, one day, give imaginary values to this relic, for it's association with the birth of the Great charter of our Independence.

Monticello. Nov. 18. 1825.

FAC-SIMILE OF JEFFERSON'S LETTER PRESENTING HIS WRITING-DESK TO JOSEPH COOLIDGE.

HON. JOSEPH E. BROWN,

UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, ex-Governor of Georgia, who was appointed United States Senator by Governor Colquitt in May last to succeed General Gordon, resigned, is a native of South Carolina, having been born in Pickens County, April 15th, 1821. He moved to Georgia when quite a young man, and commenced life in Canton, Ga., as a lawyer, in 1845. He was elected to the State Senate in 1849, and served with credit to himself in the Legislature. In 1855 he was elected judge of the Blue Ridge circuit, having defeated one of the most popular men in the circuit, Judge David Irwin, by over three thousand majority. In 1857 he was nominated by the Democratic Convention at Milledgeville as a candidate for Governor. Hons. John H. Lumpkin, H. G. Lamar and James Gardner were prominent candidates before the Convention, but the friends of each seemed determined that neither could get sufficient votes to nominate,—and Judge Brown was selected by a committee of conference. Hon. B. H. Hill was Mr. Brown's opponent in this election, Mr. Hill being the nominee of the American or Know-Nothing Party. Judge Brown was elected Governor by over 10,000 majority. The Democratic Convention unanimously nominated him again in 1859, and he defeated the Hon. Warren Aiken, who was his opponent, and was elected by over 20,000 majority. He was again elected Governor for the third term in 1861 over his opponent, Hon. E. A. Nisbet. Mr Brown remained Governor of Georgia during the war. When the war ended he was arrested and carried to Washington and incarcerated in Carroll Prison. After his release by President Johnson he returned to Georgia and resigned his office as Governor. In February, 1866, he visited Washington City with the view of ascertaining the true situation of affairs. On his return to Atlanta a number of citizens asked his advice on the situation, and in compliance with their request he prepared a letter for publication advising the people of the South to accept the situation, comply with the terms of reconstruction, and obtain representation in Congress again as soon as possible. He was opposed by a large majority of the people of the State, and for a time acted with the Republican Party. He was in favor of the Constitutional Convention of 1868, and was appointed in 1868, by Governor Bullock, as Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia. He resigned his place as Chief Justice in 1870, and on the organization of the company that leased the Western and Atlantic road, he was made president of that company. He is president of the Dade Coal Company, president of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, and president of the Board of Education of Atlanta. He has held the office of president in each of these companies ever since their organization.

His life has been a remarkable one. He has been always aggressive. He fought the banks when first elected Governor, fought the Legislature, fought the enforcement and conscript Acts of the Confederate Government, and fought for reconstruction. Before and during the war he was very popular with the people. During the reconstruction period he was very unpopular, but even then he was a power in the State. He was defeated but one time in his life, and this was the result of great bitterness towards him on account of his reconstruction record—when he ran for United States Senator in 1868, and was defeated by Hon. Joshua Hill by a very small majority. He supported Horace Greeley for President in 1872, and has since acted entirely with the Democratic Party.

HON. JOSEPH E. BROWN, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.
FROM A PHOTO. BY MORTON.

MICHIGAN.—NEW CHAPTER HOUSE OF THE PSI UPSILON, AT ANN ARBOR.—SEE PAGE 339.

Digitized by Google

A Veteran Transport.

A BOMBAY correspondent gives the following history of a little steam vessel which, after half a century's vicissitudes, is being broken up. Built in 1836, or thereabouts, and christened the Snake, she was the first steam vessel on the Indus, or, in fact, on any river in India. Returning to Bombay, she towing boats and barges) carried out the whole of the embarkation of troops, stores, etc., sent from there during the first Burmese war, and the expedition to the Persian Gulf from 1823 to 1826. Her services were again similarly utilized in the China war of 1841-2, Burmese war of 1852, Persian war of 1856, mutiny of 1857, China expedition of 1859, and she also assisted in the Abyssinian and Malta expeditions. Her engines were designed and built by a Parsee, and were the first ever manufactured in India. How well they were constructed is evidenced by their lasting powers. She was twice wrecked: once, in a hurricane of 1837; and again, in the cyclone of 1854, when the gunner, who was in charge, ran her ashore as close as he could, opened the cocks in the bottom of the vessel, and escaped up the funnel, where he sat till rescued. She has carried in her day most of the notabilities that have arrived in India via Bombay. She was a wonderful little craft, and has done right good service during an eventful and checkered career.

Philadelphia Street Railways.

IT appears from the official reports that the passenger railways of Philadelphia carried, during the year 1879, an aggregate of 90,822,855 passengers. These passengers paid the companies $4,694,903, an average of something over five cents apiece, including transfers and half-fares. It cost the companies to transport these passengers, with all other expenses of maintenance, $3,134,903, or something less than three and one-half cents apiece. The excess of the aggregate receipts over expenses was $1,813,964, about one-half of which, or $963,534, was distributed in dividends to the stockholders. The paid-in capital of all the companies amounts to something over $6,000,000, so that the dividends average about sixteen per cent. In some cases they are as high as forty-five and even fifty-two per cent., and only in the case of two small roads, and one new one which is still expanding, did they fall below ten per cent.

FUN.

GREAT LIARS IN SCOTLAND.—The first river you come to they will tell you is the Forth. Yes, and they'll tell you that a mountain's Ben Snow'd on, when there isn't a flake of snow within a thousand miles of it.

A "CAPITAL" PUNISHMENT.—Landlady: "Lor' a mussy, Mr Brown, what's the matter, sir?" Master Brown (with lively demonstrations of delight): "Glorious news—I'm going to be hung at last. Hooray!" But he only meant his picture was going to be hung at the Academy.

MISTRESS: "Who were you talking to, Jane?" Cook: "Only my eldest brother, mum. He's—he's in the parlor." Mistress: "Indeed! What is his name?" Cook: "John Smith, mum." Mistress: "But your name is not Smith." Cook: "No, mum; but, you see, he's—he's bin married!"

"AH! my darling wife," said George, the week after his marriage, "if your husband were to die what would you do?" "I don't know, I am sure, George," said the wife, reflectively; "I never thought of that. I must look in my 'Book of Etiquette' and read the rules for young widows."

A (K)NEEDED CURE.—Mick: "Well, Pat, an' what are ye standing gaping at now?" Pat: "The legs of the shindleman as just passed, Mick. An' wasn't I thinking how much better would it be for him to tuck up his trousers and let them fight it out. ("The shindleman as just passed" was badly knock-knee'd.)

THE Rev. Mr. A. was more prominent in his day for the brilliancy of his imagination than the force of his logic. At one time he was preaching on "The Ministry of Angels," and in the peroration he suddenly observed: "I hear a whisper!" The change of tone startled the deacon, who sat below, from a drowsy mood, and, springing to his feet, he spoke: "I guess it is the boys in the gallery."

AN inebriated Texan—presumably a ranger—being at the theatre at Austin the other night when McCullough was acting Othello, and F. B. Warde Iago, became so incensed with Iago that he produced his pistol and declared that he would "shoot the scoundrel." "He must, anyway, be a villain," this practical critic remarked, "and if he don't stop abusing that woman, Iaccho, I'll shoot him anyhow."

ONE of those characteristic Nevada stories is thus briefly told by the Virginia Enterprise: "Recently, during a gale, while boulders as big as pumpkins were flying through the air and water-pipes were being ripped out of the ground, an old Chinaman, with spectacles on his nose, was observed in the eastern part of the town, seated on a knoll, calmly flying his kite—an iron shutter, with a log-chain for a tail."

A NORWICH photographer was perambulating a "machine" the other day when he was hailed by a housekeeper from her doorstep: "Hev yer got enny hot cakes?" "When do you want 'em?" rejoined the broad-brimmed artist. "Right off." "Well, you'll have to wait till they are done. I had to refuse a woman ice-cream a house or two back." Just then the woman took in the situation. "Go on with your old by-sickle," said she, "I thought you was the baker."

WHEN a man in a Vermont grocery store was sitting upon the edge of the counter, and his feet slipped and he raked the whole length of his back on the counter's edge and sat square down in a bushel-basket of eggs which stood right where he couldn't miss it, the grocer was horrified, and exclaimed: "Was it an accident?" and the victim replied: "By crimus, sir, if you insinuate that I skun my back and got myself into this mess on purpose, I'll jam your head into the remains of those eggs!"

ALEXANDER THE GREAT

WEPT because there were no more worlds to conquer, but the proprietors of Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines, who have found it necessary to establish a branch of the World's Dispensary at London, England, in order to supply from that great commercial emporium those remedial blessings to foreign countries, where they are largely in demand, do not share the great conqueror's sentiments, as their conquests are of disease, and have made happy not only the conqueror but the people who employ them. Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery cures all blood and skin diseases, scrofulous affections, swellings and internal soreness, Dr. Pierce's Pellets are the little giant cathartic; Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, woman's tonic and nervine; Dr. Pierce's Extract of Smart-Weed, the great remedy for colds and all bowel affections, as diarrhœa, dysentery and flux. World's Dispensary Medical Association, proprietors, Buffalo and London.

HALFORD LEICESTERSHIRE TABLE SAUCE. No gentleman's table should be set without it. A genuine relish.

ACCIDENTS were plenty on the "4th" to people who were not insured in THE TRAVELERS.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE
IN INDIGESTION.

DR. A. S. CARPENTER, of Keene, N. H., says: "It is a valuable medicine. I have taken it myself, and prescribed it for my patients, for indigestion or enervation of the digestive organs, and always with satisfactory results."

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS.—There is no subject which should more engross attention than the purity of the preparations which are used in flavoring the various compounds prepared for the human stomach. BURNETT'S EXTRACTS are prepared from fruits of the best quality, and are highly concentrated. The "Fifth Avenue," "Continental," "Grand Pacific" and other leading hotels use and indorse BURNETT'S EXTRACTS.

CONGRESSMAN AND COMMODORE J. H. STARIN, who owns and controls over one hundred seagoing craft in and around New York, has, in consequence of the recent disasters, had them all thoroughly inspected and extra precaution taken against accident. All the boilers have been covered with felting to prevent overheating of adjacent woodwork, and to guard against danger of fires from displacement by collision.

WHAT changed your gray hair to its natural color? MRS. H. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Sold by Druggists.

WHAT nobler example of the palatial modern hostelry could there be than the ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL? Centrally located for pleasure and business; with apartments, both single and in suites, of a style to suit the most luxurious; and a table of unsurpassed excellence, the traveler nowhere can find more delightful accommodations. The present administration of the hotel is fully equal, if not superior, to anything in the past.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ¼ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists,
LONDON, ENG.

Worcester's the Standard!

"The best English writers and the most particular American writers use WORCESTER as their authority."—New York Herald.

"The best existing English Lexicon."—London Athenæum.

The Standard Vade Mecum of the Correspondent and Reader.

Worcester's Pocket Dictionary.

Profusely Illustrated. With Valuable Tables and Rules. 319 Pages. 24mo. Cloth.
65 cents.

For the School, the Office and the Counting Room.

Worcester's Comprehensive Dictionary

Profusely Illustrated. With Valuable Appendices.
608 pages. 12mo. Half Roan.
$1.75.

For the Family and the Library.

Worcester's Quarto Dictionary.

Fully Illustrated and Unabridged. 1854 pages.
Library Sheep, Marbled Edges.
$10.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or delivered free of expense, on receipt of price, by the Publishers,

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Philadelphia.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each; five for $1; or per dozen, $2.

GEORGE D. COOPER (Sole Agent),
No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS.

In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their tonic as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will henceforth be put up and sold not only in quart, but

ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,

for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. I. FUNKE, JR., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1 020

GENUINE SECRETS WORTH MILLIONS RELIABLE
Luxuriant Moustaches in 21 days! Startling Complexion in 6 hours! Glorious Health! Boundless Wealth! Bodyless Love! Book FREE—call all, Letter & Co., Toronto, Ont.

EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS!!
5,000 BUILDING LOTS,

Surrounding depot at Stewartville, near Garden City, 23 miles from New York; price, $250 each. Also 10,000 at West Deer Park, 25 miles from New York; price, $50 each. Weekly payments—25 cents a lot. Unusual facilities for building on weekly payments. Call or send stamp for circular to

R. WILSON, Attorney, 57 Broadway, N.Y.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers,

And DEALERS in GOVERNMENT BONDS and other DESIRABLE INVESTMENT SECURITIES,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York.

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds. We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities and to execute orders for the same. Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange or in the open market. Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect U. S. coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge. ☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities. We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application. FISK & HATCH.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.
THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,
Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn, Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time-tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of
HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves pier No. 18 N. R, foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elmira. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.
STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half-hourly to 8.45 P. M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A. M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P. M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 22d St., N. R., at 9.15, 10.15 A. M., and hourly to 6.25 P. M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 22d St. The boats leaving 22d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P. M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A. M. hourly to 8.25 P. M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A. M. to 12.20 P. M., 1.25 to 6.25 P. M., 7.20 to 9.20 P. M., and 10.40 P. M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 22d St. leave every hour from 11 A. M. to 9.55 P. M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

BRIGHTON BEACH.

BROOKLYN, FLATBUSH & CONEY ISLAND RAILWAY.

TRAINS LEAVE FLATBUSH AVENUE, LONG ISLAND DEPOT, BROOKLYN, hourly from 6.20 to 9.15 A. M., and from 9.35 A. M. to 10.45 P. M. half-hourly. Separate trains run from BEDFORD half-hourly from 11.34 A. M. to 10.04 P. M. Last train from the Beach leaves at 11.10 P. M.

Flatbush Avenue, L. I., Depot is reached via Flatbush Avenue cars from Fulton Ferry, and Atlantic Avenue cars from South, Wall and Fulton Ferries.

Bedford Station is reached via Grand and Roosevelt Street Ferries by the Franklin Avenue cars and Rapid Transit trains.

W. E. DORWIN,
General Superintendent.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

55 ASSORTED Perfumed Cards, with name, 10c. SIDNEYVILLE CARD CO., 21st Ward, Cincinnati.

Amusements.

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Asst's Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
MONDAY, JUNE 14th, W. C. Mitchell's Pleasure Party in OUR GOBLINS,
HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS,
THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST,
From Pier 43, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P. M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE,
From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P. M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,
Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Goshen Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

MRS. M. J. COLLEY, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,
Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. Six thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females. JNO. L. EUBANK, Proprietor.
Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.

JAMES A. FRASER, Owner and Proprietor.
COLONEL N. COSE, General Manager.

The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and prescribed by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professors T. Guilford Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville.

Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

Get off at Covington for the
HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails and telegraph-office. Board, $2.50 per day; $15 per week; $50 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station, $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. E. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.
H. C. EUBANK, Proprietor.

HANCOCK-ENGLISH.
CARFIELD-ARTHUR.

Take advantage of the great political excitement. Send 10c. for samples of either two candidates, or 20c. for the four, with terms to agents. Secure territory at once. You can make money fast. The pictures are heroic size, splendid in appearance, and sell fast. From $5 to $15 per day profit is certain. Address,
SHIPMAN & CO., 8 Reade St., New York.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.
Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE
For August Now Ready.

WITH THE FOLLOWING BRILLIANT TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"Sister Dora": A Model Christian Nurse. Illustrated.
"Venice: Its Past and Present." Eleven Beautiful Illustrations.
"Missionary Effort in Patagonia." By Rev. Daniel Edwards. Seven Illustrations.
"With St. Paul at Athens." By Rev. Professor Porter, D. D. Nine Illustrations.
"Religious Aspect of Gothic Architecture." By Dean Stanley.
"Binding the Feet in China." By Rev. Eoss C. Houghton.
"Nebuchadnezzar." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"The Children of the Bible." No. VII. Abijah, Prince of Israel.
Serial and Short Stories, Sketches, etc.—"Bo-Bo, the Nailmaker's Daughter," by the Author of "Gideon's Rock" (Chaps. XXXII. to XXXIV.); Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the author of "Little Hinges" (Chaps. I. to IV.); Illustrated. "The Clerk's Marriage"; Illustrated. "Robinson in New York," by Rev. E. E. Hale; Illustrated. "The Mayberrys at the Seashore," by Albert Wallwyn; Illustrated. "The Children of Hesh." "A Night of Anguish"; Illustrated. "Battle between Hawk and Crows"; Illustrated. "Bishop Ryle of Liverpool"; (with portrait). "The Methodist Bishops"; (with portraits of Rev. Drs. Cyrus D. Foss, John F. Hurst, Henry W. Warren, and E. O. Haven.) "A Bit of a Scrape"; Illustrated, etc., etc.
Essays.—"The Lord's Prayer"; Illustrated. "The Christian Slumber-Song." By Augusta Browne Garrett "Celibacy of the Clergy," etc.
Poems.—"Beneath the Cross"; Illustrated. "Thoughts"; Illustrated border. "June Nights" and "Song of the Twilight." By E. W. Bellamy (from Victor Hugo). "Village Chimes." "A Summer-Day Idyl." "The Bird in the Rain." "Missionary Hymn." By Carrie L. Post. "The Owl and the Lynx."
Miscellany.—"Salted with Fire." "Jabez of the Chronicles, identified with the Pharaoh of Joseph." "Action for Damages among the Jews." "Good Advice for Everybody." "On the Housetop." "Hessians"; Illustrated. "Caracas, in the Land of Earthquakes"; Illustrated. "The Catacombs"; Illustrated. "Christian Warfare." "What Music Did." "The Sealing of the Sepulchre"; Illustrated. "Watering Plants in Jerusalem"; Illustrated. "Traveling in the Seventeenth Century," by Lord Macaulay. "The Sea," etc., etc.
"Wit, Wisdom and Pathos of Childhood," "Religious Notes and News," "Editor's Portfolio," "Obituary Notices," "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep." "The Christian slumber song," composed for the SUNDAY MAGAZINE by Augusta Browne Garrett.

128 Quarto Pages---100 Engravings.

Single copies, 15 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

DR. BROWNING'S

C. & C. CORDIAL

For Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis,
Tickling or Dryness of the Throat,
Sore Throat, Cold in the Head,
Cold in the Bowels, Asthmatic Coughs,
Whooping Cough, Croup, Influenza,
Hoarseness, and Relief of Consumptives.

Dr. BROWNING is a regular graduate of medicine, a skillful pharmacist and a thorough chemist. His "C. & C." (Cough and Cold) CORDIAL is not the result of mere chance, but of long scientific research in chemistry and medicine, as is very plainly seen by the rapidity of its action and its unparalleled efficacy. The expense of its manufacture is at least five times as great as that of any other medicine upon the market, and yet it is sold at the exceedingly low price of 50c. Sample bottles (for a short time only), 25c. For sale by all druggists and by the proprietor,

W. C. BROWNING, M.D.,
1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW; apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.

DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

THE
Mohave Mining and Milling Co.
MINERAL PARK AND CERBAT DISTRICTS,
Mohave Co., Arizona.
Organized under the Laws of the State of New York.

Capital, $1,000,000, in 100,000 Shares, at $10 each.
STOCK NON-ASSESSABLE.

OFFICERS:

EDWARD M. CLARK, Pres't. WILLIAM B. CHAPIN, Treas.
MAJOR GEORGE CLENDON, M. E., Sup't.
RICHARD W. C. MARINGTON, Sec'y.
LOUIS DAVIDSON, Arizona, Eng'r.
BANKERS—National Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The four silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 120 Broadway.

ELGIN WATCHES,

All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $5 to $50. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

RELIABLE

DYKES' BEARD ELIXIR (1st bottle), and will do it on the smoothest face, or your money back. Sent anywhere, ALWAYS WEAR GLOVES WHEN APPLYING, having used from 1 to 3 Pers'ps. No injury. Bottle sealed. Charges to others. Postpaid on receipt of price, $1.00, or 6 Bottles for $5.00. L. L. DYKES & CO., Box A 47 St., Philadelphia, Pa.

The genuine has our name and address blown in bottle. Beware of imitations and deliveries to others.

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts. postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

THE MACIC CIGAR FAN.

This is a novelty as useful as ornamental, and makes a delightful present to a lady, the presentation always causing great amusement. For all appearance. It is a genuine Hanky Chief cigar of superior quality. But on pulling the tip, a dainty white frill appears, which soon spreads out into an elegant circular fan, of which the cigar is the handle. On closing the fan, it grows smaller and smaller, gradually but surely disappearing within itself, until only the brown cigar is left. When in course from or where it goes to, is a mystery difficult to unravel. An immense deal of fun may be had by young men playing it among their cigars and offering it to a friend as an "extra imported brand." The fan can be opened and closed very rapidly, is strong and compact, and be carried in the pocket or cigar case, and is always ready for use. Price, 50 cents, three for 75 cents, or $2.50 per dozen, by mail postpaid. Clean Postage Stamps, of any denomination, accepted the same as cash. Address,

Eureka Trick and Novelty Co.,
P. O. Box 4614. 39 Ann St., New York.

WITH

$5

YOU CAN BUY A WHOLE

5 per ct. Imp. Austrian 100fl. Gov't Bond

Issue of 1860.

These bonds are guaranteed by the Imperial Government of Austria, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually.

They are redeemed in two drawings annually, in which 100 large premiums of 60,000, 10,000 5,000,

etc., florins are drawn.

Every Austrian 5 per cent. 100 florin bond, which does not draw one of the larger premiums, must be redeemed with at least

120 Florins,

as there are no blanks, and every bond must draw something.

The next drawing takes place on the 1st of August 1880,

And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of August is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that day. Country orders sent in Registered Letters and inclosing $5 will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address,

International Banking Co.,
130 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

Established in 1874.

N. B.—In writing, please state that you saw this in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

50 Fancy Cards, 10c., or 20 Gold and Silver Chromos, 10c. Stamps taken. J. B. HUSTED, Nassau, N. Y.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

White's Patent Lever Truss

Is the best Truss in the world for holding and curing Hernia. Its lifting power is just the thing—no pressure on back. Every ruptured person should have one. Pamphlets free. Address,

WHITE'S LEVER TRUSS CO.,
61 Warren St., New York.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE | THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 223 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. [L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$6, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 338 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3696

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 150—155 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-houses and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF | By sending 35 cents, with age, height, color of eyes and hair, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

52 Gold, Crystal, Lace, Perfumed & Chromo Cards, name in Gold & Jet, 10c. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

40 PAGE BOOK OF WONDERS for a 3-cent stamp. Address, H. FOX & CO., 391 Canal St., N. Y.

20 Lovely Rosebud Chromo Cards, or 20 all Floral Motto, with name, 10c. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Ag'ts Samples 10c. Comc. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. HEISKELL, M. D., President of the National Medical Ass'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

TAPE-WORM

INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. EICKBORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

ELEGANT AUTOGRAPH ALBUM, bound in Gilt, 48 pages, Engraved in Colors, and 44 select Quotations for same, 15c. 12 Photograph Cards, name and photo on, 50c. Send photograph. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

50 Elegant Cards. New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY

A NEW VOLUME.
Increased Attractions, Literary and Artistic.

THE JULY NUMBER NOW READY.

CONTENTS:

"THE BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS." By N. Robinson. Twenty Illustrations and portraits.

"THE FADS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT." By Dora de Blaquiere. Eleven Illustrations.

"HOW THE JAPANESE AMUSE THEMSELVES—INNOCENT PERFORMERS." By Edward Greey. Eight Illustrations.

"AMONG THE MANUFORTS." Illustrated.

"SALT KNOB AND THE ONLY LAKE IN VIRGINIA." Five Illustrations.

"W. C. MACREADY." By J. Brander Matthews. Six Illustrations and portraits.

"THE EYE AND ITS USE." By Wm. Ackroyd. Sixteen Illustrations.

SERIAL, SHORT STORIES, SKETCHES, ETC.—"Not Guilty," by Etta W. Pierce (Chaps. XIX. to XXIII.); Illustrated. "The Romance of a Rose." "Till the Sun Grows Cold," by E. V. Hastings; Illustrated. "Dais"; Illustrated. "Handsome, Haughty, Hateful Harry Halstead," by Harriet P. Spofford; Illustrated. "A Strange Cruise"; Illustrated. "As Woman's Love"; Illustrated. "The Lady Urquart"; Illustrated. "Faithful to the Last"; Illustrated. "A Mystery of the Sea"; Illustrated. "Winning in Spite of Himself," by Richard B. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger"; Illustrated. "Linderia's Wife"; Illustrated. "Poindexter's Vow"; Illustrated. "The Lehigh Valley"; Illustrated. "A Murder Discovered by Touching a Dead Body"; Illustrated. "Traveling in the East"; Illustrated. "The Skeleton of Holar Church—An Icelandic Legend"; Illustrated.

POEMS.—"Myrtale." "The Maiden's Reverie"; Illustrated. "The Child to the Waves"; Illustrated. "The Bonnie Brig o' Balgownie"; Illustrated. "Twilight"; "Outside the Window," by Nellie C. Hastings. "Mark"; Illustrated.

MISCELLANY.—"The Mastiff Elm Tree." "An Unauthorized Tabak's Collegium"; Illustrated. "Human Nature in a Load of Wood." "Rose Legends." "In a Palm Grove"; Illustrated. "The Metamorphoses of the Cicada or Locust"; Illustrated. "The One-Thousand-Mile Tree"; Illustrated. "Blind Metcalf, the Engineer." "The Largest Workshop in the World." "A Bearish Goldconda"; Illustrated. Etc., etc.

128 Pages Quarto—Over 100 Embellishments.

A HANDSOME COLORED FROONTISPIECE—"A MORNING KISS FOR DEAR MAMMA."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3, postpaid.

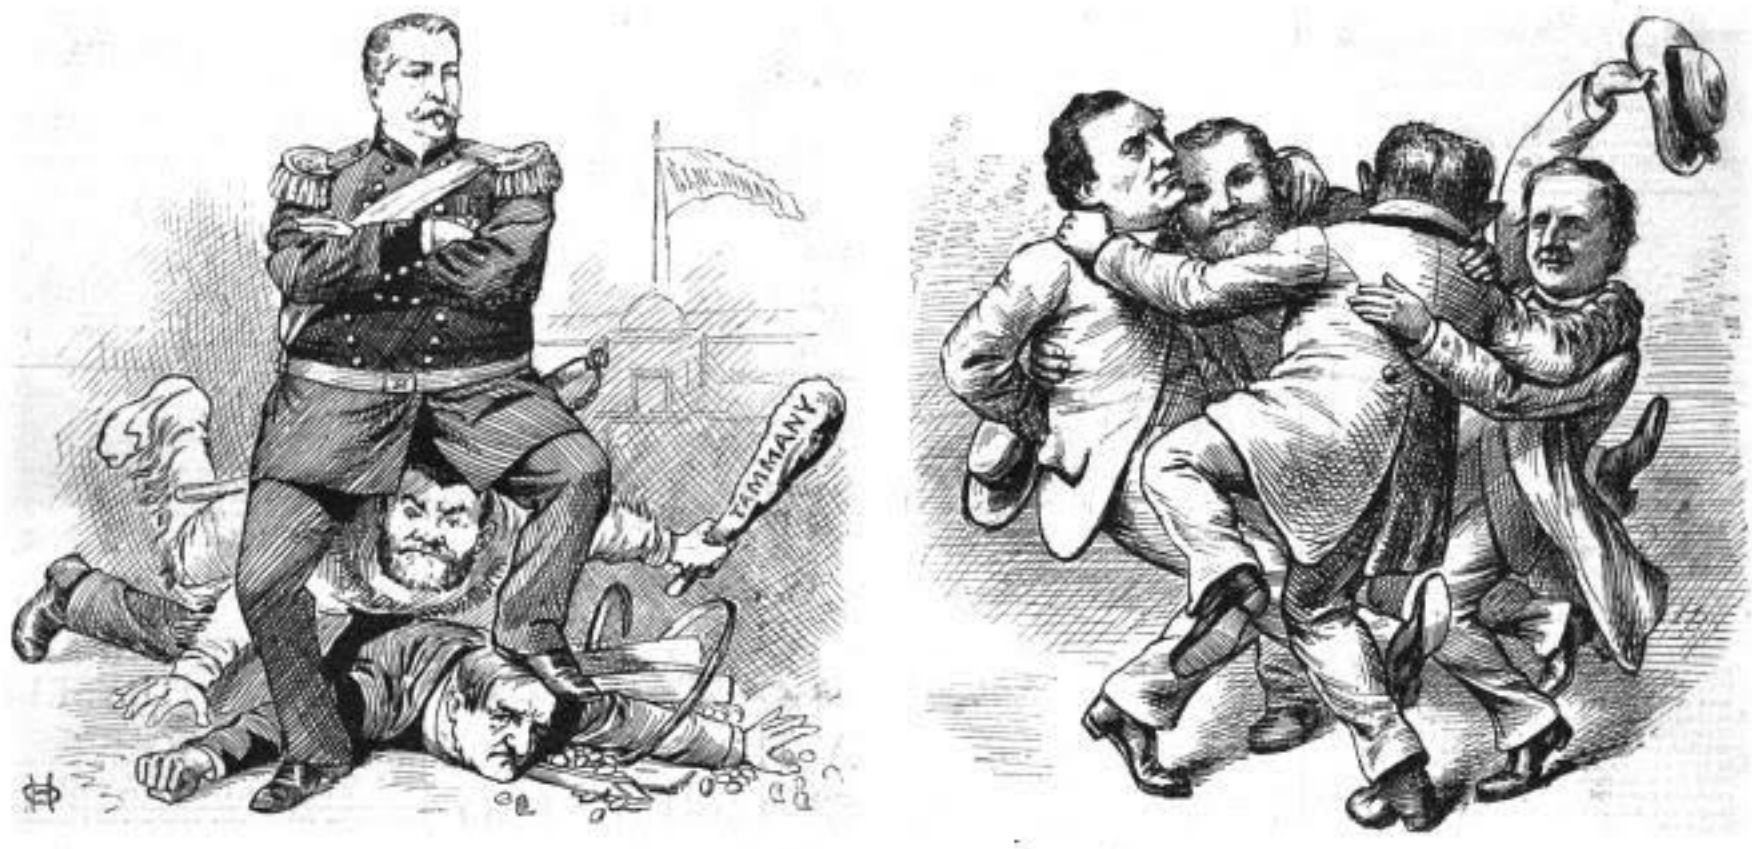
SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

A PLEASURABLE PUBLICATION.

Frank Leslie's
PLEASANT HOURS.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE, INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.



PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

"Pleasant Hours" will prove to be a Delightful Traveling Companion.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

RESULTS OF THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

Subordinating the Civil to the Military. A Love-feast of the vanquished.

THE Admiration
OF THE WORLD.
Mrs. S. A. Allen's
WORLD'S Hair Restorer
IS PERFECTION!

FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.

IT IS NOT A DYE.

It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Chesapeake & Ohio Railway

A favorite route for freight and passenger traffic between the East and West, in connection with packets on the Ohio River; railroads diverging at Cincinnati to West, Southwest and Northwest, and with various roads intersecting it; also with steamers and sail-vessels on the coast connecting at Richmond, Va.

Particular attention is called to the
GREAT REDUCTION
IN
EXCURSION FARES
TO THE
Various Springs and Summer Resorts
IN THE
MOUNTAINS OF VA. AND W. VA.
DURING THE SEASON OF 1880.

Tickets on sale at the Freight and Passenger Office of the Company, 229 Broadway, New York, and at the principal Ticket Offices throughout the country.

CONWAY R. HOWARD, G. P. & T. A.,
Richmond, Va.

Rates will be given and contracts made for freight to or from all points reached by the C. & O. Railway and its connections, by

H. W. CARR, Gen'l Eastern Ag't,
229 BROADWAY.

$3 Printing Press

Prints cards (size 3x5 inches) $3; $8 larger size for business or pleasure, young or old. No previous advertising to learn. Catalogue of press, type, cards, &c., for 2 stamps. Kelsey & Co. Meriden, Conn

SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail 50 cents. Circulars free. J. Bingh & Co., 36 Dey St., N.Y.

AND NOT WEAR OUT

Parker House, New Bedford, Mass.

Centrally and conveniently located, both for business people and other guests, on Purchase, Middle and Elm Streets. Recently renovated, newly furnished and greatly improved by extensive additions. The house will be found homelike and well-suited for the comfort of ladies and families. It is the only first-class hotel in New Bedford, and guests can obtain the most sumptuous apartments or more simple accommodations, with prices to correspond. Very favorable terms made with commercial agents and representatives of regular business houses. Telegraph office in the rotunda. First-class livery stable in connection with the house. A First-class House, offering superior accommodations to tourists en route for Martha's Vineyard. HOLDER M. BROWNELL, Prop'r.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS
For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.
NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all season of the year.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, July 8, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, July 17, 1 P.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL.....Thursday, July 22, 3 P.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, July 31, 1 P.M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, August 7, 3 P.M.
From Pier 37, North River, foot of Clarkson St.
Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $26. Drafts at lowest rates.
Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.
These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.
JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

FRESCO STENCILS Colored Sketches and Mixed Colors to match. Also, Pamphlets of Instruction. Address, J. Z. Gurnee, 141 E. 32d St., N.Y.

WILHELMS-QUELLE
IMPORTED
NATURAL MINERAL WATER
FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.
LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.
SOLE IMPORTERS,
MACK & BRUNLER,
7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,
Near Post Office.

Mining Trust Company
OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.
Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests: The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stock; payments of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.

American Mining Stock Exchange
(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company).
EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE
A practical road machine. Indorsed by the medical profession as the most healthful of out-door sports. Send 3c. stamp for 24-page catalogue with price list and full information, or 10 cts. for catalogue and copy of "The Bicycling World." THE POPE MFG. CO.,
59 SUMMER ST., Boston, Mass.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,
Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.
SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.
KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY.
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

17-Stop ORGANS
Sub-bass & Oct. Coupler, box'd & ship'd, only $97.75. New Pianos $195 to $1,600. Before you buy an instrument be sure to see my Mid-summer offer illustrated, free. Address, Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, N. J.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!
Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of
TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

MABIE, TODD & BARD.
GOLD PENS.

Pencils, Holders, Cases, etc.
180 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send for Price-List.
Our Goods are for sale by First-class Dealers in U. S.

KIDNEY-WORT
The Only Medicine
That Acts at the Same Time on
The Liver, the Bowels and the Kidneys.
These great organs are the natural cleansers of the system. If they work well, health will be perfect; if they become clogged, dreadful diseases are sure to follow with TERRIBLE SUFFERING.
Biliousness, Headache, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Constipation and Piles, or Kidney Complaints, Gravel, Diabetes, or Rheumatic Pains and Aches, are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should have been expelled naturally.
KIDNEY-WORT
will restore the healthy action and all these destroying evils will be banished; neglect them and you will live but to suffer.
Thousands have been cured. Try it and you will add one more to the number. Take it and health will once more gladden your heart.
Why Suffer longer from the torment of an Aching back? Why bear such distress from Constipation and Piles?
Kidney-Wort will cure you. Try a package at once and be satisfied.
It is a dry vegetable compound and
One Package makes six quarts of Medicine.
Your Druggist has it, or will get it for you. Insist upon having it. Price, $1.00.
WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,
10 (Will send post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.
Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,
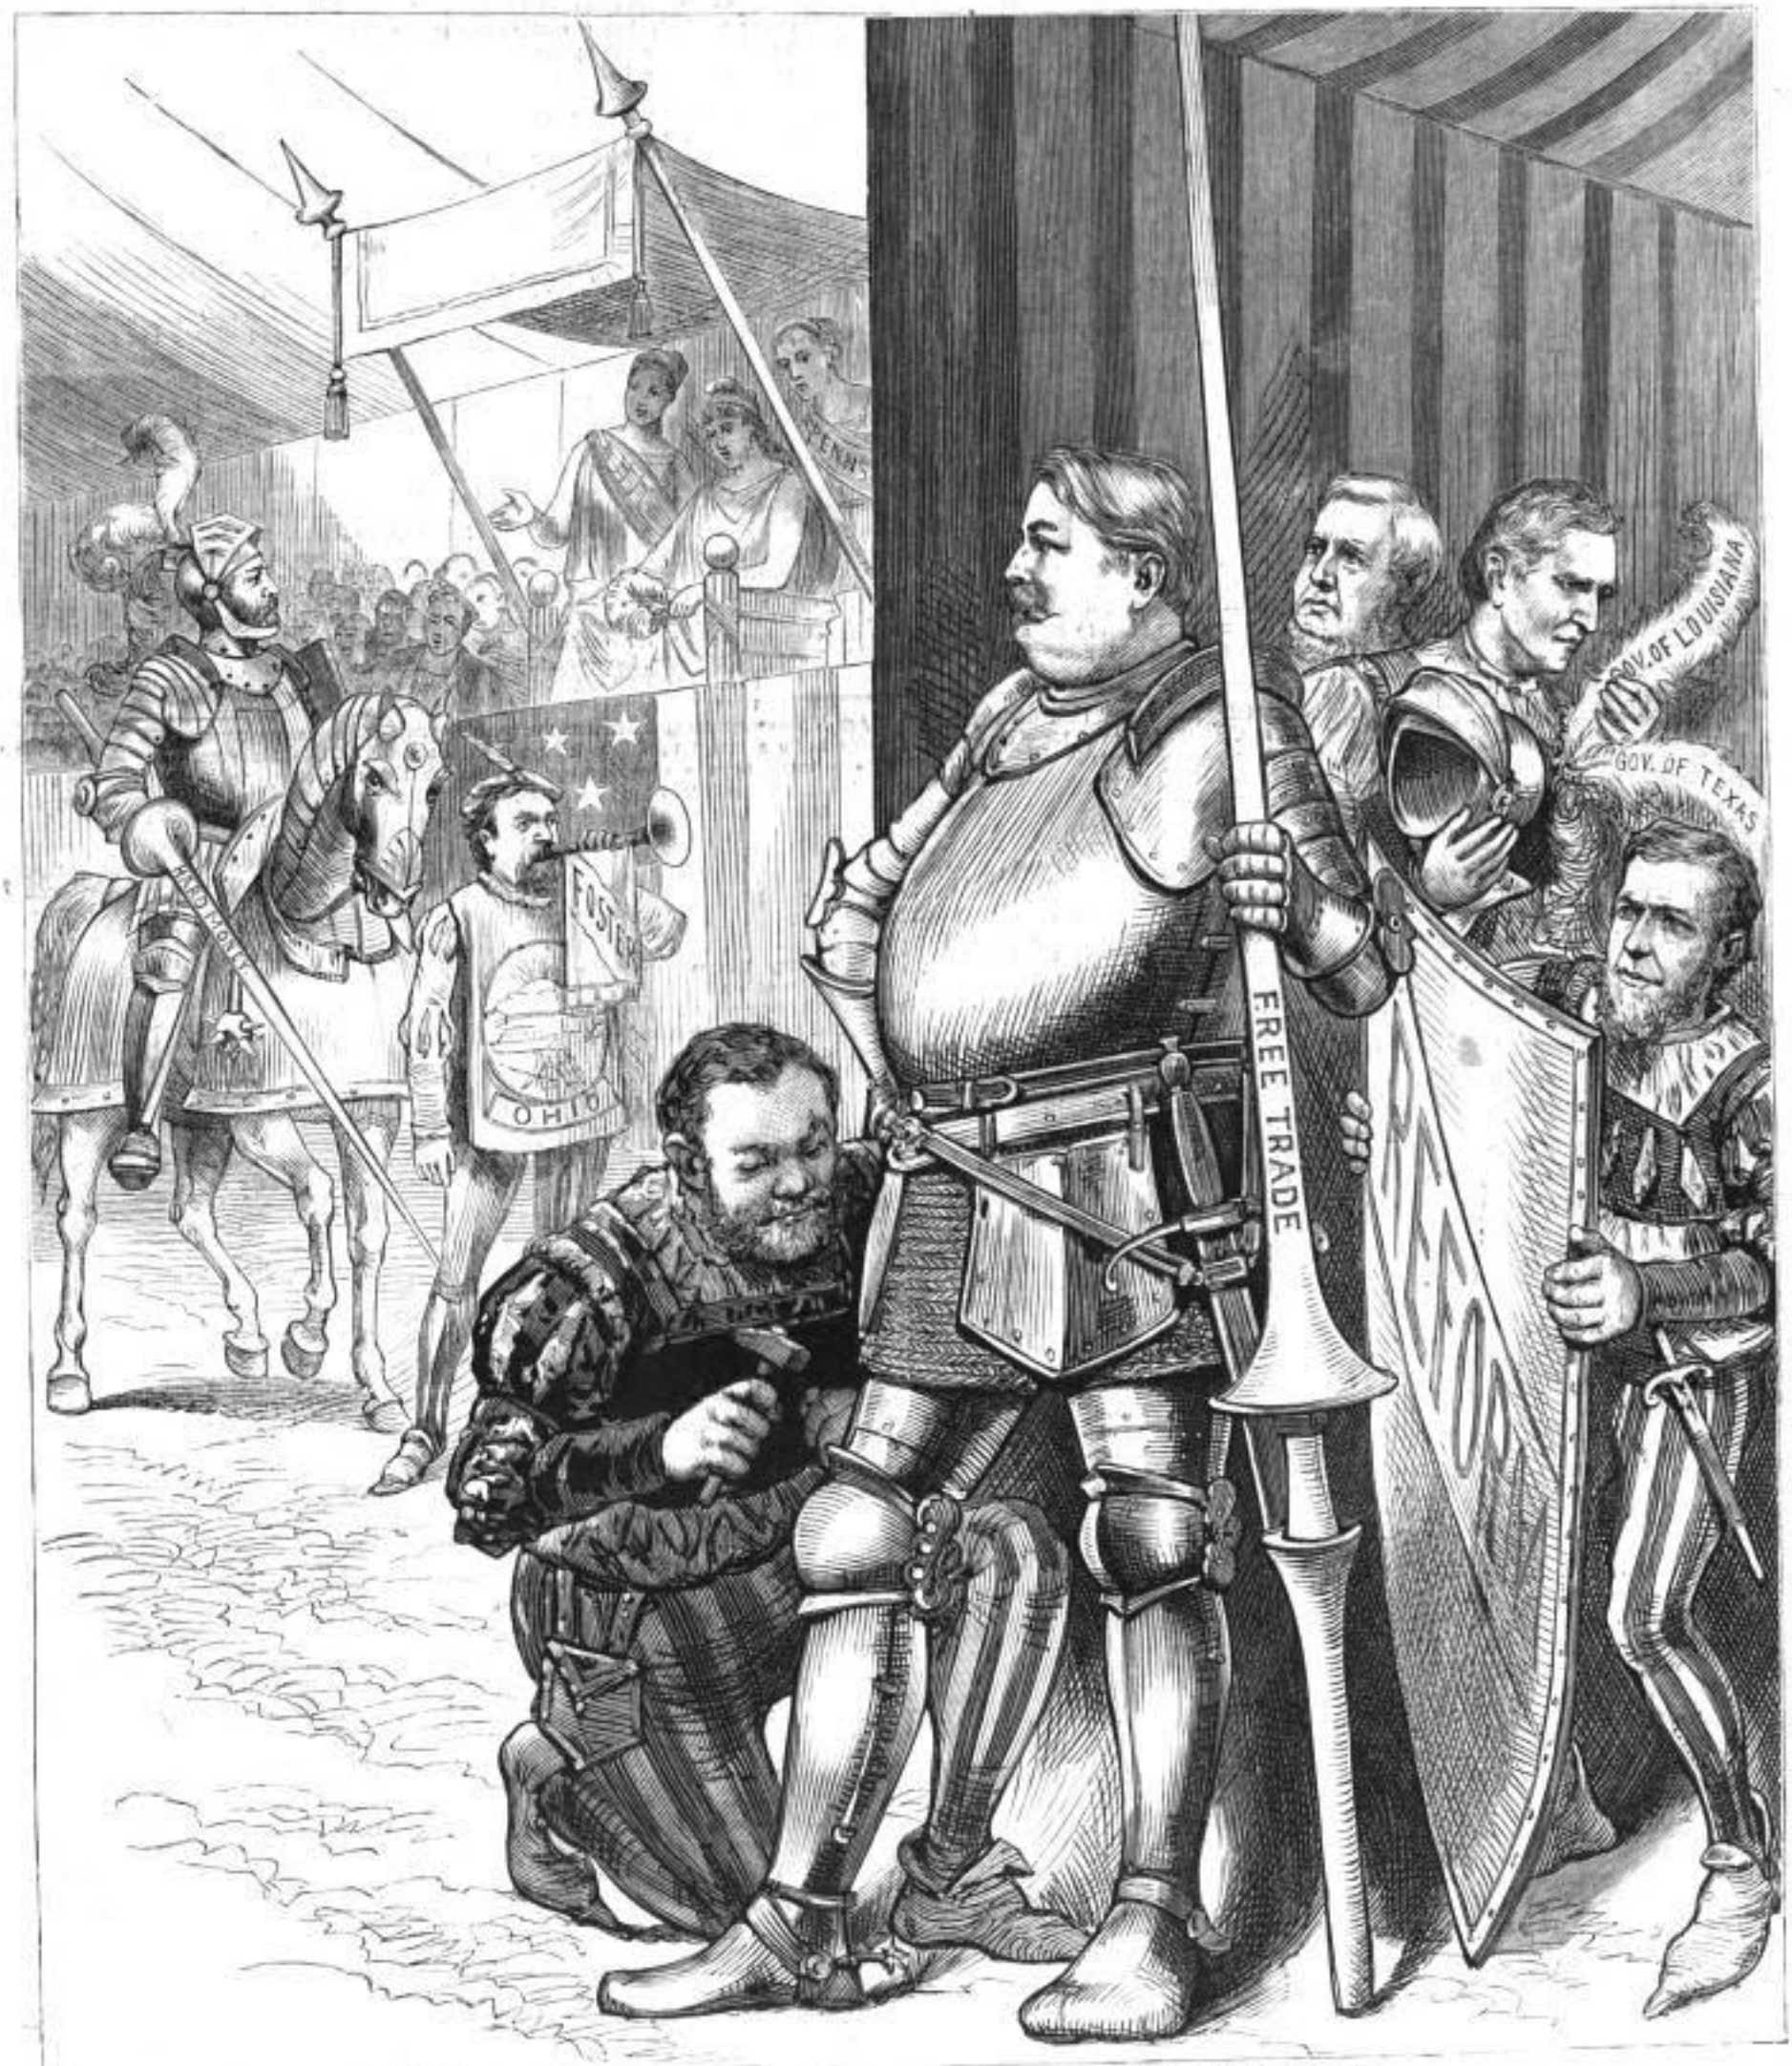
Furnished free.
GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 482, N. Y.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio



THE SUMMER FASHIONS
JUST RECEIVED FROM PARIS.
COLORED & PLAIN FASHION PLATES
IMPORTED MONTHLY EXCLUSIVELY FOR
Frank Leslie's
LADY'S MAGAZINE
—AND—
Gazette of Fashion,
Published on the 15th of each month. Annual subscription, $3.00, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ellsler, assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-Class Matter.

No. 1,295.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, JULY 24, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1.00.

PREPARING TO ENTER THE LISTS FOR THE PRESIDENTIAL JOUST.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, JULY 24, 1880

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ISSUE.

IT is a just remark of Dr. Von Holst, in his "Constitutional and Political History of the United States," that Calhoun and his disciples were not the authors of the doctrines and tendencies which finally culminated in nullification and secession. "The States' Rights question," he adds, "is as old as the Constitution itself, and has always been a living one, even when it has not been one of life and death." Sometimes this question of "life and death" has been precipitated on the country by the encroachments of the Federal Government on the rights of the States, as under the administration of John Adams, when the Alien and Sedition laws provoked a great popular reaction, and as under the Administration of General Grant, when State Legislatures were organized in Louisiana and South Carolina at the will and pleasure of the Federal Executive. Sometimes this question of "life and death" has been precipitated by the encroachments of the States on the just prerogatives of the Federal Government, as in the days of the Hartford Convention, of South Carolina nullification in 1832, and of the secession revolt in the year 1860. And in the intervals between these grand crises, the question raised concerning the comparative rights of the States and of the Federal Government under our compound polity has still been a living one, giving shape and direction to the organization of parties, and determining, in part at least, the nature of the issues on which they have divided.

Happily for the country this question of secular controversy in our political annals is not one of "life and death" to day, but none the less is it a living one in the elements of party formation, in the dialect of political discussion and in the divergent drift of public opinion on measures of special legislation and of general public policy. We need but glance at the two platforms erected respectively by the Republican and Democratic parties as recently assembled in national convention, in order to discern in them the traces of this perennial conflict. In the Republican Platform we read as follows:

"The Constitution of the United States is a supreme law, and not a mere contract; out of confederated States it made a sovereign nation. Some powers are denied to the nation, while others are denied to the States; but the boundary between the powers delegated and those reserved is to be determined by the national, and not by the State, tribunals."

In the Democratic Platform this declaration is met by a counter-declaration pledging:

"Opposition to centralization, and that dangerous spirit of encroachment which tends to consolidate the powers of all departments in one, and thus to create, whatever be the form of government, a real despotism."

Each of these declarations, separately considered, contains nothing to which a just and candid criticism can object, but, on a comparative view, they reveal the contrary tendencies and the conflicting predilections of the two historical parties which are in presence of each other before the American people to day. It is entirely true, as the Republican Platform affirms, that "the Constitution of the United States is a supreme law, and not a mere contract"; that out of "confederated States" it has made "a sovereign nation" for the purposes specified in the Constitution; and that the boundary line between the disputed jurisdictions of the State and of the Federal Governments is to be "determined by the national, and not by the State, tribunals"—at least until three-fourths of the States shall counteract the decision of a national tribunal by an amendment to the Constitution, as they did in the celebrated case of Chisholm vs. the State of Georgia. But it is equally true, as the Democratic Platform affirms, that "opposition to centralization" is among the political duties of the American citizen, for if there be danger in the centrifugal tendencies of an exaggerated self-assertion on the part of the States, there is also danger in the "spirit of encroachment, which tends to consolidate the powers of all departments in one, and thus to create, whatever be the forms of government, a real despotism."

No candid Democrat will to-day deny that in the year 1860 it was the first and highest duty of the American citizen to resist the encroachments of the States on the lawful prerogatives of the Federal Government. No candid Republican will to-day deny that under the Administration of President Johnson, and especially at the crisis of his attempted impeachment, it was the first and highest duty of the American citizen to resist the encroachments of a Republican Congress on the rights of the States and on the rights vested by the Constitution in the co-ordinate departments of the Government. The political tendencies respectively represented under this head by each of the great parties of the country are equally wholesome if kept within the limits of reason and law, and equally perilous if allowed, under the stress of party passion, to transgress the boundaries prescribed by moderation and justice. And the duty of a good citizen, at any given period in our political history, so far as this constitutional issue is concerned, must be ascertained by marking the signs of the times. If there are portents of danger from an exaggeration of "State Rights," so called, he should set his face like a flint against the party from which such danger proceeds. If there are portents of danger from an exaggerated centralism, he should set his face like a flint against the party from which that peril proceeds. If there be no crisis in either direction, and if the question be a living one only because it is permanently rooted in the fundamental structure of our institutions, he may decide his present political affiliations according to what he deems the preponderance of public policy in the matter of other questions which must needs come to the front as soon as this overmastering issue has been placed in abeyance by some accepted equipoise of the forces embodied in our composite polity.

In order to perceive how much of this conflict is sometimes factitious and how much of it is real, we have but to note the remarkable fact that the party in power always tends to exalt the prerogatives of the Federal Government, and the party in opposition always tends to exalt the rights of the States. The Democratic Party, though nominally "a State Rights Party," was extreme at the height of its predominance in the assertion of Federal prerogatives for the protection of slavery, and the Republican Party, before its accession to power, was fluent in the championship of "State Rights"—even giving them a prominent place in its platform of the year 1860. But since that date the Republicans, partly from the force of circumstances and partly from the natural drift of opinion, have been the exemplars of Federal prerogative in its extremest forms, until, in the end, they so far roused the conservative spirit of the country that even such an eminent Republican as our present enlightened Secretary of State did not hesitate to preside over a public meeting called in this city for the purpose of rebuking the centralizing tendencies of the Grant Administration, as illustrated in the organization of the Louisiana Legislature at the point of the bayonet.

And each of the two parties is swift to change sides on this question at the impulse of party necessity or at the promise of party advantage. The Republicans in Congress did not hesitate to espouse the doctrine of "State rights" in its boldest form when, in counting the Presidential ballots cast in the Electoral College of 1876, they denied to Congress the right of going "behind the returns" even for the purpose of correcting a return which had been pronounced invalid by the Supreme Court of Florida. And now that a Democratic majority prevails in both Houses of Congress, we may be sure that they will exercise the full prerogatives of Congress on counting the electoral ballot cast for the next President and Vice-President of the United States, as was done by the Republicans in the days of their supremacy. When the necessities of party and the ambiguities of political discussion are seen to land the adherents of the same organization sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other of the same dividing line, it is obvious that the intelligent voter cannot safely surrender his opinions under this head to the control of either Republican or Democratic managers, but must make for himself the wise choice dictated by the emergencies of each living issue as it rises to the surface of public discussion. For this never-ending question of constitutional limitations is a question in which each party is sometimes right and sometimes wrong. It is the source, and the proximity of the peril arising from that source, that must decide the attitude of the citizen in each Presidential contest.

OUR GOLD AND SILVER MINING INTERESTS.

THAT investments in gold and silver mining stocks in this country are regarded by many persons as so dangerous as to be avoided under any and all circumstances is a fact that requires no demonstration. The heavy men of Wall Street, who, without a second thought, would include coal stocks among their collaterals for a loan, would not jeopardize their credit by including among the securities offered by them a single share of stock of the best and most secure dividend-paying gold or silver mine in the country.

That this feeling of distrust in mining securities in general is alike illogical, unjust and unwise, is easily demonstrable. A cursory retrospect of what has been done in this country during the very limited period of, say, the last thirty years, will convince the greatest skeptic that, directly and indirectly, the development of our gold and silver mines has exercised a more potent influence in populating and building up all of this country west of the Missouri River than any other factor could possibly have done.

When gold was discovered on the late General Sutter's farm, in 1848, people rushed to the newly-acquired territory of California from every section of what then practically comprised this country. No hazards were sufficient to stay the migration. The placer gold mines of California peopled the then territory, and, but for those diggings, the prosperous Eureka State of to-day would be but a cattle-grazing ranche. In time, as the placers gave out and capital became indispensable for large mining enterprises, the miners turned their attention to agriculture, and were agreeably surprised to find land whose richness is unsurpassed in any part of the earth's surface. Up to 1855 California imported all her cereals.

As in the course of time the placer mines of California ceased to offer a remunerative field to the miners, many of these hardy pioneers struck out in search of fresh fields of mineral industry, and successfully discovered and commenced to develop the boundless mineral veins and deposits of Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Dakota, Utah, Arizona, Colorado and New Mexico. The mineral wealth of that section of the continent first drew the people to it. It kept them there. It built up our marvelous system of trans-continental railroads. It converted sterile deserts into blooming farms, and has within a limited space of thirty years settled thirty millions of human beings, with all their wants and all their producing capabilities, in a section of country that, but for the gold and silver discovered in it, would, possibly for centuries, certainly for scores of years, have remained, if not a barren waste, at best a cattle-grazing region of not the most desirable conditions.

Apart, however, from the indirect benefits which have accrued to every industry in this country by the development of our gold and silver mines, the yield of bullion itself has "made all the world wonder" and promises, in the near future, to surpass in value that of any other of our industries, agricultural or mineral.

What has been done in the way of extracting gold from the placers and quartz veins of California, or the $300,000,000 of bullion from the veins of the world-renowned Comstock lode, are but as drops of water in the ocean compared to the boundless and absolutely incalculable wealth lying in the hills and gulches of the as yet comparatively virgin fields of our Western and Southwestern States and Territories. The State of Colorado and the Territories of Utah, Arizona and New Mexico on the southwest, and of Idaho, Montana and Dakota on the northwest, bid fair to surpass in their yield of gold and silver even the astounding wealth extracted from the soil of California and Nevada.

The mineral riches of these districts is to-day populating them as California was populated in 1850 and Nevada in 1859. Railroads are stretching out their lines to-day almost exclusively to mineral sections of the country, and all the benefits of civilization follow close upon the trail of the iron horse. In fact, the history of California and Nevada is repeating itself in the North, West and Southwest to the letter.

That we owe the unrivaled increase of our wealth and prosperity during the last thirty years in a very great degree to the development of our mineral resources is unquestionable. The causes, not always irrational, which induce many to avoid investments in stocks of gold and silver mines, and which tend to disparage this, one of our most valuable industries, will be discussed in a future article.

SUMMER RECREATIONS.

IN such a climate as ours the science of living becomes a much more complicated matter than in more fortunate countries, which possess meteorological conditions that can be depended upon. But the American climate is the climate of extremes. In the Winter we are subjected to the rigors of the most nipping, freezing cold, and the whole duty of man is to know how to keep warm. In the Summer we are suddenly projected into the temperature of the tropics, and the one sole study of our lives becomes the question of how to keep cool. These sudden plunges of the thermometer bring about a whole series of new physical and mental ills to which the American has fallen heir. Of all men, he is the most nervously organized—sensitive, susceptible, restless, variable. Physically, he is more acutely sensitive to cold than his European brother, and in Winter lives in houses heated to a temperature the Englishman or German could not endure. In Summer, having had no preparation for the sudden leap of the weather from the severe cold of our late Winter to the ardent heat of our intensely hot July and August, he falls a prey to sunstrokes and other Summer fatalities that an Italian never knows. Under such climatic conditions, the true problem of life becomes a hygienic one, and the wise American is he who works this problem out. It is, at least, possible of solution.

The true secret of bodily health for an American is to be found in suiting the occupations and method of his life to the season. In the Winter there should be work and plenty of athletic exercise if he can secure it. In Summer let him preach himself a gospel of leisure, taking for a text the righteousness of the sin of laziness. Happy the man who can thus, in scientific phraseology, adapt himself to his environments. But in our eager, busy career there are, unfortunately, comparatively few who can make a study of how best to secure the highest pleasure and comforts of life. For most of us, it is a question whether we can live at all. But even those who work hardest could greatly add to their pleasure and secure an exemption from many of their physical ills by a little painstaking in the way of recreation and amusement.

A celebrated divine has told us that our amusements should be exactly opposite in their nature to our occupations. And this is sound wisdom. Of all men, the American needs most such amusements as shall bring into play none of the faculties which have been strained during the long day's work. And this is especially the season for applying the remedy. The harder a man works during days of torrid heat, the more he should seek either such amusement, diversion or recreation as shall be of a light, restful peaceful nature.

Nature herself is the best, the healthfulest, and least tiresome of all the forms of Summer recreation. An hour's stroll over green fields; an evening spent in breathing the wholesome sea-breeze; an afternoon given up to lolling under green trees in the rich, fragrant grass, or along the sands of the ocean—it is such recreations as these that make the heated season endurable and give some play of variety to the dull Summer life.

Almost all of our larger cities afford ample facilities for such excursions. As for the time they take, an hour or two stolen from the heavy sleep of torpor in close, ill-ventilated rooms is just so much gained in the added strength and health breathed in with the fresh, invigorating breezes of the open country or the ocean shore.

A REMINISCENCE.

THE recent imprisonment of Mr. Bradlaugh by the Speaker of the House of Commons recalls a case which happened some years ago. The facts are briefly these: A well-known member of the demi-monde, of great beauty and conversational charms, Harriet Wilson, who had been on terms of intimacy with many persons of distinction, published her memoirs, in which she made many revelations which were considered by the Anthony Comstock of that day, Sir Andrew Agnew—a Scotch member of the House of Commons—as highly injurious to good morals. As there had been several volumes of a similar class published about that time, the Scotch moralist moved for a committee of the House to inquire into immoral publications. When the committee printed the result of its labors, Mr. Stockdale, the publisher of Harriet Wilson's memoirs, commenced an action for libel against Luke Hansard, the Printer of the House of Commons' Blue Books. Hansard applied to the Speaker of the House for instructions. He was told not to notice the affair at all. The case was tried before Lord Campbell, the Chief-Justice, and by his ruling the jury found a verdict in favor of Stockdale, assessing the damages at £2,000. Luke Hansard again applied to the Speaker of the House of Commons for further instructions. He was told to disregard the verdict, and not to pay the money. Thus the House and the law were in conflict. Chief-Justice Campbell then issued a warrant for the arrest of Hansard for contempt of court. This, of course, was given to the High-Sheriff of London to enforce; he consequently arrested Hansard, and imprisoned him in Newgate. Thereupon the Speaker of the House of Commons issued his warrant for the arrest of the Sheriff. He was accordingly taken to the lock-up room of the House. Thus the Lord Chief-Justice imprisoned the printer for obeying the House of Commons, and the House of Commons imprisoned the Sheriff for obeying the law. As Sir Lucius O'Trigger says, "It was a very pretty quarrel."

Public opinion was much divided. The adherents of the Commons maintained that the Commons were above all law—that they could depose their sovereign—indeed, that they were omnipotent. Their opponents argued that they were only a part of the nation, and could not override the law unless they had the concurrence of the Lords and the Crown. Party spirit ran high. The leaders of both parties in the House for once agreed, and decided that the Commons were supreme.

Lord Palmerston said, in a very powerful speech, that the history of the past demonstrated the supremacy of the Commons. They were the people of England, and not a coördinate branch of the Constitution. Did the Commons of England, under the leadership of Cromwell, ask the consent of the Peers and that of the Crown when they tried and executed Charles I.?

Digitized by Google

Meanwhile there was the curious spectacle of Luke Hansard in prison for obeying the Speaker, and the Sheriff was in prison for obeying the Lord Chief-Justice. Neither party would give way. This dead-lock lasted for over three months, when Parliament was prorogued. This restored liberty to the Sheriff, and the Lord Chief-Justice then ordered the release of Hansard, but the judgment was never paid, and the law and equity of the case are still unsettled.

FOREIGN POLITICS.

IT is a curious and noteworthy fact that, even in this second last decade of the nineteenth century, when religious intolerance is hooted at as a relic of barbarism, almost every great nation in Europe is more or less disturbed by religious strife. In England the Burials Bill, the Bill for legalizing a marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and the probable action of the Roman Catholic and Nonconformist parties in attempting to disestablish the English Church, are all bones of contention. In France the expulsion of the Jesuits has caused much bitterness of feeling. In Germany the fight between Prince Bismarck and the Pope still goes on. In Belgium the anti-Ultramontanists are so strong that the Belgian Minister has been withdrawn from Rome. In Italy the triumph of the Clerical Party in Rome has made a new complication. In Turkey the differences of creeds promise to disturb the peace of Europe. The present position in Turkey is a most difficult one not only for diplomatists to deal with, but even for foreigners to understand. Albania and Montenegro, although at times recognizing a suzerainty of the Sultan, are practically free and independent States. They have all the instincts of predatory tribes, and, like the old Highlanders, are divided up into innumerable clans. As these clans are mostly at enmity with each other, either from some life-feud or from a difference in religious belief, there is constant warfare, and an amalgamation of the Roman Catholic, Greek Church and Mahommedan Albanians seems almost impossible. When, then, the Supplementary Congress gave a portion of Albania to Montenegro every one recognized the absurdity of the decision of Count Corti, the Italian Ambassador, to whom the arrangement was left. In the case of the Greek frontier line, however, the concession was generally approved, probably from sentimental motives, such as induced Lord Byron and his friends to espouse the Hellenic cause. But a more close investigation of the nationality and feelings of the Epirote Albanians, who are to become Greek subjects according to the new boundary decision, is already making many thinking persons change their minds. The Greek-speaking population of Greece is very small. Up almost to the very gates of Athens the only language spoken or understood by the peasantry is the Albanese. An enormous pressure is constantly being brought upon the Hellenic frontier by the various Slav tribes, and the narrow belt inhabited by hardy Albanian mountaineers, between the Slavs and the Hellenes, has always been a protection to Greece against Slav aggression. But these very Albanians, or Arnaouts, who seemed to Lord Byron to be the "Scot of the South," are deeply imbued with the spirit of the past, and, although small in numbers, are remarkable for their martial prowess. Consequently, if Greece should propose, as is likely from the mobilization of her army, to lay violent hands upon the ceded territory, she will probably be obliged to fight both Turkey and the Epirote Albanians. Such an attempt might be successful, but her new subjects would never amalgamate with the conquerors, and she would deprive herself of the present line of guard for her frontier. Turkey's intentions are as yet unknown, and until the Porte takes some action the Powers who were present at Berlin cannot interfere. It can scarcely be doubted that a reopening of the Eastern question by war will certainly end in total destruction of the Turkish Empire in Europe; and this certainly could not be regarded as a public calamity. The latest reports are by no means pacific.

Since the Liberal ministry under the leadership of Mr. Gladstone has come into power, the policy of the Government has been a huge mass of mistakes. The Bartle Frere, Bradlaugh and Challemel-Lacour affairs are now too well-known to allude to further, but a few explanatory words regarding the various Government measures will not be uninteresting. In the first place the supplementary budget, a department in which Mr. Gladstone has always been considered facile princeps, has been shown to be a mixture of assumptions, probably baseless, and of injuries to trade and sound policy certainly possible if not inevitable. The Irish policy has raised up a host of enemies even among the stanchest supporters of the ministry, and the Marquis of Lansdowne, a large Irish land-owner, has resigned his office as Under-Secretary for India. It is now a famous maxim that "property has its obligations as well as its rights," but the communistic Bill which is before Parliament takes away all the rights of the landlord, and leaves him at the mercy of his tenant, who need not pay rent except it seems fit to him. Then the Hares and Rabbits Bill interferes with the free right of contract in a way which makes a lawyer's hair stand on end. These Bills are intended to cure undoubted evils, but they are so clumsily drawn that even many Liberals will be forced to vote against them. It is almost certain that the Lords will throw them out when they come to the Upper House, and the Government, no doubt, hopes to place the odium of the rejection of these measures upon the more aristocratic assembly.

How little the French Republic is republican is daily becoming more and more evident. The total amnesty which passed the Assembly, after Gambetta's great speech, has been negatived by the Senate; and the reasons given for so doing are at all events weighty. The crimes for which many of the Communists were banished were by no means merely political offenses. The murders, incendiary fires and robberies of the Commune were deserving of coërcion punishment, and, although political outrages are often to be forgiven, there seems no just reason to pardon murderers and thieves merely because they were subsequently implicated in a political rising. The Senate was willing to grant an amnesty to all purely political outlaws, but wished to draw a line between them and criminals. The Bill was accordingly sent back to the Assembly, which body passed another, granting amnesty to all persons whom the Government should pardon before the 14th of July. As the Government intends to grant a general pardon, this Bill was, of course, of exactly the same effect as the former one. The Senate has therefore amended it, so as to exclude incendiaries and murderers condemned after trial, and in this shape it will go back to the Chamber of Deputies. A large part of the Press criticises very severely the conduct of a Government which, while pardoning the murderers of the good Archbishop of Paris, drives the Jesuits and many other religious communities out of France. That religious establishments, where instruction is provided for Roman Catholic children, should be closed according to the fancies of a Minister of Public Instruction, seems to many unjust, and contrary to the true spirit of republican institutions.

GOVERNOR MURRAY of Utah seems to be the right man in the right place. In a Fourth of July address at Salt Lake City, he told the Mormons that the laws of the country must be obeyed. "The country," he said, "is rich in timber for scaffolds for those who conspire to break down our Constitution and who violate our written laws."

SPITE of the dismal predictions of the early Spring, the Delaware peach crop promises to be an immense one. It is believed by some that it will surpass that of 1875, the great peach year; but more moderate estimates place the yield between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 baskets. Even this will insure a bountiful supply, and the outlook is that the fruit will be good and cheap. It is now rapidly ripening and is in superb condition.

COMPLAINTS were last week filed against nine steamboats which were plying in the waters around New York without certificates, showing that they had been inspected by the officers of the Government as to the condition of their hulls and boilers and their carrying capacity. One of these steamers had been running for a year without any inspection. The owners or agents of every one of these vessels should be made to pay the heaviest penalties authorized by law.

THE Philadelphia Record claims that the census just taken will show that city to be the greatest manufacturing centre of the world. The value of manufactured products in that city is expected to reach a grand total of $625,000,000 this year, and to this vast sum the textile manufacturers of Philadelphia and outlying districts will probably contribute more than $150,000,000. It is estimated that the production in that city, this year, of woolens and cottons of the general table, will aggregate $48,500,000; of carpets, $23,000,000; of hosiery and knit goods, $23,000,000; of worsted yarns, $12,500,000, and of silks and mixed goods, $7,000,000.

IT is stated that the mammoth steamship Great Eastern is likely to again visit American waters. The persons who control her are anxious to employ her in the American cattle trade, and are in communication with the authorities of Texas with a view of ascertaining whether 20,000 head of cattle can be at once supplied at Galveston for the English market. The ship will carry that number each voyage, and the owners say they expect to make four voyages per year. The Texas papers are greatly excited over the prospect of having the monster ship employed in furthering the interests of their State, but they do not tell us whether she will be able, with her great draught, to reach either of their important ports.

NEW YORK city tax list for the year 1880, as returned to the Board of Aldermen, shows an increase in real and personal estate valuations of $49,696,392. The increase in the valuation of real estate alone is $24,437,310, which is mainly due to the appreciation of property in the upper portion of Manhattan Island during the past year, consequent upon the development of the elevated railway system, and the general revival of business activities. The increase in valuation of personal estate property has been $25,259,082, and this is said to be largely due to the efforts of the Commissioners of Taxes and Assessments, who are determined, if possible, to compel corporations and individuals to pay the proper tax. The total valuation for 1880 is $1,143,765,727.

THE cotton planters of the Mississippi Valley are thoroughly revolutionizing the system of Southern labor by the general introduction of improved implements and cultivation. An organization formed a little over a year ago has brought about a system of co-operation, under which it is now proposed to arrange a permanent series of interior State fairs and competitive trials for machinery, with a view of enlisting the energy and capital of the entire South in the promotion of the best processes and forms of material development. Facts like these are full of encouragement as to the future of the South, and, indeed, of the country. Where the people become really interested in the utilization of material resources and opportunities, the clamor and contentions of politicians cease to become a ground for alarm.

FIDELITY and efficiency in a public official are qualities so rare that when displayed they deserve cordial recognition. For this reason we refer in terms of commendation to the record of Mr. L. H. Cramer, the Saratoga receiver of taxes and assessments, who, taking office at a time of peculiar difficulty, when taxes were sadly in arrears and the laws seriously defective in essential particulars, has not only collected sufficient back taxes to pay current town obligations, but has accumulated a surplus of cash which is available for the liquidation of claims resulting from extravagance on the part of previous local administrations. As a result of this efficiency in the performance of duty, the county will escape the necessity, at one time apparently unavoidable, of borrowing money to carry on its operations for the year, and taxpayers may look to the future with a degree of confidence to which they have latterly been unaccustomed. It pays always, as this illustration shows, to elect the best men to office.

DENNIS KEARNEY has been repudiated by a strong body of his former supporters, who now follow the lead of Wellock, his old-time lieutenant. At a recent mass meeting at the "Sand Lots," Wellock designated his former chief as the iron-jawed hoodlum, on whose tombstone would be written, "Liar, coward and traitor!" He affirmed that Kearney had property in Marblehead, Mass., to the amount of $60,000, which he had accumulated from the rich while pretending to the workingmen that he is poor. He added that he would bury the agitator so deep that Gabriel's trumpet would never wake him up, and then the crowd, by way of practically fulfilling the menace, "went for" Kearney with such savage brutality that nothing but the presence of the police saved him from being torn to pieces or hanged. It is plain that the power of the foul-mouthed demagogue is effectually broken, and the result may well provoke lively satisfaction in the community which has only too long tolerated his insolent authority.

GENERAL WEAVER, the Greenback candidate for President, is a gentleman of large expectations. He expresses the utmost confidence that he will carry Alabama, Texas, Mississippi and Arkansas, with a chance for Louisiana and the Carolinas. The theory of his campaign is that the Greenbackers will secure sufficient strength to throw the election of President into the House of Representatives, where Congressman De La Matyr holds the balance of power as between the Democrats and Republicans, having the controlling vote in the Indiana delegation, and that in this way both the old parties may be baffled and compelled to make terms with the despised inflationists. There is not the slightest probability that the Greenback Party will be able to bring about the complication they desire, but it will not do to despise them altogether, since they will undoubtedly make a vigorous fight in several States and may endanger the success of sound money candidates for Congress in certain close districts. It is of the highest importance that the next Congress should be thoroughly right on the financial question, and there should be no coquetting by either of the great parties with any faction which opposes the existing national policy on this subject.

IT is announced that the Republicans propose to make a thorough canvass of the Southern States, instead of abandoning them as was practically done in the last national campaign. This is as it should be. It is claimed by that party that in several of these States a majority of the voters are in favor of Republican principles, while many others might be won by a proper presentation of the issues involved in the election. Whether this is the fact or not can only be decided by an actual canvass, and there could be no better opportunity for such a canvass than the present. Let the Republicans send their ablest men into all the Southern States, and discuss before the people, freely and fully, the questions which are to be decided in November. Such men will be sure of a respectful hearing, and if the voters shall then, acting with absolute freedom, declare for the Democracy, their opponents will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that the result has been honestly achieved, while the victors can no longer be charged with maintaining a monstrous terrorism over those politically opposed to them. By all means let us have a fair, free and exhaustive canvass in every State and county of the Union, so that the verdict when rendered shall really speak the voice of the whole people.

FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is now, as it long has been, one of the best and brightest of the pictorial papers published in this country. In addition to many pleasing illustrations that relate only to the most interesting passing events, timely editorials, entertaining stories, and well-prepared miscellaneous matter may be confidently expected in every issue.—Great Barrington (Mass.) Courier.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

THE completed census gives Chicago a population of 501,979.

THE population of San Francisco is 233,056, including 20,549 Chinese.

GENERAL GARFIELD has been elected a trustee of Williams College.

SEVERAL French communists sailed from this city for their native land, July 7th.

FAVORABLE reports of the cotton crop have been received from nearly all the Southern States.

FIVE steamships, with 500 cabin passengers for Europe, sailed from this port, Saturday, July 10th.

A VAULT is to be constructed at the Philadelphia Mint for the storage of accumulated silver coin.

GENERAL GRANT recently visited New Mexico, having public receptions at Santa Fé and elsewhere.

THE United States war steamer Alliance is engaged in surveying the fishing banks of Newfoundland.

THE Readjusters of Virginia have nominated an electoral ticket independently of the regular Democracy.

GENERAL SHERMAN is on a visit to Manitoba, where he has been cordially received and hospitably entertained.

THE white Republicans of Georgia have organized independently of the blacks, and a split in the party is anticipated.

REPORTS from Minnesota and Illinois say the wheat crop is in excellent condition, but the outlook in Iowa is not promising.

THE revenue-cutter Corwin, which sailed to rescue whalers imprisoned in the ice above Behring's Straits, has been spoken.

THE exhibit of the receivers states the indebtedness of the Reading Railroad and Coal and Iron Companies at $200,027,914.

NINE persons were killed and six others injured by the explosion of the boiler of a threshing machine at Deshler, Ohio, July 6th.

THERE was an increase of $3,500,000 in the postal revenue for the last fiscal year, the total receipts amounting to $31,932,519.

IN Tyrone, Pa., thirty buildings, including the post-office, the theatre and all the courts, were destroyed by fire, July 8th. Loss, $150,000.

THERE are 1,900 Government prisoners confined in various prisons, and the expense of maintaining them is to be reduced by letting their labor to the prison authorities.

THE Indian Territory is reported to have been invaded by 300 men from Kansas for the purpose of establishing a colony in defiance of the authority of the Government.

JUDGE RALPH P. BUXTON has been nominated for Governor by the Republicans of North Carolina, with General Rufus Barringer, an ex-Confederate, for Lieutenant-Governor.

IT is said that a committee of the English bondholders of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company are in favor of reconstructing the company under a foreclosure sale.

AFTER a finely-contested race on the Thames at New London, July 7th, the Harvard eight-oared Freshman crew defeated a similar crew from Columbia College by a little over a length.

COLONEL W. M. SHANNON, a prominent lawyer of Camden, S. C., was shot and killed in a duel last week by Colonel E. B. C. Cash. None of the participants in the murderous affair have been arrested.

THE American Institute of Instruction met at Saratoga last week and celebrated the fiftieth year of its existence. Mr. William A. Mowry, of Rhode Island, was elected president for the ensuing year.

THE annual meeting of the National Temperance Society was held at Asbury Park, N. J., last week. A week's session of the Women's Christian Temperance Union commenced at the same place, July 12th.

CHICAGO has made arrangements to receive 20,000 knights and 12,000 ladies at the triennial conclave of the Knights Templar next month. One hundred thousand other visitors are also expected.

THE Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that the President has power to fill vacancies occurring either during the recess or during the session of the Senate, and appointments for which the Senate may have failed to confirm.

Foreign.

THE King of Greece has arrived in Berlin on his way to St. Petersburg.

THE Rev. Fernando A. Merino has been chosen President of San Domingo.

THE crop prospects in Germany are unfavorable. The corn harvest will be very small.

IT is announced that Bartholdi's statue of Liberty for New York will be finished in 1883.

ONE hundred and ten French magistrates have resigned rather than enforce the religious decrees.

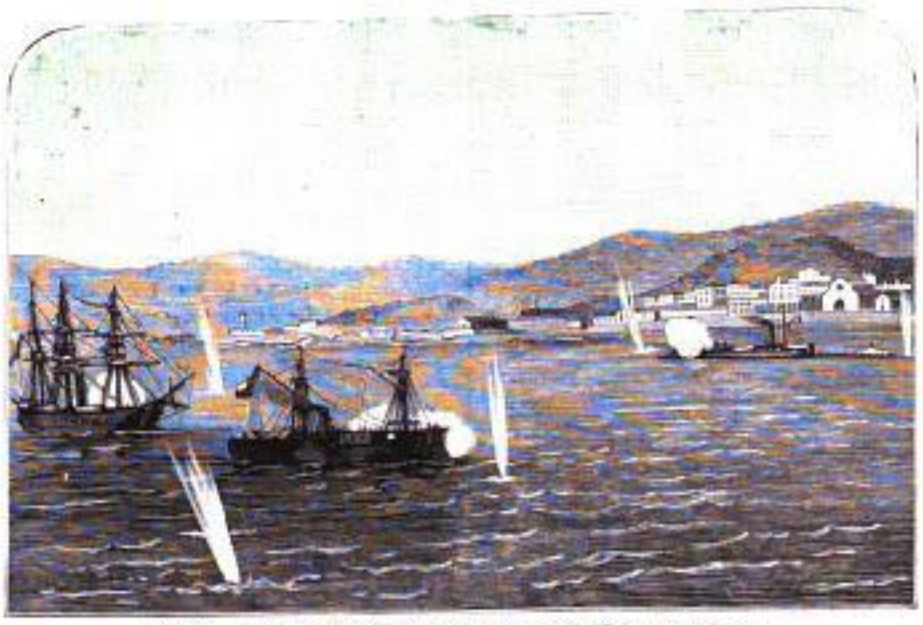
IT is reported that the Chinese Government has officially notified Russia that she does not wish to go to war.

THERE were fifty deaths from yellow fever and eleven from small pox in Havana, Cuba, during the week ended July 24.

THE colliers' strike in Leicestershire has ended. Three thousand strikers have returned to work, having accepted five per cent. reduction in their wages.

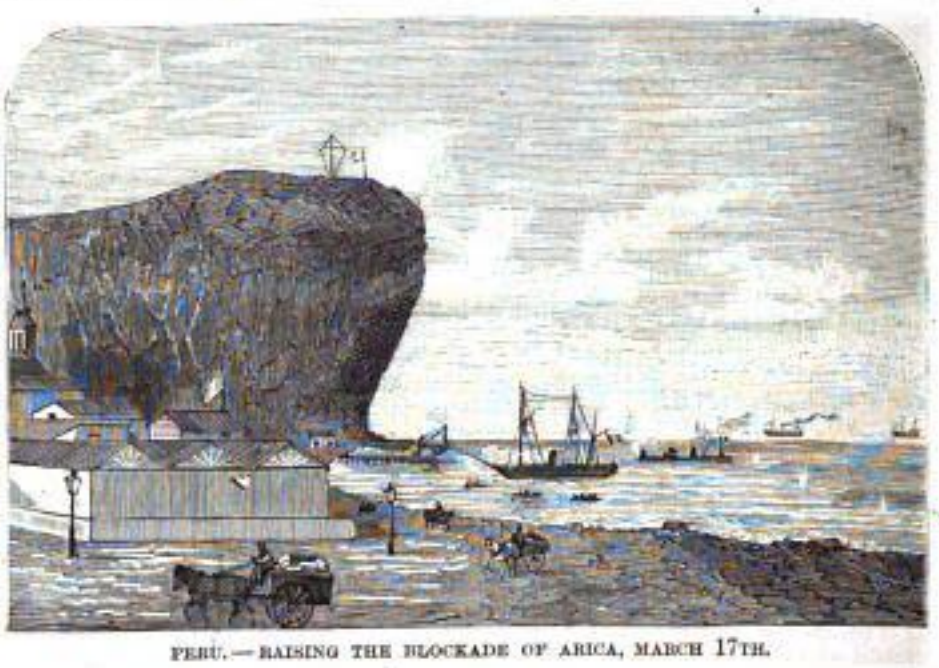
IN the British House of Lords the Elementary Education Bill, rendering school attendance compulsory throughout the country, has been read a second time without a division.

THE deficit in the Indian finances is $16,535,000—not a pleasant legacy of the Disraeli administration. The excess of the Afghan war expenditure over the estimates is $45,000,000.



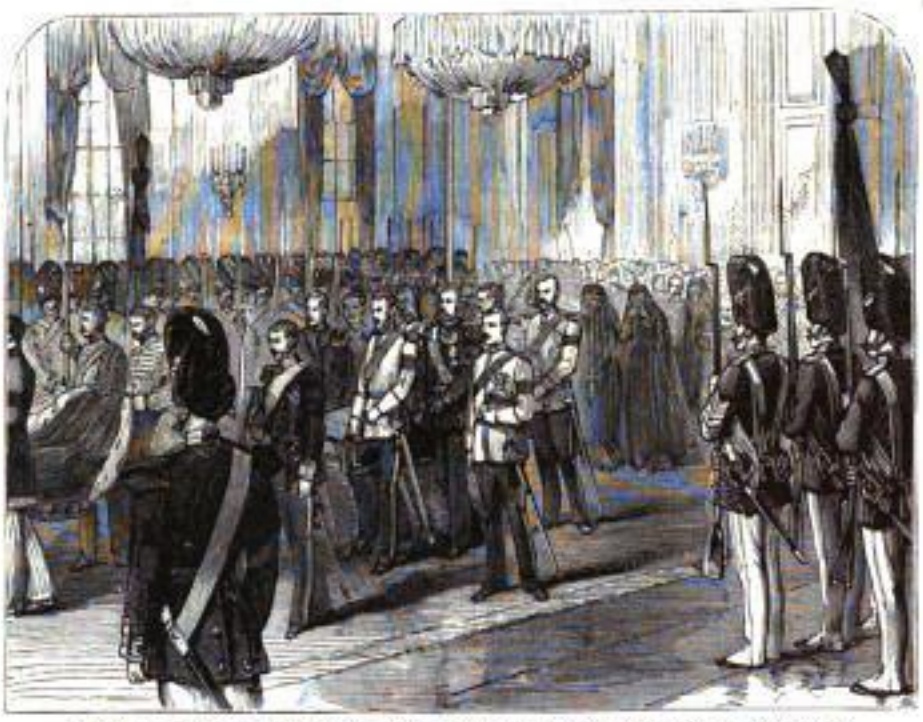
NEWS from the Azores represents that an earthquake at the Island of St. George, one of the Azores group, resulted in the formation of another island, 600 yards distant, about 18,000 yards in extent.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER has been invited to preside over a movement to obtain unconditional amnesty for all Irish political exiles. It is intended to extend the movement throughout Great Britain, Ireland, the colonies and the United States.



IT is said that when the question comes up, Mr. Gladstone will express his regret that permission was given to erect a monument to the Prince Imperial in Westminster Abbey, and will say that the Government cannot interfere in the matter.

Digitized by Google

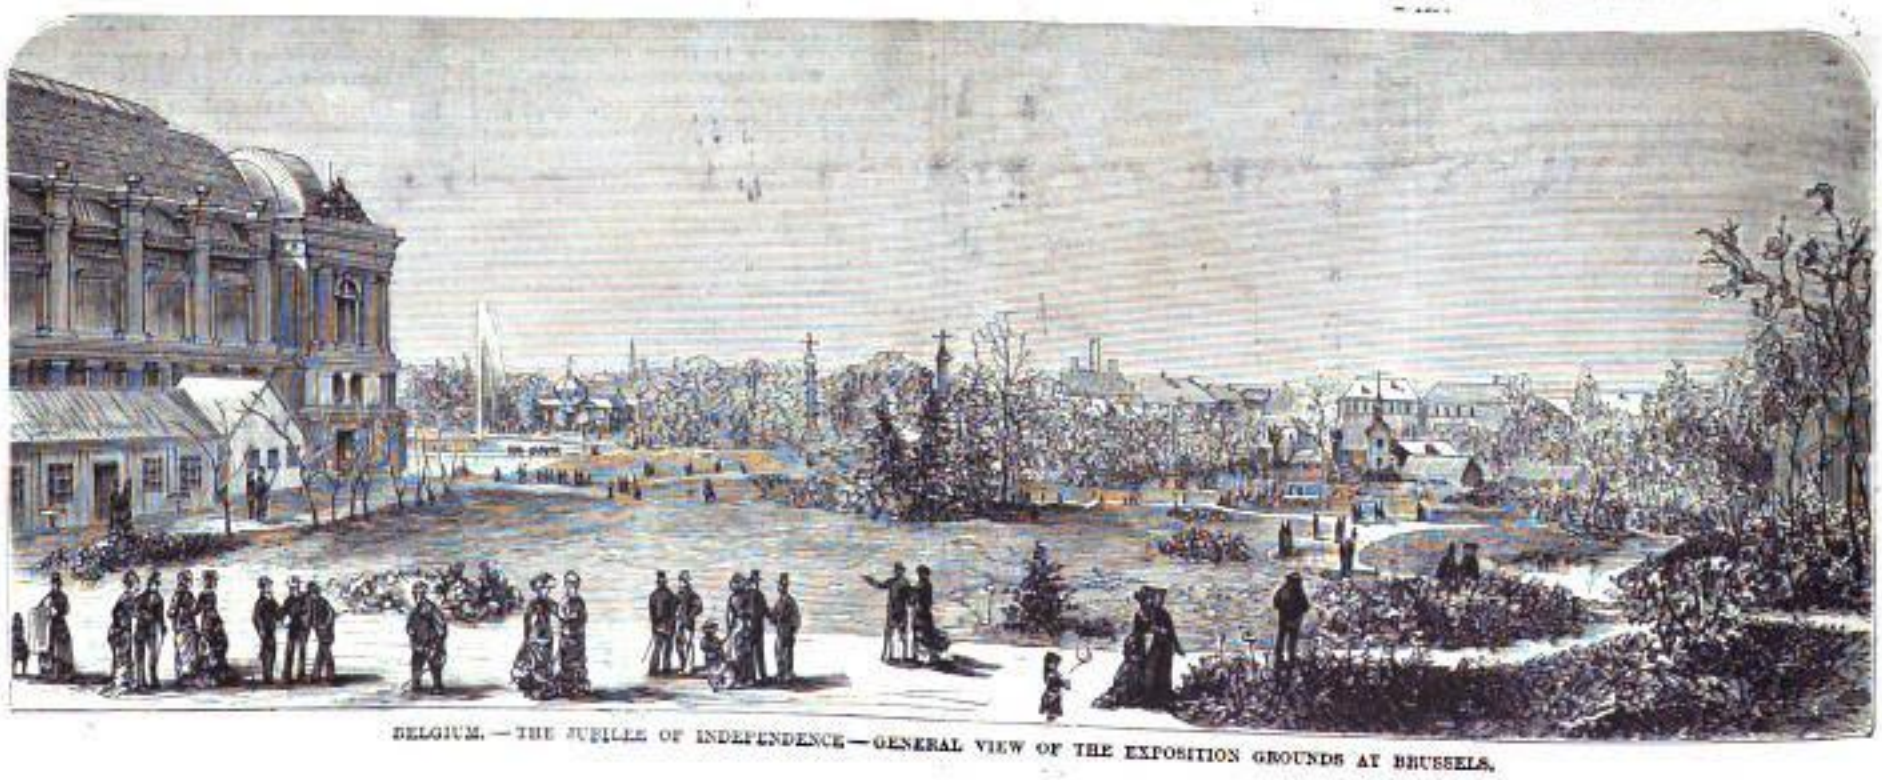


The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 351.

PERU.—THE ENGAGEMENT OF FEBRUARY 27TH AT ARICA.

PERU.—RAISING THE BLOCKADE OF ARICA, MARCH 17TH.

RUSSIA.—THE LATE EMPRESS—REMOVING THE REMAINS FROM THE PALACE.



RUSSIA.—THE LATE EMPRESS—THE LYING-IN-STATE.

ENGLAND.—PRESENTATION OF THE CIVIC ADDRESS TO THE KING OF GREECE.

ENGLAND.—THE LAST SCENE IN "AGAMEMNON," AT BALLIOL COLLEGE.

BELGIUM.—THE JUBILEE OF INDEPENDENCE—GENERAL VIEW OF THE EXPOSITION GROUNDS AT BRUSSELS.

Digitized by Google

VISITORS TO THE RACES ARRIVING AT THE PIER.

LAYING WAGERS ON THE RACES AT THE OCEAN HOTEL

STEEPLE CHASE

POOL SELLING

FINISH OF THE RACE FOR THE "WELTER CUP"

JUDITH

TRAMP

NEW JERSEY.—HOW INDEPENDENCE DAY WAS CELEBRATED AT LONG BRANCH.—FROM SKETCHES BY A. BERGHAUS.—SEE PAGE 351.

Digitized by Google

MARGIE.

EDWARD STAVEDALE was a painter—an artist in the fullest and completest sense of the word, for he lived, as it were, in the centre of a circle of art, and it was through this medium that the perception of outward things came to him. It was under the influence of this atmosphere that all thoughts were presented to him. He lived, therefore, in a world of his own; realities were to him the things the most unreal. He mixed as little as possible in the society of other men because he found their presence and conversation disturbed the beautiful phantoms that, when he was alone, held him such sweet and genial company.

In Summer time, with a knapsack, a staff and a sketch-book, he would wander forth wherever the fancy led him, now over the mountains, now by the seashore, now through woods and valleys, collecting everywhere fresh ideas, fresh experiences of that nature without which true art cannot exist.

To Edward Stavedale sensation was a word that conveyed no meaning. He had passed through the stages of youth and early manhood untempted by any of the desires or ambitions, natural or artificial, that seem almost inseparable from man's career in society. He worshiped beauty in whatever form it came to him, but only through the soul, and in its purest sense.

Now that his life was midway spent, there were moments when a vague want was felt, hints that came he knew not whence, of a yearning for some more warm and real sympathy than the shadows of great men and women could afford him, wearing a void in his heart which grew wider and deeper each day.

One lovely evening in the Fall Ed was pursuing his desultory rambles, and had struck the wood which skirts the road between the Mountain House on the Palisades and Fort Lee, when his attention was suddenly attracted by the voice of a woman, harsh and shrill. Advancing further, he found he was approaching a bivouac of strollers, half-actors, half-conjurers, of the lower order, that wandered about the States, stopping to display their performances at out-of-the-way villages and remote farm-houses. All the strollers were absent with the exception of the woman—the speaker—whose hardened features and unsympathetic aspect kept the promise given by the voice, and a little girl of about thirteen or fourteen, small, dark, sharp-featured, but with limbs fine and faultless in their slight proportions, and wondrous, wild, dark eyes, almost excessive in size, flashing from beneath the waves of black hair that overhung her face. To her the woman was addressing herself in harsh and bitter reproaches, to which the child listened in the silence that becomes almost apathy in children who, from their infancy, are little used to any other tone.

The woman, finding how slight had been the effect of her words, raised a great heavy stick which was about to descend on the girl's naked shoulders, when Stavedale sprung forward, and, clutching the upraised arm, prevented the cruel blow from being delivered, while he admonished the woman in terms so severe that she actually quailed beneath his flashing eye.

Ed Stavedale having discharged what he considered his duty, threw a glance of pity and a word of sympathy to the sobbing child, whose slight form still quivered with excitement, and turned away. He strode down the road to a small inn overlooking the Hudson, and, having dined, lighted his pipe and repaired to the stoop to enjoy his accustomed reveries. But the shapes he was wont to invoke came not; one face—a wild elfin face, with heavy black hair and great lustrous eyes; one form—a slight, agile, nervous one—always stood before him. He took a pencil and sketched them in various positions and attitudes, and formed plans of pictures in which this little figure was to form the conspicuous object.

"I must get the child to sit to me," he said, to himself; and he resolved to start back to the strollers' bivouac in the wood, and to offer the virago a dollar to achieve this purpose.

As he was about to set forth, the girl, accompanied by a raw youth, the virago bringing up the rear, passed beneath the stoop on which he sat, the woman entering the hotel.

The child suddenly looked up. What a change came over that listless face; every feature became instinct with earnest life; the eyes gleamed, the lips broke into a radiant smile over dazzling little teeth, and a warm glow spread itself beneath the dark, sallow, but transparent skin.

It was very pleasant, Stavedale thought, to see any face light up so in his presence.

"You are glad to see me?" he said

"Glad—yes."

"What is your name?"

"Margie, sir."

"Should you like me to make a portrait of you?"

"Of me, sir?" with a blush and a smile.

"Yes; if you will sit I will give you half a dollar."

A pained expression stole around the child's face.

"Yes; only——"

"Only what? You won't? Why not?"

"Because mother——"

"If I ask her leave, and give her something?"

"Ah, then, perhaps."

A bargain was soon made with the old hag, and she readily consented to Margie's giving as many sittings to the artist as might be required, during her sojourn in the neighborhood.

The girl was to Ed Stavedale a curious study, in her moral as well as in her physical nature. Vicious example, uncontrolled passions of every bad sort, brutal usage, fraud, force, the absence of all manliness, of all womanliness in those she lived with—such was the moral atmosphere in which she had grown to girlhood, such was the soil in which was sown a heart, an intense sensibility, a bright intelligence, and keen sense of all grace and beauty. Not a taint of vulgarity was in the child's nature; not a word passed her lips that had not a meaning, not a movement of her limbs but was replete with a strange, peculiar grace.

Ed was fascinated by the elfin child, who, as she sat or stood before him, seemed not only to guess all his slightest intentions, but constantly suggested new ideas of form and symmetry, beautiful beyond description. He sketched her in every attitude; he sometimes feared to weary her, but when he expressed the fear, she shook her head with one of her bright smiles and an emphatic "Never"; so he went on painting, sometimes talking to her, sometimes in a silence which lasted for hours, and which she never attempted to break. At length—it was the second day—the strollers struck their camp, and Stavedale started on the road to New York. His way lay through Pleasant Valley and Sunnyside, and as he strode along he thought of the pictures he would paint, in all of which some hint, some movement, some expression taken from her, could be introduced with precious effect. He opened his sketch-book, and as he walked slowly on he contemplated the innumerable studies of her with which it was filled. He looked up at last—before him stood the original—trembling, her great eyes riveted on his face, with a look at once fearful, so earnest, so beseeching.

"You, Margie!"

The breath came thick and fast, and her voice was scarcely intelligible; but as she went on it strengthened.

"Yes, it is me. Let me go with you—anywhere. I will be your servant; I'll do anything on earth for you. Don't be angry. I couldn't stay with them any longer; they treat me worse than ever, because they know I was happy with you and you were kind to me. Do let me go with you. Let me go with you!"

"But, child, your mother? I have no right to take you from her."

"She's not my mother, she's only my stepmother; and my father is dead. I belong to nobody—nobody cares for me. Even what I do for them they only curse me for, and beat me when I can't do the work they put me to. Do let me go with you—let me go with you!"

Stavedale's hesitation was gone, and, taking her little trembling hand in his, he led her on.

Arrived at his atelier—he lived in a little top flat on Twenty-third Street—he gave Margie money to go out and buy herself some clothes, and in half an hour she reappeared, all traces of poverty, fatigue and emotion vanished. Her neat dress fitted her so gracefully, her wild hair parted in shiny, wavy bandeaux, her little Arab feet and fine slender ankles, so symmetrical in high shoes and well-drawn striped stockings, and, above all, her oval face so radiant with beautiful joy and gratitude.

Stavedale felt very proud and happy.

"How smart you look!" he said.

She stood before him smiling, holding out her skirts as children do when their dress is admired. She broke into a short gleeful laugh of joy and triumph.

"So you are happy now, Margie?"

"Oh, sir!" and she seized his hand and covered it with kisses.

The tears sprang to Stavedale's eyes. He drew her towards him, and, resting his chin on her head, he began in a voice of deep and quiet emotion:

"Margie, I do not know if I have done right in taking you. At all events it is done. Never, child, give me cause to think I have acted wrongly—even foolishly, and, with God's help, I will be a father and a protector to you as long as I live. Kiss me, my child!"

She flung her arms round his neck and clung to him long and in silence, and he felt it was very sweet to hold such communion—to claim such love and trust and gratitude from a human creature; sweeter than to hold imaginary, unloving converse with the shadows of dead heroes and heroines.

Ed Stavedale was once more installed in his painting-room. As of old, he dreamed and painted—painted and dreamed. But when the shadowy company was not sufficient to fill his heart and brain, he would wake up from his reverie, would go to the little sitting-room at the back, where he relighted his pipe, and, half-dreaming, half-listening, heard the prattle, childish, yet strangely wise, of Margie, who, as she fluttered about or sat on a stool at his feet, thought aloud in her own wild, suggestive, conjectural way, hitting on singular glimpses of great truths that could only come to her intuitively.

By degrees Ed began to dream less and think more. Margie was now fifteen. He felt that she had become more than a child and a plaything, and that a certain responsibility weighed on him in the care of her, in the provision for her future. She had learned to read and write, and one day when he entered the little sitting-room he found Margie with a book on her knees.

"What are you reading there, child?" he inquired, carelessly.

She held up the book. It was a trashy French novel. He snatched it from her and flung it beneath the stove.

"Mind this; when you want to read anything, you must show it to me first. Do you hear, little one?"

She arranged his chair, lighted his pipe and sat down at his feet in silence. Stavedale's eyes were wide open and full of earnest reflection. Once or twice she looked up timidly, but meeting no reply to her glance, she dropped her eyes again.

She said at last: "You are not angry with me?"

"With you? Never!"

"You see I am afraid of nothing on earth but vexing you. I care for nothing on earth but pleasing you. Between these two thoughts lie all the cares of my life."

Strange, the pain and pleasure Stavedale felt. He stroked her shining hair, kissed her forehead, and fell to thinking harder than ever.

Next day instead of putting on his dressing-gown, cap and slippers, and retiring to his atelier, he, for the first time for many a long year, at such an hour, donned coat, boots and hat, sallied forth and returned with a small library—books of history, biography, religion and some poetry; all works the most perfectly suited to the purpose they were intended for.

For months, between her light household duties, so quickly and happily performed, and the frequent sittings she still continued to give him, the books were studied with earnest attention. Some of them Ed already knew; the rest he now read, and constantly of an evening questioned his pupil, drawing out and correcting her impressions with a pride and interest strangely new and pleasant to him.

As he had anticipated, Margie grew before his eyes with striking and remarkable beauty. He noticed the progress with a mingling of pleasure and uneasiness, and watched over her with a jealous care. Few visitors came to his painting-room, but at the sound of a strange footstep a look warned Margie to retreat and she fled through a back-door like a mouse into its hole.

Another year and another passed by and Margie was sweet seventeen.

"It is certain," said Stavedale to himself, "that this cannot go on for ever. I am not immortal, and if some day I go suddenly off, what becomes of Margie? We must endeavor to get a husband for her. And yet who would marry her? An artist would for her face and form. But what artist?"

He knew nobody who in the least degree suited his notions of the sort of husband to whom he would confide the happiness of his adopted child. He had a vague consciousness that, in matrimonial affairs, there were troublesome details of money matters to be gone through, and on this part of the question he felt dreadfully incompetent to enter. He was quite willing to give Margie anything and everything he possessed; but how much that might be, or how he was to find it out and put it in train, and what was likely to be the pretensions or arrangements on the other side, it put him into a state of hopeless desperation to think of. All this he admitted to himself; but he did not admit—for the thing was too vague and indistinct for admission or actual contemplation—that a little aching jealousy, a numb pain, lay at the bottom of his heart, when he thought of giving to another the treasure that for four years had lightened his life and given him new and human feelings, and a hitherto unknown love and sympathy with his race.

Margie is eighteen, and still Stavedale had found no husband for her. Hitherto he had worked alone; now, the thought and the care of her, the time he devoted to her education and her amusement—for he took her to the theatre and to Coney Island and up the glorious Hudson—rendered it impossible for him to do all he had been wont to do in his painting-room. He resolved, therefore, to look out for a student, a good student, who might never in word or deed break on the cloistered strictness and purity with which Stavedale's jealous care had surrounded his pet.

After a search the wonderful student was discovered and installed in the painting-room—Obadiah Sugden, the son of a New England oyster farmer; was tall and thin and dyspeptic looking. He was bashful and silent, and worked all day long without so much as even opening his lips. But his great brown eyes were open and they saw Margie, and, with the usual result, he fell madly in love with her; but it was that bubbledehoy love that never displays itself save in some awkwardness. One day Stavedale caught his pupil gazing with all his might and main at Margie—gazing his whole soul out.

"What if——"

A thought for the first time struck Stavedale—flashed across him with a thrill of such strange, mingled, contradictory sensations that he passed his hand across his head and felt as though some one had given him a blow.

But the thought that had struck into his brain staid there, and he took it and handled and examined it and familiarized himself with it. Strange! It had never presented itself to him before! There was the husband he had been looking for for Margie, two, three years—there, under his hand. Yes, it was the thing of all others to suit. If the oysterman would but approve, he saw no obstacle.

The oyster farmer, upon receipt of a letter from Stavedale, came to New York, saw Margie, and regretted that his son was first in the field, for he himself was a widower and of an amorous temperament.

"Square it between 'em, friend Stavedale," said Sugden, senior, "and I'll not go back on you."

Stavedale was alone in the studio with Obadiah, when he opens the matter lying heavily at his heart.

"You have never thought of marrying, Obadiah?"

His pupil shifted his position a little, colored very violently, and replied that he never had seriously.

"You ought to think of it, however, my good boy; why not now?"

Obadiah replied: "That's true."

There was a pause. Stavedale cleared his throat.

"If I found you a wife—a good, nice, charming little wife, that your father thinks well of, would that suit you?"

"Down to the ground, sir."

"Do you know any one you would like?"

Obadiah looked very sheepish, as, pointing at a crayon portrait of Margie, he exclaimed:

"He! he! That's her!"

"And do you think she likes you?"

"That's what I'd give my bottom dollar to find out."

"We'll find out, my lad."

Stavedale that very evening broached the subject to Margie.

"My child, I have been thinking a great deal about you," he said.

She looked up hastily.

"Do you know that you are of an age to think about being married?"

Heedless of the start she gave, for Stavedale's speech was all made up, and he feared that if he stopped it might stick in his throat, and he would break down. So he went on.

He told her how long he had thought of this; how he felt the loneliness of the life she led; how little a man like him was fitted to be the sole instructor and protector of a young girl; but he dreaded that a day might come—must come—when, if she were not married, he would have to leave her alone and unprotected in the wide, wide world; how dreadfully the thought weighed on him; how, until she was thus provided for, he never could feel happy or assured concerning her. Then he spoke of Obadiah; of his affection for her, of all his good qualities, of what peace and joy he would feel in seeing her united to him; and then, feeling he could not wait for her answer, he took her to his heart, kissed her, bid her think of all he had said, and took refuge in his painting-room, where he smoked five pipes without stopping.

"The sooner it's over the better," murmured the painter, and he urged on the wedding with a sort of feverish impatience.

It was the night before the wedding and Stavedale had been out, occupied with the last arrangements, and returned home towards eleven o'clock.

As he mounted the stairs to his studio his heart was leaden, and as he opened the door of his flat and entered the quiet little art home, the silence struck him with a chill of disappointment, for he had secretly hoped that Margie would have been up to greet him, after the occupations of his busy day.

He listened, but there was no quick, light step, no sound to indicate her consciousness of his entrance. Stavedale sighed, took up the dim light that had been left burning against his arrival, and instead of going to his room turned into his studio.

How deadly still it was! How deserted! The wan quivering flare of the little lamp only made the gloom it could not pierce more heavy, and as its wavering light flashed and paled over the faces of the pictures, they seemed to shudder on him while he passed.

And so it was all over and she was already gone from him, and the old, lonely, loveless life was to be begun again, now that he was so much less able and fitted to lead it than formerly. Art is just and noble and elevated, and he who pursues it with all his energies cannot fail to profit thereby. But art is not able to fill man's life alone. Art will be worshiped as a sovereign, and, if courted in earnest, sometimes condescends to let the votary kiss the hem of her garment, and now and then bestow upon him a smile. But she gives no more than this, and thus for a time it may satisfy him; then comes a day when he would resign all the fame she ever accorded him for a little human love and a little human sympathy. Stavedale had felt thus before he had them. Now he had known them and was about to lose them for ever.

The perfume of flowers—the flowers she had placed there that morning before he went out—drew him to the table. A note lay on it—a note in her handwriting and directed to himself.

A mist passed over his eyes as he opened and sought to read the contents, written in a trembling hand, and here and there blurred and blotched; how?—he knew.

"MY DEAR, DEAR FRIEND, MY ONLY FRIEND: Forgive me if you can for the pain I am causing you and, above all, oh, above all! do not think your poor child ungrateful. But I cannot marry Mr. Sugden; my heart revolts from it. Indeed, indeed I have done everything I could to reconcile myself to it because you wished it, and I know he deserves a better wife than I could make him. It is not any foolish wicked pride or self-conceit on my part that turns me from him, but I cannot love him, and when he knows this he will learn to forget me and marry some one better worthy of him. So I am going away. However, I know all the anxiety you have concerning me, feeling how little I am now fit for any other life than the happy one I have led with you these last years. Do not be afraid for me; I am young and strong, and able and willing to work, and God will not desert me.

"And later, when I am quite a woman and have got used to make my own way in the world, at least to obtain a living, I will come back to you, and we will be happy again in the old way; and you will see that your poor child only left you for a while, because she loved you so dearly that she could make this great and terrible sacrifice now to insure your future comfort. I am going into service, and when I have got fixed I will write to you, but I will not tell you where I am for fear you should come to take me back again, and if you did I know I am not strong enough to refuse to go with you.

"God bless you! and oh, my dear, best, only friend, believe that I love you, now I am leaving you, better than ever I did in all my life, and that the only happiness I look to on earth is the idea of coming back to you.

"And I will come back to you before long. God will bless my work, and we shall meet again and forget this heavy trial. I am sure of it.

"Your poor child, MARGIE."

His heart then had not misgiven him in vain. She was gone, actually and positively. Whither and to what? The thought nearly drove him wild. That little, young, helpless, beautiful creature, unsuspicious and inexperienced as an infant, gone out alone into that great wide world of guile and sin, and suffering, and temptation under every form and every treacherous disguise.

He knew her courage, her resolution, her light heart; but were these enough to guard her alone against the dangers whose name is legion?

And now where to look for her?

For three days Obadiah Sugden sought her sorrowing through every part of not alone New York, but Brooklyn and Hoboken. The fourth, Obadiah proceeded on his mission alone, for Stavedale lay on his sick-bed, racked with pain and grief and fever, but insisting on remaining alone that the quest might not be for a day interrupted.

Digitized by Google

Slowly the evening reddened and paled, and the hush and dimness of the light that precedes the departing day fell upon the sick room, and for the first time since Margie's departure, Ed Stavedale slept.

Presently the door opened, and a shadow stood on the threshold—noiseless and breathless as shadows are—then it glided across the room, paused, stood, and finally kneeled beside the bed. The sleeper's labored breathing stopped suddenly. He was not yet awake, and still he was listening. Something—a consciousness, a hope—was rising in him combatting the numbness of slumber. He started, stretching out his arms and pronouncing Margie's name.

It was Margie's voice that answered him; they were Margie's tears that fell on him; Margie's kisses that pressed his hot brow. Long and silently he held her close in his embrace.

"You will never leave me again!"

"Never, never, never! Oh, forgive me! If you knew one half of what I have suffered—not of hardship or misery. I have means to secure me from that, but from the separation from you! Oh, I could not live longer without seeing you. I thought just to steal back, have one glance, at you and then—then I knew not, cared not, what might become of me! And I find you thus!"

"Margie, tell me what was the reason you would not marry Sugden. You did not love him. Did you—do you—love any other?"

She clung to him, hiding her face and weeping silently.

"You will not tell me?"

"I cannot."

A wild, trembling, thrilling hope traversed the obscurity of Stavedale's brain

"Is it—I?"

"Who could it be but you?"

And so Margie was married—but not to Obadiah Sugden.

"INDEPENDENCE DAY" AT LONG BRANCH.

THE popularity of Long Branch as a Summer resort has never been so great as at this moment. The crowd of visitors already exceeds the most sanguine expectations. During the first week of the present month every hotel was packed with guests, while on the opening days of the Summer races the influx of excursionists was altogether unprecedented. The races, which opened on the 3d, were exceptionally brilliant. On the 5th the attendance amounted to some 10,000 persons, including shoals of well-dressed, handsome ladies, representing the fashionable circles of New York and other cities. The grand stand was a very gallery of beautiful faces and elegant toilets. One of the most interesting races of the day was the contest for the Weller Cup, worth $125, for gentlemen riders, three-quarters of a mile. Mr. Townsend bestrode Baronet; Mr. St. James, Odd Fellow; Mr. Price, Tramp; Mr. Purdy, Momentum; Mr. Hunter, Vanderdecken and; Mr. Alexander, Judith. Judith was the favorite in the betting. The flag fell to a bad send-off, Vanderdecken being in the lead, and Judith a long way behind. The mare quickly ran past them all, however, and at the upper turn had a lead of several lengths. She came home under a strong pull an easy winner in 1:22¼. Tramp, under the stimulus of a sound lashing, was second, and Odd Fellow third.

The last event of the day was a handicap steeplechase between Problem, Disturbance and Bertha, for a purse of $600, of which $200 went to second horse. Probably no finer race of the kind was ever seen anywhere. The course has been changed since last season, and is now a very long one, circling the ground two and one-half times, and including eighteen jumps, the water jump being counted twice. Disturbance was over the first hurdle, slightly in advance of Problem. Bertha refused it at the first offer and thereby lost her chances. The other two kept together nearly all the way. Problem was the better jumper and gained every time while in the air, but Disturbance seemed to run faster between jumps, so that now one was ahead and now the other. The last few jumps they rose and fell together. They came down the track linked, and went over the last hurdle at the same instant. When half way to the string Disturbance suddenly quit, dead beat, and Problem floundered home a very tired winner in 5:43. Bertha, who had jumped prettily after her first fluke, was too far behind to catch up. We illustrate both of these races, together with the pool selling at the hotels, etc.

The great iron pier at Long Branch now extends into the ocean a distance of 960 feet. It is covered with an awning, and is now lighted at night from end to end, producing a very beautiful effect. It is a favorite resort.

A MORNING AT THE SOLDIERS' HOME, WASHINGTON.

"THE object of the Soldiers' Home," so reads the first article of its "Rules and Regulations"—"is to provide a comfortable home for old soldiers of twenty or more years' service, and for invalid and disabled or discharged soldiers, who, having served honestly and faithfully in the Army of the United States, shall be entitled to the benefits of the institution."

Not only gray-headed veterans, therefore, but those who are, so to speak, babes in the service, are to be met by the curious visitor as he traverses the cool stone halls of the Home, or the shady walks that wind through its beautiful grounds. Old and young, straight and strong, and bowed and crippled, every age and type has a representative—I had almost said every color, but here the emphatic statement of the sergeant of the day, who did the honors of the institution for us, returns to remind me that here, at least, in Washington the good-humored African face is conspicuous for its absence. Nothing can be lovelier than the park-like grounds, with their rolling undulations, the smooth lawns and shady nooks, and the fine old trees grouped and scattered everywhere. Far away one can see the city, and the Potomac glimmering in a mist of sunshine; and framed in the "Capitol Vista," a green, shady walk completely roofed with arching trees, there is the dome itself rising out of a sea of roofs clear and pale against the sky. Within the grounds stand not only the Home itself, but the hospital, the chapel and library, and the pretty stone cottage half-covered with vines, whose hospitality is every Summer offered by the Home to the Presidential family. Our sergeant, pointing it out to us, spoke with the greatest enthusiasm of its latest inmates, Mrs. Hayes having very evidently won the hearts of all the veterans during her Summer's sojourn among them.

The Home was founded by General Winfield Scott with prize money from the Mexican campaign, amounting to $150,000. As an institution it is completely independent of the Government, which fact its inmates state with considerable pride, but it derives from the Army a yearly income of $30,000, each soldier in the United States service contributing twelve and a half cents monthly for its support. Its internal rules and regulations are very few and simple; it is in the fullest sense of the word a home, whose benefits are extended both to temporary and permanent inmates, and where each one is free to come and go, remaining as long as he pleases and returning after any length of time spent outside. Soldiers drawing pensions from the Government are required to turn these into the general fund of the institution, from which each man, in consideration of orderly conduct and general good behavior, is allowed to draw monthly one dollar and one pound of tobacco, or its equivalent in money. The younger men, who may wish to work on the grounds and farm, are employed there at the rate of about eight dollars per month, and besides this optional labor, each man is required to perform such small services about the grounds and buildings as the discretion of the governor may impose. Drunkenness, fighting and insubordinate conduct, are punished by the curtailment of rations and the stoppage of pocket-money, confinement to the building or grounds, or in aggravated cases by total dismissal.

Inside the great stone building everything is delightfully cool and orderly. The wide, airy halls and massive stone staircase swarmed with blue undress uniforms as the sergeant led us through, for it was nearly noon, and in a few moments the bugle call, announcing dinner, would be sounded from the porch. We took a peep into the immense dining-hall before the meal was served, and saw the rows of long tables ready set, a vast perspective of plates and glasses and casters repeating themselves with accurate regularity. As the artist rapidly sketched, our guide betrayed a nervous anxiety lest any detail should be disrespectfully slurred over. "Be sure there's seven chairs to each table," he repeated, feelingly. "Every man here'll see the picture, and count 'em up to see if they're all right. You can't make any mistake but what they'll hit on it."

With the fear of these merciless critics before our eyes, we proceeded through the other departments. The reading-room, or, rather, rooms—two connected with a great archway—whose long tables were well covered with scattered papers and magazines, representing all the best weekly and monthly publications of the day; the lavatory, irreproachable in the cleanliness of its well-scrubbed floor and cool, gray paint; and the bedrooms, which presented every variety of study of bachelor-quarters. Each of the larger rooms contained four neat little white beds, a fireplace and some simple furniture; the quantity and quality of the decoration varied with the taste of the inmates. In one room we found a perfect gallery of photographs, prints and wood-cuts, framed and unframed, with vases of dried grasses on the mantel and table, and a tiny cross of evergreens conspicuously placed; while on the wall over one of the beds was a wreath of white flowers, a mortuary relic, carefully preserved under glass, and flanked by a photograph of the deceased.

We passed out just as the crippled veteran on the porch was hanging his bugle on its nail after sounding the call to dinner. Groups of bluecoats were coming in from the little arbors and rustic seats around the lawns, where they sit in knots and smoke and gossip—it being a generally known, if not admitted, fact that men do gossip—and in a few moments not one was to be seen under the trees on our way to the library. This building, whose importance as a subject for a sketch seemed, in our sergeant's mind, to rank next to that of the dining-room, is a little gem in its way. It was built originally for a bowling alley, but has lately been converted to its present and nobler use, and is furnished with handsome oak tables and bookcases, the latter fully stocked with standard books. It is of that nondescript but highly decorative style of architecture conveniently known as "Queen Anne," with a most pleasing combination of color in the oak carvings and arched beams of the ceiling, and the low arch of red brickwork, picked out with cool white marble, which separates the library proper—formerly the bowling-alley—from a square ante-chamber rich in carved woodwork. Here the artist became rapturous over a most beautiful tiled mantelpiece, and the rest of the party interviewed the librarian, a stiff old soldier, who received us first with freezing severity, but gradually thawed into a conversational state, though evidently suspicious of the artist to the last.

Passing the pretty Presidential cottage—first occupied by President Pierce, and since by Buchanan, Lincoln and Hayes, who last week removed thither with his family—we go on to the hospital, and there, under the guidance of the steward, look in at the dispensary, the little library, and the wards, with their seemingly endless rows of patients. The light and ventilation of the wards are perfect, and the rows of little iron bedsteads, with their spotless white covers, and the small tables beside them with their array of glasses and bottles, look comfortable enough and are neatness itself; but the distressing sameness of the great sweep of white wall makes our eyes ache. A picture or two would be a blessed break in their monotony—even one of the much despised "mottoes," dear to the eyes of the uncultivated, would be positively refreshing here.

Some of the beds are empty, the men sitting in comfortable chairs beside them; in some they lie propped up on pillows, reading newspapers or staring lolly about. This is in the lower wards. As we go higher up, where the cases are more serious, we pass rows of motionless figures and pale faces, with closed eyes, like sleep or death. Here and there a visitor—generally in army-blue—stands by one of the beds; but nobody speaks, and there is not a sound to be heard in the long rooms. One veteran in the consumption ward solemnly retires under the blankets as soon as we enter, and remains with his head covered during our stay.

"He died the other day," whispers our guide, indicating with his thumb the mound of bedclothes. "They were just laying him out, when he opened one eye and called for his pipe, and now he's just as hearty as ever again."

So we look through ward after ward—a painful sight, in spite of the order and quiet that reign everywhere.

"Not much to sketch," remarks the steward, evidently considering that architectural proportions and the patterns of bedsteads are all which the artist can wish to fix on paper. "One room is pretty much like the other. No, the men don't mind you," he adds, in reply to a question; "it's something for them to look at and talk about after you're gone; and they'll see the pictures when they come out, and if there's a pencil-stroke out of the way in the leg of a table, they'll know it," he warns the artist, cheerfully.

So we depart, conscious of a body of stern censors who are ready to pounce on our notes and sketches as soon as they see the light in the columns of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

We drive through the beautiful grounds, past the little cemetery where the dead soldiers sleep—a smaller edition of the vast encampment on Arlington Heights—and through the suburbs back to the City of Washington again, and the shadow of the Dome.

Luxury in Chili.

A SANTIAGO correspondent writes: "The wealthy landowners, hacindados, or possessors of very large farms in Chili, are, as a rule, mere absentees, having little more than pied-a-terre on their estates, which they only visit for a month or two in the year, and scarcely ever else leaving their homes in the capital, to which political or social duties are supposed to bind them, except for a short residence at Valparaiso or some other watering-place on the sea or inland. The extravagance of this gentry is described as boundless. More than $8,000,000 has been spent in house-building in the period of four years (1873-6), some of these private houses at a cost of $100,000 to $250,000 each, and "the carriage licenses taken out in the latter year show that there were altogether 1,294 private carriages, besides 471 public conveyances and 2,750 carts and drays." This will appear somewhat considerable if we reflect that it refers to a town mustering a population of 130,000. The luxury in which these Chilian magnates so liberally indulge has the effect of raising the price of all commodities and especially of all articles imported from abroad to an enormous extent. A book or an almanac charged 25 cents in London at shop price cannot be purchased in Chile for less than 80 cents; a pair of kid gloves is not to be had for less than $2.50; and, as a rule, a dollar, a silver dollar, the value of which varies from $1 to $1.25, will go no further than 25 cents would do in the old countries. The charge for hair-cutting in Valparaiso is $1.50; an eighty-cent Lesle's diary costs $2.50; a tall hat (chimney pot) costs $15; you must pay 12 cents each for parchment luggage labels, 6 cents apiece for quill pens, $1 for a quire of common note paper, and so on in proportion. The Chilians seem to value things rather from their cost than from their actual worth. The extravagance of all Americans is something that far transcends the limits of Old World comprehension. At Guayaquil, the shabby seaport of the "one-horse republic" of Ecuador, I have seen a toy-shop where the price of German wax dolls varied from twenty to eighty silver dollars. A Panama hat would be charged from $300 to $350, and prices of the same enormity are charged for a guanaco coat or a vicun rug, an ostrich feather wrapper, or a poncho, and other luxuries of local manufacture.

Sale of Flowers in New York.

IN 1844 the sale of flowers for New Year's Day in what then was the largest store in New York City amounted only to $200, and probably for the whole City of New York it did not exceed $1,000. Now the amount spent for floral decorations on that day probably reaches $50,000, while for the whole year the money spent in these perishable ornaments probably amounts to millions. It is estimated that there are 600 florists' establishments within a radius of ten miles of New York City, and the capital invested in land, structures and stock is not less than $8,000,000, the product of which is mainly for the metropolis.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Chili-Peruvian War.

The long protracted war is a series of successes for Chili. Bolivia has been virtually driven from the field. Peru has been defeated on land and sea. Her most valuable provinces are in the hands of the Chilians, and her ports are all blockaded. Our illustrations show a naval engagement off Arica on the 27th of February, when the Chilian monitor Huascar and the corvette Magallanes opened fire on the Peruvian batteries; the Peruvian monitor Manco Capac at last steamed out to repel them, and a sharp engagement ensued, in which the Huascar lost her commander (Thompson), killed on the same spot where the former Peruvian commander fell. Our other illustration shows the corvette Union, Captain Villavicencio, running the blockade of Arica, under fire of the Chilian squadron, the Manco Capac covering her daring and successful attempt. The Union was badly hulled, but reached Callao safely.

The Empress of Russia's Funeral.

The ceremonies attending the funeral of the late Empress at St. Petersburg, on the 7th, 8th and 9th of June, are the subject of two illustrations. At noon on Monday, the 7th, the body was removed from the Winter Palace, where she died, to the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which is a Cathedral Church dedicated to those saints. It was conveyed in a superb gilded car, with a canopy of white and gold, followed by the Emperor Alexander II., on horseback, in military uniform, with his sons and other Princes, amongst whom was the Crown Prince of Germany, some of the foreign Ambassadors, and the chief dignitaries of the Court and State. The Duchess of Edinburgh was one of the ladies who followed in mourning carriages. Next day the public were admitted—in the morning by ticket, in the evening quite freely and indiscriminately—to the Cathedral Church, where they saw the body of the Empress lying in state. It was in the centre, beneath the dome, upon a raised platform covered with red cloth. The coffin was partially covered with a pall of cloth-of-gold, but the face and hand of the Empress were exposed to view. On Wednesday morning the Emperor, with his family and suite, was met at the door of the cathedral by high dignitaries of the Church. As soon as the Mass was over, the Emperor, with the other members of the Imperial family, approached the coffin and kissed the dead. Four Chamberlains then removed the pall, placed it on the altar, and four Gentlemen of the Chamber brought forward the lid of the coffin. The Emperor himself placed the train of the Imperial robes in the coffin, which was then sunk in the floor of the church. When the coffin had been lowered, the Metropolitan handed the Emperor a silver plate with sand and a small gold shovel, and the formula of "dust to dust and ashes to ashes" was gone through by his Majesty and his sons. At this moment there was a roll of musketry-fire from the infantry under arms outside, and the report of the fortress guns and of the artillery posted on the opposite side of the river, each gun firing six rounds.

The King of Greece in London.

King George of Greece arrived at London on June 2d and has been the guest of the Prince and Princess of Wales. As usual when crowned heads visit England, he was presented with an address of welcome by the Corporation of the City of London. The ceremony took place in the Guildhall on June 16th, and was followed by a luncheon to which 1,000 persons were invited, and at which addresses appropriate to the occasion were delivered.

The Drama of "Agamemnon."

The recent performance of the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus, at Balliol College, Oxford, was a bold experiment—one that has seldom been attempted since Dr. Parr's pupils were wont to act the plays of Sophocles at Stanmore. In their programme two scenes disclaimed any intention of producing a fac simile of a Greek drama, but stated that they had been guided throughout by the one desire of giving the work the best dramatic expression in their power. Thus, there were no masks, and the drama was curtailed, Hermann's text being adopted. Our illustration shows the last scene, when, after the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra, she turns to Ægisthus, and speaks the final words:

"Heed not their idle barking; thou and I Ruling the palace, fitly will ordain."

The Belgian Jubilee.

In our last issue we gave views of the art and horticultural pavilions in course of erection in Brussels for the approaching jubilee of Belgian independence. This week our illustration depicts the landscape features of the grounds upon which the exhibition buildings will stand. Vast preparations are being made for a proper display of the art, scientific, industrial and manufacturing progress of the kingdom; and while the jubilee will be a distinctly national one, the beauty of the city, the spirit of the occasion and the value of the material resources, will attract large audiences from all parts of the world during the continuance of the jubilee.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE Greenbackers of Connecticut have nominated Henry C. Baldwin for Governor, with a full ticket for other State officers.

—IT is reported at Constantinople that Mr. Goschen, the British Ambassador, will call for the dismissal of Aleddin Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs, on account of his complicity in the Albanian movement against Greece.

—DURING the week from May 9th to 15th not a single death occurred at St. Petersburg, while the mortality of London for the corresponding period was 19.8 per 1,000; at Berlin, 25.1; at Rome, 22.0; at Vienna, 23.5; and at Paris, 27.4.

—AT St. Petersburg the reports of Chinese victories are described in official circles as mere gossip of the Eastern bazaars. Fifteen hundred volunteers will go to the Pacific to strengthen the cadres in the Amoor district. The Czar has inspected at Cronstadt the vessels for the Pacific.

—AT Rome, July 4th, the Pope gave audience to the Sacred Orators who came on a pilgrimage from all parts of the world, including the United States. The Pope, replying to their address, urged the expediency of simplicity and humility in preaching, and recommended that they study the works of St. Thomas Aquinas.

—THE record and findings in the case of Mirzan, the naturalized citizen of the United States recently tried for murder and condemned to death by Minister Maynard in Turkey, are expected soon to reach the State Department. The general impression seems to be at the State Department that the sentence will be commuted.

—ON July 3d Lord Shaftesbury unveiled the statue on the Thames embankment to Robert Raikes, the originator of Sunday-schools in England. Dr. Vincent was present on behalf of the Sunday-schools of the United States. Dr. Murphy, of New York, read a portion of the Scriptures, and Dr. Todd, of New York, offered prayer.

—THE total receipts of all kinds of grain by canal and rail at New York from January 1st to June 20th last were 56,554,004 bushels against 47,188,289 bushels for the corresponding period in 1879. Of the amount received this year 19,522,476 bushels were by canal against 8,297,452 bushels by canal during the same period last year.

—THE Standard's Berlin correspondent, discussing the relations between China and Russia, says there seems to have been an idea of purchasing ships and cannon in America and putting American seamen against the drilled land lubbers, forming the bulk of the Russian crews, but there is little prospect of the scheme being carried out before the war is over.

—A DISPATCH from Rome says it is stated in the clerical circles that the rupture of relations between Belgium and the Vatican may possibly lead to the resignation of Cardinal Nina as Secretary of State to the Holy See, as the Pope allowed himself to be influenced as regards his attitude towards the Belgian bishops, in a sense opposed to the policy originally determined upon with Cardinal Nina.

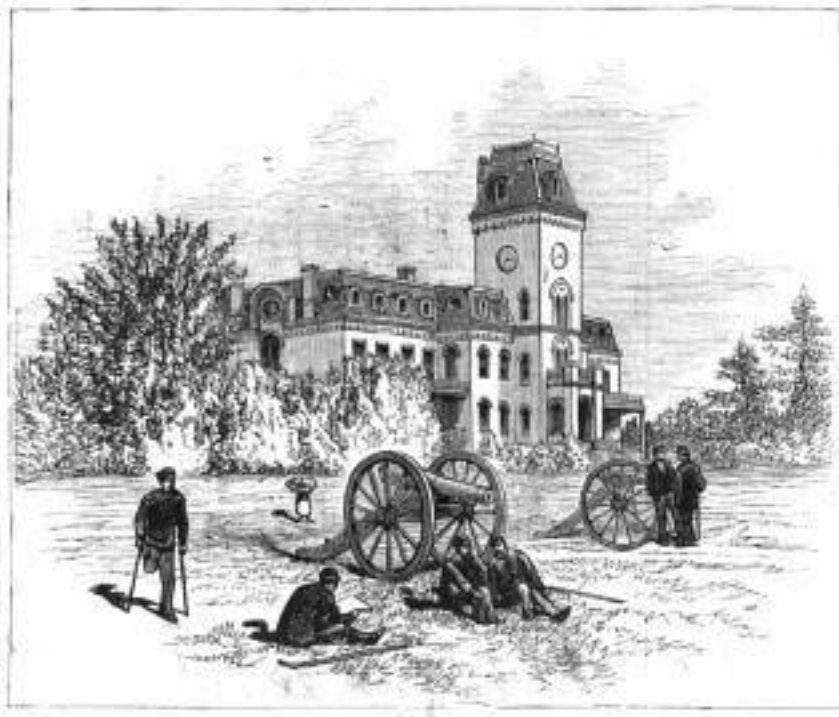
—AN Ottawa paper says the Dominion Government has been in treaty with representatives of a syndicate of English capitalists with a view to forming a company with $100,000,000 capital to build the Pacific Railway, the Government giving a land subsidy of 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 acres and taking no further responsibility. The negotiations are said to be very nearly completed.

—A Times Paris dispatch says that the amendment to the Plenary Amnesty Bill, pardoning all Communists except assassins and incendiaries, which passed the Senate by a vote of 143 to 138, would not have been carried but for the vote of five Ministers. Under these circumstances the Cabinet cannot ask the Chamber of Deputies to disagree to the awarded Bill. It will exercise no influence either way.

—THE honors accorded to the American exhibitors at the Pottery Exhibition at Berlin were quite numerous. They were as follows: Address of thanks and a gold medal, one honorary prize, a gold medal with special honorary diploma, nine gold medals, exclusive of the special ones before mentioned, fourteen silver medals, twelve bronze medals and seventeen honorable mentions—in all sixty-nine awards to the United States.

—A DISPATCH from Constantinople says enlistment of volunteers for Albania is publicly proceeding in Constantinople. The Government is giving Albanian chiefs money and free passage for all Albanians desirous to fight the Greeks and Montenegrins. Albanian chiefs frequently visit Aleddin Pasha, Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Minister of War has sent orders to the provinces to hasten the dispatch of troops to Constantinople. The Sultan has drawn up a secret proclamation inviting the Albanians to resist the Greeks.

—AT Atlanta, Ga., on July 7th, and in the Superior Court the first negro juror was called. He served with eleven well-known white citizens, was made foreman of the jury, and brought in a verdict of guilty against a colored man charged with burglary. In the next case he was refused by Asa Gunn, colored, charged with murder, who said he wanted no nigger to try him for his life. The selection of the colored juror caused much comment, and the addition of the names of people of his race to jury-rolls in the State Courts is generally approved.



—WORK has been begun at Madison Avenue and Fiftieth Street, New York City, upon the foundation for a house which is designed to be the home of Cardinal McCloskey. The building is to front on Madison Avenue, and is to have four stories. It will be a handsomely ornamented and commodious structure, with parlors and reception-rooms, a study, library and private chapel for the Cardinal and bedrooms for the guests. It is expected that the Cardinal's new home will be ready for occupation by December, 1881. The building, it is understood, will cost $75,000.

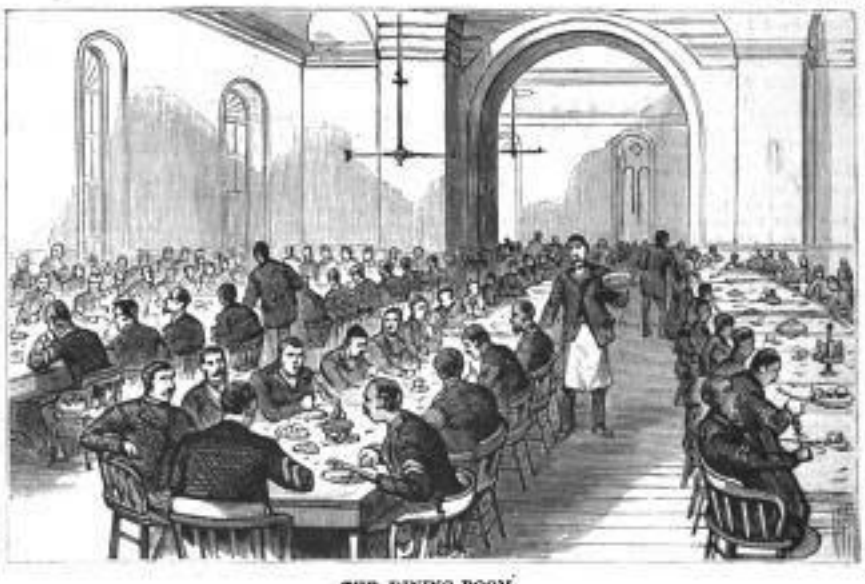
—JERUSALEM will soon be the centre of Winter fashion if matters go on as they are going. Not only has it now a German sanitary inspector and other officials to attend to the supply of water, street cleaning, etc., with a view to making it a pleasant abode, but it is announced that Lothair, otherwise the Marquis of Bute, has bought a villa near the Mount of Olives. "The Wizard Beaconsfield," as Punch called him some thirty years ago, proved his prophetic soul when he concluded "Tancred" with the announcement that "the Duke and Duchess of Bellismont had arrived at Jerusalem."

—THE Committee of the Franco-American Union gave a banquet at Paris on July 7th, to celebrate the official notification to the United States of the secured completion of the monument commemorative of the independence of the United States, which will be inaugurated in 1883. Henri Martin, the historian; Senator Bezertan; MM. Oscar de Lafayette and Laboulaye; the Count de Lesseps; Governor Noyes, the American Minister; General Pittl, representing President Grévy; M. Dietz-Monin; Mr. Walker, the Consul-General of the United States; General Noyes; Messrs. Henry Wood, Detmold and Ryan; and M. Bartholdi, the sculptor of the monument, and a large number of journalists, were present.

STAIRCASE LEADING TO THE DORMITORY.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME BUILDING.

VIEW



THE "HOME" HOSPITAL.

GROUP OF DISABLED SOLD

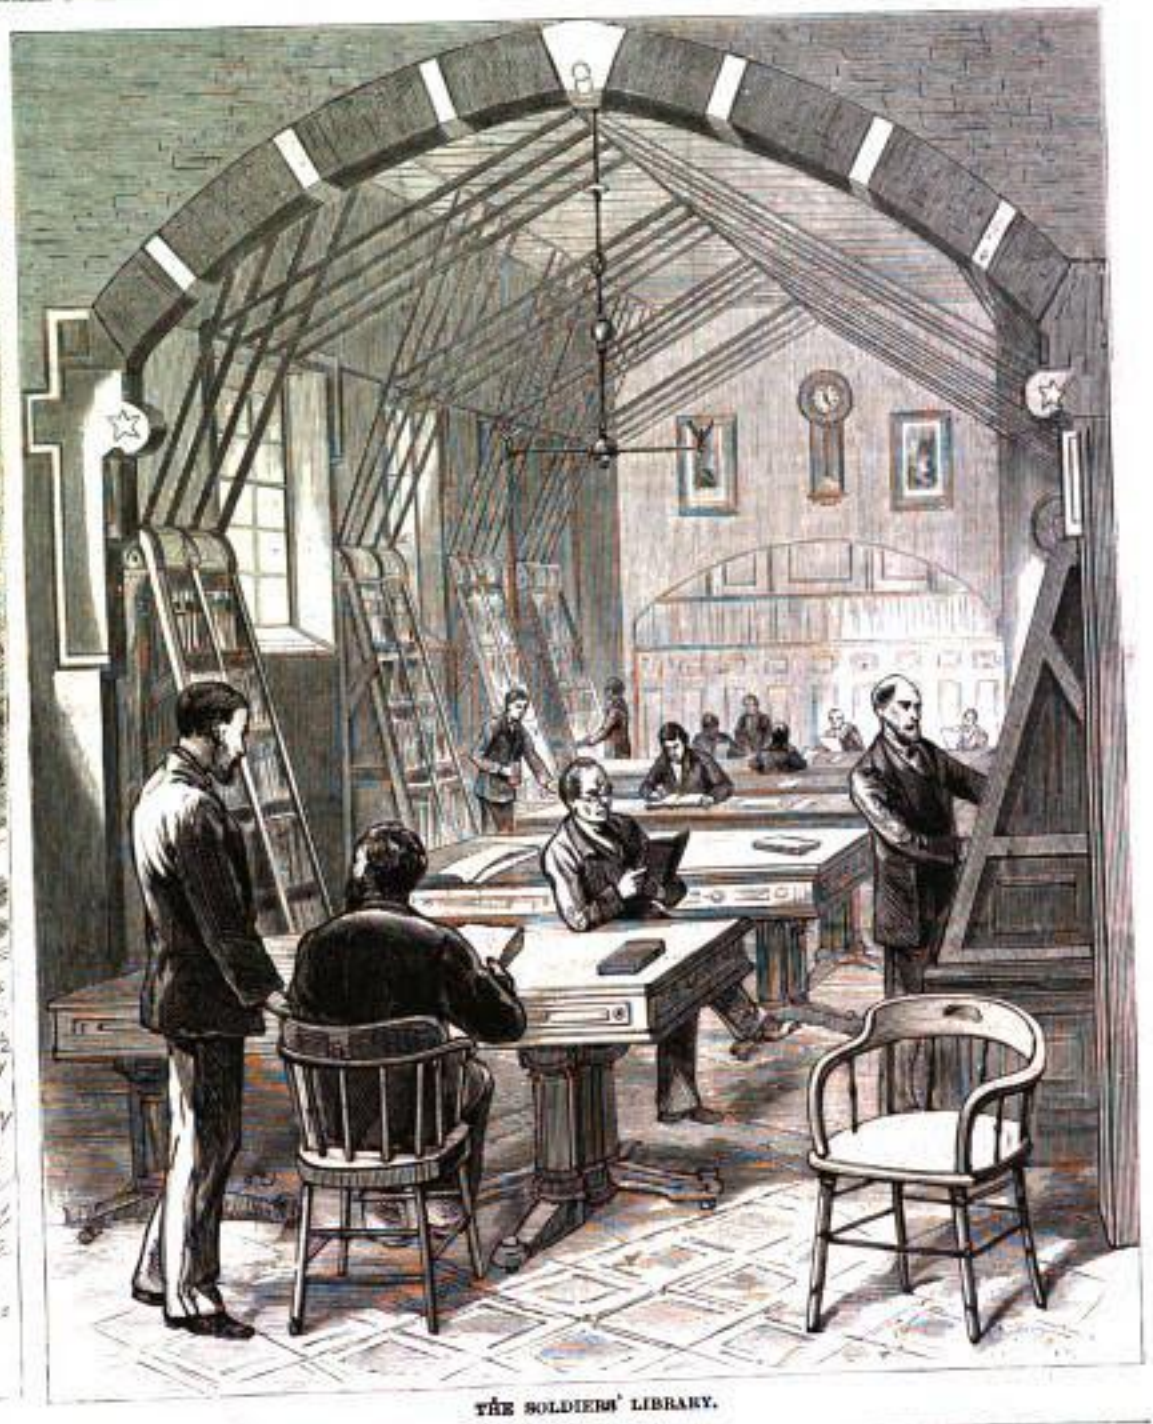
THE READING-ROOM.

THE DINING-ROOM.

THE

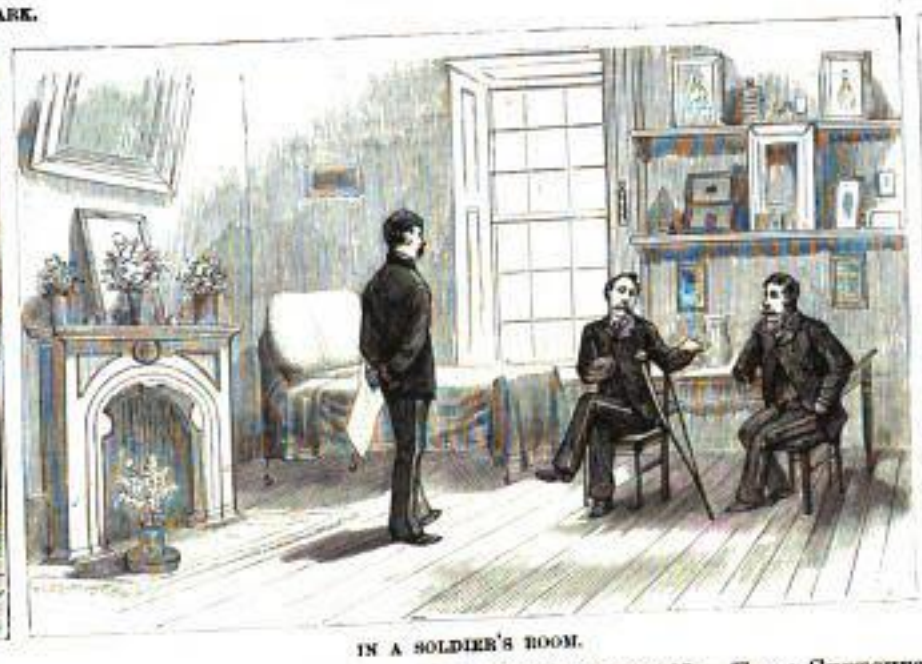
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—THE NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, AND SUMMER RESIDENCE OF THE

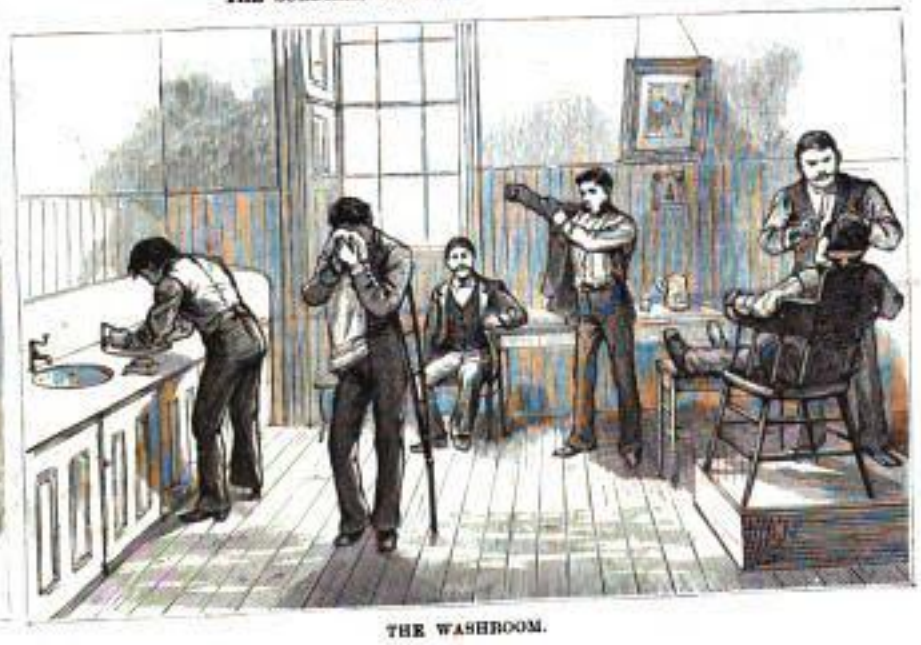
Digitized by Google



THE PRESIDENT'S SUMMER DWELLING.

THE LABORATORY AND DRUG-STORE.





THE SOLDIERS' LIBRARY.

GOING IN THE PARK.

IN A SOLDIER'S ROOM.

THE WASHROOM.

R.

DENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AT WASHINGTON.—FROM SKETCHES BY MISS GEORGIE DAVIS.—SEE PAGE 351.

Digitized by Google

IN ABSENCE.

AWAY from thee, sweetheart, away from thee!
The hours wing slowly down the slope of day.
The sunlight lingers on the restless sea,
And time makes lazy stay.

The tyrant that once sped so fiercely by,
Hurrying the sun towards the flaming west,
Now lies supine along the purple sky,
In listless, dreamy rest.

But slow or fast, sweetheart, the fleeting hours
Bear one bright legend on their ceaseless flow,
The story of a love, whose kindly powers
And sacredness we know.

No year can dim the glory of its strength,
No century can fold its joy from sight;
Born in earth's darkness, it will reach at length
God's everlasting light.

Parted to-day, the meeting-time will come,
And so I win my gladness, dear, from this—
Each throb of time brings me more near to home,
And nearer to thy kiss!

THOMAS S. COLLIER.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—(CONTINUED).

A PERFECT madness of jealousy and agony seizes Toboskie. It is with the utmost effort that he restrains himself from taking her in his arms, and giving vent to this fierce wrath that has suddenly fastened upon him for this righteous man—from crying, "Your religion shall not touch her, she is mine—mine for all eternity!"

From henceforth he will be jealous of all things; he is even jealous now of the purity and religion with which this man would enwrap her, as in a mantle. And it is a peculiar love this that has fastened upon him—a love that would bend her proud spirit to the haughty supremacy of his will—that would make her know no law save in him! Even this affection, grand and entire, but for this, is subservient to his thirst for victory, his lust for power. Yet even while he craves it and looks in the steady, glorious eyes, something in his soul whispers that never in all the years of his life will this hungry desire for dominion over her be satiated.

He knows well the haughty supremacy of her will—the quiet, but unalterable firmness of her nature. In her soul there is no plastic clay ready for the potter's hand, but granite, hard and immovable as his own, and with which he may forever contend but never triumph over. A gloomy conviction is upon him that for them the future holds but little happiness, that their natures are too closely alike, too haughty, dominant and unbending. And he knows that this will be a strife, a flaming sword, between them for ever.

Still, despite this thirst for dominion, his whole life and soul are merged in this one fierce passion she has enkindled—a passion that could taste shame, poverty and death for her, but never lessen. He would give her his life; his honor, which he prizes more; his happiness; but he must struggle through seas of trouble that will bend and shatter his pride and smite his haughty manhood to the dust ere he can acknowledge the superiority of her matchless womanhood. As surely as these three stand now together the day will come when he shall yield to her the palm of the conqueror—when he shall kneel at her feet the conquered, and acknowledge his error—yet, God pity them! At what a price must her victory be gained!

"The hour is growing late," he says, and his voice is a trifle harsh. "We will not further trespass upon your hospitality. Miss Ashhurst, are you ready?"

"Not ready," replies Maize, smiling at the abbot; "but if we are trespassing we have staid too long already."

"Daughter, you are most welcome." The monk's voice is grave and sincere. "No friend of Lord Toboskie's could intrude at St. Michael's. My son," turning genially to the Russian noble, "if it be agreeable, I should be pleased to show your friend over the monastery."

The kind words, the delicate compliment, the intrinsic value of this man for the first time are unappreciated by Toboskie. Under the fires of his fierce passion that is jealous even of this simple religion his entire nature has become changed. A savage resentment fills his breast for both his companions, and with all his proud breeding and haughty composure he cannot prevent his voice from being cold and a trifle dictatorial.

"You are kind, father, but we will go. The hour is growing late."

Miss Ashhurst's quick ear catches that commanding inflection in her companion's tones, and her sudden humility vanishes, her pride rises in alarm. A haughty, amazed light creeps into those glorious eyes that flash beneath the crown of her golden hair. It is the first time that any one has presumed to dictate to her, and in that glance that calmly meets his hot and angry eyes he reads rebellion, defiance and a proud challenge. It is the spirit of old—that spirit that defied him long years ago when she was so small that he could almost have crushed her in his powerful hands, and now, as then, it rouses a savage wrath in him.

"Surely Lord Toboskie is not such a victim to propriety that he fears to remain in my society an hour after sunset."

Her voice is low and even in its wondrous melody; her great eyes are filled with scorn and defiance, yet also with a sweet, sunny, mocking laughter that maddens him.

"I think it better to go," he says, coldly, and standing hat in hand.

As a natural consequence this perverse young lady is seized with a more violent desire to remain. She turns to the monk with her sweetest, sunniest smile:

"I could not think of missing such an opportunity as this. Many thanks for your kindness, father. I shall be delighted to accept it. Will you accompany us, my lord?"

One glance, like sheet lightning, shoots from the piercing eyes of Toboskie, but he gives no further token of his rage. With a courteous bow he seats himself upon the stone bench, and Maize, looking at him with that laughing, exasperating devil in her eyes, sees no change in his appearance save a slightly ashen hue that suffuses his haughty face that looks cut in gray stone.

"Thank you, madame. But with your permission I will await you here."

She makes him a low, sweeping bow that holds all the studied art of the English capital, all the undulating, sensuous grace of her Greek nature; and, turning with a smile to the abbot, whose position is not altogether an enviable one, she accompanies him out of the hall.

Toboskie is alone with his thoughts, his bitter rage and fatal, undying love. This is the first dispute between them, but it arouses the old strife, it defines their position, it shows him that the hostility of old is to mark their future intercourse. A dreary pain is upon him. Despite his anger he suffers as in all the years of his life he has never before suffered, and he wonders what freak of God or nature has made her so antagonistic to him, yet so dear, so wildly precious! When she finally condescends to return, he is haughty and unyielding; she, sunny, mocking, indifferent. And in this mood they bid adieu to the abbot, who stands at the door and watches them as they walk slowly, and some distance apart, down the hill. Before entirely disappearing, Maize turns and looks back at the monastery upon the hill. She can just discern the massive figure of the abbot as he stands motionless as a statue in the doorway, his black-draped frame outlined against the dim light of the hall. She stands for a moment as though fascinated, then the large and handsome head bends in a final, stately farewell, and the Abbot of St. Michael's has disappeared.

As he draws the bolts and locks the door for the night, a shadow rests upon his brow. He is more than interested in this proud scion of Russian nobility, whose royal bounty has been limitless with this religious community; he is strongly attached to him, and knowing the haughty, swift, dominant nature of the men of his race, looking ahead in the future he foresees a tragedy that no mortal hand can avert.

That night he says an extra prayer—a prayer for the man and the woman just gone.

CHAPTER XVIII.—TOBOSKIE IS SUSPICIOUS.

LAGORS and Toboskie sit in the private apartment of the former six months after the arrival of Lord Ashhurst and his family.

"Are you going out?" inquired the latter, as his host begins preparations for dressing.

"I am invited to Lord Ashhurst's. Her ladyship is alone this evening, and I am designated by her husband to entertain her." Count Lagors speaks carelessly, but Toboskie regards him sharply. Engrossed as he has been with the history of his own life—with its pain, and hope, and despair—he has had but little time to attend to his friend. But now, looking at him in this keen, sudden scrutiny, he sees how thin and haggard he has grown in the months that are gone. His eyes at times are wild, and always filled with that lurid flame, their peculiar characteristic. He looks like a man haunted, lost—beyond all redemption.

"Nicholas," says Toboskie, and his voice is very gentle—"Nicholas, something has gone wrong. Will you not confide in me?"

Count Lagors starts convulsively, and a spasm of actual fear crosses his face.

"Nonsense!" he exclaims in the next moment, with a laugh that one would be mad not to see is forced. "Don't look so sentimental. Confide in you! Certainly, my dear fellow. I tell you confidentially—my liver is out of order."

That chill, haughty shadow falls over the proud face of the Minister. The Russian statesman is not a man to offer his friendship and sympathy where it is undesired or unappreciated. He rises deliberately and carelessly takes out his watch. The acquaintance between these two men has been too long for Lagors not to see and understand that cold, steady light in his friend's eyes. And of a sudden that forced composure, that feigned carelessness, deserts him. He stands shivering as with cold; his eyes, wild and wretched, staring beseechingly at his companion. Toboskie would be worse than a brute to maintain his anger in the face of such woe as this. He is melted at the sight of it—he, the icy statesman, naturally implacable and relentless as fate.

"My God!" he says, and his voice vibrates with horror—"my God! what is the matter?"

For all answer Lagors, with a deep groan, sinks in a chair and covers his face with his hands, while his slender frame shakes with dry, suffocating sobs. Toboskie is appalled. Never before has he witnessed such agony as this, and, through sheer sympathy, the perspiration starts out upon his brow. But he sees the necessity of composing his agitated companion. He approaches him and lays his hand firmly upon his shoulder.

"Lagors, you must control yourself; this is folly, madness!"

Lagors lifts his haggard, sunken face; his eyes are dry and burning luridly, his breast heaves with voiceless sobs. In the words of Valentine Gabaudie, he gives vent to his agony:

"Mad! My God, I wish I were mad!"

Toboskie looks troubled and uncertain. Then a peculiar resolution fastens upon his countenance and banishes his indecision.

"It is useless," he says, in that steady, strengthening voice of his that has more influence with his emperor than any other earthly thing. "It is useless for me to say that I sympathize with you; it is also as useless for me to deny that I have seen there is mystery abroad somewhere. I am under the impression that we are all surrounded by a network of evil or intrigue; your manner shows me that it is drawn very tightly, indeed, around you. Perhaps I can aid you in some way; if possible, I will, provided you have confidence enough in me to give an entire explanation of your case."

Lagors lifts his haggard, weary eyes; in their depths is a shrinking pain and fear.

"What has roused your suspicions?" he says, lowly.

Toboskie looks at him steadily.

"Do you wish me to tell?"

"Yes!" the voice now is almost inaudible.

Toboskie seats himself in front of his host.

"Very well," he says, calmly, "since it is your desire I will proceed, but this will take me back to a past period. In the first place, years ago I met two women in England. I am naturally cynical and suspicious, having but little faith in any one. It is my unfortunate characteristic, but never in all my life have I ever doubted any human being—and I have been thrown with all classes—as I doubted, and still doubt, those two women. Shall I tell you who they were?"

The great, staring, sunken eyes of the wretched auditor are fastened upon the speaker, and in them he reads assent.

"They were Jack Ashhurst's wife and Valentine Gabaudie."

At those names a vast, dry choking sob breaks heavily in Lagors's throat, and his long, slim fingers spasmodically clutch the arms of his chair.

"As I say, I doubted them, and still doubt them. Understand, however, I do not suspect Lord Ashhurst or his daughter; I believe if ever mortal man and woman were held unconscious in a network of machinations, were bound in a nest of moral vampires, were fed upon by human ghouls, it is this man and woman. They are victims of a terrible deception or conspiracy, and God knows how my heart goes out in sympathy to them. Years ago I had Lady Ashhurst's history from her own lips; but before that, that great conviction of her falsity had settled upon me, and I knew that she lied to me. She told me that this Valentine was an old and valued relative; she lied. She told me that Maize was found in Greece, the impoverished and desolate child of decayed nobility; it was false. It is a hard and a bold thing to say of a woman like Lady Ashhurst, and you may call me harsh, but I would stake my soul upon it, that Claire Ashhurst, with her angelic beauty, is one mass of vile deception, one foul and hideous lie. Yet I pity her, for she is expiating her sin in a bondage bitterer than death—she is under the control of Valentine Gabaudie, who is a woman unknown to kindness or mercy. Of course, I am liable to be mistaken, but I have summed them up, and I believe it is right."

"But how do you connect these people with me?" murmurs Lagors.

"I don't connect them with you; I am merely stating facts. But I will tell what has aroused my suspicions. In the first place, Lagors, you are a changed man; in the last six months you have aged more than in all the years of your life put together. In the second, I know you are, or have been, connected in some way with the estate to which Jack Ashhurst has succeeded in establishing his title. But where does this land come from? Not from the Ashhurst side of the house; if so, the very name would establish it and make everything clear and right. England's proudest peers and truest patriots were Ashhursts. Jack Ashhurst, with all his past extravagance and dissipation, is above suspicion. But these Schaffuskie Lands emanate, it appears, from the other side of the family, where, I believe, a shadow and mystery lingers. This property is said to have been bequeathed to Maize. It is a lie! It belongs to one of those two women, and through some unknown fear, some dread of the past, they have not dared to acknowledge their title, but have thrown the responsibility upon Maize, which will lull some suspicion that they fear. And I believe that it is in these lands that the mystery lies. And, as I have once before said, I believe that you are, or have been, connected in some way with the Schaffuskie estate. But I think that if you have ever in any way been allied with these women, Lady Ashhurst is at present unconscious of it; in other words, she does not recognize you. In one sense, Claire Ashhurst is as much a victim as her husband and adopted daughter. It is that woman, that spirit of evil, Valentine Gabaudie, who is the controlling element in this unfortunate family, and who will bring them, for some hidden purpose of her own, to wreck and ruin! And now, last of all, my friend, I will give you my final reason. One night, a few weeks ago, I was restless, and could not remain at home. Although it was late then, well on to twelve o'clock, I decided to call on you, knowing that you seldom retire before the early hours of the morning. I came alone, without servant or carriage, and just as I was about to ascend your steps the hall-door opened, and a woman stepped out. The light of the street-lamp fell straight upon her, and revealed the face of Valentine Gabaudie—but it was not the countenance of a mistress returning from midnight revels with her lover, but the face of a devil incarnate, stamped with hatred and vengeance."

He pauses, and there is an intense silence in the chamber while the two men gaze steadily at one another. Then the ashen lips of Count Lagors move, and he speaks feebly.

"To-morrow, or soon," he says, and he struggles hard for breath, "I will tell you all. I am too weak to explain to-night."

With closed eyes, he lies back in his chair, and Toboskie sees that a shadow like that of death hovers over his sunken features.

"You are too ill to go out to-night," he says.

"I shall not leave my room before to-morrow," is the weary reply.

Then a transformation is wrought. He leaps to his feet and commences pacing the floor. His eyes burn with a passionate, angry fire, and a hectic flush stamps his cheek, and, as he speaks, he flings his hands around with the wildness of a maniac.

"Oh, that fiend incarnate!" he cries, while his eyes deepen in a murderous rage and his voice is low with concentrated passion. "Oh, that she-devil! My God, give me the chance of dealing with her as I would like! Toboskie, I could see Valentine Gabaudie strung to the rack and never pity her! I could see her burnt at the stake and not raise a finger to save her. But, have mercy on me! I love the other one—I love Claire, that sweet, dazzling, maddening woman that Jack Ashhurst claims for his own. Oh, if I had not been mad, if I had not been a fool in those other days. Oh, Claire, Claire!"—he stops, and down his sunken cheeks roll a flood of tears, evidence of a strong man's incomputable woe. His long, thin fingers are locked tightly before him; his eyes, staring and horror-filled, are fixed upon vacancy; his slim figure shivers as with mortal cold. He is a wreck soul and body, but whatever of sin his past may hold, he has atoned for it in this hour.

"You must compose yourself, Nicholas," says Toboskie, who really fears for his friend's reason. "Nothing can be gained by this. I will leave you, for I believe you will do better alone."

Count Lagors turns to his friend and upon his shoulder lays his hand that shivers like a leaf.

"I must warn you," he says, hoarsely, "against that woman. In Valentine you have a bitter and implacable enemy—a woman who will soon or late be revenged upon all she hates."

"I know it," says Toboskie, calmly, though a hand of ice seizes his vitals.

"And if ever she can do you an injury she will do it."

"I know that, too."

"How have you gained her enmity?"

"It was long ago in England. You must know that she is the possessor of a remarkable power, the gift of magnetism."

"Know it!" cries Lagors, excitedly. "My God, I should think I knew it!"

"Well, that power was utterly useless with me, for the simple reason that my will was stronger than hers. She attempted to influence me once, years ago in England, but failed. From that moment she has been my enemy. And now she has me in her power."

"How?"

"She can injure me, kill me, through Maize." Toboskie's voice is low and husky, showing how mighty is the love wherewith he loves this girl.

And over Count Lagors's countenance falls a whiteness and a horror appalling to witness. He lifts his ghastly, stricken face, and Toboskie shudders and shades his eyes with his hands. He essays to speak, but his tongue seems paralyzed, himself turned to marble; he only stares at Toboskie in that blind, stricken, terrified way that would move a heart of stone.

"For heaven's sake, what is the matter now?" cries Toboskie, who is also pale to the lips.

But Count Lagors takes no notice of the question. His eyes are fastened upon his companion in that dumb and appalling horror. His lips move, and finally, in a halting, feeble way, shape the words:

"And you love the girl?"

"I do!"

"God have mercy on us!" It is all he says, but Toboskie again shudders at the depth of agony the exclamation holds, as he obeys Lagors's motion and leaves the room.

CHAPTER XIX.—ANOTHER CONTEST.

"JACK, dear, old father, Jack!" the lusty shout, denoting a bronchial organization in the highest state of soundness, floats down the street on the crisp, frosty air, something like a clear, sharp clash of silvern bells. It is Maize; she stands under the arched doorway of the gray old castle where they live—a sight, upon the early Russian morning, that would do a soul good. Never was her rich, royal beauty more apparent. She is evidently in great haste, for down over the fur cloak that she has hastily thrown around her falls a vail that seems to have concentrated all the brightness of the sun. It gleams and flashes in the morning light; it glides around her proud figure like a thing of life; it even brushes—this wondrous diadem of hair—it even brushes the old gray stones upon which she stands. Her face, haughty and grand in its perfect loveliness, is set towards a certain broad masculine back that, with a velocity unusual to it, is steadily receding down the street.

"Jack! Jack! you stupid man, can you hear nothing?"

Still the figure proceeds on its way with a calmness and decision particularly exasperating to the young lady.

"Jack!" this time the shout, rendered desperate, reaches the gentleman. He stops precipitately, glances to his right and left, then turns slowly and sees the young lady gesticulating upon the step.

"Bless my soul!" he mutters, and starts hastily towards her.

"I want you," says Maize, when he reaches her, quite out of breath from his unusual speed, "I want you to buy me some of those chocolate caramels. There is only one place in St. Petersburg where you can get them, and they have them exactly like those we get at Simpson's, in London."

Digitized by Google

"Well, upon my soul!" splutters Jack, in eminent danger of choking in his indignation, "is that what you called me back for, and disturbed the peace in general, may I inquire?"

"It is partly what I called you back for. Mercy on us! Jack, don't blow so."

"Young lady," says Jack, with sudden and crushing dignity, "let me tell you there are limits to my endurance. You shout after me down the street until I am in danger of being arrested for harboring a lunatic, and by a thousand ways of contemptible artifice. Yes, madam, contemptible artifice. You insinuate that there are urgent and imperative reasons for my immediate return, and then, when you have succeeded in deluding me, you have the audacity to tell me you want some sugar-plums, and—to blow me up for blowing." After which villainous pun Jack ceases, with a broad grin, feeling that he has amply avenged himself.

Maize reels back against the door.

"Jack," she says, faintly, "Jack, I'm sick."

"Very well," promptly responds Jack, and with a display of malice that is an outrage—"very well, here is Toboskie; send him for a doctor."

Maize's embarrassment threatens for the moment to leave nothing to be desired on Jack's part, as she glances hastily up, and sees Count Toboskie standing a few steps away, with a look of enjoyment upon his face, that speedily awakens in the breast of this savage young lady a strong desire to murder him. She looks down at her robe de chambre, at her small, bare feet—positively bare—thrust in the fur-lined sandals. True, the dress is of the richest texture, but open very low at the throat, and her sandals are altogether irreproachable; still she has the vague impression that her toilet is not altogether suitable for the street.

Toboskie, on his part, thinks it the most delightful, bewitching costume he has ever beheld; wonders why in the world she doesn't always wear it, and swears, silently, that a wife dressed always in this style would be a heaven too great for earth.

Maize positively glares at Jack as if that injured individual were the cause of her mortification, and for a moment looks as if she were about to beat a retreat.

"You are better, my dear?" inquires Jack, with suspicious solicitude.

"You, men," says the young lady, without deigning to notice this disgraceful thrust, "must be possessed with the demon of early-rising."

"I confess, it is something unusual for me," laughs Toboskie; "but I had a vague idea that there was something said last night about an early gallop over the country for you and me. Was I correct?"

"I believe you asked me if I would go out riding this morning," replies Maize, ungraciously. And shooting him a side-long glance, is delighted to see that it takes effect. The Russian straightens his magnificent form, and his eyes flash.

Jack takes out his watch; it is evident that he is growing impatient.

"If you will have the kindness—" he begins.

"Oh, yes," promptly responds his obedient daughter, "I called you back to tell you that, in a moment of madness, I was betrayed into making an engagement to go out riding this morning. But, since I have made it, I want to tell you that I will not ride that nasty beast you bought yesterday."

"Eh?" Jack is the picture of idiotic bewilderment. Toboskie stands by, black as a thundercloud.

"I thought I spoke plainly."

"You won't ride him, eh?"

"No, I won't."

"He is the best saddle-horse for a lady I could find in Russia." Jack's tones are a trifle indignant now, as befits the occasion.

"Oh, no, he isn't," respectfully contradicts Maize. "The horse you bought to take back to England—if ever we go—is the best horse in Russia, and he it is I will ride."

(To be continued.)

THE GREAT WESTERN FLOODS.

NEVER has the "Father of Streams" raised his waters so high as in June, 1880. The great rain on the tributaries of the Upper Mississippi, particularly the Chippewa River in Wisconsin, caused the water to rise six feet within twenty-four hours, and at St. Paul, Dubuque and other cities on the Upper Mississippi, there was an immense inundation. This was in the first week in June. On the 11th of June the water of the Mississippi began to rise at Rock Island, Moline and Davenport. Of these three cities Rock Island suffered the most. The dam of the Pacific and Rock Island Railroad embankment broke and the water inundated all that lower part of Rock Island generally known as the "Big Slough," and the city authorities were compelled to build a dam to prevent the water from inundating the upper part of the city. Sacks filled with sand were heaped together and two hundred loads of clay were carried down from the bluffs to fortify the dam. But, spite of these preventive measures, much valuable property was destroyed. Houses were set afloat, and whole rows of buildings were so damaged that it will be necessary to rebuild them. From June 11th to the 28th the water rose eighteen and a half feet above low-water mark. The region around the public square and all of the levee were overflowed, so that the city urchins sailed about in skiffs and on pieces of the sidewalks, which the flood had broken up, while adults drove to and fro in carriages through the surging waters.

In Moline and Davenport the flood was also unprecedented, but Davenport suffered less than either of the other cities. The levee was submerged, and the depot of the C. M. and St. P. R. R. was totally surrounded by water. Cellars along Front Street were filled with water, and the ferry company had to build a bridge to the sidewalk on Front Street. The upper saw mills were all surrounded by water, and had to stop work for more than a week. The flood has now subsided, but it is feared that sickness will follow. Colonel Flagler, the commandant of Rock Island Arsenal, will cause flags to be put up on the pillars of the bridge over the Mississippi to show how high the river raised its waters in the great flood of 1880.

Our artist, recently with General Miles's expedition, writes us:

"In coming down on the Diamond Jo from St. Paul to St. Louis I noticed the fearful destruction done by the high water in the Mississippi. All the lowland farms are entirely under water, and the crops certainly ruined. In some places the river now is from four to five miles wide. Several railroads lying on the banks are completely under water. A great many cities remind one of Venice. Some towns are completely surrounded by water. In some places it is impossible to land. In going down now the scenery is very wild and romantic."

ANNUAL EXCURSION OF THE NEWS-BOYS OF NEW YORK CITY.

ON July 1st Hon. John Starin provided his fourth excursion and picnic for the newsboys of New York, sending some 1,500 of them on his barges to Alpine Grove. Just before the boats started each boy was given a bag containing two sandwiches, two cakes and a piece of pie. A few minutes before the destination was reached the second meal was given out. The boys were all driven to the upper deck of the barge, and a barricade was built of gang-planks and boxes below, with a space just wide enough for one boy to go through at a time. As each boy went through he was given another paper bag containing two more sandwiches, two more cakes, and another piece of pie. There was such a crowding for the narrow space that the police had to do more than threaten the boys with their rattans, and rap a few eager and bony knuckles. The boys emptied their bags, climbed the posts to the upper deck again, and innocently received another supply. It was about 2 o'clock when the barge was made fast at Alpine Grove. It was about 2:20 when about fifty newsboys had reached the swimming place, undressing as they ran, and plunged into the water. Two minutes later, and not more than fifty of the boys had their clothes on. Fourteen hundred boys in the water all at once, and a novel sight it was. It was no place for anybody whose constitution was too weak to bear the sight of a naked boy. Fourteen hundred boys, half naked when dressed, nearly all good swimmers, all bunched together in the water.

The beach at Alpine Grove gave the boys a grand chance to bathe. There was deep water and shallow, and plenty of nice black mud on the bottom, that they delighted in painting themselves with, and throwing, in big handfuls, at one another. It was no uncommon thing for a boy, on coming up after a dive, to get a choice morsel of a pint or so of this mud straight over his mouth. The few who did not go in to swim climbed the steep hill and hunted snakes. After a while they found one, and killed him. It would be a bright snake that could dodge fifty newsboys. At the end of about an hour the steamer's whistle blew, and some of the boys went on board. The great majority, however, staid on shore as coolly as though they had their own private carriages waiting to take them home in case they missed the boat. It took two or three false starts to get them all together again; and then the policemen had to go out with their switches and drive them aboard like sheep. The homeward trip was made without accident, and the boys were landed in New York in time to secure lodgings in their favorite hotel in New Chambers Street.

A FORTY DAYS' FAST.

AT noon, on Monday, June 28th, Dr. Henry S. Tanner, of Minneapolis, Minn., began an attempt to abstain from food and drink for forty days and nights, in a hall in New York City. He claims to have fasted for a period of forty-two days, but as almost everybody discredited him, he made up his mind to prove his assertion by repeating the experiment, subject to the constant surveillance of watchers, those watchers to be medical men. Each watcher is obliged to make oath that he watched diligently, and that the fasting man took no food during his (the watcher's) vigil. The watchers are under the supervision of the New York Neurological Society.

At present the faster is wearing a cool suit of dark clothes, white socks and slippers. He carries a fan, but uses it very little. Since the beginning of the present fast his keen gray eyes have become slightly dimmed, the top of his head, which is thinly covered with gray hair, has become as white as milk, and he has lost ten and a half pounds in weight. The outlines of his regular, well-cut features stand out more clearly, and his firm lips close more tightly.

During the first two days Dr. Tanner drank eighty ounces of water, in doses ranging from six to eight ounces each. Since then, in lieu of drinking, he simply gargles his mouth about once an hour with a couple of ounces of water, which he then ejects into a spittoon. He spends the time reclining on his cot, or sitting up in a chair, or coming forward to the border of his inclosure and talking intelligently and earnestly with his watchers. He reads the newspapers morning and evening, and is very fond of sitting on a chair and elevating his feet to the top of his little writing-table. At bedtime he takes a sponge bath. He is then rubbed down with coarse towels, after which he puts on his night dress and gets between the sheets. Before he dresses in the morning, his clothes are examined to ascertain that there is no food concealed in them. His pulse and temperature are frequently taken, and his weight every day. He has already passed the time when, according to medical opinion, he should exhibit delirium and other evidences of insanity, but as yet no dangerous symptoms have been observed.

A New House for the British Commons.

SHOULD the House of Commons agree to vote the money for a new chamber, it is believed that it can be constructed within twelve months, and that, too, without interfering with the public business now conducted in the old. The new chamber, as recommended by the Select Committee of 1868, could be built across what is termed the Commons Court, and the present House of Commons could be converted into a spacious lobby, the want of which is now much felt. The insufficiency of the present arrangements for the accommodation of members of the House is so annoying that Mr. Sergeant Simon proposes to suggest the repeal of the standing order made so long ago as 1835 with respect to members' places, and to move in substitution of it another, to the effect that any member may secure a seat by affixing his name himself thereto, and not otherwise, at 3:30 o'clock, and not earlier or afterwards, but before the House meets at the usual hour, and not earlier than half an hour before the hour of meeting when the House meets for a morning sitting, providing that the member so affixing his name be present at prayers, and that Mr. Speaker do give directions to the doorkeepers accordingly. The present House of Commons was planned by the late Sir Charles Barry, under the erroneous impression that it could seat at least three-fourths of the members, and that its acoustic properties would be perfect. In both these respects he was deceived. An artificial ceiling has been constructed which cuts the windows in two, thus destroying the architectural features of the building, while the benches from which honorable members can see, hear and, if so minded, speak, are not calculated to accommodate more than 300 persons. The result is that when the attendance of members is large and "big divisions" are pending the greatest confusion prevails, much dissatisfaction is expressed and discomfort experienced. In the event of a "call of the House" the spectacle to be presented would be in the last degree undignified. It is almost a reproach that the present house has so long been tolerated, for it is little more than a makeshift. So difficult was it, for instance, for Mr. Mitchell Henry on a recent evening to find a place from which to give notice of his intention to put a question on the subject of a new house that he was obliged to go up to the gallery to the right of the Speaker, from which position he addressed the right honorable gentleman. The question now to be put in issue affects constituencies quite as much as representatives, as no member of Parliament can be expected to discharge his functions in the House of Commons unless provided with a place from which he can hear, see and speak.

Another Anglo-Prussian Alliance.

THE influence of England at the Berlin Court is very strong, and the betrothal of Prince William of Prussia, the future heir apparent to the throne, and the Princess Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein, is looked upon as a triumph of the English party. The young Prince is the eldest son of the Crown Prince of Prussia, the heir apparent, and his mother was the Princess Royal of England, eldest daughter of Queen Victoria. In appearance he is rather thick-set and heavy, without much intelligence in the expression of his face. At the time of his birth the doctors wrenched his left arm so severely that it has hung palsied ever since. He consequently cannot take much part in manly exercises, but he is a good whist-player and waltzer. The young lady is a person of decided character. She objects to tight-lacing, and will not be photographed and stuck up in the shop windows. She is not remarkable for the classical beauty of her features, but large blue eyes, lots of fair hair and a lovely complexion, make up for the irregularity of her face. The old Empress is very indignant at the match, and positively refused to be present at the dinner given to celebrate the betrothal, and at which the Emperor made a gushing speech. Indeed, her opposition is so strong that she would only see the Crown Princess for a few moments after the latter's stay of eight months in Italy.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The General Meeting of the German Geometrical Society will be held at Cassel on July 4th to 7th next.

The University of Oxford has conferred the degree of D.C.L. on Professor Sylvester and Mr. Lister, the eminent surgeon.

The Emperor of Germany has appointed Professor Baron von Nordenskjöld a foreign Knight of the Ordre pour le Mérite for Arts and Sciences.

M. Breuse has been elected to fill the place vacated by the death of General Morin in the Section of Mechanics of the Paris Academy of Sciences.

Dr. H. Trautschold, of Moscow, maintains that the level of the ocean is getting lower, and the total quantity of water on the surface of the globe diminishing.

The Emperor of Russia has conferred the Grand Cross of the Order of Stanislaus upon Dr. Hermann Obst, the director of the Ethnographical Museum of Leipzig.

An Exhibition, illustrative of prehistoric German anthropology, will be opened at Berlin in August. Professor Virchow is president of the committee of arrangements.

The Swiss Natural History Society will hold its general meeting on September 12th to 15th next, in the small town of Brieg, in the canton Vaud, at the foot of the Simplon.

During 1881 no less than five exhibitions will be held at Frankfort-on-the-Main, viz., a patent exhibition, a horticultural, a balneological, an industrial, and a tanner's and farrier's, exhibition.

The French Government has taken an important step in the education of the people: a course of teaching in agriculture has been ordered to be introduced into every primary school in the country.

On Sunday, May 23d, M. Dumas was presented by the Société d'Encouragement with a civic crown, in acknowledgment of the services rendered to science and to France during more than half a century.

It is stated that M Coggia, astronomer to the Marseilles Observatory, will be appointed Director of the Algiers Observatory, where no observations at all have been made since its erection in 1864 by Marshal Pelissier.

The Paris Academy of Sciences has awarded the Montyon Prize to M. Camille Flammarion for his new work entitled "Astronomie Populaire." It is a large quarto volume, with magnificent engravings, which was sold in 100 penny parts. The sale in the first year of publication reached 40,000 copies.

It Appears that, with few exceptions, Australian trees flourish as well in California as in their native country. It is hence, conversely, to be expected that the native vegetation of California can be successfully acclimatized in Australia, and that the crops which succeed in the one country are likely to do well in the other.

Negotiations are in progress for the transfer of the Museum Godeffroy to the City of Hamburg. In it are to be found by far the finest series of the zoological and ethnographical products of the Pacific Islands yet assembled together, including all the types of the new species described in the thirteen "Hefts" of the Journal des Museum Godeffroy.

On Saturday, May 5th, the local committee of the French Association for the Advancement of Science met at Rheims, where the next meeting is to be held in August. An exposition of local industry and archæology will be held. Arrangements have been made for excursions connected with the congress, the most notable of which will be to the Han Grottoes, which are situated in Belgium.

The Funds for the erection of a monument in memory of the great philosopher, Leibnitz, at Leipzig, have now reached the sum considered necessary, and Professor Hänel, of Dresden, is about to execute the monument. It will be erected on the southern side of the St. Thomas Churchyard. The statue of Leibnitz will be of bronze, and will measure 3½ metres in height. The pedestal will have the same height, and will be adorned by four bas reliefs.

A Difficulty has supervened in the St. Gothard tunnel, which threatens seriously to retard the completion of the undertaking. In the part of it where the formation is of porous white stone, the vaulting has already given way two or three times, and it has required the greatest care and constant staying with timber to prevent the passage thereabouts from completely collapsing. It was thought, however, that a granite wall six feet thick would be sufficiently strong to support the superincumbent mass of white stone and keep the tunnel permanently open. A wall of this thickness has just been finished, but it, too, has begun to give way, and the engineers are at their wits' end how to overcome the difficulty.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. JOHN WELSH has been made Doctor of Laws by Washington and Lee University.

THE German Academy of Naturalists has created Henry W. Stanley a Doctor of Philosophy for his African explorations.

MISS NELLIE PRATT, granddaughter of Rufus Choate, is soon to be married to Mr. Charles A. Prince, eldest son of Mayor Prince of Boston.

SECRETARY SHERMAN is building in Washington, near his present residence, a substantial red brick house which is to cost about $25,000.

IOWA COLLEGE on June 30th conferred the degree of LL.D. on ex-Secretary McCrary, of Iowa, and on James A. Whitney, of New York City.

WHEN nominated to the Vice-Presidency Mr. Colfax was a widower. So were Henry Wilson and Mr. Wheeler. Both Mr. English and Mr. Arthur are widowers.

MR. BISCHOFFSHEIM, the British banker, lives and entertains in the "Old Palace" on Richmond Green. It was in this house that Anne Boleyn lived and Queen Elizabeth died.

A BRONZE statue of Samuel Adams, by Miss Whitney, was informally unveiled in Dock Square, Boston, July 4th. The name of the square has been changed to Adams Square.

THE Maharajah of Cashmere is said to have vigorously set to work to introduce much needed reforms. He is trying to establish a State Council armed with the most complete powers for the suppression of abuses.

MISS FRANCES EVELYN MAYNARD, the beautiful young English heiress, to whom Prince Leopold was at one time reported to be engaged, is shortly to be married to Lord Brooke, heir to the historic earldom of Warwick.

THE New Testament Company of Bible Revisers will hold a long and final meeting at New Haven, Conn., in July, and it is expected that their completed work will be issued by the University Presses in October or November.

MR. A. G. PORTER, Republican nominee for Governor of Indiana, began life as a young ferryman on the Ohio River, opposite Lawrenceburg. When he had reached the age of fifteen he had saved enough money at this work to carry him partly through a college course.

THE first prize of honor given by the Emperor at the Berlin Fishery Exposition to Professor Spencer J. Baird, of the United States Fishery Commission at Gloucester, Mass., consists of a beautiful crystal epergne, elaborately ornamented with gold, silver, pearls and precious stones, and is valued at $2,000.

QUEEN VICTORIA is said to pride herself exceedingly upon her beautiful collection of miniatures, and she is accustomed to boast with a laugh that in this respect she has only one rival in Great Britain, and that is the Duke of Buccleuch. The Queen manifests her fondness for art, and though now over sixty, still sketches from nature with much skill and taste.

DR. CAIRNS, now considered the head of Scotch Presbyterianism, and principal of the Theological Seminary in Edinburgh, is in this country. He is a tall and slender man, of nearly three score years. He has a ruddy complexion, a prominent nose, a firm mouth and a square chin. His hair and whiskers are snow-white. He has a strong Scotch accent, and is a speaker of rugged eloquence.

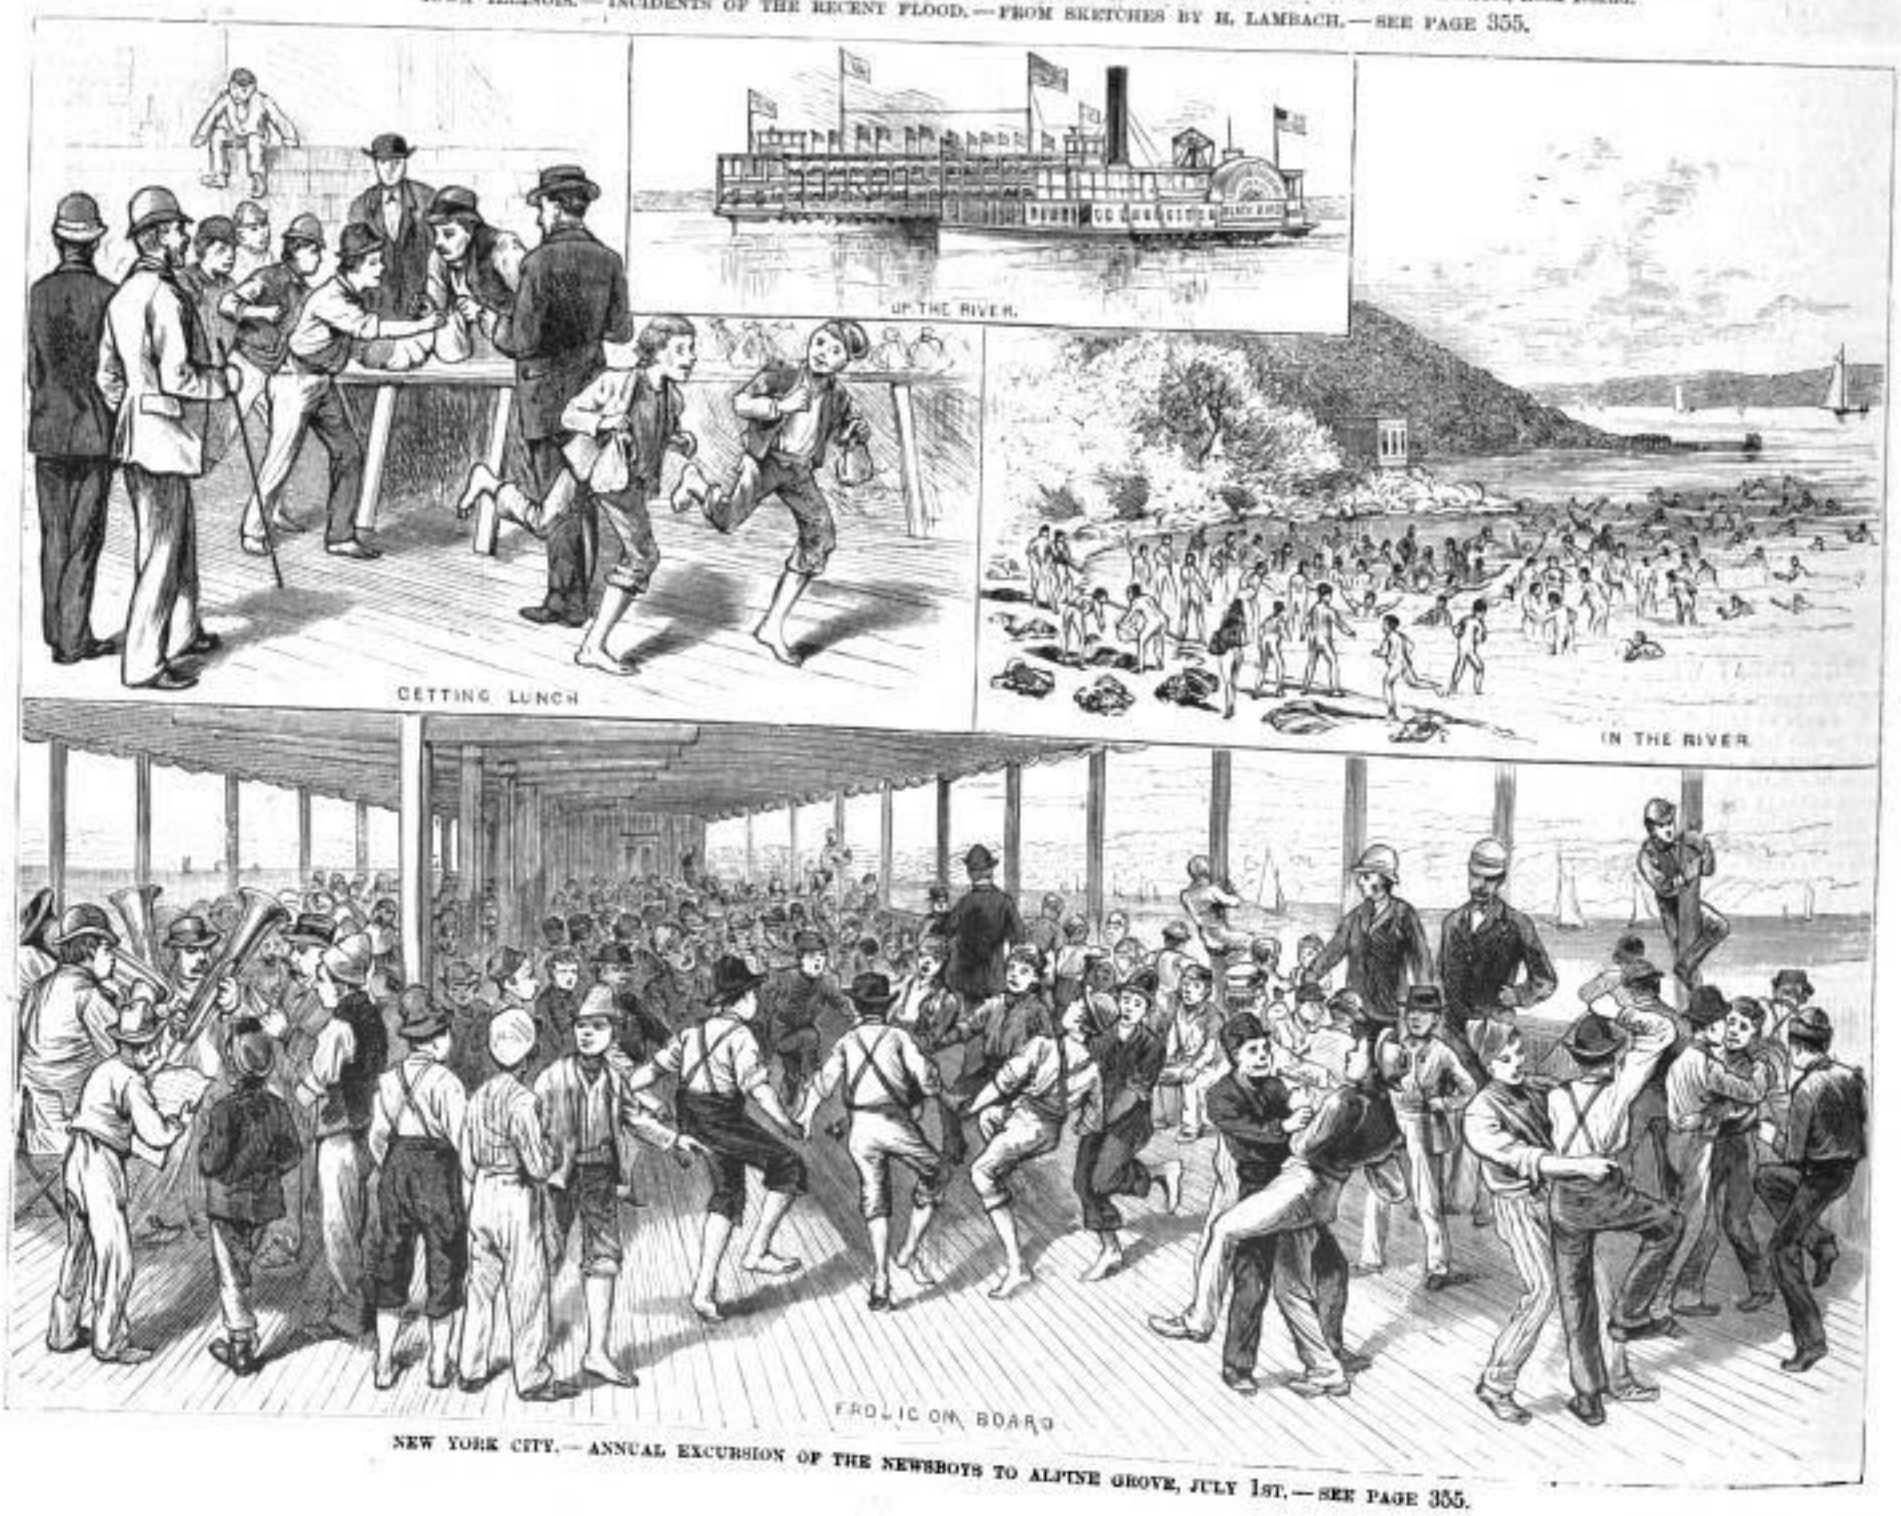
MISS MAUD BANKS, the youngest daughter of the General, will shortly sail for Europe with her mother, with the intention of studying with M. Delsarte, in Paris. The young lady has not finally determined to go upon the stage, but will at any rate thoroughly prepare herself for the work. She has already made some progress in dramatic study. Her elder sister, Miss Blanche Banks, is to be married next month.

BISHOP SIMPSON has been obliged to give up his journey to China and Japan. He had got as far as San Francisco, with his wife and daughters, when Mrs. Simpson, who was not well when they started, became so ill that they were unable to proceed. They will return to Philadelphia as soon as the invalid can travel. It was impossible to substitute another bishop, as the time before the steamer sailed was too short, and the Conference in China and Japan will have to be held without a bishop.

THE death-roll of the past few days embraced the following names: George Ripley, the literary editor of the New York Tribune for many years, July 4th, aged 78; ex-Lieutenant Governor Sexton, of Indiana, 4th, aged 53; Hon. William E. Curtis, Chief-Justice of the Superior Court of New York, 6th, aged 58; Rev. Barnas Sears, D.D., LL.D., agent of the Peabody Educational Fund, 6th, aged 77; Pierce Egan, the well-known English story-writer, 7th, aged 66; General William L. Morris, the senior member of the metropolitan bar, 7th, aged 86; Col. William T. Pelton, nephew of Samuel J. Tilden, July 8th, aged 42.

M. CHALLEMEL-LACOUR, the French Ambassador to Great Britain, was exiled from France in 1852, and was for some years professor of French literature at Zurich. He returned to France on the occasion of the amnesty promulgated by the Imperial French Government in 1859. M. Challemel-Lacour's political career commenced in 1870, when he was installed by the Republican Government as prefect of the Rhone. After the Franco-German war he resigned his appointment and was elected a Deputy to the National Assembly. Previous to receiving the London embassy, M. Challemel-Lacour was Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic at Berne.

THE author of the decrees against the Jesuits is the grandson of a brother of Charles Dominique Ferry, a poor brother who was in the College of Vesoul when the Society of Jesus was suppressed by the Pope in 1763. On being released from his vows by the brief "Dominus ac Redemptor," he studied Latin and theology, and was ordained by the Archbishop of Besançon. When the Republic was proclaimed he refused to take the oath, and his life was so exemplary that he was guillotined. Shortly before his execution he had induced one of his brothers, an innkeeper, to leave his native land of Monaco, and to settle in France, and this brother of the ex-Jesuit who perished on the scaffold at Lyons was the grandfather of Jules Ferry, the present Minister of Public Instruction.



MRS. TOM THUMB is described by a correspondent as she appeared recently in the surf. She is now a perfect matron in miniature. Her face, though still pretty, shows her age, and has a quaint, motherly expression. She is a realization, in a small way, of fair, fat and forty. She wore a suit of blue-gray flannel, which was jaunty and coquettish before it got wet. Her arms were bare to the tops of her shoulders, in each of which was a pretty little dimple, and there was a shapely taper down to her wrists. Her small feet were uncovered. She had a comically dignified air, and stepped into the surf with the air of a knee-high queen. She waded boldly until she met the first high wave, which soused her, flopped her down, rolled her over and over, and finally threw her up on the sand. All the style had been instantaneously drenched out of her clothes, but, "take her altogether, she looked better after the ordeal than did most of the bigger women."

Digitized by Google

1. View of the Public Square, Rock Island. 2. Ferry Landing and Depot, Davenport. 3. The Flood at Ninth Street, Rock Island.

IOWA-ILLINOIS.—INCIDENTS OF THE RECENT FLOOD.—FROM SKETCHES BY H. LAMBACH.—SEE PAGE 355.

NEW YORK CITY.—ANNUAL EXCURSION OF THE NEWSBOYS TO ALPINE GROVE, JULY 1ST.—SEE PAGE 355.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK CITY.—ICE FOUNTAIN SET UP IN THE POST-OFFICE BY THE MODERATION SOCIETY.

A PUBLIC ICE FOUNTAIN.

THE Business Men's Society for the Encouragement of Moderation have established a fresh claim to public appreciation by setting up an ice fountain in an embrasure of the City Post-office on the Park Row side. The fountain measures five feet in length, three feet in width and nearly three feet in depth. It holds four barrels, and has four silver-plated filter-furnished faucets. It is in light wood, ornamented with red. The fountain is constantly surrounded by thirsty drinkers. It is to be hoped that some hundreds of similar fountains may be speedily erected throughout the city.

A NAPOLEONIC VETERAN.

VERY few soldiers of the Napoleonic wars now survive. Of these few there is one, at least, in St. Louis, Mo., Christian Bechtold, who was born in the circuit of Alsfeldt, in the village of Romrad, Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt. On the 1st of June, 1812, he entered the army of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, who was then an ally of Napoleon Bonaparte. Bechtold belonged to the Second Guard Regiment, in which he served until 1821. His discharge, dated nearly sixty years ago, is written in German, and the following is a translation:

DISCHARGE.

His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Hessen, etc., commissioned colonel and commander of the Second Guard Regiment, attests and acknowledges herewith: The Guardist, Christian Bechtold, born at Romrad, twenty-seven years of age, five feet six inches and one line high (about five feet eleven inches, English measure), blonde hair and gray eyes, who has served, as becomes an honorable soldier, eight years and nine months in the company of Captain Wachter, of the Second Battalion, Second Guard Regiment, and having applied for his discharge, which, by reason of the expiration of his term of service, cannot be refused him, therefore, I hereby grant him his discharge, and request all military and civil persons to whom these presents shall come to allow said discharged Christian Bechtold, who is of the Lutheran religion, and by occupation a linen-weaver, to pass everywhere safe and unmolested, and grant him all necessary advances. This done at the Garrison of Darmstadt, on the 19th day of March, 1821, under mine and the battalion commander's own signatures, and affixing of the regimental and battalion seals.

The above named never received a regimental punishment, and engaged in the campaigns of 1813, 1814 and 1815.

The Battalion Commander.
{ Battalion Seal. } LYNKER, Major.
{ Regimental Seal. } V. BOUCHENROEDER, Colonel.

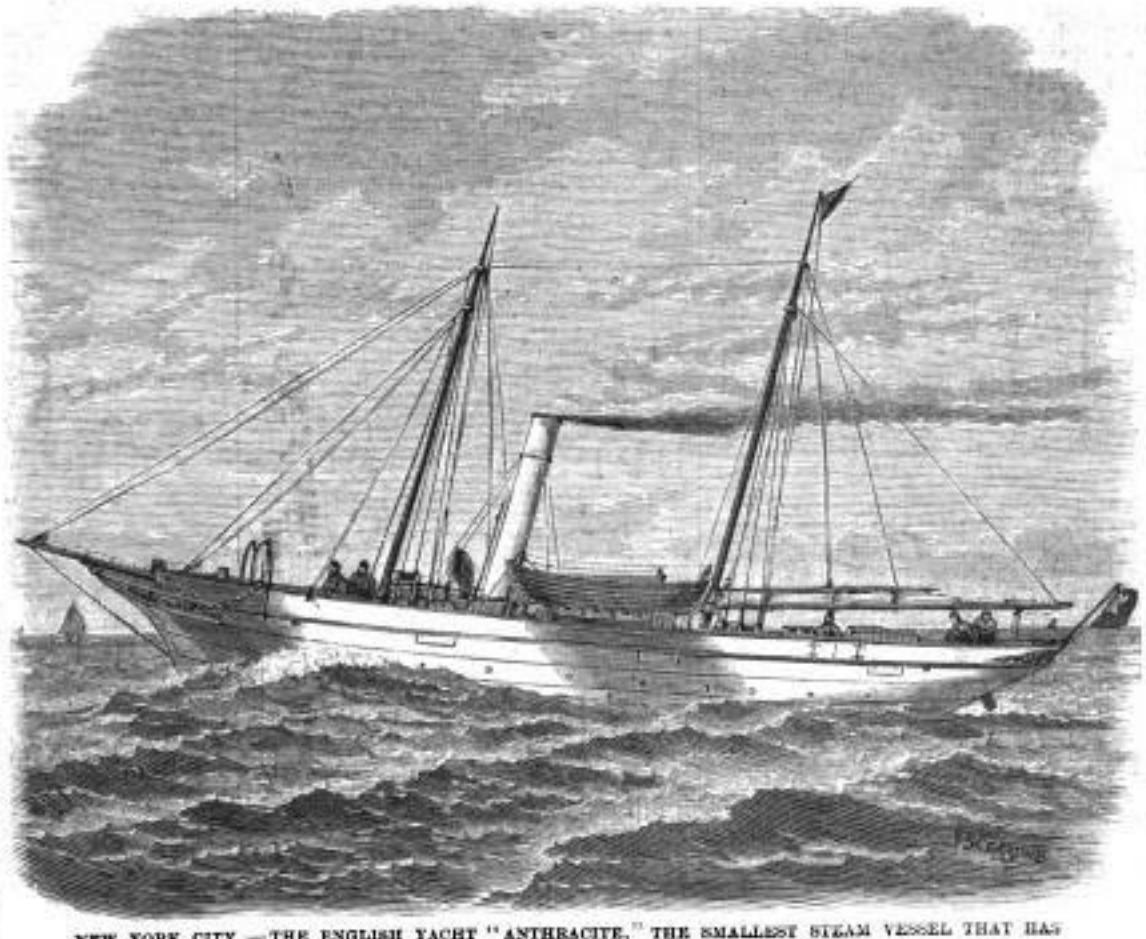
It was only during the first eighteen months of his service that Bechtold's regiment formed a part of the Emperor's army. It was attached to Marshal Ney's corps, which accompanied Napoleon at all times, so that Bechtold saw him nearly every day. He says, whenever Napoleon moved among the troops, they made the air ring with the cry of Vive l'Empereur, but that Napoleon, even in the midst of the wildest enthusiasm produced by his presence, always kept his face steadily to the front, and appeared to take no more notice of his shouting soldiery than if they had been so many croaking frogs.

Bechtold participated in the following memorable battles under Napoleon: Lutzen, in Saxony, May 2d, 1813; Bautzen, in Saxony, May 22d, 1813; Dresden, August 27th, 1813; and Leipzig, on the 16th, 17th and 18th of October, 1813.

On the 1st of January, 1814, his regiment was joined to the army of the Allies operating against Napoleon, and in one of the battles of "The hundred days" Bechtold so distinguished himself as to receive the silver medal for bravery from Francis, Emperor of Austria. Of this medal Bechtold is even more proud than of the honorable mention made of him in his discharge. It is of pure silver, about two inches in diameter, showing on one side the likeness of Francis of Austria, surrounded by his name and title. On the reverse side is a wreath of bays, supported on stands of colors encircling the legend, "Der Tapperkeit" (for bravery). The medal is attached to a silk ribbon showing the Austrian colors.

In 1840 Bechtold went to St. Louis and bought a few acres of ground in the brush, at the present junction of Meramec Street and Grand Avenue. He is always in the best of health, and, notwithstanding his eighty-six years, walks around with the sprightliness of a boy. His memory is accurate and his mind clear.

MISSOURI.—CHRISTIAN BECHTOLD, A NAPOLEONIC VETERAN OF ST. LOUIS.—FROM A PHOTO. BY CRAMER, GROSS & CO.



NEW YORK CITY.—DR. TANNER AS HE APPEARED IN THE SECOND WEEK OF HIS ATTEMPTED FAST OF FORTY DAYS.—SEE PAGE 355.

A NOVEL OCEAN CRAFT.

A NOVEL craft, the English steam-yacht Anthracite, arrived at this port on July 31, having left the Lizard, June 30, arrived at St. Johns, N. F., on the 20th, and left for New York on the 24th. The Anthracite, while of the ordinary type of the English steam yacht, differs in the motive power which, it is expected, will make a revolution in the steam traffic of the world. In crossing the Atlantic, she consumed about a ton of coal a day, at a pressure of 300 to 400 pounds, with an average rate of speed of eight knots. Only twenty-one tons of coal were in her bunkers, of which one was for the cook's use. The expense was only a penny a mile. She uses Welsh coal, but her furnaces are made to use American anthracite. Mr. Perkins, the inventor of the system, is an American. The advantages claimed for the invention are: A consumption of coal at less than half that now used, giving greatly increased carrying capacity as well as a corresponding lessening expense; absolute safety from explosion; disuse of lubricants; great reduction in weight and space of boilers and machinery. The officers and engineers claim that the success of the system was fully demonstrated on the voyage. The Anthracite has a patent tubular boiler and compound high-pressure engines of peculiar type. She has two high-pressure cylinders, one fifteen, the other sixteen inches, the steam expanding from one to the other, virtually forming one cylinder on one crank, with a low-pressure cylinder on another crank. With a pressure of 500 pounds, this admits of nearly forty expansions at the termination of the stroke in the third cylinder. The small amount of water converted into steam is again condensed and re-used, and, if joints and valves were perfect, would last the whole voyage. Fresh water from England still remained on board on the arrival of the vessel here. The boiler occupies a very small space, as, in fact, do the engines and machinery.

The Anthracite is 82 feet long between perpendiculars, 16 feet beam, 10 feet 4 inches depth of hold, with a tonnage of 72 tons, gross, 27 tons builder's measurement, English. She is built of iron, painted

NEW YORK CITY.—THE ENGLISH YACHT "ANTHRACITE," THE SMALLEST STEAM VESSEL THAT HAS CROSSED THE OCEAN.

Digitized by Google

white, with one funnel, also painted white; flush deck, except companionway and hatch over engine-room. She has commodious accommodations below, with plenty of head room. Captain, E. G. Dent; Mate, George Denny; Chief Engineer, J. McInnis; Second Engineer, D. Cunningham, and eight men compose the crew. She belongs to Mr Richard Power, of Frank Hall, Farmington, Kent, a wealthy Englishman, who lent her to Mr. Perkins for the experiment. Everything is as perfect as when she started, and she will shortly make a trip with prominent American engineers and steamship builders to demonstrate the success of Mr. Perkins's principle.

Club Life in England and France.

THE modern London club life is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable, and one of the most distinctively English characteristics of modern English social life. The club is an institution indigenous to the soil, and one which it seems to be impossible to transplant into other countries without losing the greater part, if not all, of its best features. In Paris, for instance, we hear of the Jockey Club, L'Union, Le Cercle Agricole, Le Petit Cercle and others less famous, and those who know nothing whatever about them may fancy that they have a good deal in common with the London palaces in Pall Mall and St. James's Street. As a matter of fact, they resemble their English prototype in little more than in name. As far as ninety-nine out of every hundred of their members are concerned, they are little more than gambling establishments. They are almost untenanted by day, and are chiefly frequented by their habitués in the small hours between midnight and six o'clock in the morning. A steady married man in Paris rarely belongs to a club at all, and no bachelor, however wild, would dream of making a home of his cercle, as men do in London. A Paris club is a midnight lounge for aristocratic gamblers; while a London club is the daily resort of every Londoner who is in any kind of society, and the constant meeting-place of country gentlemen—a rendezvous for old friends and new acquaintances. A Frenchman very seldom even takes his meals at his club, and he would as soon think of doing any serious work in the club room as in the foyer of the Folies Bergères. The libraries of the Athenæum and Carlton, for instance, would be as much out of place in a Paris club as married bishops and judges with salaries at $25,000 a year. And we are not aware that in any country in Europe there is a club system more nearly resembling the English than that which is accepted in Paris.

Mr. Gladstone's Financial Policy.

MR. GLADSTONE'S recent speech on the financial policy of the new Government is regarded, even by so hostile a critic as the Saturday Review, as a masterly statement—a great intellectual treat, which no other statesman could have offered to Parliament. "Novelties assumed the air of indisputable truths, and complicated figures were woven into the thread of an easy and intelligible narrative, in a manner new to this generation, and reminding the older members of the House of the days when Mr. Gladstone first soared above the level of ordinary financiers. In two hours Mr. Gladstone rearranged the wine duties, abolished the malt tax, put a heavy penalty on the publicans, and added a penny to the income tax." In the course of the speech he referred to the fact that in 1853 he had listened to an address in the House on the malt tax. That was forty-seven years ago. At the close of the two hours which his speech occupied in delivery the aged Premier resumed his seat, apparently as fresh as when he rose. He is always in his place, ready, alert and sufficient for any emergency. He is on hand at four o'clock, when the Speaker takes the chair, and he was there at three o'clock the other morning discussing the constitution of the Water Committee with inquiring members. Occasionally he permits himself the luxury of a dinner party at home, but otherwise is content with a hurried meal, often taken in the members' dining room. It is one of the unwritten rules of the House that the leader shall never appear in evening dress. While in opposition, Mr. Gladstone dined out a good deal, and was accustomed to turn up late at night, in regulation dinner dress—oftener than not with his white necktie all awry. These joys are now past, and he has settled down to his work.

FUN.

PROFESSOR: "What are the constituents of quartz?" Student: "Pints." A bland smile creeps over the class.

GROWING UNCERTAINTY.—Squire: "Fine weather like this, farmer, will raise things nicely." Farmer: "'Ees, squire, but I hopes so be as it won't raise the rents again."

A YOUNGSTER joyfully assured his mother the other day that he had found out where they made horses; he had seen a man finishing one—"He was just nailing on his last foot."

"WHEN I was your age," said old Mr. Tret, "I rose with the lark." "I beat you clear out of sight, then," said Tom, wearily and triumphantly, "I've been up all night with him."

AUNTY (reading): "There is no little room in the House that members will have to sit on each other's knees." Nephew: "Oh, crikey! Won't the women try to get into Parliament now!"

A FRENCH actress, who was graduated from the laundry, asked an old manager what he thought was her "best line of business." Glancing at her sumptuous wardrobe, he replied: "The clothes line still, mademoiselle."

"WHAT is the worst thing about riches?" asked the Sunday-school superintendent. And the new boy in the bad class under the gallery, who only came in last Sunday, stood up and said: "Their scarcity." And in his confusion the superintendent told the school to rise and sing "Don't be weary, children."

A SACRAMENTO girl was guilty of a mean trick the other day, the relation of which will cause the blood of every mother in the land to curdle with horror. She eloped with her objectionable lover the same day her mother was enameled, and as the latter was compelled to remain shut up three days or else crack all over, the couple managed to get away without pursuit.

SERVANT: "Are yees going to be at home this evening?" Mistress (looking at her with a dignified expression): "No, I shall not be at home this evening." Servant: "Oh! it is too bad. I wanted to go to a concert this evening." Mistress: "But, Bridget, you have your regular evening out." Servant: "Well, I think you might let me have this evening out, this is the first time I have asked you to stay at home for me."

A SCULPTOR'S wife had her husband arrested in Cincinnati the other day for assault and battery, because, as she testified, on the occasion of her going to his studio to inform him that the woman across the way had eloped, he struck her in the face with a huge mass of mud. The sculptor explained that the occasion referred to was the first time for years he had seen a pleasant look on his wife's face, and therefore he hastened to take a clay cast of her features, so as to catch the expression for use on a bust he intended to model. The court dismissed the case.

EARLY STAGES OF CONSUMPTION.

IF taken in their earlier stages, the progress of pulmonary affections can almost always be arrested by the use of "COMPOUND OXYGEN," which gives a higher degree of vitality and enables Nature to contend successfully with disease. Our "Treatise on Compound Oxygen," in which numerous cases of relief and cure are cited, is sent free. Address, DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard St., Philadelphia, Pa.

"ONE of the bores at card-playing," says "Cavendish," the great whist authority, "is the 'If you had' partner, who constantly greets you with 'If you had only done so-and-so, we should have made so-and so.' My favorite retort to him is to ask if he has ever heard the story of 'your uncle and your aunt.' If he has, he does not want to hear it again, and is silent. If he has not, and innocently falls into the trap by expressing a desire to hear it, I say, in a solemn voice, 'If your aunt had been a man, she would have been your uncle.'"

HE STILL LIVES.

SOME years ago Dr. R. V. Pierce, of the World's Dispensary and Invalids' Hotel, of Buffalo, N. Y., and London, was sent for to examine a terrible disease of the knee-joint, resulting in ulceration and extensive sloughing of the bone and tissues. The man's life had been despaired of by the previous attendants. Amputation at the thigh was promptly decided upon and skillfully performed by Dr. Pierce; and as after-treatment, to purify the blood and prevent a recurrence of the malady, the Doctor's Golden Medical Discovery was freely prescribed. The man's system was thoroughly purified and strengthened; he rapidly gained his health, the stump healing nicely; and he is to day a happy man. This case was among the first in which this wonderful blood-purifier was tested. It has since manifested its wonderful power over the worst scrofulous and other blood diseases. Taken for a time, it so purifies and strengthens the system as to strongly fortify it against the encroachments of diseases. Sold by druggists.

MIDDLEVILLE, Mich., Feb. 15th, 1879.

HON. R. V. PIERCE:

Dear Sir—I would say that I have sold your medicines for seven years. The Golden Medical Discovery is the best cough remedy I have ever used, and in every case where I have recommended it, it has cured. I have used it in my family for my children. It cures their colds and coughs in a day or two. My wife has used it several times when down sick. It invariably gives immediate relief. Its sale increases daily. J. B. KESTER, Druggist.

NEW YORK IN SUMMER.

TO MANY people who are not enforced residents of this city for the greater part of the year New York offers many attractions as a Summer resort. Not to speak of the cool sea-breeze it enjoys almost every Summer afternoon, nor of its parks and other attractions, it may be chosen as a central point from which to make many delightful excursions—up the Hudson, up the Sound, down the Bay, along the New Jersey shore, to the various Long Island Beaches, etc., etc. And in New York no more central house may be selected than the well-known ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, in Broadway. The rooms, single and en suite, are comfortable and elegant. The house is famous, too, for its excellent cookery.—Home Journal.

MR. P. T. BARNUM, in a letter of the 9th inst., published elsewhere in this paper, announces his acceptance of the permanent general management of the business of the new BARNUM'S MUSEUM COMPANY, of this city, to which he will give his entire personal attention. The veteran showman, whose judgment in matters of this kind is rarely at fault, predicts a great success for the Company, and that its stock will soon command a handsome premium. The subscriptions to the capital stock, of which Mr. William H. Vanderbilt has taken a quarter of a million dollars, are coming in rapidly.

THE semi-annual statement of the TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY, published in this paper, assumes new and practical interest from the recent and numerous casualties to travelers on land and sea. A trifling investment in the Travelers' may make the difference to one's family and friends between comfort and penury; and when a protection against fate may be had so cheaply, to neglect it is inexcusable. The financial condition of the Travelers' is thoroughly sound, and its methods of business have proved for many years always satisfactory to its numerous patrons in all parts of the country.

THOUSANDS are now feeling the effects of this depressing weather, and experience a loss of appetite, loss of red blood, have become pale, and are very languid. We advise them to resort immediately to the great Blood Purifier, Blood Enricher, and Perfect Health Giver, DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by its author and sole proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

A POOR MAN avoids calling on his neighbors for help in case of accident by insuring in THE TRAVELERS.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE produces most excellent results in the prostration and nervous derangement consequent upon sunstroke.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE received the highest award at the Centennial Exhibition. It is filled in elegant bottles—glass and cork stoppered, and basket covered—and is for sale by all first-class Grocers and Druggists.

PROOF of superiority. Sales immense through England and France of MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Sold by Druggists.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE—a genuine relish, exactly suited to all tastes and all conditions of people.

Stuttering cured by BATES'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to Starnes & Co., Box 2236, New York.

EPPS'S COCOA.
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast-tables with a delicately flavored beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Sold only in soldered tins, ¼ and lb., labeled:

JAMES EPPS & CO., Homœopathic Chemists, London, Eng.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

55 ASSORTED Perfumed Cards, with name, 10c. SHANNONVILLE CARD CO., 21st Ward, Cincinnati, O.

LA BELLE CHOCOLATIERE.

One Hundred Years Old.

1780 — 1880

WALTER BAKER & CO.

Dorchester, Mass.

CHOCOLATE, BROMA and COCOA

In their best and purest form, contain every ingredient that is needful for the sustenance and growth of the human system, being composed, as determined by chemical analysis, of starch, gum, gluten, oil, and a white crystallizable substance called theobromine, similar to theine in tea, but containing more nitrogen and being an important adjunct to nutrition.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

Our Book of Choice Chocolate Receipts will be sent free to any address.

33d Semi-Annual

STATEMENT

OF THE TRAVELERS

INSURANCE CO.

Hartford, Conn., July 1, 1880.

PAID-UP CASH CAPITAL, $600,000.

ASSETS.

Real Estate	$346,172.00
Cash on hand and in Bank	253,312.58
Loans on Bond and Mortgage, Real Estate	1,926,397.87
Interest on Loans, accrued but not due	47,712.20
Loans on Collateral Security	68,000.00
Deferred Life Premiums	61,001.36
Premiums due and unreported on Life Policies	37,208.94
United States Government Bonds	290,150.00
State, County and Municipal Bonds	396,411.00
Railroad Stocks and Bonds	602,788.00
Bank Stocks	663,234.00
Hartford City Gas Light Co. Stock	19,200.00
Total Assets	$5,171,875.01

LIABILITIES.

Reserve, four per cent., Life Department	$3,321,531.59
Reserve for re-insurance, Accident Dep't	320,291.82
Claims unadjusted and not due, and all other liabilities	250,000.00
Total Liabilities	$3,842,023.40
Surplus as regards Policy-holders	$1,329,851.61

STATISTICS TO JULY 1, 1880.

Whole number Accident Policies written	605,000
Whole number Accident Claims paid	40,890
Total amount Accident Claims paid	$3,690,000
Total claims paid in Life Department	$1,525,000

A GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICY,

Which any Agent will furnish at short notice and trifling cost, covers the risk of such disasters as those on the

SEAWANHAKA

AND THE

NARRAGANSETT.

Every one can afford it, and it is folly to go uninsured in these times of peril to life and limb.

JAS. G. BATTERSON, President.

RODNEY DENNIS, Secretary.

JOHN E. MORRIS, Assistant Secretary

NEW YORK OFFICE,

Tribune Building.

R. M. JOHNSON, Manager.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable, as Gift or Trouse. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Five for $1; or per dozen, $2.

GEORGE D. COUPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

ANGOSTURA LIQUEUR

The Finest and Purest Sweet Cordial in existence. Prepared by DR. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS, the manufacturers of the world renowned

ANGOSTURA BITTERS

J. W. HANCOX, Sole Agent, 51 Broadway, New York.

CAMPAIGN SONGS.

AGENTS AND CLUBS, SEND FOR SAMPLES.

"WE'LL RALLY ONCE AGAIN!" (Garfield's Portrait.)
"SAVE THE UNION!" (Hancock's Portrait.)

Both rattling songs and good portraits. Imclose 10 cts. for samples; $5 per hundred.

H. W. HITCHCOCK, 24 Park Row, N. Y.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers,

And DEALERS in GOVERNMENT BONDS and other DESIRABLE INVESTMENT SECURITIES,

No. 5 Nassau St., New York.

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds. We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities and to execute orders for the same. Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange or in the open market. Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect U. S. coupons and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge. ☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities. We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

To New York.
BOUND BROOK ROUTE
The Pioneer 2-hour Route.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 7.30, 8.30, 9.30, 10.25 A.M.; 12.10, 2, 3.30, 3.45, 5.40, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 9.30, 11, 11.50 A.M.; 1, 2.45, 4.35, 6.30, 6.17, 8.20, 10.20 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

LEAVE NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 6.45, 7.45, 9, 11.15 A.M.; 1.30, 4, 4.30, 4.45, 5.30, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.25, 10.10, 11.30 A.M.; 1.40, 4, 6.10, 6.50, 7.30, 8.10, 10.05 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

To Long Branch, Ocean Grove, etc.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.30, 10.25 A.M.; 2, 3.30 and 3.45 P.M.

LEAVE OCEAN GROVE: 6.12, 6.27 and 7.28 A.M.; 3.57, 4.13 and 6.07 P.M.

Trains connect at Jersey City by Annex Boat for Brooklyn, where a connection in addition to that from New York is made with steamers for Rockaway, Brighton and Manhattan Beaches.

H. P. BALDWIN, G. P. A., New York. C. G. HANCOCK, G. P. & T. A., Phila.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS

Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,

The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves pier No. 18 N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.

STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 6.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.30, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.00, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.30 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N. R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M., and 10.40 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.05 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

BRIGHTON BEACH.

BROOKLYN, FLATBUSH & CONEY ISLAND RAILWAY.

TRAINS LEAVE FLATBUSH AVENUE, LONG ISLAND DEPOT, BROOKLYN, hourly from 6.30 to 9.15 A.M., and from 9.15 A.M. to 10.45 P.M. half-hourly. Separate trains run from BEDFORD half-hourly from 11.30 A.M. to 10.00 P.M. Last train from the Beach leaves at 11.10 P.M.

Flatbush Avenue, L. I., Depot is reached via Flatbush Avenue cars from Fulton Ferry, and Atlantic Avenue cars from South, Wall and Fulton Ferries.

Bedford Station is reached via Grand and Roosevelt Streets Ferries by the Franklin Avenue cars and Rapid Transit trains.

W. E. DORWIN, General Superintendent

Digitized by Google

SEASON 1880.

STOCKTON HOTEL,

Cape May, N. J.

CHARLES DUFFY (of Continental Hotel, Philadelphia), Sup't and Gen. Manager.

OPENS JUNE 10.

Music by HASSLER'S CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA—SIMON HASSLER, Leader.

NOTE.—Our patrons have the use of a PASSENGER ELEVATOR, and each room is supplied with ELECTRIC BELLS.

HEKTOGRAPH

Dry process of copying. Patented May 18th and June 1st, 1880. One Hundred Copies of any writing or drawing made in 20 minutes. Patents for this process having been issued to us, the manufacture, use or sale of any Gelatine Copying Pad other than the Hektograph is illegal, and will be prosecuted.

HEKTOGRAPH CO., 23 and 25 Church St., New York.

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop't & Mgr.
MONDAY, JUNE 14th, W. C. Mitchell's Pleasure Party in OUR GOBLINS.

HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.

HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 43, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,

Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Goshen Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

MRS. M. J. COILEY, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,

Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. Six Thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females. JNO. L. EUBANK, Proprietor.

Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.

JAMES A. FRAZIER, Owner and Proprietor.
COLONEL N. COSBY, General Manager.

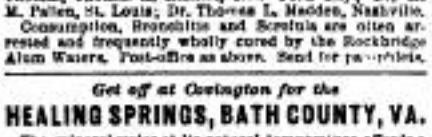
The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and prescribed by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professors T. Gaillard Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville.

Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

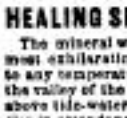
Get off at Covington for the



HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails, and telegraph office. Board, $2 50 per day; $15 per week; $50 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station, $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. E. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.

R. C. EUBANK, Proprietor.



HANCOCK-ENGLISH. CARFIELD-ARTHUR.

Take advantage of the great political excitement. Send 10c. for samples of either two candidates, or 20c. for the four, with terms to agents. Secure territory at once. You can make money fast. The pictures are heroic size, splendid in appearance, and sell fast. From $5 to $15 per day profit is certain. Address,
SHIPMAN & CO., 8 Reade St., New York.

JUNIOR AIR GUN, $10

Send for Catalogue of Air Guns, Pellet Shots, Darts, Cap Pistols and Targets.
HAVILAND & GUNN, Ilion, N.Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$8, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D. by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 359 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3086

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to Agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

40 PAGE BOOK OF WONDERS for a 3-cent stamp. Address, H. FOX & CO., 250 Canal St., N. Y.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing. Sheathings. Fireproof Coatings. Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

THE

Mohave Mining and Milling Co.

MINERAL PARK AND CERBAT DISTRICTS,
Mohave Co., Arizona.
Organized under the Laws of the State of New York.

Capital, $1,000,000, in 100,000 Shares, at $10 each.

STOCK NON-ASSESSABLE.

OFFICERS:

EDWARD M. CLARK, Pres't. WILLIAM H. CRAPTS, Treas.
MAJOR GEORGE CLENDON, M. E., Sec'y.
RICHARD W. C. MARSHTON, Sec'y.
LOUIS HAVEMEYER, Arizona, Eng'r.
BANKERS—National Park Bank.

Offices in New York, Equitable Building, Broadway.

The property of this Company consists of two valuable gold mines—the Louis and the Baden Baden—covering three-fifths of a mile of a large true-fissure vein of free-milling gold ore, of remarkably high grade. The mines are being rapidly developed, and ore is now being extracted from the main vein, which gives an average value of three hundred dollars per ton for the whole width of two feet. Within the next sixty days an ore body, worth over a million dollars actual milling value, will be exposed and ready for reduction into bullion from this one section alone.

The lone silver mines controlled by the Company in the adjoining district of Cerbat have been extensively worked for several years, and have supplied a large quantity of ore whose actual milling value has exceeded three hundred dollars to the ton. The developments recently made by the Company's Superintendent in one of the four mines, at the depth of one hundred feet, indicate that an average far in excess of this will shortly be obtained. Ore exceeding a million dollars in value is now actually within reach in this section of the Company's property.

The ten-stamp mill the Company is about to erect will produce two thousand dollars in bullion per day at a cost, liberally estimated, of three hundred dollars, affording a surplus sufficient to pay monthly dividends of fifty cents per share, for an indefinite period, on the Company's very low capitalization.

The mines are readily reached by steamer and railroad, and will be within six days of New York by Kansas Pacific Line next year.

The first issue of treasury stock being disposed of, 5,000 shares are now offered at $5 per share, the balance being held at their par value.

For further information, prospectuses, etc., apply at the Company's Offices, 130 Broadway.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!

Frank Leslie's

POPULAR MONTHLY.

THE

August Number Now Ready.

CONTENTS:

"Oberammergau and its Attractions—The Passion Play in 1880." By N. Robinson. Twelve illustrations.
"Some Remarkable American Women—At the Bar, in the Pulpit, and on the Dramatic and Operatic Stages." By George J. Hagar. Seventeen illustrations and portraits.
"What the Japanese Eat." By Edward Greey. Twelve illustrations.
"An Anglo-French Watering-place—Granville." Six illustrations.
"The Massacre at Chicago." Illustrated.
"Colbert—Minister and Favorite of Louis XIV." Illustrated.
"Cameo-cutting." Illustrated.
"Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn." Illustrated.
"A Soap Bubble." By John A. Bower. Nine Illustrations.
Short and serial Stories.—"Not Guilty," by Ella W. Pierce (Chaps. XXIII.-XXV.); Illustrated. "In the Wrong Box"; Illustrated. "How May Pink Became the Richest Girl in Chester," by Richard B. Kimball, author of "St. Leger." "Fergus Blake's Wife," by John Moran; Illustrated. "Was it Better?" by S. Annie Frost; Illustrated. "The Dead Hand," by Walter Edgar McCann; Illustrated. "The Revenge of Gerald Geraghty"; Illustrated. "Pick et Fluck"; Illustrated. "The Sun of Blood"; Illustrated—etc.
Sketches.—"A Wild Beast Shop"; Illustrated. "An Adventure in a Forest," by James Payn. "A Rubber Saved"; Illustrated. "A Scratched Camel"; Illustrated. "The Boy who did not Know what Fear was"; Illustrated. "Letters Oddly Lost and Found—Some Cases which should Teach Caution in making Charges of Theft"; etc., etc.
Poems.—"That Dream of Ours." "A Dilletante." "Summer Pastime"; Illustrated. "Captain Otis's Booty," a Ballad, by A. Mary F. Robinson; Illustrated. "Flowers"; Illustrated.
Miscellany.—"An Invalid's Experience," with comic Illustrations. "Clocks in China." "Who First Drew Down the Lightning?" "The History of Writing." "Violin Makers." "Dyak's Trade." "The Prairie Dog's Home, and its Unwelcome Visitors"; Illustrated. "How Kings Traveled in the Fourteenth Century." "Gosters." "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES, over 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

COLORED FRONTISPIECE:

"An Ancient Egyptian Lady's Toilet—Painting the Eyes with Kohl."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; and four months, $1. Sent postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

CHAMPLIN'S LIQUID PEARL

An unequaled toilet preparation. Restores, preserves and beautifies the complexion. Used and indorsed by Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Clara Louise Kellogg, Lotta, Janauschek, and hundreds of others. Contains nothing that will injure the most delicate skin. Sold by all druggists. 50 cents per bottle. Beware of imitations.
CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N.Y.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE | THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 223 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

THE PHILADELPHIA PREMIUM BOOK CO., No. 610 Chestnut St., Phila'a, Pa., is advertising new and standard Books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and the list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises. Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 35 cents, with age, height, color of eyes and hair, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage.
Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

Agents Wanted.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—To best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses selling to DEALERS SAMPLES FREE. Don't be STAKED to CIGARS. Lowest grades. E. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.

Central Park Brewery

AND

Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 150—156 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

IT WILL COST YOU

ONE CENT

For a Postal Card on which to write your name and residence plainly, and address the same to J. Gilbaum Browne, No. 21 Grand St., Jersey City, N. J., for a copy of Dr. O. Phelps Brown's famous Treatise on the Cure of Disease by the use of Herbal Remedies. A new and revised edition, with correct likeness of the author, now ready and sent free to all.

GENUINE SECRETS WORTH MILLIONS RELIABLE

Lawyers! Mechanics! All Have Desire for Information! Something to Learn! Everybody Wants Knowledge! Combination in 6 hours! Glorious Health! Boundless Wealth! Reckless Love! Book FREE—tells all. Brewer & Co., Toronto, Ont.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Glass, Scroll, Wreath, and Lace Cards, 10c. Try us. CHROMO CARD CO., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.

Frank Leslie's

SUNDAY MAGAZINE

For August Now Ready.

WITH THE FOLLOWING BRILLIANT TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"Sister Dora": A Model Christian Nurse. Illustrated.
"Venice: Its Past and Present." Eleven Beautiful Illustrations.
"Missionary Effort in Patagonia." By Rev. Daniel Edwards. Seven Illustrations.
"With St. Paul at Athens." By Rev. Professor Porter, D. D. Nine Illustrations.
"Religious Aspect of Gothic Architecture." By Dean Stanley.
"Binding the Feet in China." By Rev. Ross C. Houghton.
"Nebuchadnezzar." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"The Children of the Bible." No. VII. Abijah, Prince of Israel.
Serial and Short Stories, Sketches, etc.—"Bo-Be, the Nailmaker's Daughter," by the Author of "Gideon's Rock" (Chaps. XXXII. to XXXIV.); Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the author of "Little Rugen" (Chaps. I. to IV.); Illustrated. "The Clerk's Marriage"; Illustrated. "Robinson in New York," by Rev. E. E. Hale. Illustrated. "The Mayberrys at the Seashore," by Albert Wallwyn; Illustrated. "The Children of Heth." "A Night of Anguish"; Illustrated. "Battle between Hawk and Crows"; Illustrated. "Bishop Ryle of Liverpool"; (with portrait). "The Methodist Bishops"; (with portraits of Rev. Drs. Cyrus D. Foss, John F. Hurst, Henry W. Warren, and E. O. Haven.) "A Bit of a Scrape"; Illustrated, etc., etc.
Essays.—"The Lord's Prayer"; Illustrated. "The Christmas Slumber-Song." By Augusta Browne Garrett. "Celibacy of the Clergy," etc.
Poems.—"Beneath the Cross"; Illustrated. "Thoughts"; Illustrated border. "June Nights" and "Song of the Twilight." By E. W. Bellamy (from Victor Hugo). "Village Chimes." "A Summer-Day Idyl." "The Bird in the Rain." "Missionary Hymn." By Carrie L. Post. "The Owl and the Lark."
Miscellany.—"Salted with Fire." "Jokes of the Chronicles, identified with the Pharaoh of Joseph." "Action for Damages among the Jews." "Good Advice for Everybody." "On the Horseback." "Beauties"; Illustrated. "Caravan, in the Land of Earthquakes"; Illustrated. "The Cetacean"; Illustrated. "Christian Warfare." "What Music Did." "The Sealing of the Sepulchre"; Illustrated. "Watering Plants in Jerusalem"; Illustrated. "Traveling in the Seventeenth Century," by Lord Macaulay. "The Sea," etc., etc.
"Wit, Wisdom and Pathos of Childhood." "Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." "Music—"Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep"—the Christian slumber song, composed for the SUNDAY MAGAZINE by Augusta Browne Garrett.

128 Quarto Pages---100 Engravings.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

The Summer Fashions Just Received from Paris.

Frank Leslie's

LADY'S JOURNAL,

THE

Best & Most Attractive Fashion Journal

IN THE COUNTRY,

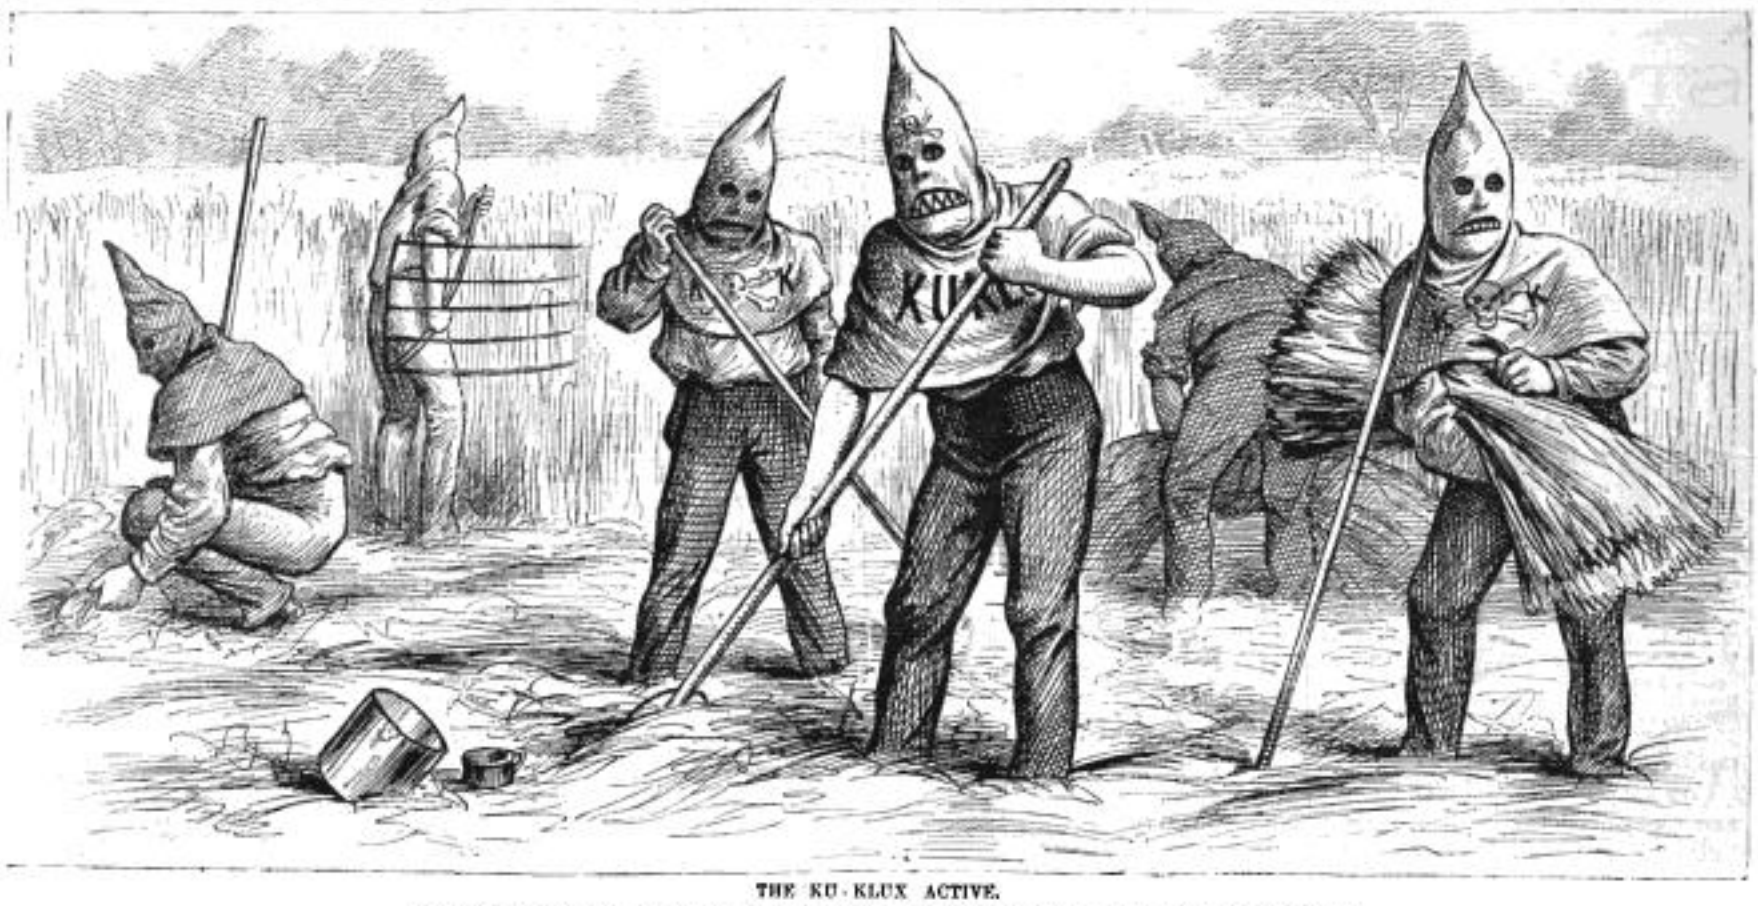
SHOWING THE LATEST STYLES OF PARISIAN INDOOR TOILETS, PROMENADE AND CARRIAGE COSTUMES, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, Etc., Etc., Etc.

The Acknowledged Authority in European and American Fashions.

Elaborate Articles, illustrative of



"What New Yorkers are Wearing."

Each Number contains Serial Novels and Short Stories, Sketches, etc., etc.; Illustrations of Home and Foreign Subjects; Poetry; Fashionable Intelligence; Social Gossip; Useful Information on Family Topics, etc., etc.

Published every Friday. For sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cts. per copy. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE KU-KLUX ACTIVE.

"Terrorism in the South—Citizens Beaten and Shot at—A New Chapter," etc. [From New York Tribune.]

BARNUM'S MUSEUM CO.

Capital Stock, $3,000,000.

GREAT POPULAR INVESTMENT!

Mr. P. T. BARNUM takes the personal management of the Great Building and its various departments.

Applications for portions of the building (already received by the Company) indicate the earning of large dividends on the stock—the subscribers to which embrace people from all professions, trades and industries.

Only a limited amount of the unsold $1,750,000 of the stock which was offered to the public, June 15th, remains for subscription.

By direction of the Museum Company, the time to the public for subscriptions at par has been extended to August 1st, proximo.

Subscriptions for $100 and upwards, in even hundreds, will be received.

Prospectus and subscription lists will be furnished on application to

The New York, New England & Western

INVESTMENT COMPANY,

31 and 33 Pine Street, New York,

Financial Agent for the Museum Company.

LETTER FROM MR. BARNUM.

WALDEMERE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN., July 9th, 1880.

To New York, New England and Western Investment Co.:

GENTLEMEN—Yours of the 8th inst. received. You are perfectly right in positively assuring all purchasers of stock in the new "BARNUM'S MUSEUM COMPANY" that I am to be the permanent General Manager, and that I will devote my personal attention to the enterprise, in the success of which no person can feel so deep an interest as myself.

I have already signed a contract to this effect, and have secured, by written agreement, the assistance of managers known to me for years, and in whose ability I have the most implicit confidence. I know exactly where to place my hands on the greatest novelties in the world, and I really believe this great enterprise will pay larger dividends than any first-class stock offered to the public for years, and will rapidly advance to a very high premium. Very truly yours,

P. T. BARNUM.

...IMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

...Y OF BERLIN .....Saturday, July 17, 1 P.M.
...Y OF MONTREAL. .....Thursday, July 22, 3 P.M.
...Y OF RICHMOND. .....Saturday, July 31, 1 P.M.
...Y OF CHESTER... .....Saturday, August 7, 3 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

...bin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable ...ms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

...alcons, staterooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

...EN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
...A. PAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
...H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
...C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

...immer Excursions at Low Rates.

Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of ...als, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Ringsley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, ...gara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of

...LL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,

Furnished free.

O. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 452, N. Y.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,

...loves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.

SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.

KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

4-Stop ORGANS

...ol. book & music, boxed & shipped only $85.00. ...Piano $210 to $1,000. Before you buy an instrument be sure to see my Mid-summer offer Illustrated, ...e. Address Daniel F. Beatty, Washington, N. J.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

Chesapeake & Ohio Railway

A favorite route for freight and passenger traffic between the East and West, in connection with packets on the Ohio River; railroads diverging at Cincinnati to West, Southwest and Northwest, and with various roads intersecting it; also with steamers and sail vessels on the coast connecting at Richmond, Va.

Particular attention is called to the

GREAT REDUCTION

IN

EXCURSION FARES

TO THE

Various Springs and Summer Resorts

IN THE

MOUNTAINS OF VA. AND W. VA.

DURING THE SEASON OF 1880.

Tickets on sale at the Freight and Passenger Office of the Company, 229 Broadway, New York, and at the principal Ticket Offices throughout the country.

CONWAY R. HOWARD, G. P. & T. A.,
Richmond, Va.

Rates will be given and contracts made for freight to or from all points reached by the C. & O. Railway and its connections, by

H. W. CARR, Gen'l Eastern Ag't,
229 BROADWAY.

THE Admiration
OF THE
WORLD.
Mrs. S. A. Allen's
WORLD'S Hair Restorer
IS PERFECTION!

FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.

IT IS NOT A DYE.

It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

FRESCO STENCILS Colored Sketches and Mixed Colors to match. Also, Pamphlets of Instruction. Address, J. Z. GIFFORD, 141 E. 25th St., N.Y.

WILHELMS-QUELLE

IMPORTED

NATURAL MINERAL WATER

FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.

LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.

SOLE IMPORTERS,

MACK & BRUNLER,
7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,
Near Post Office.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

Mining Trust Company

OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.

Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests: The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stocks, payment of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.

American Mining Stock Exchange

(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company),

EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1026 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 21 to 30 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.

Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,

MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,

AND

139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement

SENT BY MAIL.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Self-inker $8.) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Steam saved. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all the Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

KIDNEY-WORT

Cures KIDNEY COMPLAINTS, URINARY DISEASES, Female Weaknesses, BILIOUSNESS, PILES, CONSTIPATION, by causing free action of the organs and restoring their vigorous health and power to throw off disease. One package will make six qts of medicine. Get it of your druggist. Price, $1.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Prop'rs, Burlington, Vt.
Will send post paid.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, post paid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

FOR SALE,
"INTERLAKEN,"
THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to

HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. Ford, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,296.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, JULY 31, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $5.00 Yearly; 13 Weeks, $1.00.

"FOR HIS DEAR SAKE."

Doctors Hewitt, Schell, Bigelow, et al.—"There! He'll certainly feel better after all this coddling."
Invalid (sotto voce)—"The beggars! As if I didn't understand the meaning of all this poulticing and dosing."

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, JULY 31, 1880.

CAUTION.

Subscribers, in sending subscriptions for any of our publications, should be careful to direct their letters plainly to the street numbers of the Frank Leslie Publishing House, Nos. 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York, in order to insure their safe delivery.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S ACCEPTANCE.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S "letter of acceptance" is an ample and well-considered paper, covering the whole ground of current political discussions and "cordially indorsing" the principles set forth in the Chicago platform, without materially adding to them either in number or preciseness of definition. Indeed, the document is much more remarkable for the moderation and prudence of its statements than for the full utterance and ringing emphasis of a party leader who is bent on vindicating the courage of his own opinions rather than on conciliating the average sentiment of his party followers. By the tone and tenor of his letter, Mr. Garfield makes it evident that he fully realizes the representative position in which he has been placed by the National Republican Convention, and that in speaking for his party, rather than for himself, he must impose on his pen a constraint and a reticence which he has not always practiced when mingling in the debates of Congress.

In the matter of "the Constitutional issue," which forms the permanent basis of party organization in this country, General Garfield is explicit in affirming the national prerogatives secured to the Federal Government under the Constitution, while claiming that the Republicans "fully recognize and will strenuously defend all the rights retained by the people and all the rights reserved to the States." Committing himself, therefore, although parenthetically, to the doctrine of the reserved rights of the States, he proceeds to enforce the nature and the obligations of the United States, considered as "a nation," and finds a current illustration of these obligations in the duty of the Federal Government to uphold and execute "the national laws relating to the election of Representatives in Congress." But while thus indorsing these laws, Mr. Garfield does not reaffirm, as a Presidential candidate, the opinion he is known to have expressed as a Representative, with regard to the injustice and oppression which may sometimes be attendant on the practical execution of these laws in their present shape.

On the right of any citizen to cast his lawful ballot "freely and without intimidation," and on the evils resulting from political intolerance at the South, the declarations of the letter are clear and logical; but, while affirming that "the National Government should exercise all its constitutional authority to put an end to these evils," he is utterly silent as to the nature, extent and limitations of that authority—the only points on which there is room for a difference of opinion, and therefore the very points on which precision of statement was most necessary.

In regard to the currency question, the most exigent of all the questions immediately pending before the people, the letter of Mr. Garfield halts and hesitates where it should have held the banner of an enlightened public opinion "full high advanced." Congratulating the country on a "paper currency as national as the flag," and on a "circulating medium" rendered by resumption "more abundant than ever before," he says not a word about the duty of gradually withdrawing the greenbacks, or of suspending the coinage of the depreciated silver dollar. On the contrary, he writes as if he was satisfied with the present financial situation, protesting, as he does, against "doubtful financial experiments," and proposing "to maintain the equality of all our dollars," without once adverting to the fact that, in the presence of the depreciated silver dollar, that equality has been already lost, and threatens the currency with a growing confusion. In writing with such "bated breath," it seems to us that Mr. Garfield has lost a great opportunity for himself, for his party and for sound finance.

On the subject of the tariff he reiterates the doctrines of the platform, and avows himself a protectionist, not perhaps for "protection's sake," but for the sake of enabling "our great industries to compete fairly in our own markets with the labor and capital of foreign countries." As all taxation is a burden, it would have been well for Mr. Garfield to explain how the imposition of burdens on one great industry in favor of another great industry can add to the national wealth of production; and as in another part of his letter he speaks of agriculture as the greatest of all our industries, "comprising seven-twelfths of our population," it would have been useful to show how the farmers of the country are advantaged by being taxed for the emolument of the manufacturing classes.

In regard to civil service reform, Mr. Garfield recognizes the importance of the subject, but seems embarrassed by the difficulty of suggesting any practical measure for realizing the hopes of reformers. He shrinks from advocating for the incumbents of civil service a stability of tenure accorded by law and custom to officers in the military and naval service of the country, though why such a tenure should not be awarded to the subordinates of the civil administration we fail to see. And until the great mass of the public offices are placed on this footing it will be idle to talk of a reform in the civil service which shall be "thorough, radical and complete." It is true, as Mr. Garfield says, that in making appointments the President must seek and receive information from others, but if character and qualifications, instead of partisan service, were made the sole criterion of appointments, the evils of this dependence would be reduced to a minimum. Until the ministerial offices of the country are taken as completely out of "politics" as appointments in the army and navy, there will be a public scramble for them at every Presidential election.

On the minor issues of the time—the immigration of Chinese laborers, the support of common schools, the improvement of our rivers and watercourses—the declarations of Mr. Garfield are at once moderate and judicious. He recognizes the evils incident to an immigration which abstains from assimilation with our people, and proposes to deal with them by legislation if they should not yield to diplomatic negotiations. In the matter of internal improvements, he deems it fortunate that there is no longer any opposition to appropriations which are national in their scope and bearing.

NOTABLE PHASES OF OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE.

THE statistics of the foreign commerce of New York for the month of June have been published, and from these an estimate closely approximating the official figures may be made of the foreign commerce of the United States for the fiscal year ending the 1st of July. The figures are truly colossal in their proportions. The exports may be set down at $850,000,000, against about $735,500,000 for the year ending July 1st, 1879, an increase of $114,500,000. The value of imports shows, however, the most extraordinary increase. They amounted to about $760,000,000 for the year ending July 1st, 1880, against about $466,000,000 for the year ending 1879, an increase of $214,000,000 or about forty per cent., while the exports increased only a little more than fifteen per cent. The balance of trade in our favor was, for the year ending July 1st, 1879, about $269,500,000—that is, our exports exceeded our imports to that amount—while the balance in our favor for the fiscal year ending July 1st, 1880, was only about $90,000,000, a decrease of $179,500,000, or about two-thirds. That the decrease has been no greater, even to the extent of turning the scale against us, may be ascribed to the collapse of the speculative "boom" which, during the Autumn and early Winter months, had extended to nearly every article of merchandise, stimulating our imports unduly, and imposing a serious check upon our exports.

The effect of the recent decline in values is seen in the statistics of the commerce of the port of New York for the past few months. Our exports in January last, when we had enormous stocks of grain, cotton, provisions, etc., and when prices were relatively high, were valued at only $26,236,500. These had increased in April, when speculators had begun to "let go," to about $34,846,200; but in June, when to sell was the great impulse of holders, without much regard to price, our exports were increased to the unprecedented amount of $43,084,600. We see a somewhat similar effect upon the imports. The total of $51,493,800 last November, and $47,704,700 in April, was reduced to $40,512,400 in June, 1880. Still, the excess of imports over last year is very large, amounting to $17,000,000 for June, and more than $100,000,000 for the first half of the calendar year. That they are still excessive, notwithstanding the recent decrease, is shown by the fact that in June, 1880, the value of foreign merchandise in bond at this port increased nearly $6,000,000.

One effect of the recent increase in our exports and decrease in our imports has been to put a check upon the advance in foreign exchange, and the consequent export of gold, which seemed to be imminent in May. It is now more probable that we shall import gold in considerable amounts, for we are about entering upon a new crop year, with every prospect of a large surplus of the products of agriculture to go forward to foreign markets, and with very little inclination to put speculative values upon anything. The absence of speculation will also reduce imports. Hence the balance of trade, now turned in our favor, will probably continue so for some months to come.

THE COMMON SCHOOL QUESTION.

THE recent attacks from certain not very liberal nor enlightened men on the higher grades of our public school system, together with the act of the Brooklyn authorities in withholding appropriations from their high schools, compel a further consideration of the whole philosophy of popular education and the theories on which State institutions are maintained. Those who denounce the academic and collegiate grades do so in the name of economy, and ostensibly for the purpose of extending the facilities for primary tuition; but they misconceive the whole subject in a manner not at all creditable to their intelligence. They seem to think that the purposes of popular education are limited to the lowest pursuits in life; that the State has performed its highest duty when it has fitted the pupil to become an accomplished grocers' clerk, or to handle his mother tongue without unnecessary violence to its parts of speech. After having taught the prospective citizen to combine his alphabet, and to read the Constitution of the United States, they never think it worth while to inquire if he will ever take the trouble of reading that important instrument, or find instruction on even the most elementary principles of government. These men would do well to enlarge their conceptions of education. What are the purposes of State instruction, and what portion of the curriculum of the schools is best calculated to promote the objects in view? Is it the primary or the academic and collegiate studies? These are the questions that must be met when we undertake to estimate the benefits of popular education to society.

The only sensible advocates of the public school system base their claims for its utility mainly on moral grounds. The State has no more right to educate boys for the ordinary duties of life than it has to pay the expenses of their apprenticeship at a trade. Constitutionally, it can become an agent in the management of educational institutions only when the instruction given so strengthens the mind, enlarges the understanding and elevates the aspirations of the pupil, that he will be better prepared for his eventual duties as a citizen and a member of society. But it cannot be claimed that a merely rudimentary education accomplishes this result in a very appreciable degree. No high order of mental training is secured by cramming a boy's head with reading, writing and arithmetic. These studies are but the foundation on which the whole superstructure is to be reared, and the work of the State properly begins just where the champions of illiteracy would have it finish. Our public school system, as a moral and reformatory agent, would be next to valueless were it to offer no mental diet of a more sustaining quality than it is possible to obtain in the lower departments.

It is a favorite method of the opponents of education, as a moral force, to look up statistics which seem to show that the possession of a public school education is not a preventive to crime. Three-fourths of the criminals in the State Prisons, they say, have been pupils in the public schools; and here is the end of all their careful training. This is not true in fact; but if it were true, it would only indicate that the education of all those convicts should have been made more complete. On this point, it will be better to inquire what proportion of the convicts in prison have passed through the higher grades, and received graduate's diplomas in the academic and collegiate departments. The discovery of the exact number will supply the only figures that can be brought to bear on the arguments of those who believe in education as an incalculable moral force in the community.

There is another point of view, too, from which this subject should be considered. When you lower the grade of the public schools you strike a blow at their very existence as anything better than the resource of the most indigent members of the community. The rich and independent in life would have but little use for institutions from which a child could glean nothing but the most rudimentary knowledge. Indeed, this whole attack on the higher education of the public schools may be suspected as a device of their enemies, made for the purpose of destroying their usefulness. A successful attempt at lowering their standard would finally render the public indifferent to their prosperity or decline.

When intelligently studied, the public school system is to be considered as only in its infancy, and the work of the future will be in the creation of means for securing a thoroughly good education from the State in all sections of the country. It will be only when this most desirable progress has been made that all the advantages of popular education can be realized; and it will then be seen that crime and intelligence do not move hand in hand, and that public-school children are not being especially trained for the penitentiary.

A STARTLING STATEMENT.

THE statement of the Receivers of the Reading Railroad and of the Coal and Iron Company exhibits a condition of affairs which is well calculated to shock public confidence in the integrity and wisdom of railway management. The total indebtedness of the railroad, exclusive of stock, amounts to $92,851,321. Of this sum $13,564,381 consists of floating indebtedness, $3,309,515 of which is wholly unsecured, the balance being covered by the company's bonds. The indebtedness of the Coal and Iron Company, exclusive of stock, which is practically a part of the general property, is stated at $64,878,417. Included in this is $3,516,638 on account of floating debt, exclusive of $6,358,519 specifically charged as due to the loan account of the railroad. Thus the floating debt of the two companies aggregates $17,080,980, while their total indebtedness amounts to $200,007,914. The value of the assets, in offset of this colossal total, is not stated, the receivers not having yet been able to determine it; but there is little in the facts so far known to encourage the creditors of the corporation. Among the items of railroad indebtedness is one of $793,638 for unpaid wages, one of $81,214 taxes due the State of Pennsylvania, and another of $739,273 due for materials, etc.

It is impossible to mistake the meaning of figures so expressive as these. They show that the management of this great property has been unbusiness-like and monstrously inefficient. More than that, they prove conclusively that public confidence in its integrity has been based upon deceptions and prevarications altogether indefensible. The corporation has been managed by theorists, who, without special business training, have stubbornly rejected the lessons of business experience and the counsel of prudent business men. The president, educated for the legal profession, in which he had acquired eminence, managed the railway and coal and iron interests intrusted to him as he would have tried a case in court, subordinating everything to his own theory as to what ought to be, with stolid indifference to the actualities of the case. Events are stronger than all theories, and rates of transportation, the wages of labor, the laws of supply and demand in iron and coal, are not to be regulated by any man's whim. So it happened that Mr. Gowan, refusing to learn from observation and experience, and persisting in his effort to run his great business in the grooves of his own conceit, found himself at last, baffled and broken, standing amid the wreck of a property which ordinary wisdom might have made remunerative and prosperous. The lesson should not be lost upon those men in professional life who imagine that because they have succeeded in a speciality, they can fill any and all other spheres, however different or remote from that in which they have achieved success, nor upon that class of stockholders in corporations of one sort and another who fancy that a shining figurehead is the only thing necessary to insure them good round dividends.

A SIGN OF PROMISE.

YEAR by year the people of the Southern States are celebrating the Fourth of July more generally, spontaneously and heartily. At no time since Lee's surrender has the old national holiday been so welcomed and honored in that section of the country as this Summer. Almost every Southern city, village and cross-roads blossomed with flags; the air pulsated again with the strains of familiar national airs; the citizen soldiery paraded in honor of the Union's birthday; eloquent orators touched and swept with practiced skill the chords of patriotic feeling. "This is a glorious day for America!" wrote John Adams on the first Independence Day. We may say the same of this latest Independence Day. It has been a glorious day for America.

Why? Because it marks the continued rise of the tide that is washing out and effacing, year after year, the rancors and distrusts left by civil strife. Because it demonstrates to all who have eyes to see that the people are turning their backs on the past, with all its misunderstandings and estrangements, its blunders and follies, and are setting their faces towards the future, wisely resolute to leave the dead bury their dead. Because it says to all who have ears to hear that henceforth the people will not view with patience or tolerance any attempt to tear open healing wounds, to set reconciled brethren again at variance in order to make votes for a party.

Think of it: Barely sixteen years ago

Digitized by Google

the flag which now floats all over the South was in Southern eyes the flag of an enemy. Sixteen years ago a bar of "Yankee Doodle" or of "Hail Columbia" would have announced to Southern ears the proximity of a hostile force, to be killed or captured if possible; in any event, to be hated and fought to the last extremity. Sixteen years ago any man down South rash enough to openly celebrate the Fourth of July, without Federal troops to protect him, would infallibly have been mobbed, and would have stood an uncommonly good chance of being lynched. What a change since then! Remembering that time, so recent yet so remote, what we now see appears almost a miracle. We can scarcely believe our eyes.

Of course, such a tempest of civil war as fell upon us in 1861-65 always leaves an ugly groundswell. That is in the nature of things. But even this has now subsided, and the haven of perfect reconciliation is plain before us. "Fortiter occupa portum!" Let us sail bravely into port

THE MODERN HERODS.

THE anomaly presented by great cities is nowhere more startling than in New York. While it is the most lavishly charitable of American cities, there are daily perpetrated in it the most heartless and persistent cruelties, and on so gigantic a scale as to almost stagger belief. The most perfect code of laws guarding against every evil is so flagrantly disregarded as to endanger life in every possible shape. And it is only when some ghastly catastrophe happens that public attention is called to the terrible audacity with which essential statutes are outraged if not openly defied

Despite the terrible accidents of the Narragansett and the Seawanhaka, it has been discovered that nine large steamers were running without a license, and that others were, to a most dangerous extent, daily overcrowded. Vessels only calculated to carry 1,500 persons were constantly carrying 2,700, and sailing without pilots in a perilous channel

But the particular evil to which we now call the attention of our readers is the wholesale slaughter of little children, as chronicled day by day in the health reports. Since the commencement of the present heated term, as it is styled, the average number of children's deaths in New York alone has been over eighty a day. The most careful inquiries justify us in ascribing this frightful mortality chiefly to the infamous manner in which our tenement-houses are built and conducted. The Herald sent a reporter to one special locality, where several cases of infantile mortality had occurred, and his account reveals a state of affairs equally disgraceful to the owners of the houses and to the Board of Health, both having been notified of the horrible condition of the premises, but without securing any attention to the complaints. In one house eight children were all down with malarial fever of the worst type, the cause being defective drainage. A woman informed the reporter that, having lost two children out of four, she was told by the physician who attended them that the only chance was to move away from the house if she wished to save the others. She did so, and they rapidly recovered.

Judge Oakley ruled, twenty years ago, that a tenant had good grounds of action for damages against his landlord for the illness of his family, if it proceeded from any defect in the construction of the house. But construed as the law now is, the advantages are all on the side of the wealthy landlord. If some public-spirited men were to found a society for the protection of poor tenants, it would work a cure in this tenement-house nuisance, and save the lives of thousands of poor children who are now sacrificed to the greed of the landlord and the supineness of the authorities.

This is a question that intimately concerns also the wealthier classes, for many a petted child is snatched away from the palace of the millionaire by the disease which takes its rise in the squalid home of some dweller in a tenement-house.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE situation in Turkey, Greece and Albania remains almost unchanged. In spite of all the protestations of the Porte that every assistance would be given to Greece and Montenegro to take possession of the territory granted to them by the Berlin Conference, there is a general belief that the Sultan is not sincere. The hardy Albanian mountaineers refuse to be transferred as so many chattels, and it seems too much to ask Turkey to part with some of her territory, and then because her subjects are not willing to change their allegiance, to insist that Turkey should make war upon her own people whose only fault is fidelity to the Porte. Meantime, several slight engagements have taken place between the Albanians and the Montenegrins, and there is an unauthenticated rumor that the Turks have attacked the Montenegrin outposts on the Zem and routed them. Several prisoners were made and sixteen of them were beheaded. Mr. Goschen's mission to Constantinople seems to be a failure, and the Sultan has applied to Germany for certain German officials to straighten out the tangled finances of the Porte. These officials have already appeared at Constantinople and their presence is thought by some persons to foreshadow a Turco-Prussian alliance, which, of course, would be to cast a slur upon the English Ambassador.

The proposal to erect a monument in Westminster Abbey to the late Prince Imperial received a check on the 16th of July. Sir Wilfrid Lawson and some other members of Parliament had held a meeting in St. James's Hall, at which a loud protest was made against the so-called desecration, and Mr. Swinburne has written some verses, more remarkable for their melody and vigor than for their sense. Victor Hugo also writes that he disapproves of the proposed testimonial. Dean Stanley, of Westminster, the Queen and Royal family, and, it may be added, a large portion of the English people, are in favor of the monument; and as the necessary funds have long since been subscribed and the statue almost finished, it was deemed improbable that any protest would avail. But in the House of Commons, on a motion of Mr. Briggs that the erection of a statue to the late Prince Louis Napoleon in Westminster Abbey is inconsistent with the national character of the edifice, and is calculated to impair the good feeling between England and France, 147 votes favored the project, while 161 opposed it. The motion thus prevailed, despite Mr. Gladstone's declaration that, excepting certain royal chapels, the Dean's authority over Westminster Abbey was absolute, and his advice that the House should not interfere in the matter of the Dean's right.

The English world of fashion has experienced a new sensation in the arrival in London of some eighty blind girls and youths from the French National Institution for the Youthful Blind. They were brought over, after permission obtained from the French Government, by the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Richardson-Gardner, who are trying to direct the investment of a large bequest left by a relative to the establishment of a musical college for the education of the blind. The performances of these unfortunate young people were not only very interesting but quite wonderful, as showing the extraordinary perfection to which musical talent may be brought even in persons deprived of sight. Their performances began with a French version of "God Save the Queen," which closely follows the original of the national anthem, and was sung with great verve and spirit. After many concerted pieces and solos, the closing piece was the "Marseillaise," splendidly rendered. These novel entertainments have attracted all Mayfair, including the Prince and Princess of Wales, and may have a further result of interesting thinking people in the great question of the education of the blind.

The differences in the English Cabinet still continue, and the principal stumbling-blocks in the way of their unity and comfort are Sir Bartle Frere and the Irish Compensation Act. During the Conservative Government the Liberals were incessantly clamoring for the removal of Sir Bartle Frere, on the ground of the mischief done by his disastrous policy. With the coming into power of Mr Gladstone's Government it was assumed that the High Commissioner would at once be recalled from the Cape; but the Premier has stated to the House of Commons that he must be kept in office because of his special fitness for working out the miserable scheme of confederation which is to be forced upon South Africa. Sir Bartle Frere is somewhat of a heavy load upon the colonial funds, for by the civil service revised estimates just printed it appears that he receives $30,000 a year from the colonial fund, an annuity of $5,000 a year from Indian revenues, and a pension of $2,500 a year as a retired member of the Council of India. Besides this, he had $12,500 last year and $2,500 this year as High Commissioner. Thus a grateful Government rewards an officer objected to by both parties with from $40,000 to $50,000 a year.

The European crops are now a matter of supreme interest to Americans. A good harvest abroad means a poor market for the crops of the Great West, although, no matter how plentiful wheat and other produce in Europe may be, the great manufacturing countries cannot possibly produce enough to feed their overflowing population. England is our best customer, and there the crops have looked remarkably well up to the end of June. Since then, however, there has been very heavy rains, and much damage has been done to the hay and other crops. In Ireland, where, until quite recently, there was every expectation of a year of plenty to succeed the famine year, a constant downpour of rain has threatened the harvest. In France, Germany, Hungary and Italy the prospects are excellent. In Austria the wet weather has done much harm, and from Russia come stories of fearful ravages by enormous flocks of locusts and other insects. The Government has been taking active steps to stamp out this plague, but owing to the insufficiency of hands it has done so without success. In the neighborhood of Odessa alone fourteen detachments of soldiers are engaged in an effort to exterminate one species of bug known as the Aninopla Austriaca.

THE Democracy of Maine illustrate their fidelity to sound financial doctrine by giving the Greenbackers four out of the seven electors to be chosen by the State. Honest members of the party will scarcely look with favor upon a capitulation so utterly dishonorable.

THE Tennessee Board of Health is adopting timely precautions against the introduction of yellow fever into Memphis and other cities. It has, among other steps taken, enacted an ordinance which prohibits the entry into the State of articles of merchandise shipped as freight from New Orleans liable to transport the germ of fever. Officers of the Board will be stationed on the railroads at the State line, and wharf masters at river towns, to enforce this order.

MEXICO has passed the ordeal of another Presidential election without revolution or serious disorder. The returns indicate the election of General Gonzales as President, a result which assures a continuance of the wise and pacific policy of Diaz, of whose Cabinet he was for some time a conspicuous member. Meanwhile, the work of internal improvement and industrial development appears to be making satisfactory progress. Over 800 miles of railway have been completed and are now in operation, and three important roads—one over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, another from Guaymas to El Paso, and a central road from the capital to the City of Leon,—a distance of 262 miles—are in course of construction.

SHOULD the reports in reference to the failure of the grain crop in Russia prove to be correct, we may reasonably expect that a new impulse will be given to our prosperity as a people. It is said that the returns show a deficit of grain of at least 9,761,510 bushels, and the anxiety is so great that it is already proposed to forbid the exportation of wheat in order that the necessities of home consumption may be met. Such a restriction would be a very serious matter for Germany, where the rye crops are poor, and that country, as the case stands, will certainly require large quantities of our American grain. Fortunately, our harvest will be so ample that we can supply any demand which may be made upon us.

IN a speech in Indiana the other day, Secretary Thompson, referring to the intimation that the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President, if elected, will take their seats, said: "This means, if it means anything at all, that Tilden and Hendricks, who, according to the Democratic theory, were elected, did not take their seats because they were cowards. If General Hancock is elected fairly and honestly, of course he will take his seat, but if he is not fairly and honestly elected, he will not take his seat." He further said that the right and privilege of every citizen to vote as he pleased in the coming contest would be secured, if necessary, by the exercise of all the power of the Administration, and supported, if need be, by the Army and Navy. This is certainly plain and positive, but is it not a trifle more vehement than called for by the facts of the case?

IT is to be lamented that men of practical business ability and experience are so generally indisposed to serve in Congress. Here, for instance, is Hon. John H. Starin, of New York State, who, after a service of two terms, positively declines to be a candidate for re election, and his district will now probably be represented by some professional politician without any real qualification for legislative work. Mr. Starin is no doubt persuaded to this course by considerations satisfactory to himself, but men of his class owe the State a service which should not be lightly regarded, and their withdrawal from public life, so long as they are needed by their constituencies, must always be matter for regret. The legislation of Congress will never be what it should be in its comprehension of, and relation to, the great business interests of the country while the professional and political elements so largely outweigh the practical.

THE next exhibition of the American Institute, which will open on the 15th of September, will possess unusual interest on account of a new and unique feature which will then be introduced. The managers, desiring to encourage a full and complete exhibit of work produced by amateurs and apprentices, will admit, without charge, all such work in all branches of mechanical, industrial and decorative art which may be offered and approved, and will award premiums to those who may excel in the arts named. It is the intention of the Institute to have ladies as well as gentlemen judges, who shall be proficient in art-work. This will embrace sculpture, painting, drawing, bric-a-brac, fancy-work, embroidery, decorated china, wood-carving, sawing and all other artistic hand work, calculated to adorn American homes. Amateur workers will be thus stimulated to earnest competitive efforts, and the result must be in every way salutary in developing the practical and useful arts.

THE number of business failures reported in the United States during the last three months is 1,065, with liabilities of $20,111,689. For the first half of the present year the failures numbered 2,497, with liabilities amounting to $32,888,743. In the first half of last year there were reported 4,058 failures, with liabilities amounting to $45,779,390. This seemed like a wonderful reduction when compared with the first six months of the year previous, 1878, when the liabilities reached $130,000,000 in round numbers, or nearly twice as great a sum as 1879, but the present year shows thus far a ratio of reduction over 1879 fully as great as that year did over the preceding year. The circular of Dun, Barlow & Co., from which we gather these statistics, says:

"The foregoing figures are a fresh illustration of the healthy condition of business which is almost universally supposed to prevail. If, during such years as 1878, when the losses by bad debts equaled $5,000,000 per week, the failures illustrated a very disastrous condition of affairs, surely no better sign of the general prosperity than now prevails is needed than the tables for the first half of 1880, in which the losses from this source are shown to be rather less than one and a quarter millions per week. So that not only are the figures in themselves evidence of prosperity, but the absence of loss which they imply is a part of the existing favorable condition of business. It is evident that so far as credits are concerned the risks of business in the last six months have been reduced to a minimum. It is to be remembered, too, that the volume of business transactions has increased enormously over that of preceding years. Taken in their broadest sense, the statistics of failures here given imply a condition of prosperity and a safety in granting credits which has not been equaled heretofore in the history of the country."

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

CADET WHITTAKER'S case is still before the War Department.

THE Government blue-book contains the names of 97,800 public officials.

THE official census returns of Detroit show the population to be 116,027.

CHANTINE COX, the negro murderer of Mrs. Dr. Hall, was hanged July 16th.

THE wrecked steamer Narragansett has been successfully raised and towed to Noank, Conn.

PRINCE LEOPOLD of England will sail from this port, on his homeward voyage, July 24th.

THE Receiver of the First National Bank of Newark, N.J., reports a deficiency of $200,000.

THE Missouri Greenbackers have nominated a full State ticket, with Lyman A. Brown for Governor.

GENERAL POPE says there is no invasion of the Indian Territory, reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

PRINCE LEOPOLD has canceled all his Newport engagements owing to an injury received while salmon fishing.

SECRETARY SHERMAN recently visited New Bedford, Newport, and other points on the New England coast.

GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY has been elected captain of the American rifle team which is to shoot at Wimbledon.

AN Irish Republican National Convention, composed of delegates from twelve States, has been held in Indianapolis.

INFORMATION has been received of the arrest of Captain Payne, the Indian Territory raider, and his party, near Fort Reno.

THE Department of Agriculture reports the prospects for cotton, corn and wheat crops as more favorable than for several years past.

IT is thought that Chili and Peru will accept the offer of the United States Government as mediator, with a view to a settlement of their controversy.

NEARLY all the members of the Cabinet will take part in the coming political campaign. Secretary Schurz will address meetings in Indiana.

IT is announced that Captain Phelps, the commissioner sent to Paris in the interest of the Nicaragua Canal, has been very successful and will soon return.

THE intercollegiate boat-race at Lake George, on July 16th, was won by the Cornell four, the University of Pennsylvania was second, and Columbia third.

SEVERE damage was wrought in the southeastern portion of Chester County, Pa., and in Greenville County, Va., on July 16th, by violent hail and wind storms.

THE Republican National Committee claims to have encouraging reports from all parts of the country. The Democratic Committee expresses equal satisfaction with the campaign prospects.

THE second annual convention of the National Rabbinical Association was held at Detroit last week. The association numbers fifty-six rabbis, and proposes to establish a new Jewish quarterly as its organ.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT JUDGE WOODS, of Alabama, has decided that the cases of the thirteen revenue officers arrested by the State authorities for homicide in killing certain whisky distillers are transferable at once to the Federal Courts.

A MOB of rioters in East Atchison, Missouri, on July 14th, attacked and drove out all the colored workmen employed there in various capacities, and afterwards took possession of the town, defying the law and the militia. Its ringleaders will be arrested.

INSTEAD of dying or becoming insane, Dr. Tanner, on completing the eighteenth day of his abstinence from food, showed a gain in weight, a clear eye and a cheerful temper. He now drinks considerable water, and is sanguine of finishing the forty days' fast.

TWENTY-SEVEN Italian laborers, on a gravel train on the Long Beach branch of the South-side Railroad, were swept from the cars, July 14th, by a heavy wire derrick guy which hung too low across the track. All were more or less hurt, and three will probably die.

GENERAL SHERMAN denied that he ever received a letter from General Hancock to the effect that if Mr. Tilden should be declared elected by the House of Representatives, he would obey his order without reference to any other decision or the commands of the Government.

REPRESENTATIVE WHITEHOUSE has been nominated for re-election by the Democrats of the Seventh Congressional District of Tennessee. In the Ninth Indiana District, Judge G. S. Orth has been re-nominated by the Republicans. In the Sixth Mississippi District, General J. R. Chalmers is again the Democratic candidate.

Foreign.

FRANCE will redeem 167,000,000 francs worth of Treasury bonds this year.

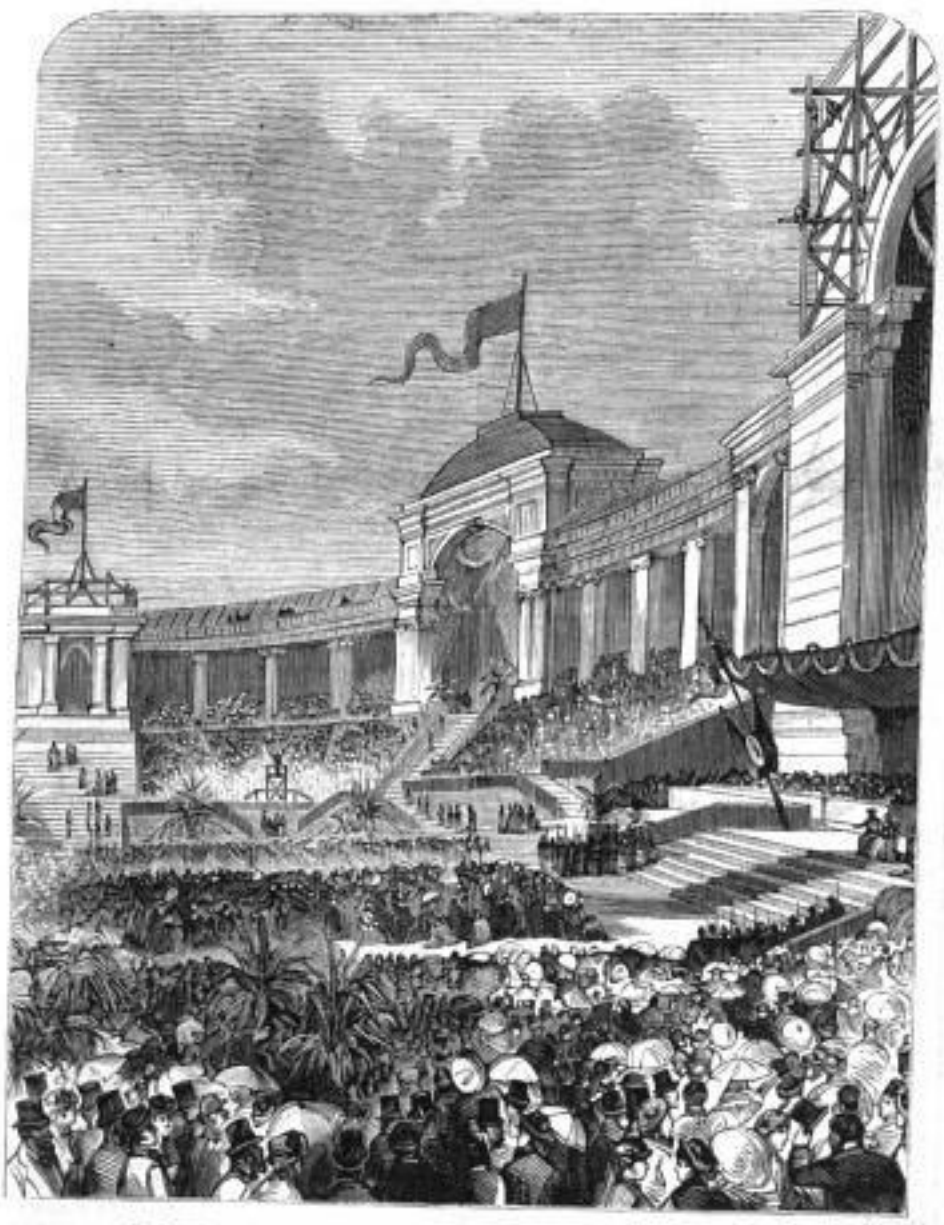
THE Albanians have begun the threatened war, attacking the Montenegrins on the morning of July 12th.

SIR CHARLES DILKE says, on behalf of the British Government, that the Powers are acting in concert in regard to Russia.

THE ritualist, Rev. A. Mackonochie, has appealed to the British House of Lords against the order suspending him for three years.

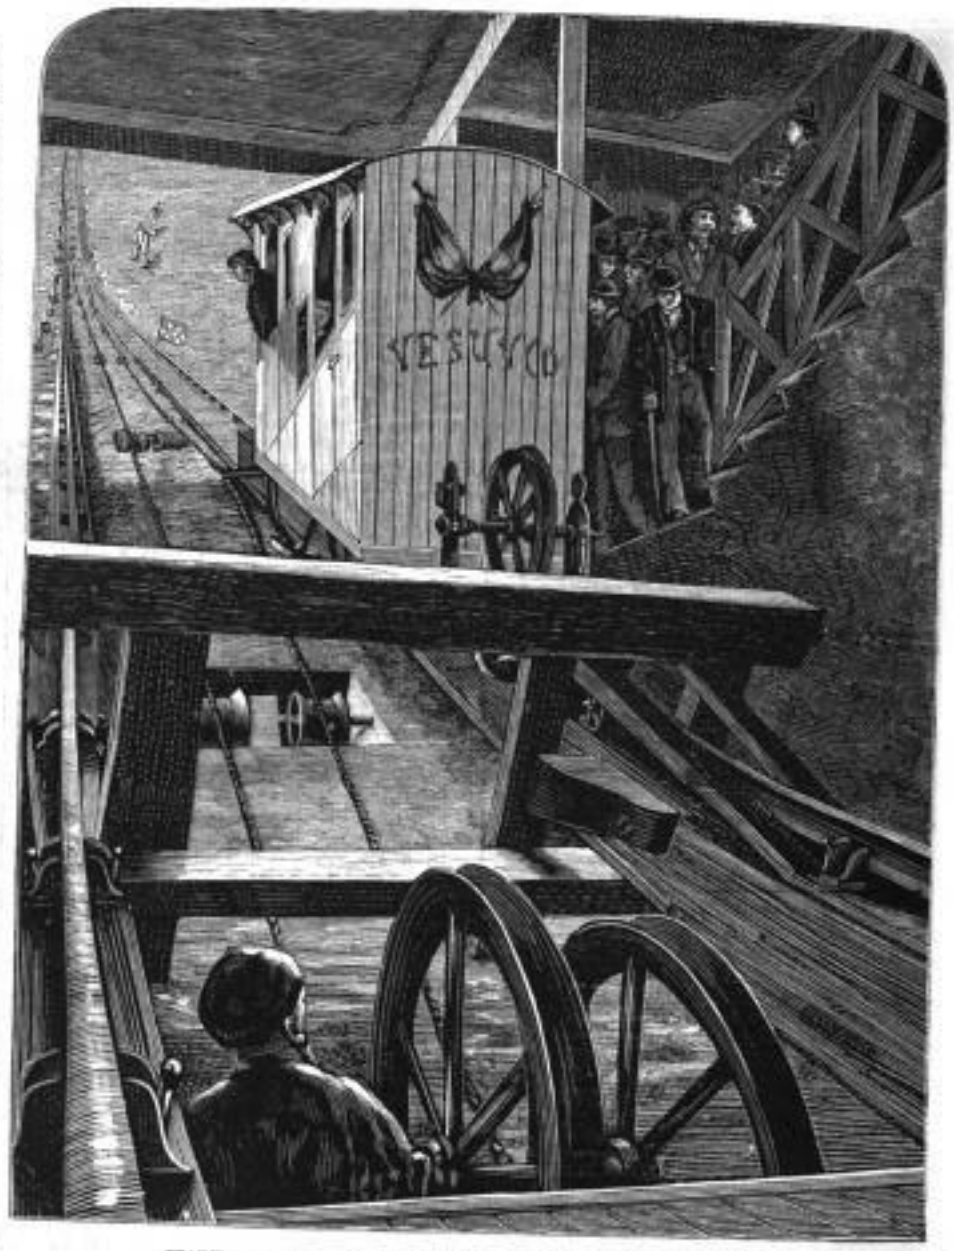
REPORTS from Cuba, not yet confirmed, state that seven prominent Cuban prisoners were recently massacred by the Spanish authorities.

BECAUSE the Catholic priest in Constantinople refused to sing a Te Deum in honor of the French fete, the Greek clergy celebrated the occasion, and Greek merchants made an enthusiastic demonstration in favor of France.



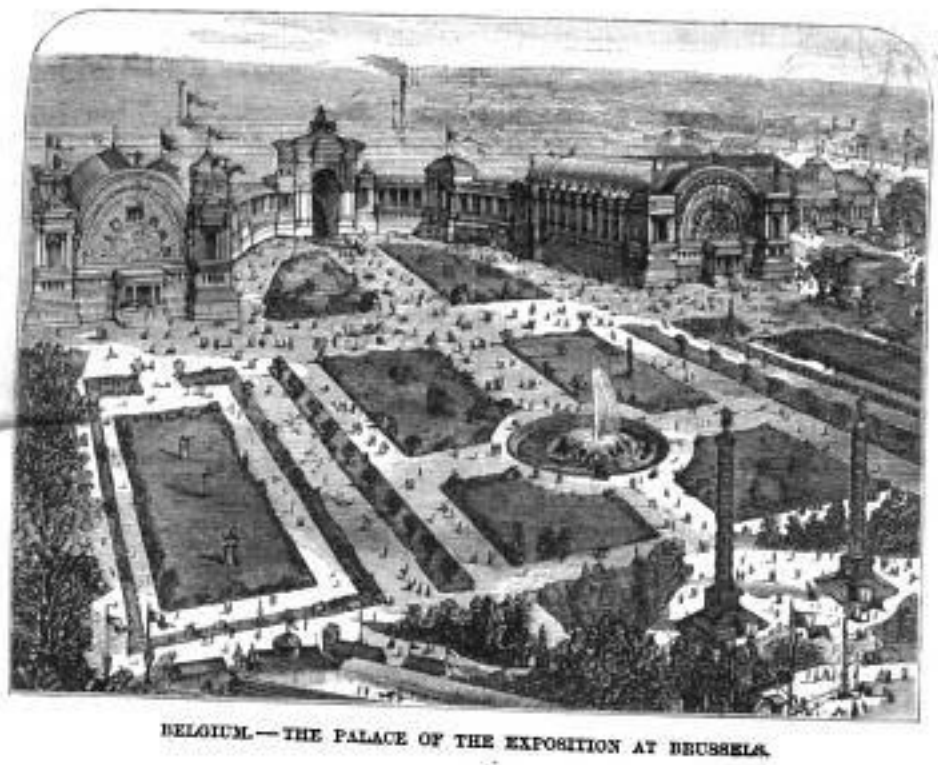
A TERRIBLE colliery explosion occurred near Newport, Wales, on July 15th, by which 120 men who were working in the mine are reported to have lost their lives. The exploring parties say there is little or no hope of finding any of the men alive.

THE weather throughout England, especially in the Midland Counties, is causing serious anxiety regarding the crops on account of heavy rainfall. The harvest in France has begun and promises to be satisfactory.

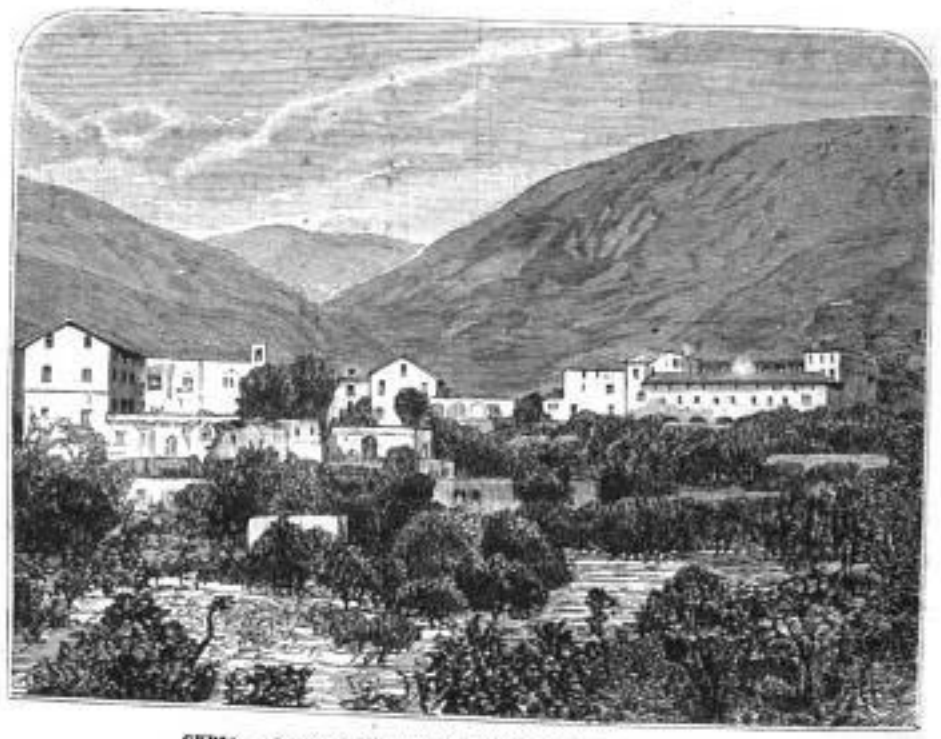


IT is said that Count Hatzfeld, with the consent of the German Cabinet, has secretly arranged for a Turco-German alliance. The announcement has caused some excitement in Europe. The collective note of the Powers as to the Greek boundary has been presented to the Porte.

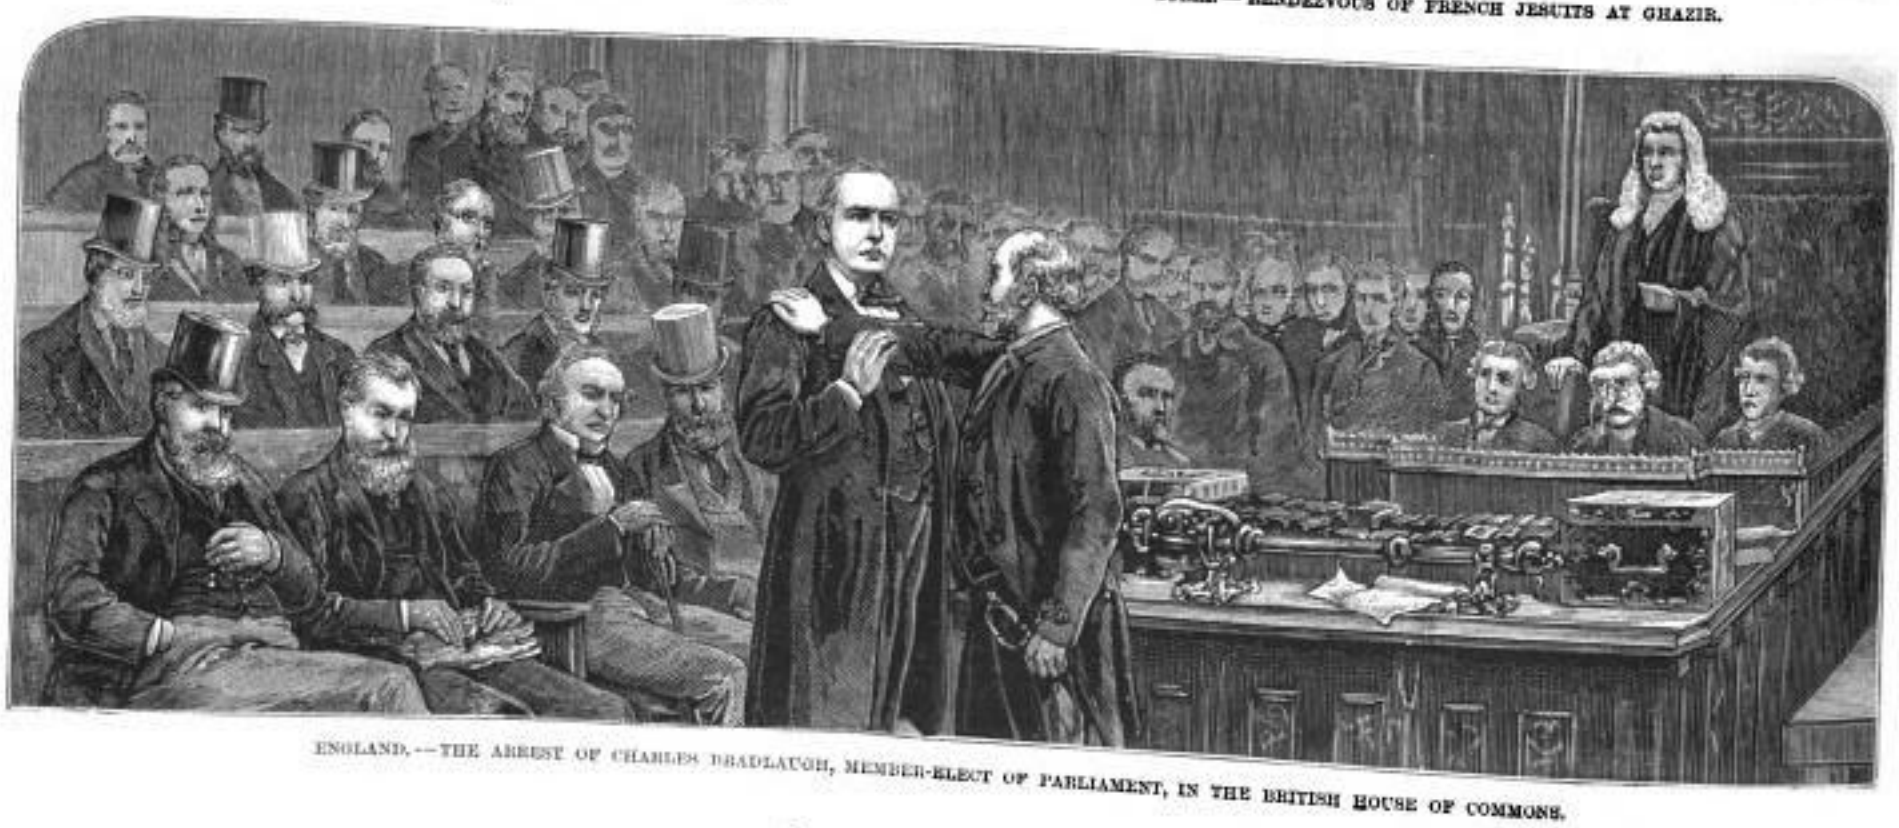
Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 367.

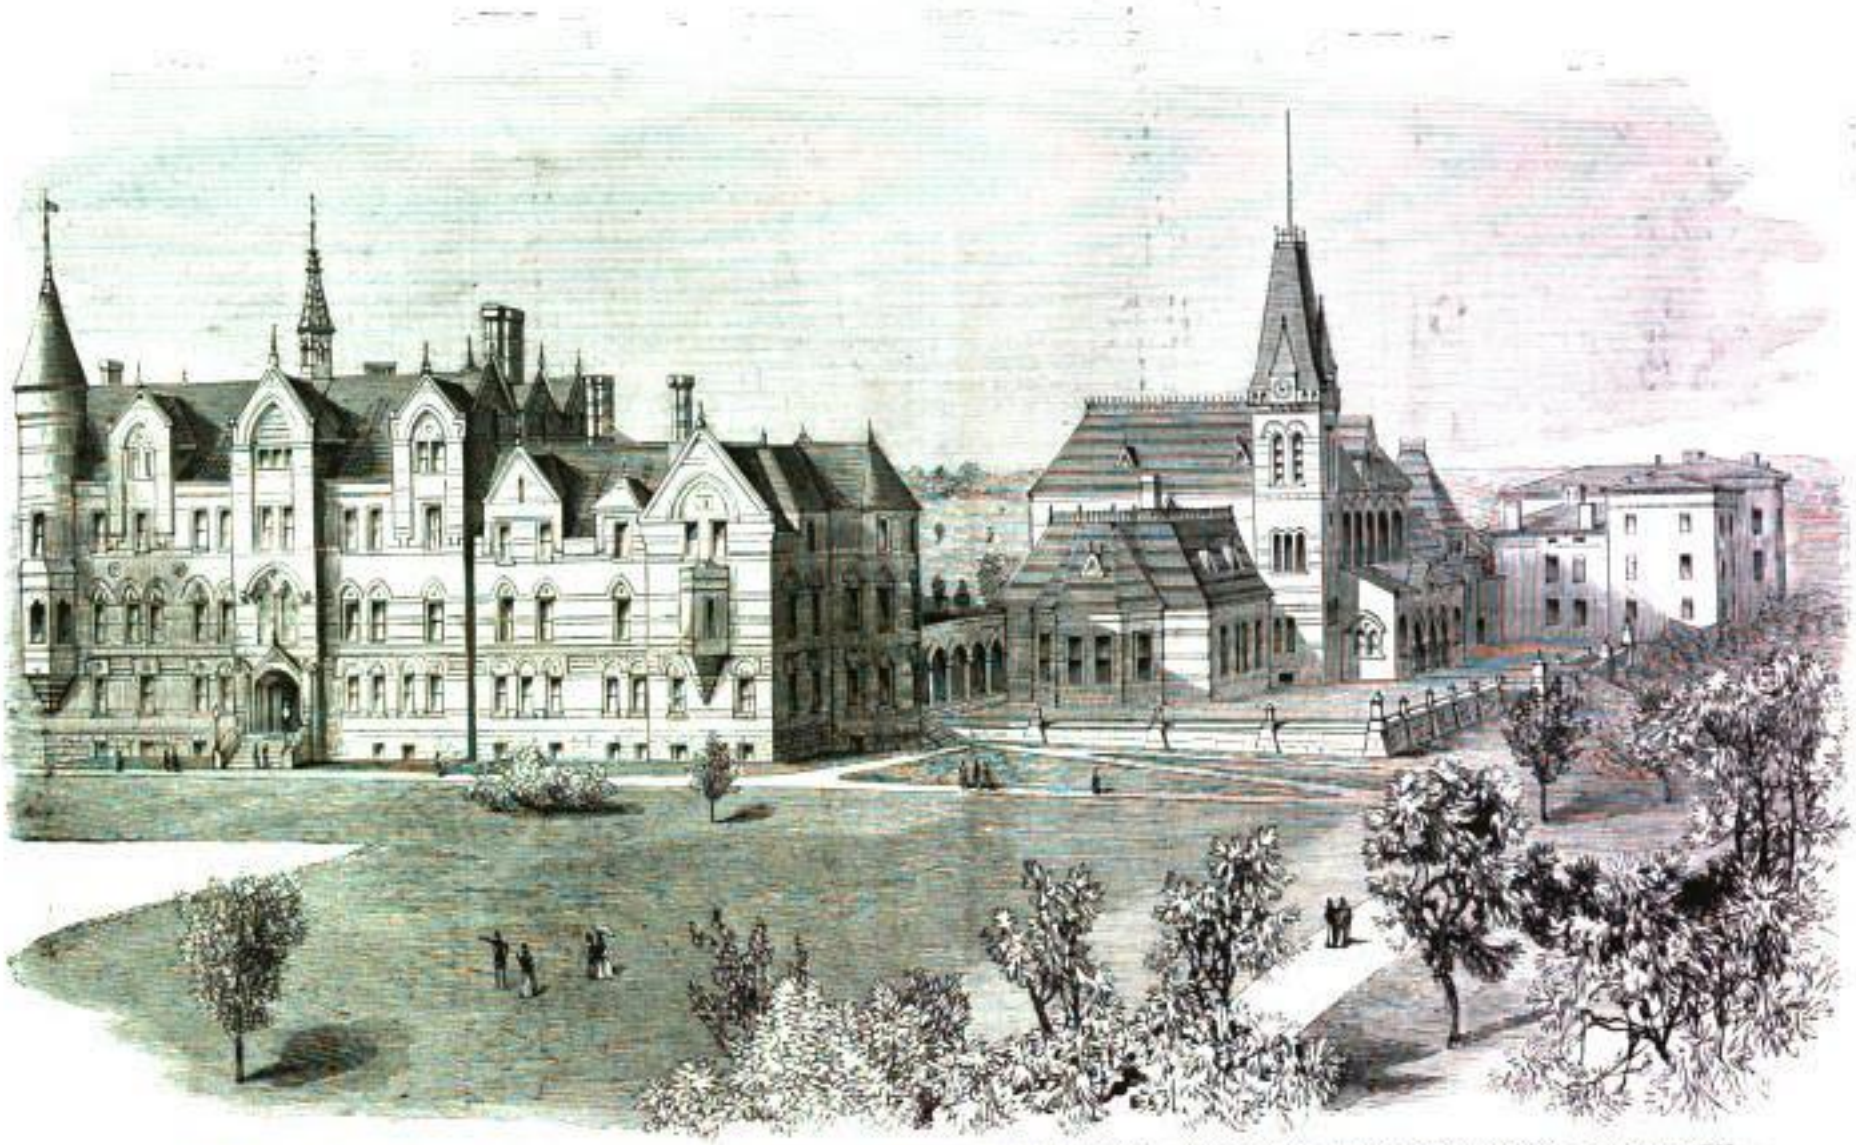


BELGIUM.—OPENING OF THE JUBILEE EXPOSITION, JUNE 16TH.

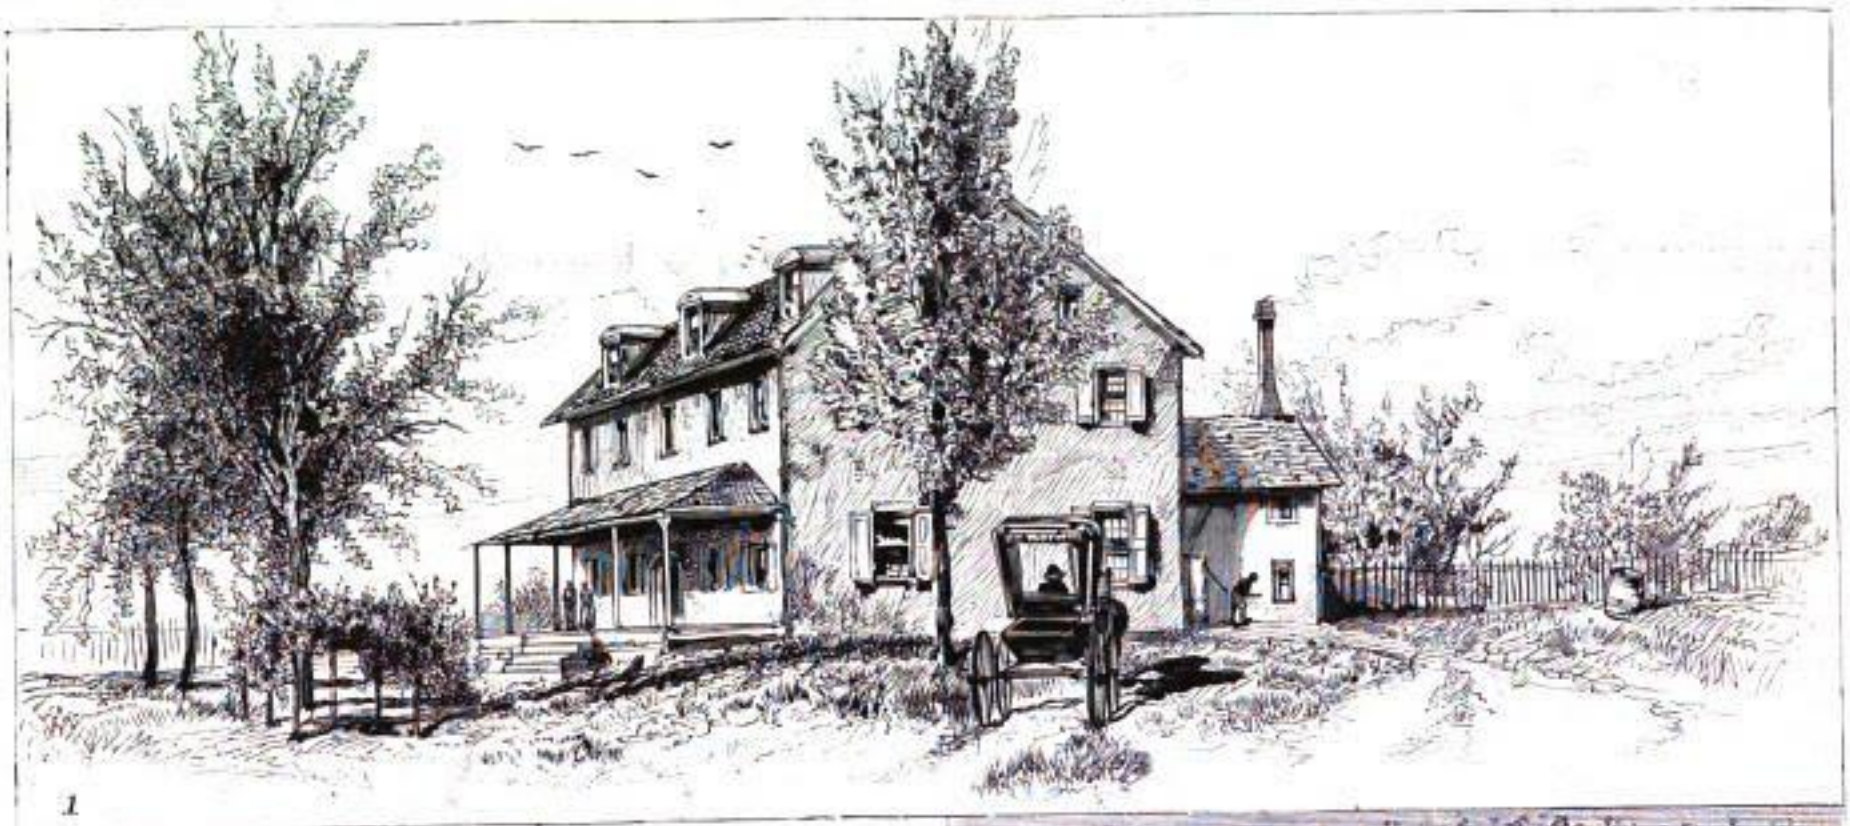


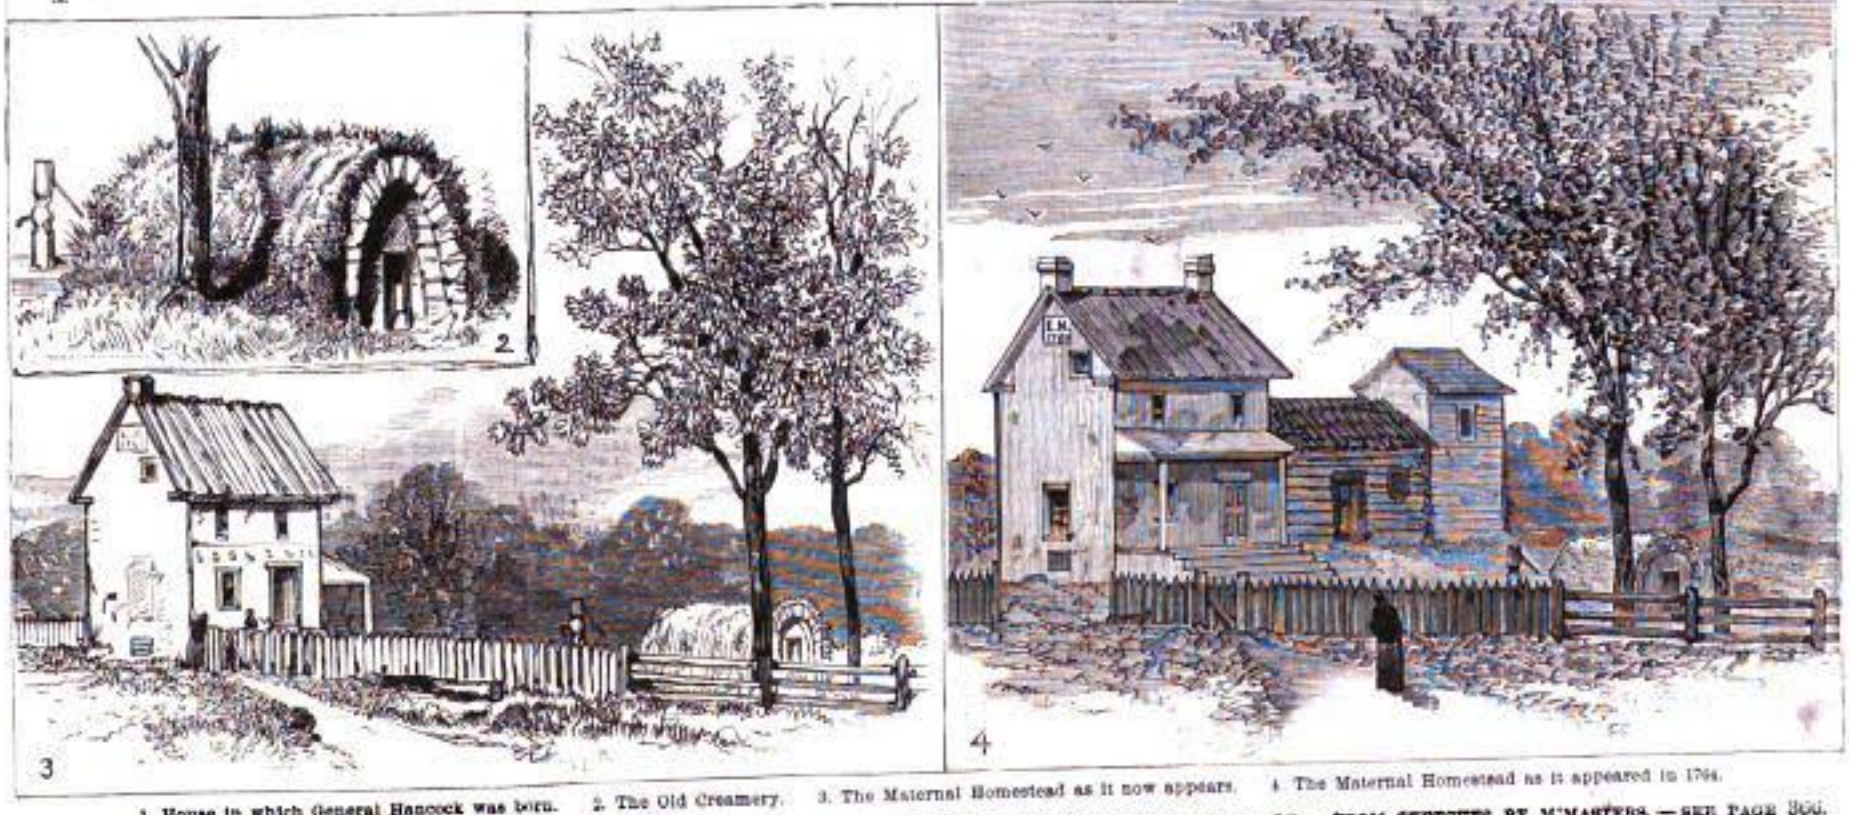
ITALY.—INAUGURATION OF THE MOUNT VESUVIUS RAILWAY.

BELGIUM.—THE PALACE OF THE EXPOSITION AT BRUSSELS.



SYRIA.—RENDEZVOUS OF FRENCH JESUITS AT GHAZIR.





ENGLAND.—THE ARREST OF CHARLES BRADLAUGH, MEMBER-ELECT OF PARLIAMENT, IN THE BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Digitized by Google

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—THE NATIONAL DEAF-MUTE COLLEGE, KENDALL GREEN, NEAR WASHINGTON.—FROM A SKETCH BY CHARLES KERNEY.—SEE PAGE 366.

1. House in which General Hancock was born. 2. The Old Creamery. 3. The Maternal Homestead as it now appears. 4. The Maternal Homestead as it appeared in 1764.

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE ANCESTRAL HOMESTEAD AND BIRTHPLACE OF GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT HANCOCK, NEAR LANDSDALE.—FROM SKETCHES BY M'MASTERS.—SEE PAGE 366.

Digitized by Google

THE VILLAGE POETESS.

HER gifted pen, that never flags,
Writes not for pay but pleasure;
She is the Weekly Carpetbag's
Most valuable treasure.
A prodigy, beyond all doubt,
Adoring friends affirm her;
And little children point her out
With reverential murmur.

Although her age is not a girl's,
But forty-five and older,
She wears her hair in falling curls
That nearly reach her shoulder.
Her maiden heart, she loves to hint,
Was stormed by early pillage;
A fact which frequently in print
She tells her native village.

Within her plenteous lines, we meet
With kisses most galvanic;
Their "sighs" would help to sail a fleet,
Their "tears" are oceanic.
The local press has christened her
Apollo's favorite daughter;
Yet certain folk have dared aver
She's Tennyson-and-water.

As even the grandest mortal known
Will sometimes frisk and romp, too,
Occasionally she is prone
To shine amid impromptu.
How fleetly, in a bride's behalf,
Her willing rhymes are mustered!
She'll knock you off an epitaph
As though it were a custard!

We see at home her talent rare
Its rightful guerdon reaping;
For needlework she does not care;
She deigns to do no sweeping.
And surely people can't expect—
Indeed, no mortal wishes—
That such a massive intellect
Should ever wash the dishes!

The contents of her mother's purse
Are slight, report discloses,
Yet, ah! should genius bear the curse
That hateful toil imposes?
And so she dwells apart, 'tis said,
In lofty isolation,
And lets herself be clothed and fed
With gentle resignation!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

THE GHOST OF THE LABURNUMS.

"WHY do you not invite me to the Laburnums, Fan?"

"Because it is so lonely there, Rae."

"For that reason I shall come," said pretty Raphaella Fairlie. "I shall come and keep you company for a whole week, just as soon as I can get away from the city. I knew you and Phil were moping," nodding her curly head sagaciously.

A sudden gravity went over Fannie Brudenel's gentle countenance, yet her eyes brightened expectantly.

"I should love to have you there, of course," was all she said.

When train time came and Fannie had left Rae's pretty studio and the city, the little artiste still sat daintily touching the photograph she was coloring, and evidently closely thinking of something else. She was not sure that Doctor Philip Brudenel would exactly approve of her going to the Laburnums, but she meant to go, for all that, for she loved him, and she could plainly see that he had cares and perplexities of which she knew nothing. And though they had been engaged over a year, he made no proposal of marrying soon, only looked moodily when the subject was approached. Rae so enjoyed his company that she could live with him in the black hole of Calcutta, she declared to herself, but probably Philip did not think so. Anyway, she was going to the Laburnums, his home at Lowshore, because she felt that her love gave her a right to know what was troubling him.

Ten days later she locked her studio-door and steamed away to Lowshore, and soon the depot-carriage had set her down at the door of a tiny cottage hid in laburnum-trees.

Fannie kissed her affectionately.

"What a delightful apparition you are, Rae," she said, and led her into a little sitting-room.

Everything was very plain, and very, very tiny, Rae thought, accustomed to spacious city apartments; and when Fannie had taken her hat and traveling-satchel, and gone to spread a lunch for her, Rae looked around and saw that the carpet was threadbare and the furniture extremely old fashioned.

Suddenly a door opened, and an old lady, leaning on a cane, tottered into the room. Her face, bordered by a snowy cap, had a strange, white, puffy look, but she yet showed signs of having been very pretty in youth.

"What are you?" she asked Rae, "a fairy? Do you think you can better our fallen fortunes? No, no! that can never be."

Rae's cheek burned under the strangely significant words, but she guessed immediately that the old lady's mind was wandering; then Fannie entered the room.

"Come, mother, come and rest now," she said, gently, and drew her from the room. She came back, saying to Rae: "My mother is demented. Do not be troubled by anything she says."

It was evening when Doctor Philip brought his fine presence into the tiny home. His start of delight on beholding Rae was succeeded by a rather sad smile.

"What pleasure did you expect to find here, child?" he asked, holding her hand.

"Perhaps I did not come for pleasure, Philip."

"For what then?"

"Profit."

"I find very little of that here."

Two days passed. Rae saw plainly what the life was at the Laburnums—monotonous, meagre; but ever since Philip had first brought his sister to her studio, Rae had loved Fannie, who was older than herself, and patiently becoming one of the sweetest of old maids. So she enjoyed sisterly talks with Fannie. Philip was absent most of the time.

In one of these confidential chats Fannie said:

"You ought to have come in the early Autumn, Rae—it is prettier here then. In November we have nothing attractive—literally nothing. I have often expressed the wish to Philip to have you visit us; but he always speaks of the contrast between your life and ours—you in the city, with access to so much that is entertaining, and we so shut out from the world. But because it is you, I think, Rae, that I will show you the house in the Hollow."

"The house in the Hollow, Fan?"

"Yes, our ancestral home; for Philip and I came of a prosperous race, poor as we now are, and the old house is full of what is beautiful and rare. Get your hat and we will go now."

Through long lines of laburnums, across a tiny kitchen-garden, along a decaying orchard into a slope still green in the November sunshine. At one end of the valley which opened towards the sea, where white sails were noiselessly flitting, stood a large and handsome house of painted brick, with oriel windows and other picturesque effects.

"It is not an old house," said Fannie. "It was built by my grandfather, in his last days, as a wedding present to my mother. The old house which had formerly stood here he had pulled down and this built. He intended to reside with his only daughter when she married Israel Beaumaire, a French Jew, whom he had chosen for her. But my mother fell in love with her music-teacher, Rosa Brudenel, and eloped with him, and grandfather wrote and bade her never to come back. But when Philip and I were fatherless, my mother came, in her great extremity, and begged her father's assistance. Grandfather gave her the cottage we now have, and allowed her a small income with which to bring us up, but never forgave her. At last he died, willing all his property to a distant cousin in India, who has never come for it. The house stands empty, with all its beautiful furniture, and the rich fields lie fallow, while Philip barely supports us with his small practice. Lowshore is a distressingly healthy place," with a faint smile.

The interior of the house was finished in rich foreign woods, the floors polished like glass and laid with costly rugs and tapestries. The furniture was of mahogany and velvet, long mirrors and dark paintings adorned the the walls. It was indeed a handsome house, speaking of almost limitless wealth.

"There are thousands of dollars worth of silver in the bank at Shoreborough," said Fannie, "and rents accumulating there which will be a small fortune in itself. But we have nothing."

"How hard! how cruel!" cried Rae. "I should not think your grandfather could rest in his grave to have you and Philip, with all your refinement and culture, spending your lives in a hand-to-hand scramble for bread."

"They say he does come back and wander uneasily about here," said Fannie, carefully closing shutters and doors and coming out into the sunshine. "But, of course, such stories are told of all such places. Philip says he does not believe a word of it," with a marked emphasis which made Rae turn and look at her.

"But you do, Fan."

"Twice people have tried to sleep there and declared that grandfather appeared to them. I should not dare to try it, for I am a timorous thing at best, and——"

The intensity of Rae's thoughts made her quite deaf to what further her companion was saying. This fortune was Philip's right. No wonder he was sad, moody and hopeless of their marriage as he was situated and seemed fated to continue to be.

"The will was made immediately after mamma's marriage," said Fannie, standing under the laburnums and looking up at the great house. "Poor mother says that he told her on his deathbed that he made another will—perhaps in her favor. But what she says goes for little. Her state is very strange since a fever she had just after Philip came of age—her talk so wild and foolish—and yet she seems to understand some things in our affairs that we do not see till afterwards. It is almost uncanny to think over the strange knowledge she has had during these past years," and Fannie fell into a fit of musing.

They walked back to the tiny cottage. Rae's veins thrilled with excitement, but Fannie went soberly about getting tea. They kept no maid, this poor disinherited family, and Rae learned that Philip's own hands tilled the little kitchen-garden, while every labor of the household was performed by Fannie.

She could not sleep that night after she had gone to her tiny bedroom. The moonlight seemed to disturb her and make her brain wildly active. What influence strung her nerves?—for when all was still and the night far advanced she rose, and, dressing, donned her warm sealskin sacque and cap, and came out into the hall. She took a bunch of keys from their nail there, and, selecting one which she had seen Fannie take, held it tightly in her slim, white fingers as she went out into the night.

In the moon's white light she went steadily through the long lines of laburnums, across the tiny kitchen-garden, along the decaying orchard, into the Hollow. She stood a moment before the great still house, listening to the roar of the sea. Strangely enough, she did not feel afraid. If she thought of the presence of an unseen spirit, it was to appeal to it prayerfully for help.

Another will. It must be. At least it would do no harm to search, and that is what she had come for.

She left the hall-door wide open and let the moonlight flood the tiled hall. It streamed through the chinks of the shutters, which she opened, one by one, as she fitted keys to drawers of all kinds. The task was no light one, for in every niche was cabinet or escritoire. But there were no papers anywhere. Many things which must have been the personal property of old Squire Brudenel she found, but nowhere his will.

"Oh, if I only could—if I only could!" she said, sadly, "and it would restore Philip to his rights!"

Rat, tat, tat—the sound of a cane on the tiled floor. Rae turned for the first time, her eyes wide with fright. The enthusiasm with which she had entertained her generous purpose had made her utterly forgetful of herself. Now some one was coming.

The door swung slowly on its tarnished silver hinges. A quaint, bent little figure, leaning on a cane, advanced into the room and paused beside a handsome carved armchair which stood before a table. Lifting the cane, the bent little old woman knocked smartly thrice on the seat of this chair, filling the room with a hollow sound, then, resuming her feeble walk, she passed out of the apartment by another door.

Tremblingly, doubtlingly, Rae curiously approached the chair. The blows of the cane seemed to have disturbed or broken the seat, for it was awry, plainly revealing a cavity beneath. Turning the chair to the light, Rae looked within and saw distinctly a folded paper.

It was a large sheet, yellow and thick as vellum. Her hands trembled as she unfolded it and read, "My last will and testament, Paul Brudenel," and it dropped to the floor.

Snatching it up she ran—ran swiftly out of the house, and flew noiselessly and shaking to Fannie's door.

"I have found it—I have found it!" she cried, flinging her arms around the amazed, white-robed figure who admitted her to Fannie's chamber.

"Found what? Are you sick? Are you crazy?" asked gentle Fannie Brudenel.

"The other will—within a chair—an old armchair in the house in the Hollow. A ghost showed it to me!" answered Rae, holding the paper aloft.

There was a knock at the chamber-door.

"Sister, what is the matter? What disturbs the house?"

It was Philip's voice.

"I have found the will! Come in and read it!" cried Rae, dragging him in.

She gave him the paper; she lighted a lamp. He was forced to read. Struggling for calmness as he proceeded, he read to the end. Yes, late, but not too late, the precious document was found—the second will of Paul Brudenel, unconditionally bequeathing all he possessed to these two, his grandchildren.

In the exciting talk which followed, no one heard a slender cane go rat-tat tat past the door, but when the blue morning light dawned and Fannie bestirred herself to get breakfast, she went first to her mother's room.

"Philip," she said, coming back, "mother has had one of her bad nights again. She has been up and away. I must have slept very much more soundly than usual; she never eluded me before. She is very much exhausted."

Philip went instantly to attend his mother. When, the next day, she seemed restored to her wonted condition, and Rae had minutely told her story, they closely questioned Mrs. Brudenel as to her visit to the house in the Hollow, and tried to discover if she had any knowledge of the hiding-place of the will. But nothing could be gained from her disordered mind. She would only shake her head and smile.

"How dared you go on such an expedition to that lonely place at such an uncanny hour, Rae?" asked Philip, the next evening, when, embraced by his arm, they had talked over the happy prospect of their immediate union.

"I was inspired," she answered, laughing, but with a look of awe creeping into her beautiful eyes. Then, as she reconsidered that strange night, she gently embraced him:

"All for love, Philip. It was done all for love."

GENERAL HANCOCK'S BIRTHPLACE.

THE ancestral homestead of General Hancock, on the maternal side, stands in Montgomery County, Pa., half a mile east of Lansdale and about twenty miles northwest of Philadelphia. The old portion of the house was erected in 1728, and the new portion in 1764. In this house the mother of General Hancock resided at the time of her marriage to the General's father. The county in which this historic homestead stands was named after General Montgomery, who fell at Quebec, and whose monument stands in St. Paul's Churchyard, in this city. At the time of his marriage, Mr. Benjamin Franklin Hancock—father of General Hancock—was living in the family of John Roberts, Esq., at Montgomery Square, and in Mr. Roberts's house General Winfield S. Hancock was born. This house, the birthplace of General Hancock, is some three miles east of Lansdale. It stands about half a mile east of the Square, and it is a solid, well-preserved building, of fine appearance.

When young Hancock was a year old, his father removed from this old mansion to a house of less pretensions, somewhat nearer to Montgomery Square, where he resided and taught school under the same roof. The schoolhouse residence is still standing, but greatly altered in appearance. Two years later, young Hancock's father removed to Norristown, some twelve miles distant, and there taught school and practiced law till he died, at the age of sixty-seven years.

The ancestors of General Hancock, on both sides, belonged to families of revolutionary fame, and were engaged in all the wars from the French and Indian, before the Revolution, down to the war of 1812.

The father of General Hancock married against the will of his guardian, who was a Quaker, and joined the Baptists, to whom his wife belonged, and became a deacon in the Baptist church at Norristown. He was a constitutional man and a Democrat, but not a politician, and never sought or held any political office. When his son, the present General Hancock, at the age of sixteen, went to West Point, the Quakers attempted to induce the sister of his father's guardian, Miss Polly Roberts, to cut off young Winfield in her will, as the profession of a soldier, educated as a man of war, was not to be encouraged. She remained steadfast, however, until General Hancock had graduated and gone to Mexico and become engaged with the enemy, and, as she supposed, had "killed people." Then the "Friends" said it was impossible she could bestow a legacy upon a person who was killing men by wholesale, and this prevailed. Winfield was cut off in the will. But, as she suspected that the "Friends" wanted her money, she provided for the younger brother in place of Winfield.

It was said of the General's grandfather on the maternal side, that, though a man of small stature, he could jump over a horse or cast a stone across a ten-acre lot.

In this old homestead his grandfather died, at 84, and was buried in the churchyard at Montgomery Square, and his father before him died in the same house. This very house was attacked by the Indians, and defended by the women, who fled to the attic after chopping the hands of the savages as they attempted to force an entrance. The patriotism of the family is shown by the fact that, although but a lad of fifteen years, at the close of the war of 1812 and 1814, the father of General Hancock shouldered his shotgun and went to Red Bank to meet the British, being too young to be enlisted.

THE NATIONAL DEAF-MUTE COLLEGE.

TWO miles northeast of the United States Capitol there rises a beautiful eminence, which affords a commanding view of Washington City and the country for miles around. On this elevation is situated a group of buildings which constitute the National Deaf-Mute College, said to be the only deaf-mute college in the world. The site is what is known as Kendall Green, and the institution is supported by Congress, which, with liberal views and commendable philanthropy, has built the college for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among the silent students. The inception of this enterprise is due to the generosity of Hon. Amos Kendall, and to the influence of Edward M. Gallaudet, Ph. D., LL.D., the youngest son of the Rev. Dr. Thomas H. Gallaudet, the founder of the first institution for the deaf and dumb in America, at Hartford, Conn. Though the institution has gradually grown with the natural increase in the number of students demanding admittance, and with an eye to future enlargements, and as yet seems rather small, yet it is considered to possess one of the finest college buildings in the country. Its architecture is varied, the main hall and chapel being of red sandstone, with white stone trimmings, and the others of brick with white Ohio sandstone ornamentations, and it is thus a fine addition to the public buildings of Washington.

In 1857 the Columbia Institution for the deaf-mute children of the District of Columbia and of the army and navy was incorporated at Washington, D. C., and Dr. E. M. Gallaudet was called to take charge. This institution was erected on a prominent site containing 100 acres, thirty acres of which are richly covered with grass and young maple-trees, while the remainder is wild forest land, and adjoins the National Fair Grounds. The lands were, by Congress, purchased from Amos Kendall, who had already donated a portion of land, with a number of small frame cottages, to the Columbia Institution. In April, 1864, Dr. Gallaudet, with the directors, determined to organize a collegiate department, and Congress agreed to an amendatory act authorizing the Institute to confer collegiate degrees. Soon afterwards the range of study was extended so as to embrace a college course, and the institution was therefore divided into two departments, the advanced department receiving the name of the National Deaf-Mute College.

The objects of the directors in establishing this college was in part to prove, what had been doubted by some, that deaf-mutes could, in spite of their disability through the loss of hearing and speech, engage successfully in the advanced studies pursued in colleges for persons not so disabled. The more important end in view, however, was to afford to a class of persons in the community, already numerous and increasing steadily with the population, an opportunity to secure the advantages of a rigid and thorough course of intellectual training in the higher walks of literature and the liberal arts. The experience of nearly sixteen years in the progress of the college has fully satisfied those familiar with its workings that their confidence as to the ability of deaf-mutes to master the arts and sciences was well-founded, while at the same time the expressions of interest which the enterprise has called forth from instructors of youth, from deaf-mutes and their friends, and from the public journals in Europe, as well as America, may be taken as evidence that the world approves the undertaking.

Beginning with five students and one professor, and occupying a small frame house, the college has progressed so remarkably that it has received 308 students, representing thirty-one different States and the District of Columbia. Of this number New England claims thirty-seven; the Middle States, thirty-seven; the South, forty-seven, and the West, eighty-seven. The college has at present sixty students and seven professors, who are E. M. Gallaudet, of Washington, D. C.; Samuel Porter, the brother of the President of Yale College; E. A. Fay, of New York; Rev. J. W. Chickering, Jr., of New Hampshire; J. C. Gordon, of Indiana; J. R. Hotchkiss, of Connecticut, and A. G. Draper, of Illinois. The professors are men of high culture and real Christian character. The students are given a course of instruction which is the equivalent of that afforded in the best American colleges, with the exception of Greek, more attention being given to the French and German languages.

Since the establishment of the college forty-two graduates with degrees have gone forth from its walls. Of this number the New England States claim thirteen; Ohio, eight; Pennsylvania, three; New York, three; Wisconsin, three; Indiana, two; Illinois, two; Michigan, 2; Iowa, two; Kentucky, England, the District of Columbia, and Georgia one each. Thirty-two students, who have been at this college, have engaged in teaching in every part of the world; two have become editors and publishers of newspapers; three others have taken positions connected with journalism; three have entered the civil service of the Government; one, by sheer force of his talent, literally pushed his way into the high position of Chief Examiner of Patents in the United States Patent Office, but has recently resigned to enter upon the practice of law in patent cases in Cincinnati; one, while filling a position as instructor in a Western institution, has rendered important service to the Coast Survey as a microscopist; one has become an accomplished draughtsman in the office of a New York architect; one has filled the position of recorder's clerk in Chicago; two have taken places in the faculty of their Alma Mater, and become instructors where they were students. Some have gone into mercantile and other offices; some have undertaken business on their own accounts; while not a few have chosen agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in which the advantages of thorough mental training will give them a superiority. Of those alluded to as having engaged in teaching, one is the principal of a flourishing institution in Pennsylvania, another has charge of a day school in Cincinnati, and a third has charge of a day school in St. Louis.

The college library consists of about 2,000 volumes, to which a small collection is annually added; the Literary Society has a library of 300 well-selected books for its members, and collected at its own expense; and the Congressional Library is accessible to students for any special line of research. The college has a handsome museum, with mineral and zoological collections, and, besides, the extensive collections of the Smithsonian Institute, the Agricultural Department and the Army Medical Museum are easily reached. The Corcoran Gallery of the Fine Arts, and others in Washington, present great and inestimable opportunities to the students who are anxious to make the fine arts a special study. The Students' Literary Society holds semi-monthly meetings for the delivery of essays, debates, declarations and dialogues. A Reading Club supplies a selection from the publications of the day. The students' rooms have a unique arrangement for knockers—the mutes' door-bell. A six-pound weight is attached to a bell-pull, and when it is raised by the pull, it drops on the door, causing a jar that attracts the attention of the deafest of the deaf.

Digitized by Google

The officers of the college are as follows: Ruther ford B. Hayes, President of the United States, is the Patron; Edward M. Gallaudet Ph.D., LL.D., the President; Hon. William Stickney, the Secretary; George W. Riggs, Esq., the Treasurer; and the Directors are Hons. T. F. Bayard, J. T. Harris, William Claflin, H. S. Dawes, W. E. Niblack, H. D. Cooke, Rev. B. Sunderland and J. C. McGuire, Esq.

American and foreign travelers are always deeply interested in this noble college. When Don Pedro II., the Emperor of Brazil, visited our country in 1876, he paid a visit to the college and planted in its yard a beautiful ivy from his country with his own hands. Christian IX., King of Denmark, recently, in a letter, requested Dr. Gallaudet to send him the cost, schemes and specifications of the college with a view to the establishment of a similar college in his kingdom.

THE "CHILDREN'S HOUR" AT SWAMPSCOTT.

THE quaint little bathing-place known as Swampscott or "Broken Waters," is a favorite Summer resort of the overheated Bostonians, who are enabled to strike it by rail in twenty minutes, as it lies about twelve miles to the northeast of the Hub. It boasts of 450 dwelling-houses and a normal population of 2,000 inhabitants. The people are for the most part engaged in cod and mackerel-fishing, and go down to the sea in twenty sturdy fishing-boats. These boats start at early morn, cast their nets, draw, and return in the evening. Fish wagons await the arrival of the fleet, and thrifty matrons dispute the right of way in a frugal desire to make a haul of the fresh glittering fish for the "old man's supper." Occasionally the Swampscott fishermen make for Labrador. They come back to be re-hersed by their townsfolk. The fish-houses are marked with the names of the boats which they send forth, such as Gipsy Girl, Minnehaha, etc. The small boats, or dorys, are painted red, blue, green and purple, and present a most picturesque appearance as they bake on the tawny sands. The first tannery in New England was established here in 1629 by one Francis Ingalls—peace be to his ashes! There are beaches and beaches at Swampscott. Philips Beach is one mile and a half long, and shaped like a scimitar. Great gray bluffs, covered with vegetation to the water's edge, overhang it; and every where that a dwelling will fit, there a dwelling clings on. Villas, from the pattern of the Norwegian satyr and Swiss chalet, to the tasteless thing in stone and expressionless frame-house, are dotted all over the bluffs. On the edge of the foam are the quaint habitations of the fisher-folk, mixed up in a tangle of oars, brown cordage, tackle and nets. Gayly-painted catboats rock themselves to sleep at their moorings. There is a perfect eruption of flowers at Swampscott. Flowers in gardens, in windows, on stoops, on slope, suspended from piazzas, springing out of the trunks of old trees—yes, even on chimney-pots do the flowers bloom; and with the flowers are canary birds. How many cages did the artist and I make count of!—and such cages! Mosques, marquees, cupolas, cottages, castles, towers, all in glittering brass wire yellower than the plumage of the imprisoned songsters. The Swampscottonians are æsthetic. Why shouldn't they be—are they not Bostonians undergoing a temporary transplanting?—and the selection of color is chosen with artistic skill. Blood-red geraniums stand up against white walls; tender blues tone with gray rocks, and even claret-color is made to do æsthetic service. At the left extremity of Philips Beach, opposite to where Nahant lies dreaming in the dayshine, is a rocky promontory. Upon this promontory flourishes the greenest of grass—grass like velvet—and the most umbrageous of lordly old trees. Here do the daintily dressed children of the sojourners disport themselves from rosy morn to dewy eve. Here, too, Normandy-capped nurses compare notes as to their respective conquests during the season at the Hub. Here does baby inhale life giving ozone, and here is croquet done to death. Boston affects Beverly at this hour of writing; why turn its back upon so quaint, so picturesque and so unique a colgne of vantage as Swampscott?

HANCOCK AND ENGLISH.

THE OFFICIAL NOTIFICATION OF THEIR NOMINATION.

ON Tuesday, the 13th instant, General Hancock and William H. English, the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President, were officially informed of their nominations by the committee appointed for that purpose. The committee, of which ex-Senator John P. Stockton, of New Jersey, was chairman, had invited the members of the National Committee to accompany them to Governor's Island, and, shortly after noon, the party landed at the steamboat dock on the island and marched to General Hancock's house in orderly procession, Governor Stevenson and Senator Stockton heading the line. General Hancock was at home, but in great sorrow at the death of his favorite grandchild, Winfield Scott Hancock, four months old, who had received that name the night before at the hands of the Rev. Dr. Thompson, of Trinity Church. The child had died at six in the morning, and General Hancock had watched with it most of the night. The ceremony was made as brief as possible. The General met the delegation as it entered the house with a "Good-morning, gentlemen," and led the way to the back parlor. This apartment was soon filled, and standing before a dark bookcase at the east end of the room, General Hancock listened to the formal announcement of his nomination. Senator Stockton, who stood beside Mr. Stevenson, introduced that gentleman and the committee in some remarks, after which the secretary read the formal letter of notification. General Hancock, who stood with his hands clasped behind him, was dressed in a dark mourning suit and white tie, and, during the reading of the letter looked very grave. When the reading was finished, he bowed to the committee and said:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: I appreciate the honor conferred upon me by the Democratic National Convention, lately assembled in Cincinnati, and I thank you for your courtesy in making known that honor to me. As soon as time permits me to give to the subject that careful attention belonging to it I shall prepare and shall send you a reply of a formal nature accepting the nomination tendered me by the Democratic Party for the office of President of the United States." (Applause.)

Then General Hancock stepped forward and began shaking hands with the various members of the committee who were known to him, and receiving introductions to others. After a few minutes he retired into the front parlor, and many of the delegates sought, at the front and rear of the house, the cool piazzas overlooking—one, the greensward; and the other, the Buttermilk Channel. Presently Senator Stockton asked for Mr. English, and that gentleman, who had been standing among the delegation, took the place recently occupied by General Hancock and was in turn formally notified of his nomination by the reading of a letter by the secretary. This letter, like the letter to General Hancock, was accompanied by an engrossed copy of the platform of the Convention, arranged to fold with the letter into a red Russia case. Upon receiving the packet Mr. English bowed and said:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE—As a practical business man, not much accustomed to indirection of action or circumlocution of speech, I will say briefly and in a few words that I accept the high trust which you have tendered me, with feelings of profound gratitude, and that I will at an early date formally and in writing make the acceptance which I am informed is usual on such occasions. In doing this, I fully realize the great responsibility of the situation, the care, the turmoil, the anxiety, the misrepresentation and the abuse which are certain to follow, and I understand thoroughly that all the resources and power of our political foes from all parts of the land will be concentrated against us in Indiana, my native State, where the first grand battle—and probably the most important of all—is to be fought. But these are great occasions where the discharge of high patriotic duties are to be considered above all personal considerations, and I shall not disregard the unanimous voice of the representatives of a majority of the American people which you speak here to day. (Applause.) I am profoundly grateful for the high honor which has been conferred upon me, and I have an abiding faith that, with the favor of God and of the people, we shall succeed in this conflict." (Applause.)

This terminated the ceremony, at which about 120 persons were present, and shortly after the visitors took their departure.

The National Democratic Committee has organized, with Senator W. H. Barnum as Chairman, and Mr. F. O. Prince as Secretary. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has selected Senator William A. Wallace as Chairman, and resolved to co-operate with the National Committee in the work of the canvass.

The National and Congressional Committees and the committee appointed to notify General Hancock and Mr. English of their nomination visited Mr. Tilden's house together on July 14th, where Chairman Stevenson, of the National Convention, presented to Mr. Tilden, in a brief speech, a copy of the resolution complimenting him and passed by the Convention. Mr. Tilden replied as follows:

"MR. STEVENSON, PRESIDENT OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION: I thank you for the kind terms in which you have expressed the communication you make to me. A solution which enables the Democratic Party of the United States to vindicate effectually the right of the people to choose their Chief Magistrate—a right violated in 1876—and at the same time relieves me from the burdens of a canvass and four years of administration, is most agreeable to me. My sincere good wishes and cordial co-operation as a private citizen attend the illustrious soldier whom the Democracy have designated as their standard-bearer in the Presidential canvass. I congratulate you on the favorable prospects with which that canvass has been commenced and the promise it affords of complete and final success."

The French Fete Day.

THE French National Festival, on the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille, July 14th, was celebrated with great splendor and patriotic ardor in Paris. The grand opening ceremony took place in the Hippodrome at Longchamps in the afternoon. President Grévy, accompanied by a brilliant staff, reviewed the troops and delivered the new colors to the regiments in the presence of 100,000 people. President Grévy, in presenting the flags, said the Army had become to France a guarantee for the respect due her, and for the peace which she desired to preserve. At the conclusion of his speech, which occupied only a few minutes, there were enthusiastic cheers and shouts of "Vive la République!" "Vive l'Armée!" "Vive Grévy!" amid a scene of patriotic enthusiasm.

The weather was superb. The streets were all decorated with flags and garlands. There was an enormous crowd, but perfect order was maintained. Very few police were seen in the streets.

The illuminations at night were very brilliant, and the streets were thronged. Petards were let off in all directions. M. Gambetta made a tour through the central quarters and was received with immense enthusiasm wherever he appeared. The Place de la Bastille was in a blaze of many-colored lights, and the avenues and streets near it were lighted like the day. In all the quarters of the city the principal buildings and squares were illuminated, and many beautiful and artistic transparencies were displayed.

Besides the grand concert at the Trocadero, which was attended by from 15,000 to 20,000 people, musical performances on a grand scale took place in the different districts of the city.

The illumination of the Cathedral of Notre Dame was very grand. The whole building was overspread with electric lamps, concealed in such a way as to throw their light upon the Cathedral without the spectators observing its source. The whole building was thrown into bright relief and looked like a vast structure of porcelain.

The French residents of New York city kept the day with due honor. The two French frigates in the harbor were bedecked with bunting, and there were games and other festivities on board. A general reception was held at Washington Park, where twenty-three French societies made holiday.

Progress and Civilization in Hawaii.

REMEMBERING that in the history of the Sandwich Islands only one hundred years ago their barbarian inhabitants clubbed Captain Cook to death, the sight of a well-printed "Hawaiian Almanac and Annual for 1880," with many pages of smart advertisements, and a complete Court Calendar, gives rise to very strange feelings. Neither the Australian colonies nor the United States afford any parallel to the progress of the Sandwich Islands. In the former cases the civilization is simply an offshoot and continuation of that of England; in the latter, it is the natives themselves who in the short space of a century have advanced from primitive barbarism to the necessity for an almanac. This almanac covers seventy six pages besides advertisements, the latter affording a pretty fair criterion of the staged civilization already attained in these islands. Here the attractions of a variety of restaurants, refreshment, coffee and billiard saloons are set forth; the "Palace Ice Cream Parlors," in Honolulu, seem to be rather an inviting resort in a place where the weather is always hot; watches and clocks have always become a necessity, and the latest things in upholstery and household furniture have found their way to Honolulu, which also boasts of at least one wagon and carriage-builder. One confectioner and pastrycook vaunts the richness and flavor of his wedding cakes, while appropriately in the next page we are told where a plentiful supply of drugs, medicines, and Havana cigars may be obtained. The cards of attorneys-at-law and stock brokers give evidence of the complexity of Hawaiian civilization, and the tourist need be at no loss for hotels and "pleasant furnished rooms." A reading-room gives access to the principal periodicals of the world, upwards of one hundred of which are set down in a news agent's book as being regularly supplied to his customers. Indeed, it would be difficult to name any article in demand in civilized society that could not be supplied at one or other of the various stores and warehouses in Honolulu. When we look at the almanac itself we find it contains pretty much the same kind of information to be found in the almanacs of countries where civilization began 1,000 or more years ago. Hawaii has a fair supply of public holidays, including, characteristically, the Chinese New Year and the birthday of Queen Victoria. A full list of the church days and movable feasts is given, a list of the Kings of Hawaii, their birth, accession, etc., from Kamehameha I., who began to reign in 1782. There is a complete court calendar, as minute as any of the court lists in the "Gotha Almanac," with the king, queen, princes and princesses, ministers, law dignitaries, governors, etc. There is, moreover, much useful information as to population, inter-island and inland distances, heights of mountains, imports and exports, shipping, and other statistics. The regulations for car fares and rates of fares are quite as minute and as hard on the "cabbies" as those of London or Paris. All this, with some especial articles relating to the islands, the royal family and Hawaiian folklore, renders the "Hawaiian Almanac" of peculiarly suggestive interest. It is sad to think that a people who have shown themselves capable of such marvelously rapid progress should be rapidly dying out. That this is so the various censuses give unmistakable evidence. At the census of 1832 the total population was 130,313; in 1878 it had dwindled down to 57,985, and of this number only 44,088 were native, and 3,420 half-caste, the remainder being foreigners. Of the foreigners, the Chinese are by far the most numerous, numbering 5,916.

Suffrage in Italy.

ITALY is in the throes of a Reform Bill movement. A measure of this kind has been promised by successive Cabinets, the universal feeling being that the existing state of things has become untenable; but the frequency of governmental changes always prevented the introduction of a Bill. At present the suffrage in Italy stands on the narrowest basis in all Europe. Out of 28,000,000 to 30,000,000 inhabitants, among whom there are about 8,000,000 adult men, only 600,000 have the right of vote. The new Bill just brought in by the Cabinet is in the nature of a compromise between two factions. An educational test is the main feature of the new proposal. As before, the complete age of twenty-one is fixed for the exercise of suffrage. The elector must be able to read and write. The minimum of the property qualification is either the annual payment of direct imposts to the amount of forty lire; or, in proportion to the number of inhabitants of a town or village, a rent of 300 to 600 lire from houses or business places; or a rent of 600 lire from stocks; or the annual payment of 800 lire for a farm. In the absence of property qualification, the proof that a man has the knowledge required in an examination of the fourth elementary class of public schools, will confer the vote. Commissions before which such proof is to be given are to be instituted, but the technical and somewhat complicated details we readily omit. Soldiers and non-commissioned officers in active service, custom-house officers, policemen and gendarmes, are not to have the suffrage. Indeed, a great deal of indue influence had hitherto been exercised by the latter in the elections for Parliament. The electoral registers are to be under the supervision of a committee composed of a magistrate, three members of the Provincial Council, and a prefect as chairman. So far as we can judge at present, the measure would considerably widen the franchise, but would still fall far short of universal suffrage. In the different groups of the Left there are great divergences of opinion: and altogether this Reform Bill movement will probably lead to a vast deal of excitement, the very constitution of the Italian nation being, so to say, about to be put on its trial.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The New Vesuvius Railway.

The ascent of Mount Vesuvius up to within about a mile of the cone is not particularly difficult, and has indeed been hitherto usually accomplished by carriage as far as the inn below Professor Palmieri's Observatory, as there is a capital road all the way from Naples. Close by the observatory, however, the road ended, and from thence the would-be ascenders walked over a footpath cut in the streams of hardened lava to the foot of the cone, where they would begin their three hours' zigzag climb of a slope that rarely takes seven minutes to descend, shin deep in loose ashes and crumbling scoriæ. Now, however, the whole ascent can be made by rail. The carriage-road has been extended to the foot of the cone, and there is situated the lower station, from which the train starts for the summit, a distance, as the crow flies, of a little over a thousand yards. The line is worked on what is termed the "funicular" system, the carriages not being propelled by a locomotive, but being drawn up and lowered by means of two endless steel ropes and a windlass, which, set in motion by a steam-engine, is placed in the lower station. The line has been constructed with great care upon a solid pavement, is planked throughout, and is believed to be secure from all incursions of lava.

The Belgian Exposition.

The Belgian National Exposition of art, industry and agriculture was opened on Wednesday, June 16th, by the King, surrounded by the members of the royal family, the foreign ambassadors and the high dignitaries of State. The occasion being a holiday, the opening was witnessed by an immense crowd, and a very enthusiastic one. Brussels was in gala garb, public and private decorations being very extensive and brilliant. Before declaring the Exposition open, the King congratulated the Minister of the Interior and the Mayor upon the interesting display. After the declaration the royal family promenaded the various pavilions, and the King reviewed the troops, while many bands discoursed enlivening music.

Jesuits in Syria.

The Society of Jesus is about to establish hostilities in England and in Jersey. The Dominicans and a portion of the Franciscans are going to settle in the Tyrol, the Carthusians and Trappists proceed to England; the Recollets and Franciscans of the Observance, who devote themselves chiefly to missionary work in the Holy Land, intend to ask a refuge in the Levant, transferring their novitiates to the Tyrol. Many of them have been offered a temporary home by the bishops and secular clergy. Some few, the Oratorians, for instance, assume lay attire. We have already published views of some of the buildings in Paris occupied by the members of the religious Order of the Society of Jesus, and this week we supplement them with one of the Jesuit College at Ghazir, in the district of Kesrawan, six hours' march from Beyrouth, Syria.

Charles Bradlaugh's Arrest.

In a late issue we gave, with a portrait of Charles Bradlaugh and sketch of his career, an account of his appearance before the bar of the House of Commons to make affirmation prior to taking his seat as a member, and of his formal arrest by order of the Speaker. Our present illustration shows this scene. It was soon followed, as people generally imagined it would be, by another spectacle—of Mr. Bradlaugh's triumph. Since taking his seat he has been served with several writs for exercising the voting privilege, and it is understood that he will make answer to the first writ, that the entire question may be determined according to the laws of the United Kingdom.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A NUMBER of exiled French Jesuits have arrived in Canada.

—SOUTH AUSTRALIA has had thirty-one ministries in twenty-one years.

—A PLEA has been applied for to carry the Tichborne case into the House of Lords.

—OVER $10,000,000 a year are expended in private horticulture in Great Britain and Ireland.

—AFTER October 1st advertising cards bearing one-cent stamps will cease to be mailable matter.

—THE Commissioner of Agriculture of Virginia reports the wheat, tobacco and oat crops all below the average in quality.

—THE Russian General, Kaufman, has been ordered to Eastern Siberia with 14,000 men to clear the district infested by brigand Chinese immigrants.

—THE report that Senator Cameron, of Pennsylvania, has been seriously ill is denied. The Senator will take an active part in the campaign in his State.

—IT is stated that the Jesuits expelled from France intend to settle in Wales, and have leased a house at Aberdovey, in Merionethshire, for twenty-one years.

—DISPATCHES from Pekin announce that Chung How's sentence has been remitted, and that the Government has abandoned the idea of going to war with Russia.

—ONE lady was killed and eight others injured by the tipping over of a wagon on the descent of Mount Washington, N. H., July 12th. The driver of the team was drunk.

—THE President has ordered troops to the Indian Territory with orders to repel all invaders, and Secretary Schurz says that those captured will be dealt with according to law.

—IT is stated that the Pope intends to issue an encyclical to the Belgian Bishops, approving their course and encouraging them to persevere in defending the rights of the Church.

—THE Chilian fleet has arrived off Callao on the Peruvian coast, and if the terms of peace offered by Chili are not accepted it will proceed to invest Lima, the capital of Peru.

—THE National Temperance Camp Meeting will be held this Summer in Spencer, Tioga County, August 4th. Hon. Neal Dow; Rev. Albert G. Lawson, of Brooklyn; Rev. M. E. Dunham, Gloversville, and others have been engaged to speak.

—THE British Museum has purchased a vaulted wooden Egyptian coffin, well preserved, and a gilded mask and mummy of a lady named Tahuiiea or Thothei, one of the court or family of the Queen of Amasis I., of the eighteenth dynasty.

—THE Turkish Porte seems to recognize the possibility that its domination in Europe is nearly terminated, and is selling large quantities of ecclesiastical property and crown lands in the European Provinces, especially in Thessaly and Epirus.

—THE National Educational Association, held at Chatauqua, N. Y., last week, perfected the organization of a permanent National Council for educational publication and work, consisting of fifty-one leading educators. A committee was appointed to secure an educational exhibition at the International Exhibition to be held in New York City in 1883.

—PRESIDENT GRÉVY, by decrees dated July 6th, granted pardons and commutations of sentence to more than 1,200 common law criminals undergoing punishment in home and colonial penal establishments. The Minister of Marine has ordered a large transport ship to be immediately prepared to bring home 314 amnestied Communists from New Caledonia. About 480 Communists living in different parts of Europe will be entitled to return.

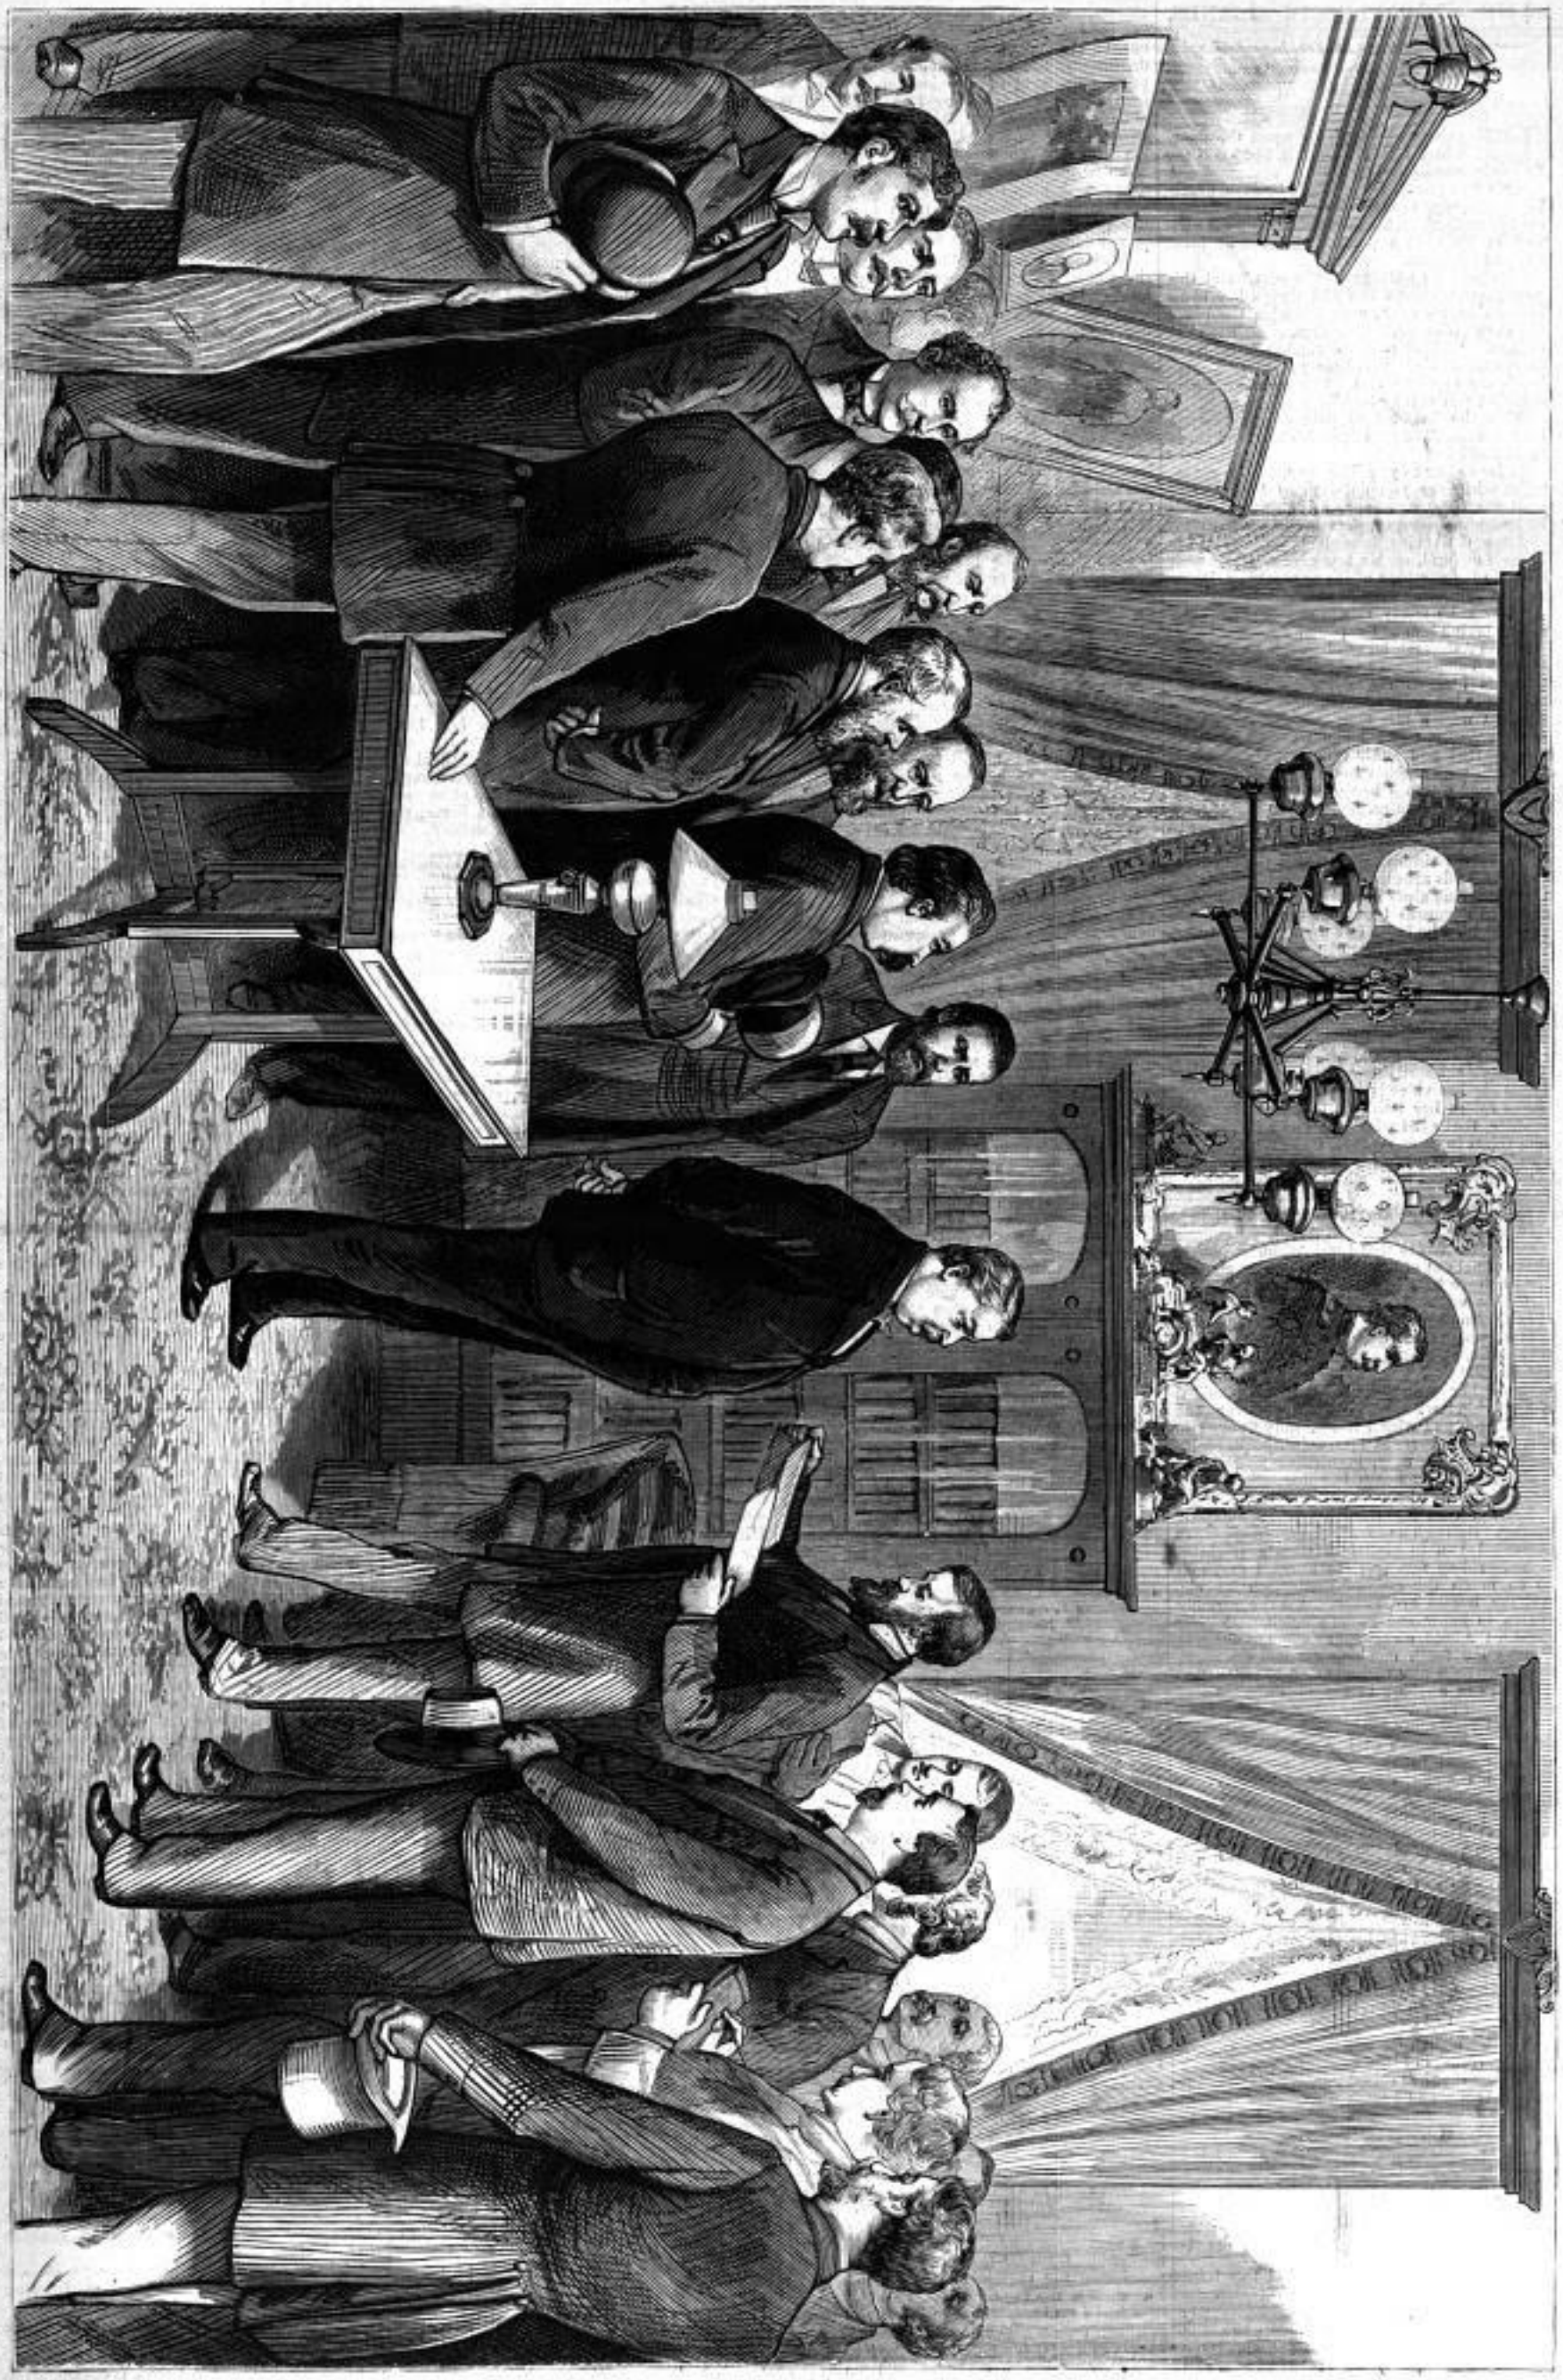
—THE Musical Phalanx, which promises to be the largest concert troupe in the world, is now being organized, with Henry C. Jarrett as business manager and David B. Gulick as musical director. Mr. Jarrett has spent three months in Europe securing talent, and expects to begin the tour of the United States and the Canadas early in September, with eight vocal soloists and four instrumental, besides a chorus of fifty voices and a well sustained orchestra.

—THE Treasury Department has prepared a statement showing in detail the operations connected with the retirement and refunding of the United States bonds and the amount of interest saved by the transaction. The entire amount saved by the refunding from December 1st, 1871, to July 1st, 1880, was the very large sum of $58,289,168. The percentage saved ranged from one to two per cent. The total amount of bonds refunded is $1,395,341,950.

—IN Afghanistan events are proceeding fairly towards a final settlement. Probably, if Abdurrahman Khan fails to come to an agreement with the British, he will sell the large quantities of goods he has seized from Turkestan traders to raise funds for a holy war. There is great distress in Cabul owing to the scarcity and high prices of provisions, but the harvest is nearly gathered, and should bring relief. It is understood that on the withdrawal of the troops from Cabul the defenses will be demolished.

—AMERICAN enterprise is beginning to turn the immense natural resources of Russia to account. Mr. Barker, the American who procured the first four cruisers of the Russian volunteer fleet when war with England was apprehended, has established a joint stock company, with a capital of $5,000,000, to work the South Russian coal mines. Mr Twedal, of New York, has set to working the naphtha fields of the Kuban. If they can obtain a sufficiency of hands, which is always a difficult matter in a lazy land, these companies are pretty sure to prosper.

—A SELECT COMMITTEE of the British House of Commons on the law of libel, has agreed to recommend that in future no criminal proceedings for libel be allowed to begin without the fiat of the Attorney-General being first obtained. The Committee will also recommend that fair, accurate reports of the proceedings of public meetings, published without malice, be privileged; but the plea of privilege shall not be allowed as a defense to any action where the defendant refused to insert a reasonable letter or statement, in explanation or contradiction of the report.



—DURING June more than 48,000 applications for pensions were filed with the Pension Bureau, some for arrears alone, and some being entirely new claims. The work of settling pension cases becomes more difficult as the date when the claimant was disabled becomes more distant. The work is much slower than it was some years ago. In the four years—1863 to 1867—there were allowed 164,456 pensions, and the clerical force was not more than one-third of the size of that now employed. In the years 1867 to 1871 only 85,386 were allowed, although the amount expended for clerical work was increased by $400,000. Since that time the same peculiarities have marked the work of the Bureau, the work becoming much slower and the working force larger as the necessary testimony becomes more inaccessible.

Digitized by Google

MASSACHUSETTS.—OUR POPULAR SUMMER RESORTS.—THE CHILDREN'S HOUR AT SWAMPSCOTT.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. A. OGDEN.—SEE PAGE 367.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK—GENERAL W. S. HANCOCK RECEIVING THE OFFICIAL NOTICE OF HIS NOMINATION FROM THE COMMITTEE OF THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION, AT GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, JULY 13TH.—SEE PAGE 367.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XIX.—(CONTINUED.)

JACK calmly sinks down upon the door-step where he seats himself, but his is the calmness of despair.

"He will break your neck," he says, glancing helplessly at Toboskie. That gentleman stands motionless, his gaze fixed upon the girl, and in his eyes a perfect madness of love, rage and passion.

"He will do nothing of the sort," and this young siren stoops low and wraps her arms around Jack's neck, who, knowing the effect of such blandishments, struggles hard to escape. "There now, dear, good Jack! don't be disagreeable! It is time you were going; leave me to settle this. You must go immediately; you will be late."

With the liveliest despair depicted upon his features, Jack gets upon his feet, and turns to Toboskie.

"I leave her to you," he says, with a groan. "But whatever you do, don't let her ride that devil of a horse, or as sure as you live she will be brought back a corpse."

After delivering himself thus Jack takes himself off, and, with a low gracious bow that holds in it something of sunny mockery, Maize invites Toboskie in the house.

"I will be ready in a few moments," she says, leaving him at the parlor door.

"Miss Ashhurst, let me beseech you," commences Toboskie. But "Miss Ashhurst" interrupts him with a delicious little smile, holding in it a spice of wickedness.

"Just wait a few moments, my lord," she says, sweetly, "and when we are mounted and started you shall talk as much as you please." With another smile she turns, and he stands and watches her as she flits down the hall and up the stairs.

In a few minutes she returns—a transformation has been wrought—she is dressed in a plain velvet riding-habit, which falls in long straight folds around her perfect figure; all that glittering glory of sweeping hair is folded away in decorous braids at the back of her regal head. She looks like a young Diana, and in her eyes he sees that challenging, mocking gleam that past experience tells him means war to the knife.

As she stands like a vision in the door, he goes to her, and his teeth are set tight, while his eyes blaze—that fierce, savage wrath of his nature is now at its worst.

"Miss Ashhurst, do you propose riding that horse?" His voice is very chill and low.

She raises her head with that old, haughty gesture, that even when she was a child made him thirst to conquer her. Her eyes, tranquil, steady, defiant, meet his in a vast challenge.

"I am resolved to ride him, count," she says, calmly.

He takes a step nearer her, and his hands clinch.

"Are you aware that Lord Ashhurst bought that animal out of my stables?" he inquires.

"I believe I heard something to that effect."

"Very well. Then you must know that I speak from experience, and I tell you, madam, that no woman has ever touched the back of that horse, and but very few men that he has not killed."

Upon her arm hangs her jewel-studded riding-whip; with this she stoops over and touches the pug which has already figured in this history—touches him daintily, playfully right upon his ugly, inquisitive nose. And while she thus amuses her dog, she slowly, lightly, answers her companion:

"Thank you, my Lord Toboskie, for your candor. Riding The Fiend—by-the-way, what possessed you to give him such a frightful name?—riding this terrible horse. I say, will be so much the greater distinction for me. Ah, the horses are ready. I have already grown to know The Fiend's neigh." As she speaks, the loud, clear, angry snort of a horse cleaves the fresh morning air and comes to these two belligerent people as they stand confronting one another in the rich shadows of the ancient castle.

"I am ready, my lord." Maize straightens herself and glances at her companion. He stands rooted to the spot—his magnificent figure, his stern, dark face, seem cast in bronze.

"Is it possible that you will persist in this madness?" he inquires.

"Yes, if you allude to my riding that horse," is the calm response.

Then clear and startling distinct comes his answer:

"I will not allow it."

Almost delirious in his passion, he yet sees the stately uplifting of that golden head with its proud majesty, the sudden, dangerous flash of those haughty eyes.

"By what right do you presume to control my actions?"

"By the right that any man has to save a woman from her madness, Miss Ashhurst. This fancy that has seized you is a mere braggadocio spirit, and I think if you take time to consider your action you will be ashamed of it." His tones are provokingly cool, and hold a certain contemptuous ring that lashes the girl's proud spirit to fury, though never for a moment does she lose that proud self control.

"I shall ride the horse," she says, calmly, "unless you resort to personal violence to prevent me. Are you prepared to carry your interference to that extent?"

He looks at her in indecision. In this long, vaulted old apartment of the Russian castle the light of the young day has not yet pierced; only a gray, faint light hovers around the stained windows, and further down the room hang rich masses of dusky shadow, and through this gloom he sees the proud, white majesty of her wondrous face, the steady gleaming of her eyes, the marvelous shining of her golden hair. He notes all the proud, rich curves of her majestic figure, all the soft, dazzling beauty of her face, and a passion, a perfect madness of intoxication, born of his great love, sweeps over him, accompanied always with that vast thirst to subdue and conquer her, to compel her to know no law save his will, no happiness but in his love! Even while this insane desire grows and deepens in his breast, he sees her turn and walk towards the door, with a resolution in her countenance that he knows no earthly power can lessen.

Without a word he follows. When they gain the street the horses stand in waiting in the hands of their grooms. Toboskie's mare is a beautiful thoroughbred, showing good speed and proper spirit, and a coat as white as snow. The other is a vicious looking brute, handsome, powerfully built, with a black, sleek coat, smooth limbs and a clear head, delicate, pointed ears, broad, dilated nostrils, and eyes full, lustrous, wicked, and showing that dangerous crescent of white. If anything, he stands more docile than his companion, but he looks every inch a dangerous, wicked brute, with a tigerish treachery in his present composure.

Without a shadow of fear upon her countenance, Maize advances to The Fiend and places her hand upon the broad, thick neck. The beast hails this overture with a wicked laying back of the pointed, sensitive ears, and his eyes roll fiercely.

The groom stares in affright at the young lady, and his stolid, pale face actually pales.

"For the love of God, miladie," he cries, "get away! He hates women! It is what your life is worth to go near him!"

Maize looks at the man and laughs.

"My good man," she says, calmly, "I ride this horse this morning."

In a stupor of horror and amazement the groom stares first at her and then at Toboskie, who stands pale to the lips—an agony that she cannot fail to see shining in his eyes. In this perilous moment his love has stepped upwards above every other emotion; even his thirst for victory is vanquished, and in his soul is only one aim—care for her safety. He goes to her and lays his hand upon her arm—the arm that rests upon the powerful neck of The Fiend—and his voice is gentle, pleading, humble:

"For God's sake listen to me; do not ride this horse. I acknowledge your power; I beg, I beseech of you not to ride him!"

Mortal man can say no more, she has conquered him for the moment, yet it does not suffice. She raises her eyes and in them he sees that cold, unconquerable light that he knows no pain or menace or earthly peril can vanquish; and even before she opens her lips, his sudden and unusual humility has fled, and that old, fierce passionate strife has again fastened upon him.

She does not rush into danger blindfold. She knows the madness of her resolution, is fully conscious that it may cost her her life; yet, were she sure she would be brought home a corpse, she tells herself, with a savage closing of her lips, she would ride this horse after what has passed between them. It is not foolish to say that to some natures pride is stronger than the love of life, and this woman is of that unfortunate order.

"Are we not wasting time?" she says, calmly. He is maddened beyond all semblance of control. A fierce Russian oath breaks hoarsely in his throat as he gathers her in his arms, and his eyes, hot and savage like a tiger's, gleam down in the lustrous beauty of her own. He is literally mad or he would see that he is crushing her to his breast so fiercely that her soft flesh is bruised by his roughness. For an instant, not longer, he holds her thus, and she feels the rapid pulsation of his heart; then, without an effort, so powerful is he in his magnificent manhood, he lifts her upwards and places her in the saddle.

"There!" he says, and he is panting with passion, "die if you will, but better for me if it had been long ago!" He crushes her hand in his own and then steps back. The groom, with wisdom unusual in one of his station, retains his hold upon the bit. The horse, feeling the weight of its rider, stands for an instant motionless, then slowly spreads out its great fore-legs and lowers himself with that slow, crouching motion of a tiger until its stomach almost touches the ground. Then he deliberately straightens himself and every muscle in the great body quivers, and with sheer passion, as he feels the firm, steady grasp upon the rein.

Toboskie tightens his grip upon his riding whip, and, ready for action, stands watching the brute with a falcon eye. But as it shows no further signs of evil, he mounts his own steed, the groom releases The Fiend's bridle, they start on a smart trot down the street, the two horses side by side.

So long as they remain in the city The Fiend is irreproachable in conduct, and Toboskie begins to breath freer. But when they reach the open country the devil crops forth in his every motion; he rears, he plunges, he goes in every possible direction but the proper one, absolutely refusing to advance straight forward. In a hundred fiendish antics he endeavors to free himself of his rider, who keeps a steady seat under what is sufficient to throw the best rider in Europe.

A savage, reluctant admiration is wrung from Toboskie's soul at her fearlessness. Yet he fears for her—he, the haughty and indomitable noble, fears for this brave, dauntless, exasperating life that is to lay waste his own. But what is the use of prolonging this history of a girl's madness? There could be but one possible result. Weary with his ineffectual efforts to unseat his rider, and driven furious by a stinging, but imprudent, blow from Maize, whose soul possesses but little patience, The Fiend, with a savage snort, throws himself with all his force sidewise in the path.

A dizzy, blinding faintness seizes Toboskie. He expects she is crushed to death—all that soft, dazzling, wondrous beauty mangled in the dust. And God knows what saved her! When the mist clears from his eyes he sees that The Fiend is already upon his feet some distance off, standing viewing his prostrate rider. He springs from his saddle and staggers to her, prepared for a ghastly spectacle. To his surprise he meets her eyes, filled with consciousness and a glad, wild light unmistakable—pure love of life, sheer glory in existence. Then it slowly dawns upon him that this life, so precious to him, has not been cut off—has not been blotted out from the living.

"I felt him going and jumped," she explains, coolly; "consequently he only fell upon my arm."

Without a word—he cannot yet speak—he stoops and raises her. Then he sees that she is pale and faint, and one arm hangs limp by her side, though that great, glad light still shines in her eyes. He glares murderously at The Fiend.

"Don't blame him," she says, and tries to laugh. "He has treated me much better than I expected. I am thankful for my escape. I must confess I fully expected to be taken back a corpse. As it is, only my arm is broken."

Still Toboskie is silent, and again he glances at the horse with a menace of vengeance. And again Maize says:

"Don't blame him——"

"I shall kill him!" he interrupts her, and even his lips are pale with passion.

"Then that would be unjust, and I hate injustice," she cries. "I do not profess to be angelic. You know that a Greek could be nothing but swift and revengeful where vengeance is righteous." She lifts her head proudly at these miserable, fatal words, and he realizes that from her race it is natural for her to have inherited a peculiar temperament; "but in this case vengeance would not be just, for I, knowing the nature of this horse, deliberately ran the risk of riding him."

He looks at her curiously.

"Perhaps," he says, "you feel more inclined to kill me?"

"No," she replies, quietly. "I have a horror of bloodshed."

"I have a horror of murder," he observes, "but of bloodshed none. You know my race have all been rather desperate dare-devils. I believe that there are often insults offered, wrong done, that only blood can wipe away; it is the creed of our family, and I see no harm in an open warfare. But for the coward—be it man or woman—who would steal unawares to his victim and strike the fatal blow in secret, who would show his adversary no mercy, no chance for life, for such a dastard the ax is too good! But what a remarkable conversation," he continues. "You are suffering intensely. My God! what tempted you to ride the brute?"

"Perhaps you will never know," she replies, lowly, so low that he fails to catch her words.

"If you will sit here and wait for me, I will tie the horses and search for help. There must be a cottage around here somewhere."

She nods her head and he soon disappears. She is growing faint with pain when he returns with the information that his search has been successful.

All day long she stays in the cottage, and Toboskie never leaves her side. He is gentle, reverential, tender; she sees him in an entirely new phase, while through all his quiet and unobtrusive devotion runs a vein of passionate, immutable love.

A doctor comes out from Petersburg whence he has been summoned and sets her arm. The family have been duly notified of the accident, which notification brings Jack post-haste to the cottage nearly frantic with fright. And in the sunset Maize and Toboskie are driven back to Petersburg. Jack rides his friend's horse, while a servant follows in the rear leading The Fiend.

Just as they are about to enter the city Maize touches Toboskie's arm and points to the west, which is suffused with an angry crimson glow.

"What does it look like?" he murmurs, after a moment's silent contemplation.

And she shudders as she answers, "Blood!"

CHAPTER XX.—THE SECRET OF THE PAST.

"AND now," says Lagors, who reclines upon a divan, his haggard face looking more shrunken and wretched in the light of the burning tapers, and turning his weary, restless eyes upon Count Toboskie, "and now you have my history. Can you ever again take me by the hand?"

For an instant Toboskie is strongly tempted to answer "No." There is a strong, fierce passion in his eyes for this man—this self-confessed sensualist—and every nerve in his magnificent frame quivers with rage and excitement. But his thoughts are all of her—this soft, dazzling, wondrous woman, who has entered into his heart for all eternity, and an agony of horror and pity seizes him, not for himself but for her.

He thinks of the gay, royal, haughty life of this girl, by nature and rearing a passionate aristocrat. Yet this life, for the vile lust, the sensual weakness of a rotten and dead-and-gone passion, is branded with illegitimacy—is the price of sin, the offspring of hazard.

A shudder seizes him and he is weak and faint even in his magnificent manhood. For himself it matters not: he comes of the haughtiest and most powerful line of noblemen in his country, yet all the same he would take this girl, all stricken with shame and shorn of the proud purple of aristocracy—he would take her to his breast, shielding her with his love, protecting her with the proud name he bears. It is always for her that he grieves.

"Can you still claim me as your friend? Oh, my God! you can't loath me more than I loath myself!"

The hoarse, unsteady voice breaks in upon his meditation, and rouses him from his stupor of horror and amazement. His eyes, with their shrinking pain and hatred, fasten upon that miserable wreck—this man, for whom, through many years, has burned a steady friendship—and that fierce, murderous rage, that savage thirst for his blood, dies quickly out. He sees that remorse has taken vengeance out of his hand, that the wrongs of the helpless are being avenged by that most relentless of all avengers—the consciousness of guilt.

"It is not for me to sit in judgment upon the actions of my fellows. I am not free from guilt myself."

His voice is quiet, but he cannot yet, with the fierce pangs of this revelation so new, force it to be friendly. And in his soul is a consciousness that, with all the lust and excesses that necessarily mark his life, spent as it has been in a gay and sensual court, he could never allow his honor to be stained as in his eyes the honor of this man is shadowed.

Lagors raises his thin hand and brushes back from his brow the heavy locks whose lustrous black is speedily changing to gray.

"But I am being punished," he says, and his voice is dry and hard. "For all my wrongs I am being punished. I love Claire Ashhurst—love her as never man loved woman before. I cannot live without her! and I will not!"

He rises and paces the floor, his hands locked upon his brow.

Then into the eyes of Toboskie sweeps a lion's wrath, not so much for this man as for that soulless, brainless thing, all bright brown hair and smiling lips, and sunny eyes, and soft, white limbs—that sensual, foul, rotten thing that Jack Ashhurst has made his wife!

"Have you told Maize yet?" he asks.

Lagors stops with a start of terror.

"No!" he cries, "and do you never mention it. I would not have told you if I thought you would not keep my confidence sacred." He catches Toboskie by the hand, and his restless, fiery eyes hold a great prayer. "Swear," he says, "swear by your hopes of heaven never to breathe this subject to any living creature!"

Toboskie rises haughtily; in his eyes is a cold and dangerous gleam, though his voice is chill and quiet.

"You have known me long enough to know that my word is sacred, and I pledge it that I will not betray your confidence."

"Thank you." Lagors's voice is husky in its emotion. "I would sooner lose my right hand than injure or offend Gypsy."

A hard, bitter smile flits over the fine, satirical lips of the statesman, but he is silent. It is always of her that Lagors thinks—that treacherous, faithless, brainless creature, with her angel face and soul of hideous blackness—but never of that strong, free, spotless soul that sooner or later must be crushed by their guilt, or of that proud English nobleman who, in all faith and love, has taken that viper to his breast.

"Raoul, speak to me—advise me. I believe I am going mad!"

Lagors's miserable voice again rouses Toboskie. He raises his dark, stormy face, and looks at the stricken wreck of a man before him.

"I can advise you in no way," he says, and his voice is chill with a mortal coldness. A bitterness worse than death has fastened upon him. Despite this mutual strife between them, all the faith, the loyalty, the grandeur of his soul have centred in his love for this girl. He adores her with a strength of passion that has never touched the mad, fleeting, sensual lust of Lagors for that wanton creature. Maize's cause is his, always must be, though she deny him the right—that holy right for which he yearns—of protecting her. And he knows that the bitterest wrong has been done her that can be done by human agency, and that savage lust of his race still struggles hard in his breast—that race that ever spilled blood as quickly as water if it were to avenge the cause of the helpless, or to wipe out a wrong done to the women of their love. "I can advise you in no way. It seems to me it is not a question of advice or indecision, but of honor. This woman is the wife of one of England's proudest peers, a man who has opened his doors to you, and whose hospitality you have accepted. His wife should be sacred to you!"

A delirous madness fills Lagors's eyes, though his voice is calmer than it has been during this fatal interview—calm with a hard, dogged resolution that amazes Toboskie, whose own honor is dearer to him than his life.

"See here, Toboskie," he says, and his tones are low, "a man who is dying with love for a woman, who would give that woman his life, his soul, his earthly all—such a man is mad; and honor does not count much with fools and madmen!"

His hand falls heavily upon Toboskie's shoulder, and his breath breaks from him in great, labored gasps.

"I believe you are mad," says Toboskie, looking at him steadily.

"I am!—mad for her—that soft, dazzling, maddening creature who does not care one sou whether I live or die."

Again he tosses the damp hair from his brow with that weary, despairing gesture, and paces the floor with a staggering, uncertain step. In a few moments he again pauses before his companion; his eyes are brighter, madder than before.

"I have brought trouble," he says, in that hard, drawn voice, "to many a trusting woman. I have been a curse, a misery, a darkness on their lives for ever. But for all that I have ever done I am being repaid in this hour. I suffer as the damned cannot suffer!"

"I should advise you," says Toboskie, after a pause, "to get away from Russia as soon as possible. When a man knows where danger lies, it is best for him to shun it. The only course left for you is to get away from this woman and never look upon her fatal face again."

Digitized by Google

"You conjure me to do this—you, who know what love is?" cries Lagors, and there is a shrill ring of pain in his voice. The steady, fine muscles about Toboskie's lips relax slightly.

"Yes," he says, "I know what love is, but, as God is my judge, I would not buy it with my honor," and he believes that he speaks the truth.

"Honor!" cries Lagors, "what is honor to love? I tell you that Claire Ashhurst shall be mine!"

Toboskie is a thorough man of the world. He has had his own liaisons, and known of them in others, but he has never injured any man whose hand he has taken in friendship. Therefore, he recoils from Lagors as if he had been stung.

"What!" he mutters. "You would win her from her husband!"

"I would and I will, if possible!" is the steady answer.

"Then I have taken your hand for the last time."

They stood confronting one another like wild brutes, a dogged, sullen resolution in the eyes of one, a fiery scorn and indignation in the other.

"So be it," says Lagors, after a long silence. "I have sold my honor. I am willing to lose my friend for Jack Ashhurst's wife. It is not the first time that a man has staked his all for a woman!"

"Then it only remains for me to bid you good-by." They bow coldly to one another—these men between whom has been a friendship firm and true—and in the next moment a distance and silence comes between them that never again will be abridged or broken.

In the evening Toboskie takes Maize to a state ball. He is weary with state cares, oppressed with dim forbodings of the future, and a recollection of that revelation so recent, regretful of the friendship broken. Yet above every other emotion rises that fierce and torturing jealousy as he sees the ardent glances of admiration elicited by the rich and wondrous loveliness of this girl whom he has constituted his idol.

She is courted, pampered, worshiped by that throng of Russian nobles, and it maddens him; and he swears that this night shall not pass without his telling his love, and gaining that right of cherishing her for himself, of claiming her before the world; or, if he is destined to be refused, of knowing and accepting his fate. In that case, he will go far away where the sight of her wondrous glory will never dazzle and madden him more.

As he wraps the royal ermine around her tall, proud form, and hands her to the carriage in the "wee sma' hours" of the night, he looks piteously, almost beseechingly in her eyes. Through the gloom she sees the feverish fire of that strange glance, and a half-terror of what she feels is to come seizes her.

"May I ride home with you?" His voice is low and a trifle hoarse, as he bends eagerly forward awaiting her answer.

She is silent; that demon of pride and perversity has seized her, and she looks down at him with a sunny, alluring light in her wondrous eyes, though her lips resolutely remain closed.

Over the dark, haughty face of the Russian statesman sweeps a swift pallor; always this strife between them; almost he wearies of it, even though at this moment that swift rage fills his breast, and mingles with that fierce and passionate love for this woman.

He reaches further over, and his grasp falls with unconscious force upon the small, bare hand that lies in her lap, while his eyes, darkening with passion, look upwards into the rich, Greek beauty of her dazzling face.

"May I ride home with you?" The words are still couched in the form of a request, but the spirit of a fiery command rings out in his voice and shows in his pallid countenance.

"No!" The single word is launched forth in unconscious scorn and disdain, as the proud spirit of the girl rises in arms at his tone.

He stands for a moment in silence, his eyes, hot and lurid, like a tiger's, fastened upon her face, and fearless as she is by nature, upon her briefly fastens a sudden dread of the mad passion she has enkindled. Then, in the delirious excitement of the moment, he gives way to a weakness, which, an hour afterwards, he blushes for—he, this polished courtier, this haughty statesman, deliberately enters her carriage, closes the door, and commands the coachman to drive home.

For a moment the girl is too amazed to speak, and stares at him silently. Then into her eyes flashes the fiercest scorn that he has ever seen even in her. She settles herself back in the carriage and devotes herself to looking out in the dark, damp streets where the rain is falling fast. And all the while the man's great, angry, passion-lit eyes devour her as she sits in her calm, cold contempt. At last his low, intense voice rouses her and compels her attention.

"I had no right to do what I did. You are a woman; but if you were a man, by heaven I would have killed you ere this!"

She smiles, a slow, mocking smile, even while yet through the carriage floats his voice with its fierce, passionate pain. Oh, she can be very pitiless, this girl, with her soft, Grecian loveliness.

"You drive me to it," he continues, in that swift, panting tone—"you drive me to it with your mockery and defiance, with you sorceress's beauty, that has made me drunk like wine! I sought you to-night as any man would seek the woman he loves. I begged your permission to accompany you home. Why did you refuse? It would have cost you nothing!"

"I refused, Count Toboskie, because in my country, women have that right, which is also a sufficient reason," she answers, haughtily.

"And men have rights," he retorts, fiercely, "one of which is to plead their cause and to be treated, at least, with consideration from the women they love. I sought you to-night to tell you my love——"

His whole being runs rife with passion. Yet there is something in her eyes and in the gesture, as she raises her hand, that stops his passionate utterance.

"Count Toboskie," she says, and her voice is like steel, "you have forced your society upon me after I gave you every reason to know that it was objectionable. If I had any way of ridding myself of it, believe me, I should have done so long ago. Do you furthermore intend to distinguish yourself by compelling me to listen to a subject that is distasteful, and, under the circumstances, an insult?"

He falls back as if he was shot, and in his eyes comes a great, shrinking pain and fear. She has dealt him a mortal blow now.

"Is it true," he mutters, and a blinding, dizzy pain is upon him—"is it true that my love is distasteful to you?" Looking at her sharply, breathlessly, he sees the steady glory of her eyes falter, and a rosy flush steal upwards over her countenance, and his steady, despairing torture lessens. She sees the brightness that sweeps like a vail of glory over his dark and majestic face, and that accursed pride takes root again. She lifts her head with that haughty, stag-like grace, and the flush dies slowly off her face.

"We will not discuss the subject if I still have any control over myself, though it is scarcely to be supposed that a prisoner will be allowed such a liberty—by the captor." Her tones are haughty and arrogant. He looks at her in all her insolent young beauty, and again that desperate, murderous wrath runs rife in his being. Then, turning away and opening the carriage door, he leaps out in the street. For a moment she sees his burning, lurid eyes—sees them through the storm and wind and darkness, then the carriage whirls on, and, faint and exhausted, she sinks back in the seat.

(To be continued.)

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.

THE University of the South is situated upon the western brow of the Cumberland tableland, in Middle Tennessee. Buried in the mountain forest, and without the usual surroundings of an institution of learning, to the careless observer its existance is an enigma. To the thoughtful, however, its isolation will indicate a wise purpose, and in its existence will be exemplified the truth that a great conception embodying the aspirations of a people though long unrealized, can never perish.

The motive of the institution can be explained only by its history. As a clearly defined idea, the University had its birth in the year 1857; at that time the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the ten States south of Virginia met and gave the conception form. Realizing the necessity for a great centre of learning in their midst, where, under Christian guidance, the highest and most liberal education could be offered to the young of the South, they projected a scheme as magnificent in its proportions as it was lofty in its aims. Recognizing in the rapid growth of physical science the source of new modes of thought against which Christian truth must be maintained, they determined to meet the issue by offering the most thorough education in every branch of science. Abiding in the faith of an eternal harmony between the spiritual and physical manifestations of God to man, they judged that erroneous thought could best be met by widest knowledge. For the execution of this design their preparations were ample. It was determined that at once an endowment of $3,000,000 should be raised for the establishment of a great university, and that, if necessary, this sum should be ultimately increased. In order that a perfect organization should be attained, every university, European or American, was scrutinized and measured; and, as the result of much thought and investigation, an outline was finally adopted for the organization of the University of the South.

In this plan thirty separate schools were completed, each with its own corps of professors, and in each school preparation was made for thorough instruction and original research. By the laity of the church the plan was heartily indorsed, and a few months saw subscriptions to the amount of $600,000 placed at the disposal of the trustees. In the selection of a site for the University three considerations guided the founders: First, the position must be central and easily accessible; secondly, it must have pure air and water and perfect health; thirdly, it must be remote from city or town, and be situated upon its own domain where it could mold its own surroundings and be itself the centre of influence. These several requisites were adjudged as best fulfilled by a site upon the western brow of the Cumberland plateau in Tennessee. Here, two thousand feet above the sea, in direct railroad communication with all parts of the country, was found a spot equi-distant from the cities of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and the trans-Mississippi States. In this region, above malarial influences, abounding in pure freestone water and bathed in a bracing atmosphere, a domain of ten thousand acres was offered and accepted, and in the then mountain wilderness the University of the South was founded to create for itself a habitation and a name. Before a large concourse of prominent citizens, assembled from every quarter of the South, the corner-stone of the University was laid, with imposing ceremonies, in the Autumn of 1860. So far had the undertaking progressed when it was arrested by the war. If at the beginning of the war the necessity for such an institution was apparent, it was seen to be doubly so at its close. Although all endowment had been swept away, the original domain was still available, and the conception still lived. By the survivors of the original Board of Trustees steps were immediately taken to re-establish the institution. In the year 1868 a beginning was made, which, though humble in its pretensions, yet served to reawaken in the minds of churchmen their duty to the cause of Christian education. This was made possible through the personal efforts of the Rt. Rev. C. T. Quintard, in England; by this devoted churchman sufficient money was raised to warrant the organization of a corps of instructors and the beginning of instruction. Since that date to the present time the progress of the University has been uninterrupted; 1,994 students have matriculated in its schools, while its numbers have averaged over 200 per annum; its corps of instructors has strengthened, and its degrees are valued throughout the South as warrants of sound and thorough education.

Resting upon the carboniferous conglomerate and sandstones which cap the Cumberland tableland, the health of the University site is perfect. Its supply of cold, freestone water is abundant, and chalybeate and mineral water add to its attractions as a resort for health during the heats of Summer.

But two permanent University buildings have as yet been completed: the one, St. Luke's Memorial Hall, a fine stone building, erected through a donation of $30,000 for that purpose by Mrs. Louis Malingault, of South Carolina; the other, the Hodgson Library, the gift of the present Vice-Chancellor, the Rev. Telfair Hodgson, D. D. The other buildings are temporary structures, in use until returning prosperity shall enable the friends of Christian education to express their zeal in works.

Access to Sewanee—the post-office village that has sprung up around the University—is had by the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis Railroad, to Cowan, from which station the road of the Tennessee Coal and Railroad Company passes through Sewanee on the University domain.

SURRENDER OF HOSTILE SIOUX.

ON Monday, June 14th, a body of five hundred of Sitting Bull's Sioux surrendered at Fort Keogh to General Miles. They came from the British possessions, where starvation for the tribe seems impending. These are the results of General Miles's work for the past four years. He has fought them when necessary, has avoided it when unnecessary, treating them humanely when they had surrendered—a fact which the Sioux now appreciate. They declined to surrender except to his force at Keogh. The Sioux who surrendered in 1877 under his terms, and who have been under his supervision since, are prosperous and contented. Their fair treatment no doubt led to the latter surrender, and will probably tend to the ultimate surrender to him of thousands of the once hostile Sioux.

Our illustration represents this band crossing the Yellowstone previous to the surrender. The cluster of tents is General Miles's village of Indian scouts, situated some two miles above Fort Keogh.

HON. ALBERT G. PORTER.

ALBERT G. PORTER, Republican candidate for Governor of Indiana, was born at Lawrenceburg, Ind., April 26th, 1824, at which place he lived until over twenty years of age. He attended college at Hanover, and afterwards at Asbury University, Greencastle, where he graduated in 1843, during the presidency of Bishop Simpson. He studied law at Lawrenceburg, and afterwards went to Indianapolis, where he has ever since resided. He was admitted to the Bar in 1845, and began the practice of law. He was chosen city attorney, and for several years was a member of the Common Council of Indianapolis. He was appointed reporter of the Supreme Court in Judge Blackford's time, and published five volumes of reports. His first law partner was his father-in-law, Hiram Brown, one of the pioneers of the Bar in Central Indiana. Afterwards he was a partner of Hon. Lucian Barbour, of that city, and this connection continued until the election of Mr. Barbour to Congress in 1854. Mr. Porter then became a partner of Hon. David McDonald, and this connection continued until the election of Mr. Porter to Congress in 1858, when he defeated Hon. Martin M. Ray, of Shelbyville, Democrat, by 10,776 votes to 9,736; was re-elected to Congress in 1860 over Robert L. Walpole, Democrat, receiving 13,029 votes to Mr. Walpole's 11,877, and served in Congress during the stormy period of the first months of the civil war. The interests of his family required him to decline the proposition of a renomination for Congress, and, coming home, Judge McDonald invited him to renew the law partnership, an invitation which Mr. Porter esteemed a genuine compliment and gladly accepted. This partnership continued until the appointment, by President Lincoln, of Judge McDonald to the position of United States District Judge of Indiana. Mr. Porter was afterwards in partnership with Mr. W. P. Fishback; and when General Ben Harrison returned home after service in the army, he became a member of the firm, which existed for a number years. He was afterwards a member of the law firm of Porter, Harrison & Hines, and continued in active practice until he was appointed to the position he now holds. Mr. Porter was a candidate for Presidential Elector on the Hayes ticket in 1876, and in March, 1878, he was appointed by President Hayes First Comptroller of the Treasury, which position he has ever since held. He has been continuously engaged in the practice of the law up to the time of the appointment last mentioned, except when this practice was interrupted by his two terms in Congress. He has been an active member of the Republican Party since its organization, having cast his lot with it primarily on account of his emphatic opposition to the extension of slavery.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

Mr. Frank Buckland has been awarded a gold medal and a decorated diploma of honor by the authorities of the Berlin International Fishery Exhibition.

The Climate of North Africa might, thinks Dr. Theobald Fischer, be more easily improved by the planting of forests than by forming an inland sea.

After Careful Examination Dr. Trautmann arrives at the conclusion that no process hitherto invented will keep iron effectively and durably from rust.

The Constructors of the railway up Mount Vesuvius have adopted the American double iron rope system as the best means for raising and lowering the trains.

There can no longer be any doubt that the alligator does exist in the Old World, as two fine specimens taken from the Yang-tse-kiang are now in the Berlin Zoological Museum.

Mr. Carl Bock has lately returned to London after his journeys in Borneo, bringing with him a magnificent series of portraits of the native tribes of that island—both Dyaks and forest people—taken in water colors. These are to be reproduced, at the expense of the Dutch Government, by chromolithography, and will illustrate his report on the journey, which is to be read in the first instance before the Royal Geographical and Anthropological Society of Holland. Pending the publication of this report, Mr. Bock refrains, at the desire of the Dutch Government, from anticipating it in England even by a preliminary sketch.

Amongst the peculiar institutions of Paris are the street astronomers, who exhibit through their telescopes the moon, sun-spots, comets' tails, and other celestial objects, according to circumstances. The charges vary from two cents in the suburbs to ten cents on the Place de la Concorde or the Place Vendôme, where the instruments are not unworthy of a regular observatory. At the last monthly meeting of the scientific journalists, M. Flammarion read an address sent to him by these itinerant teachers of the marvels of the heavens. They state that from the beginning of the publication of the Astronomie Populaire the number of their customers has more than doubled.

Signor Cristoforo Negri, President of the Italian Geographical Society, and member of the Geographical Society of London, has just published an interesting pamphlet at Genoa, in which he warmly advocates the proposed Italian Antarctic expedition. He demonstrates the importance not only to science, but probably also to trade, of such an expedition. A special circumstance increases the desirability of this Italian Antarctic expedition. In 1882 the transit of Venus will again occur, but after that not again for a hundred years. The Italian expedition, therefore, finding itself in 1882 at some point of the Antarctic circle, would be able to observe this phenomenon under favorable conditions.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. TENNYSON is taking a long journey through Italy and Switzerland.

SENATOR DAVID DAVIS is now at his home in Illinois, and is said to be seriously ill.

THE REV. DR. C. H. TOY has been appointed Hancock Professor of Oriental Languages at Harvard.

MR. CORCORAN, of Washington, and Peter Cooper, of New York, both of whom have been very ill of late, are believed to have fully recovered.

THE will of General John Alfred Hazard, admitted to probate at Newport, R. I., on July 12th, leaves an estate of over $200,000, almost wholly to the Newport Hospital.

THE President has appointed Orange Judd, of New York, and of the American Agriculturist, to be a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners, vice Barstow, resigned.

GENERAL HANCOCK is reported to be a rich man. Besides all his other property in Missouri, he has some excellent coal mines, which he refuses to sell, and does not at present care to open.

PRESIDENT HAYES has signed the commission of John B. Neil, of Salt Lake City, Utah, as Governor of the Territory of Idaho, vice Mason Brayman, whose commission will expire July 23d.

PROFESSOR S. F. BAIRD, of the United States Fish Commission, is to commence work at Newport, R. I., at once. Articles used in scientific research have arrived, and the necessary buildings have been rented.

THE sureties of General Hartranft justified in the required sum before the United States Commissioner on July 12th, and subsequently General Hartranft took the oath of office as Collector of the Port of Philadelphia.

NAIB MAHOMET, bearer of a letter from Queen Victoria to King John, has returned to Cairo, and reports that he was well received. The king informed him that he was desirous of maintaining friendly relations with Egypt.

JUDGE WILLIAM LAWRENCE, ex-member of Congress from the Fourth District of Ohio, has accepted the position of First Comptroller of the Treasury, made vacant by Judge Porter, the Republican candidate for Governor of Indiana.

LIEUTENANT FRANCIS V. GREEN, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, who was the American military attaché with the Grand Duke Nicholas during the late Russo-Turkish war, and author of the work entitled "The Russian Army and its Late Campaign in Turkey," has been decorated with the Order of the Star of Roumania.

REV. EDWARD EGGLESTON has been climbing Alpine passes in company with his daughters and Professor Northrop of Geneva, the son of Mr. B. G. Northrop, Secretary of the Board of Education of Connecticut; and Dr. Eggleston's friends will be glad to know that his health is greatly improved, so greatly, indeed, that he has recently been able to do some literary work.

HENRI ROCHEFORT arrived in Paris on July 12th. Six thousand persons welcomed him and cheered him enthusiastically. He was escorted to his hotel by crowds singing the "Marseillaise" and shouting "Long live Rochefort!" His new journal, L'Intransigeant, sold 198,000 copies the first day of its publication. Rochefort declares that he intends to demolish M. Gambetta.

JEFFERSON DAVIS has presented to the City of New Orleans, in compliance with the request of the late Mrs. Sarah A. Dorsey, who left him her estate, a painting representing Anne of Austria exhibiting the portrait of her son, Louis XIV., to the French people. The artist was Pierre Mignard, court painter of Louis XIV. The State of Louisiana was named after "La Grand Monarque."

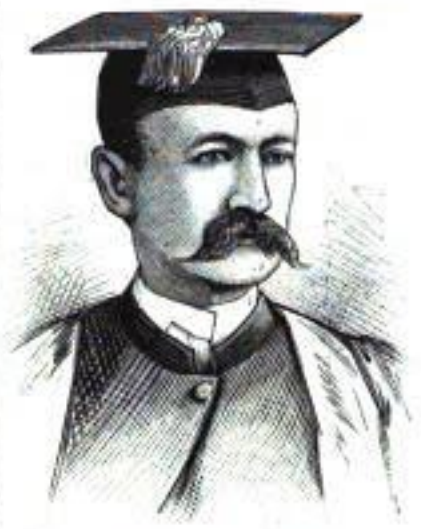
THE Marquis of Ripon, the new Viceroy of India, reached Bombay on the 31st of May, and was heartily welcomed. In reply to an address from the Municipal Corporation he made a brief speech, in which he expressed the hope that God would grant India a respite from the famines from which of late years she has suffered so heavily, and said also that he would use his best endeavors to bring the Afghan war to an early and honorable end.

CAPTAIN EADS, California's new Consulting Engineer, has gone to that State, and will begin his work by making a thorough examination of the Sacramento River. He has declined the proposition of Dom Pedro to accept the charge of the Brazilian Engineering Department, recommending, however, an American engineer, who has been appointed. Captain Eads expects to return from California in August, and will possibly go to his work in Portugal in the Autumn.

THE total destruction of the private library at Berlin of Professor Christian Matthias Theodor Mommsen, must be regarded as a serious loss to the world of letters. The library of the great historian of Rome, although it contained 40,000 volumes, was not numerically as large as some other private libraries in Germany—notably that of the Prince von Oettingen, at Wallerstein, in Bavaria, which contains over 160,000 volumes, or of Prince Thurn, at Hallsbon, which has nearly the same number; but it was unusually rich in rare editions, and it possessed the exceptional value which attaches to all special collections made by men of erudition for a special purpose.

AMONG recent deaths we note those of Professor John C. Bull, for twenty five years an instructor in the Hartford Deaf and Dumb Asylum, on July 11th; the Rev. John Cole Miller, D. D., select preacher to the University of Oxford, July 11th, aged 65; David L. Seymour, a prominent manufacturer of Peekskill, N. Y., and at one time warden of Sing Sing Prison, 11th, aged 75; Pierre Paul de Pommayrac, celebrated French painter, 11th, aged 62; Isaac Pereire, the French banker, 11th, aged 74; Tom Taylor, the popular English dramatist, 12th, aged 63; General Nelson Sheerman, of Brooklyn, N. Y., 12th, aged 60; Andrew T. Pillot, one of the oldest members of the New York Cotton Exchange, 12th, aged 84; General John A. Campbell, a veteran of the war, ex-Governor of Wyoming, and one of the Assistant Secretaries of State at Washington, 14th, aged 46; the Rev. William C. Wisner, D. D., long a prominent clergyman in Western New York, at Lockport, 14th; Herman Grotta, for fifty one years an active bookbinder of New York City, 12th, aged 75.

PROFESSOR WALTER Q. SCOTT, of the Wooster University at Ohio, who has been obliged to resign his chair on account of accumulations of heresy, was formerly pastor of the Arch Street Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. Before settling in that city he was a professor in Lafayette College, where he was universally liked by the faculty and students. He is a man of great physical courage, as well as moral courage, as an accident which happened in a coal mine near Easton several years ago illustrates. There had been an explosion of fire-damp at the foot of the shaft when the first car was lowered in the morning. Those who had gone down in the car were in great danger of their lives, and not one of the miners assembled at the mouth of the shaft could be induced to go to their rescue. Professor Scott, who was passing by at the time, learned of the accident, and himself went to the rescue. He descended the shaft, filled the men into the car, and was then pulled up, all the men being unconscious, and Professor Scott himself nearly overcome by the gas.



Digitized by Google

GENERAL E. KIRBY SMITH.

VIEW OF THE UNIVERSITY BUILDINGS.

VICE-CHANCELLOR HODGSON.

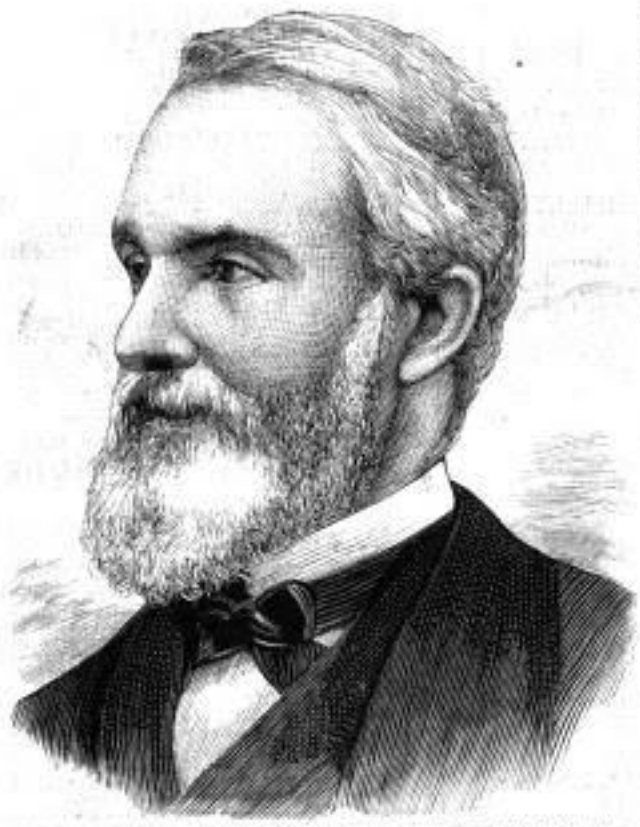
RESIDENCE OF BISHOP QUINTARD.

THE HODGSON LIBRARY.

RESIDENCE OF REV. MR. HODGSON.

THE CLASS UNIFORM.

ST. LUKE'S HALL.



THE CADET UNIFORM.

VIEW OF THE COUNTRY AROUND THE UNIVERSITY BUILDINGS.

TENNESSEE.—THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH, AT SEWANEE, FRANKLIN COUNTY.—FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER, AND PHOTOGRAPHS BY C. S. JUDD.—SEE PAGE 371.

Digitized by Google

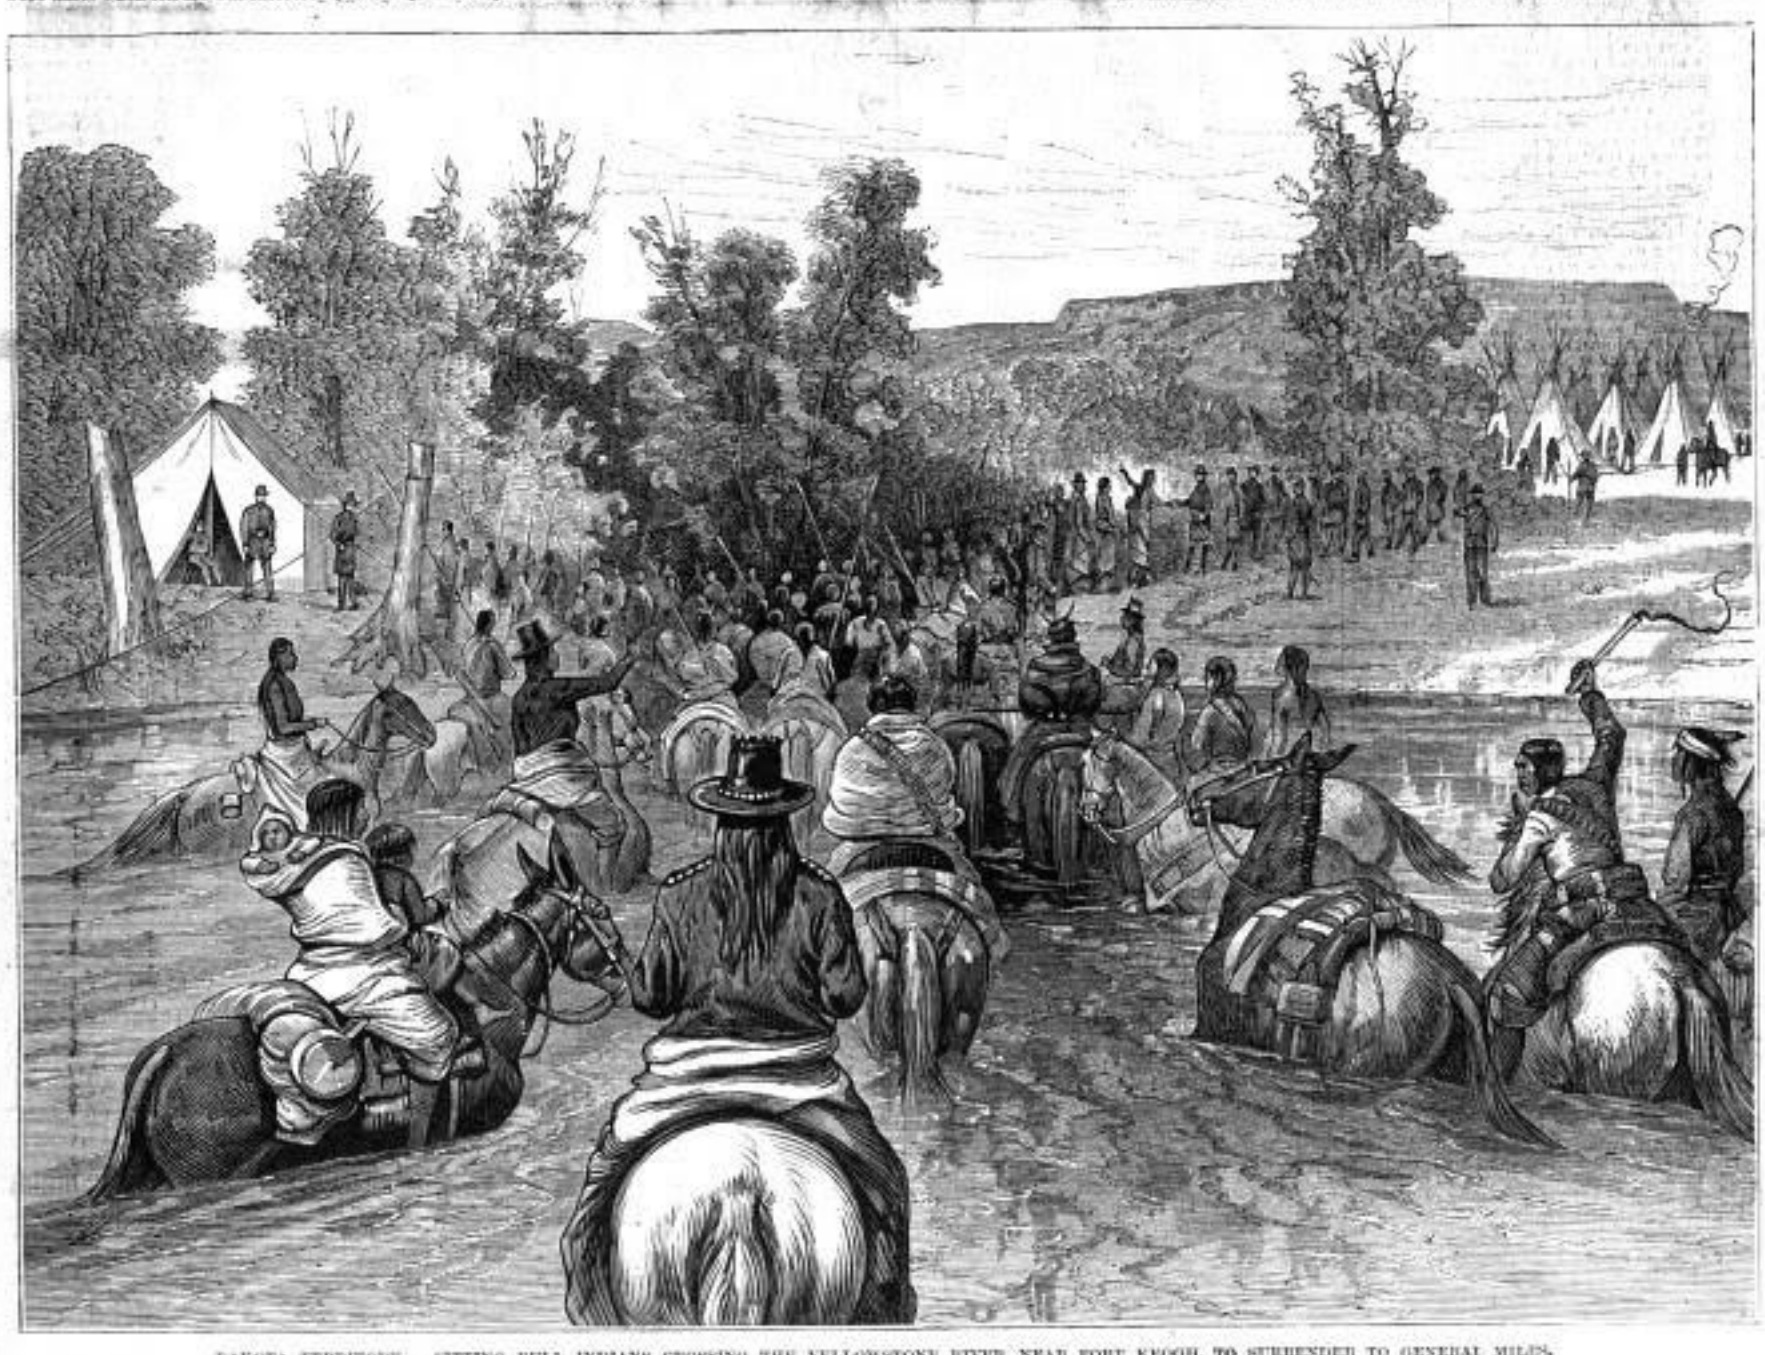
M. PAUL ARMAND CHALLEMEL-LACOUR, NEW FRENCH MINISTER TO ENGLAND.

M. CHALLEMEL-LACOUR.

CHALLEMEL-LACOUR, the new French Ambassador to Great Britain, is said to be one of the most erudite gentlemen in Europe. In a country where scholarship is somewhat high, he has attained a reputation for his acquirements which would place him in the front rank among any community of learned men whatsoever. He was one of the first of the many brilliant scholars sent forth by the Lycée St. Louis, and became professor of philosophy at the famous school of Pau when only twenty-two years old. Here, and afterwards at Limoges, whither he was transferred in 1851, he became noted for his Republican opinions, and few young men could clothe the doctrines which have been popular in France for three generations in more forcible and academic language. His patriotism and eloquence, and also, it may be added, his youth and inexperience, brought down upon him their natural consequences, and he was one of the first of that band of eminent men who incurred the displeasure of the desperate and adventurous intriguers who planned the Second Empire. A man who was so active and so able with his pen could not expect to escape annoyance from his political opponents, and in 1868 Challemel-Lacour was again prosecuted for the part he took in the Baudin subscription business. Still, nothing could daunt his courage or obscure his talents. Whenever his work as a journalist grew slack, he was busy with something else, and though the range of his capabilities extended over the arts, theatrical criticisms, foreign literature and political philosophy, there were times when leisure was enforced upon him. In such spare hours he wrote his fine essay on Humboldt, and his correct and admirable translation of Ritter's "History of Philosophy." He also edited the works of Mme. d'Epinay. At last there came a time when the genius, wit and fortitude of this brilliant gentleman and scholar were publicly acknowledged. Within a few days after the revolution of the 4th of September, 1870, he was named Prefect of the Rhone and Commissioner Extraordinary for the Republic. He filled these difficult and important functions during the whole of the remaining time that the war lasted; and he did so in such a manner as to win the warm regard and personal friendship of Gambetta. It was he and M. Allain Targé, and M. Banc, who were the original founders and editors of the République Française, which has certainly done more than any other journal to secure the signal triumph of the Liberal cause. It was the unvarying sympathy and support which Gambetta received from these invincible champions of his policy which enabled the present President of the Chamber to hold his own against the tremendous attacks of M. de Fourtou and M. de Broglie.

THE LATE PHELIM TOOLE.

IT has been a very long time since any passing event has created so profound an impression in St. Louis as the death of Phelim Toole, the captain of the Pompier corps of the Fire Department. He was the hero of a hundred reckless exploits, which had made him famous far and near. There was no dizzy height between heaven and earth within the limits reached by modern architecture at which he had not saved human life; yet the hero perished ignobly July 6th, his life being literally jolted out of him by the explosion of an infernal machine in a smoky cellar. Fire had been discovered in the block next to No. 6 engine house, where the Pompier corps is stationed, and as soon as word was sent, Austin Shea, of the hook and ladder boys,



THE LATE PHELIM TOOLE, OF THE ST. LOUIS FIRE DEPARTMENT.

HON. ALBERT G. PORTER, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.—SEE PAGE 371.

picked up a Holloway extinguisher, and, followed by Phelim Toole, Assistant Chief John Lindsay and Tom Finnerty, ran through the alley to the rear of the house. Shea prepared the extinguisher for use, while Phelim and Finnerty ran down into the cellar, which was full of smoke. Shea then handed the extinguisher to Toole, who, to avoid the smoke, ran in a stooping position until he got to the centre. He then stooped still further to put the machine on the ground, when it exploded almost in his arms. The gas blew out the bottom of the cylinder, and then reacted by making the whole of the heavy machine raise and strike him in the chest. Toole was bent over it, and the brass cock on the top of the extinguisher crushed in a section of the breastbone, breaking the ribs just over the heart. He uttered a cry, and was almost instantly dragged out by his comrades, but died while being carried into a neighboring warehouse. The soldering in the extinguisher was found to have been defective. The fire amounted to nothing. Toole was thirty-two years old. He was born in the parish of Annamulla, townland of Fakle, in the County Armagh, and adjacent to the City of Newry, in the County of Down, Ireland. He took to the sea when young, and sailed before the mast for many years. Going to St. Louis thirteen or fourteen years ago, he sought employment at labor congenial to his first vocation, worked on steamboats, sewed tarpaulins and tents, made sails, and eight years ago, prior to his entering the service of the Fire Department, was engaged in spreading and repairing tarpaulins on the Levee. The last eight years of his life had been passed in the Fire Department, where he was a general favorite with officers and men.

DAKOTA TERRITORY.—SITTING BULL INDIANS CROSSING THE YELLOWSTONE RIVER, NEAR FORT KEOGH, TO SURRENDER TO GENERAL MILES. FROM A SKETCH BY HOLTES.—SEE PAGE 371.

Digitized by Google

He was five feet ten inches in height, had dark hair and mustache, dark hazel eyes, and weighed about 160 pounds. He was married in Ireland, and had a loving and faithful wife and two children, a boy of fourteen and a little girl aged six. As father, husband, friend and fireman, he has a bright record, for he was as tender-hearted, kind and true as he was brave. At the great Southern Hotel fire, some years ago, he saved the lives of 13 persons. On that occasion, when the guests and servants in the sixth and seventh stories were cut off, he ran up a high ladder, stood recklessly upon the top round, tied a rope to a sheet that was thrown from one of the windows, and when the rope was secured above, swung off the ladder and climbed to the point, where he shared the danger with the others. A subscription has already been started for his family, and so highly was he thought of, there is no doubt a handsome sum will be realized.

Our Wheat Product.

THE wheat crop reported by the Government for the fiscal year 1878-9 (grown principally during the calendar year 1878) was, as is generally known, the largest but one ever produced in this country, being 422,122,000 bushels, an increase of about sixty-five per cent. over that of 1870, 163 per cent. increase over that of 1860, and more than four times that of 1850. The quantity retained for home consumption has risen from 100,331,000 bushels in 1850 to 189,000,000 in 1860, 224,000,000 in 1870, and 266,000,000 in 1879; the quantity exported (both domestic and foreign) from 792,768 bushels in 1850 to 4,155,000 in 1860, 37,000,000 in 1870, and 124,000,000 in 1879, having nearly doubled in the last year, as compared with 1878. Relatively, though not absolutely, the increase in exports is vastly greater than in home consumption. Consumption per head shows no very marked increase: it was 4.35 bushels in 1850, 5.37 in 1860, 5.81 in 1870, 6.03 in 1879. The percentage of crop sent abroad, on the other hand, was but 0.779 in 1850, was 2.40 in 1860, 14.18 in 1870, and 29.41 in 1879. In corn, production is more than three times that of wheat, but has not quite trebled since 1850; its consumption per capita is four times that of wheat, showing that we are a corn-eating people. Wheat exports during 1879 were not very much larger to Great Britain than in 1878, but those to France increased from 4,237,000 bushels to 45,147,000, this increase being the more notable in contrast with the fact that for some years previous our wheat exports to France had scarcely averaged a million bushels.

Torture of Criminals in France.

THE sickening accounts of the tortures inflicted on the French convicts, political or otherwise, expatriated to New Caledonia, affords, in one particular, a remarkable proof of what may be termed the conservations of cruelty. Flogging, it was stated in evidence before the Committee of Inquiry, was frequently inflicted with great violence and on very slight provocation. Now, flogging, it has been repeatedly asserted by the opponents of corporal punishment, has long since been abolished in France, both for civil and for military offences. Prior to the first revolution, the cat-o'-nine-tails, or, rather, of twelve-tails—the invention of the French General Martinet, whose name, in France, has come down to posterity in conjunction with the instrument of torture which he invented—was extensively used in the French Army; but its application was prohibited by a sensitively humane convention when the Reign of Terror was at its height. Jean Jacques Rousseau did really succeed in banishing the rod from French schools; but in the navy the cat, or "garcette," lingered until 1848, when naval flogging, and the punishment of keel-hauling to boot, was abolished by a decree of the Provisional Government of February. On the other hand, merciless flagellation has never ceased to prevail in the French bagnes or convict prisons. The wretched exiles in New Caledonia are scourged with an instrument precisely similar to that with which the "Forçats pour la Foi" (the French Huguenots sent to the galleys by Mme. de Maintenon and Père la Chaise at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes) were tortured. This implement of flagellation was and is a thick cord, strongly twisted, attached to a short handle, and with its lash rendered additionally hard by being closely tarred. The punishment is traditionally know as "la bastonnade," or bastinado, for the reason that in the old times there were always a large number of Turkish prisoners in the galleys at Toulon and Marseilles, and a Turkish convict, assumed to be an adept in the art of castigation in the Ottoman fashion, was selected to flog the unfortunate Huguenots. Occasionally a cowhide, resembling the Turkish "kourbash," was substituted for the tarred rope. In the old French bagnes, when there were no more Turkish prisoners to act as lictors, the strongest, wickedest and most ferocious among the convicts were appointed to act as executioners.

Burmese Umbrellas.

THE umbrella, which the Englishman under his threatening climate wisely considers an indispensable accompaniment of his toilet as often as he breathes the outer air, is for very different reasons in the East a necessity to the native. In Siam and Burmah, China, Annam and Cochin China, it is not only the necessary protection against the intrusive rays of a vertical sun, but it has functions of its own to discharge which are quite foreign to it even in those countries where it is, as it was, intended to be, a "little shade." It is a distinctive feature in the lives and characters of the natives of those parts, and their Kings and Emperors, when writing to one another, to allude to their subjects as "wearers of the umbrella" in contradistinction to the ignorant and misguided people of other climes. Thus we find an Emperor of China writing to a King of Burmah: "From the royal elder brother, Tan-kwang, Emperor of China, who rules over a multitude of umbrella-wearing chiefs in the Great Eastern Empire," to "his royal younger brother, sun-descended King, lord of the golden palace, who rules over a multitude of umbrella-wearing chiefs in the Great Western Empire." In Burmah especially the umbrella has a deep and secret meaning to convey what is as double-Dutch at first to the foreigner's ear. It is, it need scarcely be said, the necessary finish to the out-of-door toilet of a Peguan or Burmese fashionable, but it is much more. It has very delicate duties to perform which could not so well be allotted in Burmah to any other instrument. Gold or gilded umbrellas, which in the Provinces may be carried by any nobody, are reserved in the capital for Princes of the blood alone; and red umbrellas are affected by the gay sparks of Burmese society as being the next thing most gaudy in appearance. Etiquette has also fixed the exact number of umbrellas that Burmese nobles may display when they approach the "lord of the golden palace"; and it has now been settled by the Mandelay Herald's office beyond possibility of dispute that no one but the Ein-Shé-Men, or heir apparent, is entitled to have borne over his litter the full complement of eight golden umbrellas. To carry a letter under an umbrella is to accord to it royal honors in Burmah. Eight golden umbrellas are properly carried over a King's letter, and when the Burmese authorities would not permit the umbrellas to be carried over the Governor-General's letter, according to custom, Major Phayre, the British envoy to Burmah in 1855, insisted upon the Union Jack being waved over it on its way from the Residency to the palace.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and Investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

FUN.

A LITTLE girl in church, after the contribution-plate had been passed, complacently and audibly said: "I paid for four, mamma; was that right?"

PROFESSOR: "Can any one tell us the origin of the expression 'Go to'?" Embryo Minister: "Perhaps there was something more to it once, and they left it off because it didn't sound well."

FIRST YOKEL: "What to thee doing of, James?" Second Dito: "Nothing. What be you?" First Dito: "Minding the children." Second Dito: "Where be they?" First Dito: "Danged if ol know."

SCHOOLTEACHER (to little boy whose father is a grocer): "Now, Johnny, if your father has a barrel of whisky containing forty gallons, and one-fourth of it leaks out, how many gallons does he lose?" Johnny: "He don't lose none. He fills it up again right off."

A GENTLEMAN called professionally on a prominent physician and complained of a total loss of appetite. "I'll just give you a little tonic to take before dinner," said the doctor. "Oh, I'm all right just before dinner. It's after dinner that I suffer so much."

THE minister stopped at a house on the East Side last week, and sought to improve the time by giving an eight-year-old boy an instructive lesson in morality. "My boy," said the minister, "I have lived forty-five years, and have never used tobacco in any form, nor told a lie, nor uttered an oath, nor played truant, nor ——." "Gimminy crickets!" interrupted the lad, "yer ain't had any fun at all, have ye?"

THE Rev. Dr. Alexander relates that there lived in Presbyterian a half-witted man, who was in the habit of saying his prayers in a field behind a turf-dike. One day he was followed to this spot by some wags, who secreted themselves on the opposite side, listening to the man at his devotions, who expressed his conviction that he was a very great sinner, and that even were the turf-dike at that moment to fall upon him it would be no more than he deserved. No sooner had he said this than the persons on the opposite side pushed the dike over him, when, scrambling out, he was heard to say: "Hech, sirs! it's an awful warld this; a body canna say a thing in a joke, but it's ta'en in earnest."

DR. PIERCE'S Golden Medical Discovery cures every kind of humor, from the worst scrofula to the common pimple or eruption.

Four to six bottles cure salt-rheum or tetter.

One to five bottles cure the worst kind of pimples on the face.

Two to four bottles clear the system of boils, carbuncles and sores.

Four to six bottles cure the worst kind of erysipelas.

Three to six bottles cure blotches among the hair.

Six to ten bottles cure running at the ears.

Five to eight bottles cure corrupt or running ulcers.

Eight to twelve bottles cure the worst scrofula.

Sold by druggists, and in half-dozen and dozen lots at great discount.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE MAKES A DELICIOUS DRINK.

DR. M. H. HENRY, the widely-known and eminent family physician, of New York, says:

"Horsford's Acid Phosphate possesses claims as a beverage beyond anything I know of in the form of medicine, and in nervous diseases I know of no preparation to equal it."

RINGLETS BRIGHT

"That toss in the breeze like a thing of light."

She stood thus beautiful through the use of MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Sold by Druggists.

MILLIONS of bottles of BURNETT'S COCOAINE have been sold during the last twenty years, in every civilized country, and the public have rendered the verdict that it is the cheapest and best Hair Dressing in the world.

A SIMPLE trial of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE convinces the most obstinate of its superior health giving qualities. It is a perfect Blood Purifier, changes the constitution suffering from General Debility into one of Vigorous Health, and enriches and reddens the Blood. Manufactured by its author and sole Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M.D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia. All Druggists and Dealers in Medicines keep it.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—Best relish in use for family use. Preferable to all others.

THE ST. NICHOLAS is one of the best conducted and most universally popular hotels in the United States. The policy of management is broad and generous, and of a kind that gives full equivalent for the standard of prices.

NO BUSINESS or working man can afford to be without Accident Insurance. Insure in THE TRAVELERS.

PUERTO PLATA, SAN DOMINGO, July 1st, 1880.

H. W. Johns Mfg. Co., 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

I have ordered to-day through Messrs. R. H. Allen & Co. a lot of Roofing. Your Asbestos Roofing which I have sold during the past three years has given good satisfaction. Yours truly, W. O. BARTLETT.

FOR SALE.

Bound Volumes of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER published during the Civil War. Address, T. LITTLE, 318 West 23d St., New York.

The most Charming Works of Fiction of the Present Day.

THE WORKS OF E. MARLITT.

After the German, by Mrs. A. L. WISTER.

16mo. Extra Cloth. Price, $1.50 each

IN THE SCHILLINGSCOURT.

"It is one of the best of E. Marlitt's romances."—N. Y. Evening Post.

AT THE COUNCILLOR'S.

"Well merits a second and even a third perusal."—Boston Daily Globe.

THE SECOND WIFE.

"A German story of intense interest by one of the best known writers of romance of that country."—Washington Chronicle.

THE OLD MAM'SELLE'S SECRET.

"It is one of the most intense, concentrated, compact novels of the day."—Columbus (Ohio) Journal.

GOLD ELSIE.

"Gold Elsie is one of the loveliest heroines ever introduced to the public."—Boston Advertiser.

THE LITTLE MOORLAND PRINCESS.

"A charming story."—New York Observer.

COUNTESS GISELA.

"One of the very best of its class."—Phila. Press.

After the German, by E. E.

OVER YONDER.

With Frontispiece. 8vo. Paper. 50 cents.

MAGDALENA.

With Two Illustrations. 8vo. Paper. 35 cents.

. For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of the price, by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Publishers,
715 & 717 Market St., Philadelphia.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each; five for $1; $2 per dozen, $2.

GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS

In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their success as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will henceforth be put up and sold not only in quart, but

ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,

for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. A. BOKER, JR., Sole Agent, New York; 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,029.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

CAMPAIGN SONGS.

AGENTS AND CLUBS, SEND FOR SAMPLES.

"WE'LL RALLY ONCE AGAIN!" (Garfield's Portrait.)
"SAVE THE UNION!" (Hancock's Portrait.)

Both rattling songs and good portraits. Inclose 10 cts. for samples; $3 per hundred.

H. W. HITCHCOCK, 32 Park Row, N. Y.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100-page pamphlet, 10c.

55 ASSORTED Perfumed Cards, with name, 10c. SEDAMSVILLE CARD CO., 21st Ward, Cincinnati.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time-tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves Pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.

STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 3.45 P. M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 2.35, 10, 11.05 A. M.; 12.05, 12.35, and every half-hour to 10.35 P. M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N. R., at 9.10, 10.25 A. M., and hourly to 8.25 P. M. Leaving EAST RIVER STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P. M. do not stop at Lacey and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.30 A.M. to 12.30 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M., and 10.40 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Lacey St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 8.45 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

Angostura Liqueur.

THE FINEST AND PUREST
SWEET CORDIAL
in existence. Prepared by
Dr. J. G. B. Siegert & Son,
the Manufacturers of the world-renowned

Angostura Bitters.

J. W. HANCUX, Sole Agent,
61 Broadway, N. Y.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N. Y., is the only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware.—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE,

INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER,

PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTES, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 10 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
THE
August Number Now Ready.

CONTENTS:

"Oberammergau and its Attractions—The Passion Play in 1880." By N. Robinson. Twelve Illustrations.

"Some Remarkable American Women—At the Bar, in the Pulpit, and on the Dramatic and Operatic Stages." By George J. Bagar. Seventeen Illustrations and portraits.

"What the Japanese Eat." By Edward Greey. Twelve Illustrations.

"An Anglo-French Watering-place—Granville." Six Illustrations.

"Colbert—Minister and Favorite of Louis XIV." Illustrated.

"Cameo-cutting." Illustrated.

"Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn." Illustrated.

"A Soap Bubble." By John A. Bower. Nine Illustrations.

Short and Serial Stories.—"Nat Gallup," by Rita W. Pierce (Chaps. XXIII.-XXV.); Illustrated. "In the Wrong Box"; Illustrated. "How May Pink Became the Richest Girl in Chester," by Richard B. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger." "Fergus Blake's Wife," by John Maron; Illustrated. "Was it Better?" by S. Adams Frost; Illustrated. "The Dead Hand," by Walter Edgar McCann; Illustrated. "The Revenge of Gerald Geraghty"; Illustrated. "Flick et Flam"; Illustrated. "The Ban of Blood"; Illustrated—etc.

Sketches.—"A Wild Beast Shop"; Illustrated. "An Adventure in a Forest," by James Pays. "A Robber Saved"; Illustrated. "A Scratched Camel"; Illustrated. "The Boy who did not Know what Fear was"; Illustrated. "Letters Oddly Lost and Found—Some Cases which should Teach Caution in making Charges of Theft"; Illustrated, etc.

Poems.—"That Dream of Ours." "A Dilettante." "Summer Playtime"; Illustrated. "Captain Otis's Bride," a Ballad, by A. Mary F. Robinson; Illustrated. "Flowers"; Illustrated.

Miscellany.—"An Invalid's Experience," with comic illustrations. "Clocks in China." "Who First Drew Down the Lightning?" "The History of Writing." "Violin Makers." "Dyck's Trees." "The Prairie Dog's Home, and its Gruesome Visitors"; Illustrated. "How Kings Traveled in the Fourteenth Century." "Goodwin's Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES, over 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

COLORED FRONTISPIECE:

"An Ancient Egyptian Lady's Toilet—Painting the Eyes with Kohl."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; and four months, $1. Sent postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 41, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.

General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,
Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Gotben Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

MRS. M. J. COILEY, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,
Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. 864 thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females. JNO. L. KUBANK, Proprietor.
Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.
JAMES A. FRAZER, Owner and Proprietor.
COLONEL N. COBB, General Manager.

The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and prescribed by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professors T. Gaillard Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville. Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

Get off at Covington for the
HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails and telegraph-office. Board, $2 50 per day; $15 per week; $60 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station; $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. K. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.
H. C. KUBANK, Proprietor.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

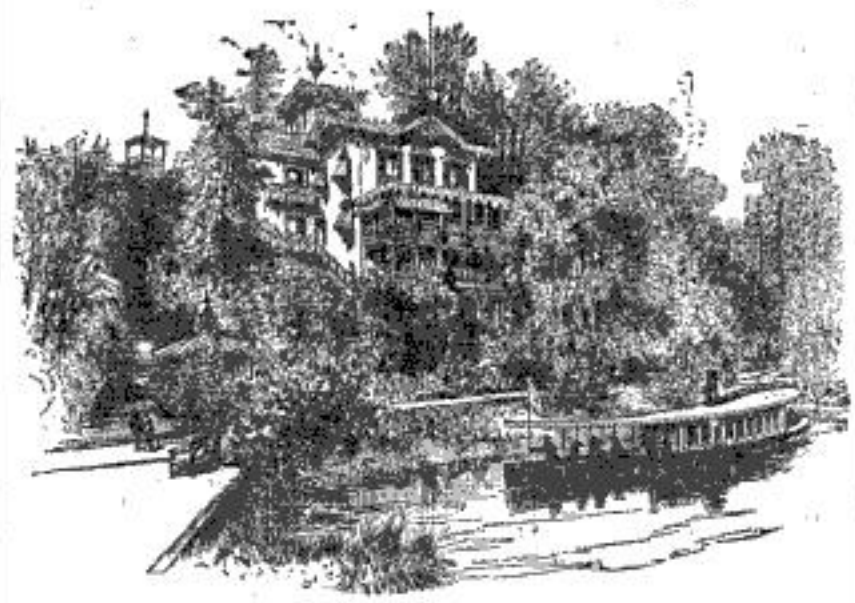
DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW: apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.
DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

DEAFNESS and noises in the head relieved by DR. J. HUNT STILWELL'S PATENT ORGANIC VIBRATOR, which fits into the ear and is not perceptible. Particulars free. Address, 141 McDougal St., New York.

READ THIS. Send One Dollar and receive, by return mail, Specimens of Mineral from all the famous mines in and about Leadville. Address COLORADO SPECIMEN CO., Lock Box 294, Leadville, Col.

TAPE-WORM
INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp,
H. ECKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.



18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts. postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

50 Fancy Cards, 10c., or 30 Gold and Silver Chromos, 10c. Stamps taken. J. B. HUSTED, Nassau, N. Y.

20 Lovely Rosebud Chromo Cards, or 20 all Floral Motto with name, 10c. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. BISSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

ELGIN WATCHES,
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $10 to $150. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

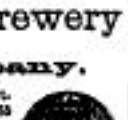
Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 33 cents, with age, height, color of eyes and hair, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage.
Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N. Y.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc., for Restores. Speedy cure guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $12, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 335 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3986

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.



BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. S. WILTBERGER Prop., 233 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery AND Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 189—195 East Fifty-ninth Street. Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

52 Gold, Crystal, Lace, Perfumed & Chromo Cards, name in Gold & Jet, 10c. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

ESPECIAL NOTICE.

Judge Brown, of the United States Circuit Court, on March 31st, made the following decisions:

1. That the Commonwealth Distribution Company is legal.
2. That its drawings are fair.

The Postmaster-General has, therefore, rescinded his order against the delivery of mails to this company.

Registered letters will be delivered and postal orders paid as formerly.

22d

Popular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY has always drawn in public at Macauley's Theatre, Louisville, Ky., on a Saturday.

JULY 31.

Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.

1,000 Prizes, $112,400; Capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000; 20 of $1,000; 1,047 others from $500 down.

Tickets always sold at $2; halves, $1.

Address R. H. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky., or same at 309 Broadway, New York, or W. PORTER, 1,237 Broadway, New York, or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.

THE BEST AND BRIGHTEST OF THE PICTORIAL PAPERS.

Frank Leslie's
Illustrated Newspaper

The Oldest and Most Popular of the Illustrated Weeklies.

"FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER is now, as it long has been, one of the best and brightest of the pictorial papers published in this country. In addition to many pleasing illustrations that relate only to the most interesting passing events, timely editorials, entertaining stories, and well-prepared miscellaneous matter may be confidently expected in every issue."—Courier, Gt. Barrington, Berkshire, Mass.

This universally popular periodical has reached its Fiftieth Volume, and thus, for a Quarter of a Century, has afforded a Complete and Faithful Review of the Current Events at Home and Abroad.

The Contents embrace illustrations of the prominent events of the day—political, social, scientific, commercial, etc. One of the eight illustrated pages is devoted to careful reproductions from the Illustrated Foreign Press.

Editorials on all subjects of public interest; select Serial and Short Stories, Essays, Poetry, Biographies, Musical and Dramatic News, Personal Gossip, Foreign and Domestic Anecdotes, and a highly amusing and instructive Miscellany.

Admirable Cartoons appear in each number, humorously illustrating prominent incidents, prevailing follies, foibles, etc.

A Serial Story of profound interest is now in course of publication, entitled "THE SCHAPPUSKIN LADDIE," by Annie Duffell.

Published every Wednesday. To be had at all newsdealers', price 10 cts. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.

Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE

For August Now Ready.

WITH THE FOLLOWING BRILLIANT TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"Sister Dora"; A Model Christian Nurse. Illustrated.
"Venice: Its Past and Present." Eleven Beautiful Illustrations.
"Missionary Effort in Patagonia." By Rev. Daniel Edwards. Seven Illustrations.
"With St. Paul at Athens." By Rev. Professor Porter, D. D. Nine Illustrations.
"Religious Aspect of Gothic Architecture." By Dean Stanley.
"Binding the Feet in China." By Rev. Ross C. Houghton.
"Nebuchadnezzar." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"The Children of the Bible." No. VII. Abijah, Prince of Israel.
Serial and Short Stories, Sketches, etc.—"Bo-Bo, the Nailmaker's Daughter," by the Author of "Erdmer's Rock" (Chaps. XXXII. to XXXIV.); Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the author of "Little Hitrec" (Chaps. I. to IV.); Illustrated. "The Clerk's Marriage"; Illustrated. "Robinson in New York," by Rev. E. E. Hale; Illustrated. "The Mayberrys at the Seashore," by Albert Wallwyn; Illustrated. "The Children of Herb." "A Night of Anguish"; Illustrated. "Battle between Hawk and Crows"; Illustrated. "Bishop Ryle of Liverpool," (with portrait). "The Methodist Bishops," (with portraits of Rev. Drs. Cyrus D. Foss, John F. Hurst, Henry W. Warren, and E. O. Haven). "A Bit of a Scrape"; Illustrated, etc., etc.
Essays.—"The Lord's Prayer"; Illustrated. "The Christian Slumber-Song." By Augusta Browne Garrett. "Celibacy of the Clergy," etc.
Poems.—"Beneath the Cross"; Illustrated. "Thoughts"; Illustrated border. "June Nights" and "Song of the Twilight." By E. W. Bellamy (from Victor Hugo). "Village Chimes." "A Summer-Day Idyl." "The Bird in the Rain." "Missionary Hymn." By Carrie L. Post. "The Owl and the Lark."
Miscellany.—"Salted with Fire." "Jabez of the Chronicles, identified with the Pharaoh of Joseph." "Action for Damages among the Jews." "Good Advice for Everybody." "On the Housetop." "Hunting"; Illustrated. "Cariboo, in the Land of Earthquakes"; Illustrated. "The Catacombs"; Illustrated. "Christian Warfare." "What Money Did." "The Sealing of the Sepulchre"; Illustrated. "Watering Plants in Jerusalem"; Illustrated. "Traveling in the Seventeenth Century," by Lord Macaulay. "The Sea," etc., etc.
"Wit, Wisdom and Pathos of Childhood," "Religious News and Notes," "Editor's Portfolio," "Obituary Notices," "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep"—The Christian Slumber-song; composed for the SUNDAY MAGAZINE by Augusta Browne Garrett.

128 Quarto Pages---100 Engravings.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

THE NEW CRAZE AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

BUTCHERS, BAKERS, AND ALL.—"If this sort of thing continues, we'll all of us starve ourselves for want of business."

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!
Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of
TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

WILHELMS-QUELLE
IMPORTED
NATURAL MINERAL WATER
FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.
LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.
SOLE IMPORTERS,
MACK & BRUNLER,
7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,
Near Post Office.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.
SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.
ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.
Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

Mining Trust Company
OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.
Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests: The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stocks, payment of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.

American Mining Stock Exchange
(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company),
EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS complete with Type, Cards, Inks, Rules, &c., (Chief-Inker $45) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money-maker. A paying business can be realized for all or spare time. Send two stamps for 32 pp. Catalogue of all Printers' Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to
Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.] Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.
"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.
"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cures have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878.
"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Restorer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,000,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"Brown Lake Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.
"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Barnoo, England, Feb., 1879.
"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

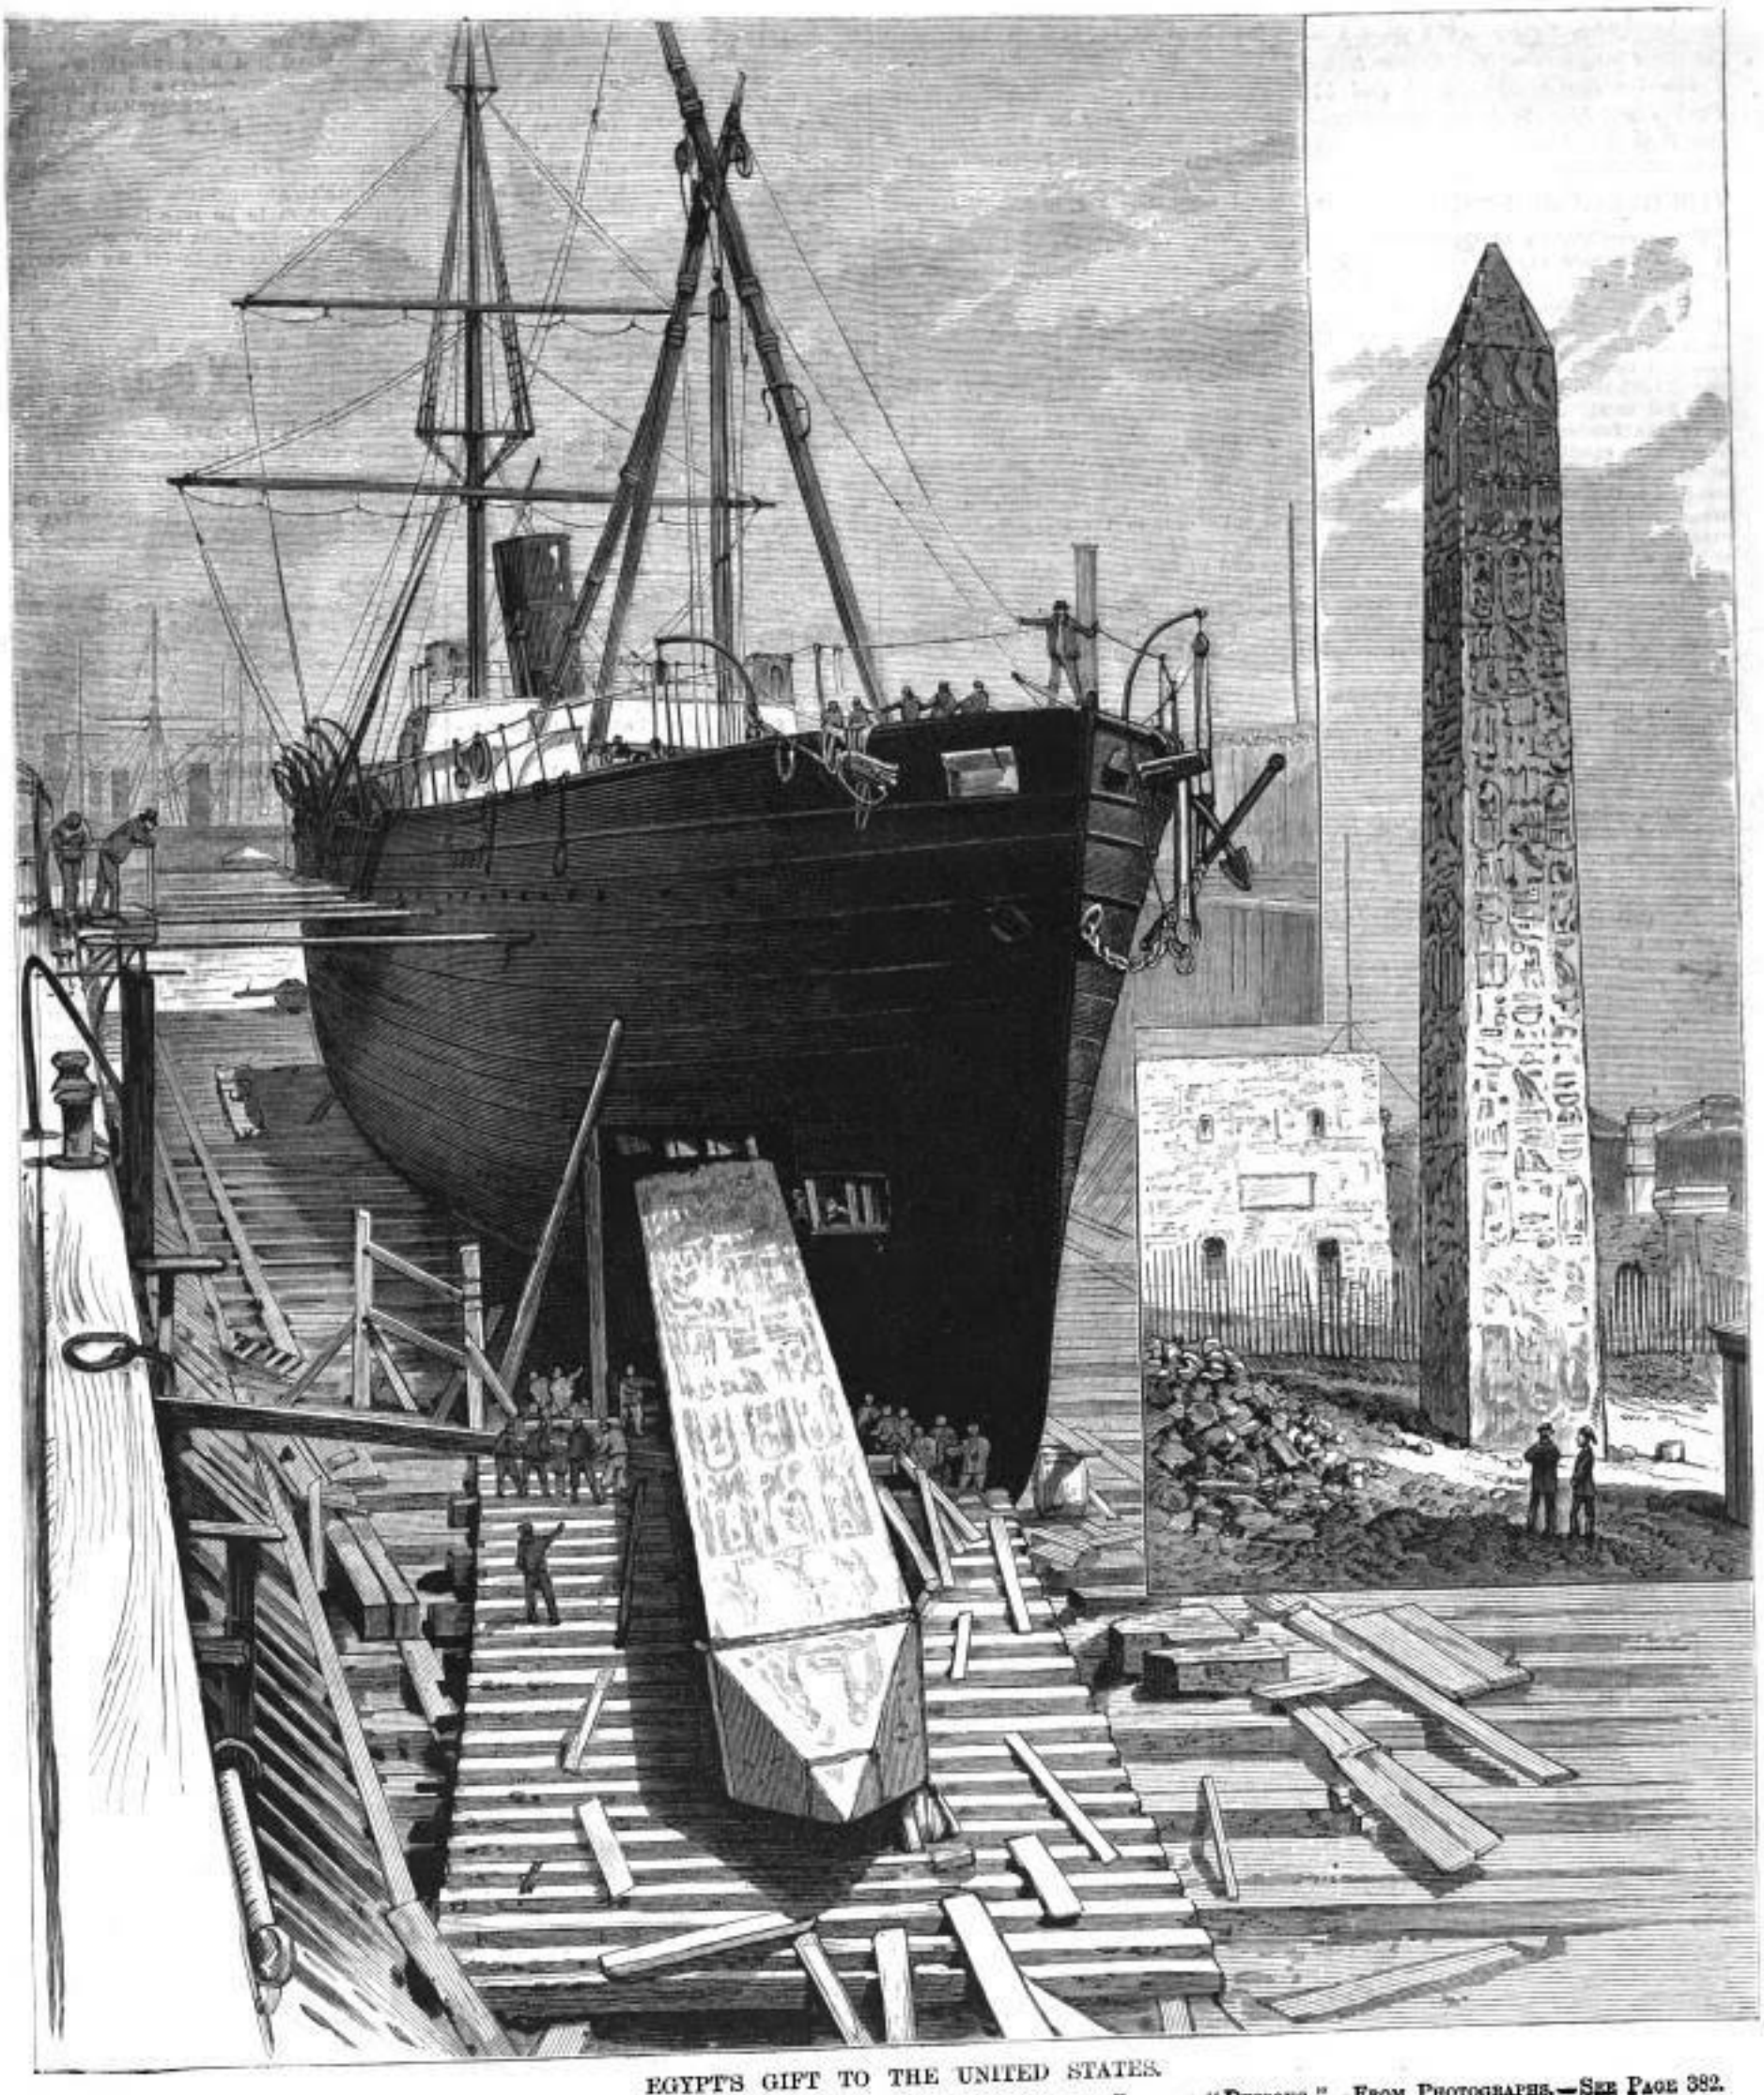
Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH,
LASTING FOR YEARS.

Mention this Paper. SENT POSTPAID on RECEIPT of $3, Or by Express, C. O. D.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?



Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ringland, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,297.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, AUGUST 7, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks, $1.00.

EGYPT'S GIFT TO THE UNITED STATES.

The Obelisk as it Stood on the Bank of the Nile, and as it was Placed in the Hold of the Steamer "Dessoug."—From Photographs.—See Page 382.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 7, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

J. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

CAUTION.

Subscribers, in sending subscriptions for any of our publications, should be careful to direct their letters plainly to the street numbers of the Frank Leslie Publishing House, Nos. 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York, in order to insure their safe delivery.

THE GREENBACK "SIDE-SHOW."

IF the candidature of General Weaver, the nominee of the Greenback and Labor Party for the Presidency of the United States, shall have no other effect, it will at least serve, during the present canvass, to accentuate those phases of the financial issue which the political managers of both the two great historical parties seem not unwilling to shuffle out of sight. It is the fundamental principle of the Greenback candidate that "all money, whether gold, silver or paper, should be issued by the supreme authority of the nation, and be made a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private," and, as a necessary corollary of this doctrine, he holds that "both patriotism and sound statesmanship loudly call for the abolition of banks of issue," as now established under authority of the National Government.

But while thus pleading for the issue of all money by the immediate act and direct authority of the Government, General Weaver has been careful to explain that he does not advocate an unlimited emission of irredeemable paper money, and instead of believing any longer in the fiat power of the Government to make money by imprinting its stamp on a piece of paper, he now favors us with the doctrine that "the value of money consists in its limitation," only insisting that this "limitation" should be "fixed by Congress."

It is some concession, doubtless, to the laws of reason and to the force of a public opinion enlightened by recent discussions, that the standard-bearer of the Greenback and Labor Party has been brought to abjure the nonsense of the fiat money theorists, but the concession is not as great as it seems when it comes to be critically scanned. It is, indeed, rather theoretical than practical, for, reposing as he does in the wisdom and discretion of Congress—a changing body of men—the whole power to regulate the amount of paper money to be put in circulation, what guarantee can he give that this circulation will always be kept within the limits of redeemability in gold?

Under our present national bank system, with the freedom of its operations restrained by nothing but the imperious laws of trade and commerce, there is a check put upon the volume of the currency, but no check except that which is prescribed by the nature of things and the necessities of the financial situation at any given epoch. It has been well said by Mr. Gallatin (that master of finance under the administrations of Madison and Monroe), that "the Government has no means to ascertain whether its issues are too contracted or too large till after the evil has actually taken place; whilst banks, obliged to pay their notes in specie, and skillfully directed, are constantly employed in preventing its occurrence." It passes our comprehension to understand how the Greenback financiers can, in one breath, inveigh against the "double profits" reaped by the national banks on their issues, and, in the next breath, can charge that these institutions, by controlling the volume of the currency, may fix, at their mere will and pleasure, "the price of all labor and property." If the "profits" of the national banks are in proportion to their "issues," does not Mr. Weaver see that they are under a constant pressure of self-interest to keep these issues at the highest possible point? To suppose that they would place any arbitrary limit on the volume of the currency is to suppose that they would put an arbitrary restriction on their own profits; but, called as they are to watch the currents of trade and the tendencies of productive industry, as well in their own interest as in the interest of the public, they must watch intelligently for the prevention of panics on the one hand and of overtrading on the other, for the occurrence of either will prove a source of damage to them in common with the country at large. The interests of these banks are bound up in the same bundle as the industrial and manufacturing interests of the nation, and to intimate that they would fain put the latter in "circumscription and confine," is to intimate that they would fain lessen the "double profits" about which Mr. Weaver discourses so fluently.

We observe that some of the Greenback orators are pressing the great name and authority of Mr. Webster into the support of their doctrine concerning the duty of the Government as regards the currency. It is true that in the financial crisis of 1837 this statesman avowed the opinion that it is "the constitutional duty of the Government to see that a proper currency, suitable to the circumstances of the times and the wants of trade and business, as well as to the payment of debts due to Government, be maintained and preserved—a currency of general credit, and capable of aiding the operations of exchange, so far as those operations may be conducted by means of the circulating medium." But in so arguing Mr. Webster was very far from giving the slightest countenance to the financial doctrines of the Greenback Party in regard to the source from which this national currency should emanate. For, in immediate connection with the foregoing statement, he was careful to add that, in so saying he does not say "by what instrument or agent Congress ought to perform this duty." The idea that Congress should perform the duty directly without the intervention of any "instrument or agent," was as foreign from his thoughts as from the thoughts of Mr. Gallatin when the latter commented on the evils of remitting to the Government an immediate control over the volume of currency. One great national bank seemed to Mr. Webster a fitting instrument for the performance of the Government's duty in the matter of a paper currency needed for the purposes of business and of exchange, but the whole tenor of his remarks applies with much more pertinency to the system of national banks which has been established in the recent legislation of the country.

FEATS IN FASTING.

THE craving of the public appetite for spiced and piquant food is being abnormally pandered to by the insane desire for publicity which has taken possession of the now notorious Dr. Tanner. This individual's fast, even if it ceases ere the expiration of the time named by him for its continuance, has already lasted to a period which strikes the uninitiated with awe and bewilderment, the profession with astonishment and perplexity. We believe this to be a bona fide fast, nor do we in any way discredit the warranty of the gentlemen who keep "ghostly and dismal watch" over the eccentric and chameleon-like physician. We do not envy Dr. Tanner, and we have no sympathy with his devoted body-guard, even though their self-imposed labors be in the interests of science.

In the belief of Dr. Tanner's honesty, we are more or less fortified by cases of wonderful fasts that have from time to time occurred, and all of which, during their continuance, excited sensations akin to that which now engrosses public attention. If we go back to the Middle Ages, we have Joseph of Copertino, who for five years neither ate of bread nor drank of wine, but subsisted upon dried fruits and bitter herbs, and who was wont to fast for forty days seven times in every year. Nicolas of Flue abstained from food altogether, and when compelled to swallow a morsel of bread his stomach rejected it. Liduine of Schiedam fell ill in 1395, and remained in that state for thirty-three years, or to her death. During the first nine years she partook of nothing daily but a single wafer of apple and one mouthful of beer or milk. Later on, she rejected the apple in favor of water, and after nineteen years she refused even the water. According to her own confession, for eight years her lips were sealed to food and drink. The case of Eve Filegen, of Meurs, excited considerable attention. It is stated that for the space of fourteen consecutive years—from the twenty-second to the thirty-sixth year of her age—she refused nourishment of every description, "and this we have confirmed by the magistrates of the town of Meurs, as also by the minister, who made trial of her in his house thirteen days together by all the means he could devise, but could detect no imposition." The Welsh fasting girl, Sarah Jacob, is a very familiar case of modern abstention. At the age of ten, this girl suffered from spasms, attended with loss of consciousness, loss of muscular power and other symptoms of an hysterical character. She frequently vomited her food, which was taken in continually decreasing quantities. By the beginning of October, 1867, her daily food was a pill of bread administered by a teaspoon; on the 10th of October, a solemn declaration was made that she ceased to partake of any food whatsoever. This absolute fast, it is alleged, continued until December 17th, 1869, the day upon which she died, or a period of two years, two months and one week. This case so excited the public mind that four nurses from Guy's Hospital, in London, were sent down to watch the girl. The watch commenced on the 9th of December. On the 16th, "she was looking very pale and anxious, her eyes were sunk and her nose was pinched," and the "starvation smell" told the nurses that she was sinking. She died on the 17th. In Philadelphia an insane Irishman in the Pennsylvania Asylum refused all food and drink for forty-six days, because his daily allowance of food, which was four times in excess of that allowed to any other patient, was cut short. On the forty-sixth day of his self-imposed fast he was asked if he would have something to eat—every stratagem had been used to compel him to partake of food, but without success—"Give me something to eat," he said. Meat was given to him, but his stomach was too weak to hold food, and he died two days afterwards, his fast having lasted forty-eight days.

Numerous other cases of wonderful fasts might be cited to prop up belief in this unwise effort of Dr. Tanner. That he may accomplish his test is within the bounds of possibility, that he will aid science is open to a question, but that he is playing a very desperate game goes without saying.

MINING PROPERTIES AND STOCKS.

PARADOXICAL as the case may appear to the casual observer, the fact is patent, that, while on one hand capitalists and miners alike are scouring the country, from Maine to Arizona, in search of hitherto undiscovered deposits of the precious metals, on the other, the decrease in the value of shares in organized mining companies now aggregates millions of dollars per week. Nor is this decadence a matter of yesterday. It has been going on for months, and the end of the decline is, apparently, as far off as ever.

The solution, however, is most simple. Mining properties and mining stocks have long since parted company. It is scarcely too much to say that a mining property ceases to be a property the moment it is represented by shares of an organized company. The truth is that the mines, as such, have, in ninety-nine cases in every hundred, paid enormous dividends, not only to the miner or miners who originally discovered them, but to the second-hand owners who, purchasing them from first hands at comparatively insignificant figures, although such figures paid enormous profits to the sellers, have managed to delude the public into investing in the shares of such enterprises at rates which, on the most cursory investigation, are clearly preposterous. Thus, a hole in the ground which proves the existence of a more or less extensive vein or deposit of the precious metals, and which would pay highly remunerative interest on any reasonable amount of capital invested in its development, is organized into a company with a nominal capital of millions of dollars, divided into hundreds of thousands of shares, and this swindle is palmed off on a confiding public at a figure per share which leaves to the "promoters" far more enormous profits than the mine can ever earn or divide in the form of dividends.

In this purchasing of shares in mining companies at prices which the deluded victims fondly believed to be "bed-rock" figures, all rules which would govern the same purchasers in any other financial operation or investment are disregarded, if not set at defiance. No sane man would invest his capital in an interest in a farm, a mill or a bank, without previously ascertaining, to the best of his ability, the interest he could reasonably expect to derive from his investment, whether the figure at which the enterprise was valued was a fair one, and the more important of all considerations to him would be the percentage of the whole which his money purchased.

In mining stocks the opposite rules would seem to obtain. Not one man in a hundred, who has been induced to buy mining stocks, knows the first rudiments of geology or metallurgy; not one seemingly cares as to the amount at which the property he invests in is capitalized; and thousands of people who to-day are holders of mining stocks do not know whether their money has bought a thousandth, a ten-thousandth, a hundredth-thousandth, or a five hundred-thousandth part of a property which they have been induced to believe a valuable one. The purchasers in the majority of instances are deluded by eulogistic reports of the mine by the celebrated Professors Smith, Jones, of Robinson, many of whom are far from being morally or scientifically immaculate, and by lists of "Directors" or "Trustees," the antecedents of many of whom would scarcely bear close investigation, while others, previously regarded as highly respectable members of the community, are induced apparently to lend, but in reality to sell, their good names for a mess of potage in the shape of a gratuity of a few hundreds or thousands of shares.

Some eighteen or twenty months ago this community was invaded by a swarm of pseudo-capitalists from San Francisco, who, after having fattened on the people of the Pacific Slope, found their occupation gone because they had left only the bleached skeletons of their victims. A good many of these men had, previous to their advent among us, been gradually paving the way for their intended operations here, by unloading, or, as they called it, interesting the Eastern public in their Pacific mines. About that time Colorado loomed up as the coming remunerative field of mining industry. It more than verified, by its wonderful productions, all that had been predicted of it. Instantly mining schemes were promoted by the hundreds. The names of apparently respectable directors or trustees were obtained for a consideration; the shares were launched and floated; they were kept in a state of buoyancy by clever manipulations of the market, and were sustained just long enough to enable the respectable promoters and trustees to saddle the public, at exorbitant prices, with stocks which had cost them but little or nothing.

If credence can be given to one tithe of the reports which are openly bruited about, the instances seem to be rare in which there was even "honor among thieves." The result is that to-day, in by far the majority of cases, the promoters own none of the stock of the very enterprises which they promoted, because they have, in a few months, made more than all the dividends which the mine could reasonably be expected to earn in years, and the public own the stock, hoping anxiously for dividends which they will never realize.

The result of all the rascality that has been practiced in this matter of organizing, floating and selling mining stocks will not, however, either paralyze, hamper or retard the industry of gold and silver mining in this country; and, if it teach our people to exert as much caution in any future investments in mining properties as they would in any other money-making branch of business, the dose, bitter as it has doubtless been to many, may yet prove of a very salutary nature.

GERMANY AND TURKEY.

THE various nations which were represented at the Conference of Berlin are far from being in accord at the present moment. Of course, it was scarcely to be expected that Austria and Russia would be influenced by the same feelings in the consideration of Panslavism. The interests of these countries are widely different in the settlement of the Bulgarian affairs, and it is a matter of notoriety that English and Russian sentiments are widely at variance. The insulting remarks of Mr. Gladstone, and his subsequent apology to Count Karolyi, are still fresh in the minds of our readers; and the appointment of Mr. Goschen as an extraordinary ambassador to the Porte has by no means settled this troublesome question. But, in addition to all the other complications which beset the Eastern question, the present attitude of Germany adds another element of alarm. In spite of all the protestations of affection of the German Government towards Russia, there is not much love lost between the two countries. On the other hand, Austria and Prussia, although for a long time influenced by a most intense jealousy of each other, can meet upon the common ground of dislike to any Russian aggression. Turkey has been desired by the Conference of Berlin to hand over certain portions of Albania and Thessaly to the Montenegrins and Greeks, but the inhabitants of these border lands refuse to be transferred like so many chattels. The English and French special ambassadors, Mr. Goschen and M. Tissot, have tried to coerce the Porte, but that power has simply said, "We will do all in our power to carry out the articles of the Berlin Congress, but you must not expect us to make war upon our own people because they object to change their nationality."

Nor is it possible for the Porte to entertain any doubts as to the part which Russia wishes to enact. To establish Panslavism in Bulgaria is certainly one of the aims of the Autocrat of the Russias. This would entail the destruction of Turkey and the banishment of the followers of Mohammed from Europe. If Greece is obliged to fight in order to obtain possession of the parts of Epirus and Thessaly ceded to her, Bulgaria will probably follow in order to obtain Eastern Roumelia. Austria, then, in order to protect herself against Slavism in Bulgaria, will seize some material guarantee, and would probably advance towards Salonica. Here Russian and Austrian interests would at once clash, and Prussia, in order to protect herself against the aggrandizement of her powerful neighbor and the waving of the Russian flag over the Bosphorus, which would proh-ably follow, will join her arms with those of Austria. The latter country is said to have instructed her ambassadors to inform the Porte that strict compliance with the articles of the Berlin Conference will be insisted upon, and it is supposed that Germany is so far in entire accord with Austria and the other signatories. But at the same time Austria and Germany will insist upon the other articles which are in favor of Turkey being carried into execution, and will take every care of the interests of the Porte. That the Sultan has asked for and obtained the assistance of certain members of the Prussian Civil Service to aid in reforming the Turkish administration is beyond doubt, and the slight which is contained in this demand to England and France, whose representatives are on the spot ready to undertake such a duty, is probably intentional. Even the English new-papers allow that there is something in this new and strange fellowship, but they deny that there can be any alliance which will threaten the peace of Europe.

Digitized by Google

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE long-threatened rupture between Rome and Belgium has at length taken place. The Belgian Minister has been withdrawn from Rome and the Nuncio has left Brussels. The Nuncio in the letter in which he demanded his passports brought an accusation against the Belgian Prime Minister. He says the Premier, in explaining the course of the negotiations to the Chamber, "knew that the consequences attributed by him to the words of the Cardinal Secretary of State answered neither to the thoughts nor to the intentions of the Vatican." M. Frère-Orban, the Prime Minister, thereupon replied that as long as the Pope remains neutral in the conflict between the Church and State in Belgium, so long was the maintenance of diplomatic relations possible; but as soon as the Vatican supported the bishops in their opposition to the laws of the State, the Legation became useless, and it only remained to withdraw the representatives of either Government. The bishops have announced that they will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence by singing a Te Deum, but that they cannot take any other part in the ceremonies.

In France the strict Catholics are so indignant at the expulsion of the Jesuits, and so fearful lest the anger of heaven may be called down upon the evil-doers, that a pilgrimage to Paray-le-Monial has been arranged. A large party of pilgrims have joined the expedition, and the French authorities feared some disturbance, which, however, did not take place.

In England politics, both home and foreign, have lost all their interest before the discussion of the great problem whether Bend Or, the winner of the Derby, is Bend Or or not. In entering a horse for a race, it is necessary to state his pedigree correctly, and any mistake in the sire or dam would disqualify him were he to come in first. So when a discharged stud groom of the Duke of Westminster, the owner of Bend Or, came forward and said that Bend Or was not the son of Doncaster and Rouge Rose, but the produce of Doncaster and Clemence, all England was shaken to its centre. Both foals were born at Eaton, the duke's seat in Cheshire, and it is supposed that while being removed to Russley, where they were trained, they became mixed up. As the duke's stud book ought to describe the exact markings of both colts, it has been referred to, but hitherto without any satisfactory issue. The whole matter seems somewhat puerile here, but the interest which the Derby excites in England is something marvelous. To most Englishmen it is as great a day as the Fourth of July is to a citizen of these United States.

The Empress Eugenie is daily expected in England. Her trip to Zululand has been—if such a term may be used—very successful, and the poor mother has gratified her morbid desire to see the spot where her only son was killed. It is believed that the hot, fever-breeding climate of Southern Africa has told upon the Empress's health, but not to any dangerous extent. Her ex-Majesty was accompanied by Sir Evelyn Wood, and she visited the scene of his great victory at Kambula, where she planted several trees and a wreath of bulbs, and erected a cross upon the graves of some of the heroes who fell on that field. On her way back from Cape Town the Empress stopped at St. Helena, the island fortress where the first and great Bonaparte died. Longwood, the house where Napoleon was imprisoned, was originally a farmhouse and settlement belonging to the East India Company, and was used prior to Napoleon's imprisonment as the residence of the Lieutenant-Governor of the island. Since the death of the Emperor the house has been allowed to fall into disrepair, and the former drawing and dining rooms, the library and bathroom, which had been inhabited by the ruler of Europe, have passed through the various stages of stables, granaries, barns and threshing-floors.

IF the French people have entertained any doubts as to the advantages of a republican form of government, the statement just made by the Minister of Finance must tend greatly to dissipate them—at least so far as material results are concerned. This statement shows that since 1872 the remissions of taxation have amounted to $61,400,000, more than one half of which was taken off last year, and that if the reductions shall continue at the present rate, all the increase of taxation entailed by the war with Germany will be cleared off in three years. This is certainly a highly gratifying statement, and presents, in a striking light, the wise and prudent financial policy under the Republic as contrasted with the extravagance and waste which marked the Second Empire. It is to be remembered, too, that all this has been achieved without any sacrifice of any great public interest or of the efficiency of any branch of the public service, which is indeed, as a whole, on a stronger and more satisfactory basis than it has been for a quarter of a century.

THE Democrats of the Seventh Congressional District of Indiana have refused to indorse De la Matyr, the Greenback candidate, and nominated a candidate of their own. If they shall adhere to this position, they will very effectually eliminate the reverend Greenbacker from the politics of the State and country, while at the same time demonstrating a fidelity to sound financial principles which can scarcely fail to strengthen them with the people.

THE Government vaults now contain about $70,000,000 in silver coin, of which $45,500,000 are in dollars, and the remainder in smaller pieces. The Government also has on hand $5,000,000 worth of silver bullion. It is estimated that the silver of the United States, which is either in circulation or in the vaults of the Government, amounts to about $127,000,000, of which $64,000,000 are in dollars and $50,000,000 in smaller coins, made since 1875. There is still storage capacity for about $5,000,000, but this will soon be exhausted, and the Treasury officials are inquiring with some concern as to what they will then do with the coin, as it comes in at the rate of $2,000,000 a month. One thing is certain, and that is, that the people will not hold and use it as currency.

A STATEMENT just issued by the Treasury Department shows that by the refunding transactions under the Acts of 1870 and 1871, there has been effected an annual saving in interest charges of $19,900,883, the total amount of bonds refunded being $1,295,347,800. The statement also shows, in addition, that there have been bonds sold for resumption purposes since March 1st, 1877, amounting to about $90,000,000, the interest upon which amounts to $3,925,600. This latter sum represents the annual cost of the coin reserve held for the security of circulation. The net annual saving through resumption and refunding operations since the date last named is $10,365,453. In addition to the bonds referred to, there were issued in 1878, to replace coin used in payment of the Halifax award, four per cents. of 1907, amounting to $5,500,000.

THE improvement in the general condition of business is very clearly shown by the increase of the volume of railway traffic during the first six months of the present year as compared with the corresponding period last year. Taking the reports of thirty-four companies, we find that their receipts this year have been $83,326,895, as against $65,908,736, an increase of $17,418,159. The New York Central, a representative line, shows an advance of $2,584,510, the receipts this year being $15,742,478, as against $13,157,968 last year. During the month of June last the total receipts of forty-two railroads amounted to $18,164,772, being an increase of $4,915,378, or about 37 per cent. of the earnings of the same month in 1879. As bearing upon the commercial movement of the country these figures are certainly suggestive.

THE returns made to the Department of Agriculture for the month of April last, show that the farmers of the country will this year be favored, not only by bounteous crops, but also by an increase of eight per cent., taking the average for the entire Union, in the price of farm lands, as compared with the prices one year earlier. In Florida the average increase in value of cleared and timbered lands reaches 28 per cent.; in Nebraska it is 15.3 per cent.; in Missouri it is 12.5 per cent., and so on down to New York, where the increase is only 1.7 per cent. A gratifying fact exhibited by the returns is that all the Southern States showed a marked increase in the value of cleared lands. The average value per acre of cleared lands is $85 in Massachusets, $82.42 in New Jersey, $58.48 in New York, $45.75 in Pennsylvania, $47.53 in Ohio, etc., the lowest valuation per acre being $6.53 in Alabama.

THEY do some things well and thoroughly over in New Jersey. Here, for instance, is the case of the broken First National Bank at Newark, the stockholders of which have been imperatively required by the Receiver to pay over at once one hundred per cent. on the stock held by them in order to make good the deficiencies. No doubt this requirement will operate severely on some of the small stockholders, but they understood their responsibility under the law when they purchased their stock, and they have no right to complain when called upon to pay the penalty of their own negligence in the selection of incompetent directors. It is understood that actions may be brought against some of the latter for criminal inattention to their duties, but however this may be, the action of the Receiver will be almost universally commended as tending to beget greater care and fidelity in the management of financial institutions generally.

GENERAL ARTHUR'S letter of acceptance is in some respects a more creditable production than that of General Garfield. As to the financial question, he is more explicit, while as to the question of the authority of the National Government to maintain free elections in every State, he speaks with an emphasis which will elevate him in the opinion even of those who disagree with him. As to the civil service, he says, with some truth: "The efficiency of certain proposed regulations governing appointments to public office has been distrusted, mainly because they have seemed to exalt mere educational and abstract tests above general business capacity, and even special fitness for the particular work in hand. It seems to me that the rules which should be applied to the management of the public service may properly conform, in the main, to such as regulate the conduct of successful private business." And he adds this criticism which, while it will not be appreciated by President Hayes, will be assented to as entirely just: "By the acceptance of public office, whether high or low, one does not, in my judgment, escape any of his responsibilities as a citizen, or lose or impair any of his rights as a citizen, and he should enjoy absolute liberty to think and speak and act in political matters according to his own will and conscience, provided only that he honorably, faithfully and fully discharges all his official duties."

THE letter of Senator Butler of South Carolina, in reference to the recent murderous duel in that State, will command the hearty approval of all right thinking citizens everywhere. The Senator says emphatically that the law must be rigorously enforced against all who pursue this murderous method of "vindicating their honor," and then adds:

"It will be a sad day for South Carolina when a gentleman, who feels it to be his personal or professional duty to vindicate private rights in our courts, is first to be insulted, pursued, vilified, and goaded to desperation and then shot. If that is to be the plane which our civilization is to occupy, we shall all be sleeping on our arms. And there must be something radically wrong in a public sentiment which can force a man of Shannon's high character and acknowledged courage to fight a duel under the circumstances which surrounded him. It is about time we were finding out where we are, and ascertaining whether "border ruffianism" is to govern this country, or whether civilized institutions shall be maintained."

It is gratifying to observe that the press of South Carolina sustains the views expressed by Senator Butler, and it is to be hoped that the agitation of the subject may result in the formation of a public opinion which will henceforth make dueling practically impossible.

THE Commercial Bulletin estimates that the wheat crop of the present year will exceed that of 1879, when it amounted to 449,000,000 bushels, by about ten per cent., while the crop in all other countries will amount to an average one. During the latest four years of ordinary crops in other countries, the export from the United States averaged 73,000,000 bushels. If the growing crop should reach the aggregate of 494,000,000, as estimated, the case of supply and demand would then stand:

	Bush'ls.
United States crop	494,000,000
For seed and home consumption	260,000,000
Surplus	344,000,000
Ordinary export requirements	73,000,000
Balance remaining	171,000,000

In the event of the crop, here or in other countries, encountering adverse conditions between now and the ingathering of the harvest, the supply would be so far reduced below the above figures; but the Bulletin believes that, in any case, we shall have a surplus of 100,000,000 bushels, and it regards the prospects of our farmers, therefore, as rather discouraging than otherwise, since with an oversupply extraordinarily low prices for wheat seem inevitable. There is, however, this consolation, that what is a calamity to the farmer will be a blessing to every other class of the community.

AN important co-operative colonization movement has recently been started in this city, which, if carried out according to the intentions of its originators, cannot fail to be of great benefit to the working classes. It is known as the Grand Co-operative Brotherhood, and it already numbers over fifty members, each of whom is charged an admission fee of $100. As a member pays this amount in weekly installments, he waits his turn on the list of names, and is then sent out to the colony with his family and settled on land. Women are admitted the same as men. If a member fails to pay the weekly installment of his fee he is temporarily suspended, but does not lose his money. He receives seven per centum on his money paid in, and can pay the rest of the fee ten years afterwards, or whenever he is able to do so. The first colony will be located in Texas, where lands can be obtained from the State at one dollar an acre, payable in ten years. The colony will begin with thirty acres to a family. It is believed that the enterprise can be made in every way successful, and it certainly will have the good wishes of all who are interested in improving the condition of the working classes. The President of the brotherhood, Mr. H. E. Sharpe, in a recent interview, referred as follows to the purpose and scope of the scheme:

"Consider our condition as workingmen to-day. We use all our energy to earn bread, and never know whether we will eat to-morrow or not. When we get old we have the poorhouse only to go to. Necessity commands us to do something for ourselves. Under present conditions of society in large cities like New York the workingmen have no opportunity to gain wealth and better their condition. Land and labor make wealth. We purpose to buy land, go away from the city, and by labor on our land acquire wealth. We are dissatisfied. We want to help ourselves. We have no faith in political help, and we believe that, except by colonizing, we cannot help ourselves. Look at the colonies which exist to-day in this country. The community is rich in every case, but they die out because of special mistakes. We have studied their histories and will avoid their mistakes."

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

A BATCH of 758 Mormons, bound for Utah, arrived here from Europe last week.

SENATOR LAMAR is so ill that he has been forbidden to make any speeches at present.

THE report that Collector Merritt of this port was to be removed is authoritatively denied.

THE thirty-fifth annual convention of the New York Teachers' Association was held at Canandaigua last week.

GENERAL NEAL DOW has accepted the nomination for the Presidency by the national prohibitory party.

SECRETARY CARL SCHURZ opened the Republican campaign in Indiana last week by a speech at Indianapolis.

THE Summer Sunday-school Assembly at Round Lake, New York, opened on July 20th, with a large attendance.

IT is stated that General Grant has accepted a business position which will make it necessary for him to reside in this city.

HORACE RUSSELL, Assistant District-Attorney, has been appointed Justice of the Superior Court, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Chief Justice Curtis.

SPOTTED TAIL, the Indian chief, has removed his children from the training-school, and the tribe have asked the President to depose him and appoint a new chief.

A DISPATCH from Minister Fairchild at Madrid puts it beyond doubt that it was a Spanish naval vessel that recently fired on two American schooners off the coast of Cuba.

EX-MINISTER WASHBURNE sailed for Europe on Saturday last. He goes abroad for his health, having been annoyed by the bronchitis for the past two years. He will try the waters at Ems, and hopes to return early in October.

THE Democratic National Executive Committee has established its headquarters at No. 138 Fifth Avenue, in this city. The Congressional Democratic Campaign Committee has been asked to appoint an auxiliary committee of five members.

MOLLY MAGUIRISM has revived in the mining region of Tamaqua, Pa., where an engineer of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company was murdered by masked men on July 21st. Disorders and acts of violence have greatly multiplied in that vicinity within a few weeks past.

THE investigation into the fatal collision of the steamers Narragansett and Stonington has developed a great deal of conflicting testimony, and the exact measure of responsibility cannot be easily fixed. Suits have been commenced against the Stonington company by survivors of the disaster who lost friends and themselves sustained injuries.

THE steam yacht Mamie was run down and cut in two by the excursion steamer Garland on the Detroit River on Thursday, July 22d. Of the passengers on the yacht sixteen were lost, many of them being altar boys in a Detroit church. The night was clear and moonlit, and the vessels were seen a long way apart. It is said that the Garland was racing at the time with another steamer. None of the bodies have been recovered.

RECENT enlargements of the postal service include, in addition to what was in successful operation last year, an improved fast mail service from New York to the West, which places some of the most important Eastern cities in closer mail connection by twenty-four hours than heretofore with Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Indianapolis and St. Louis. It is proposed to extend the fast mail system from New York via Washington along the coast to Jacksonville, Fla., and from Washington via Lynchburg and Atlanta to New Orleans.

THE Ohio Democratic State Convention last week nominated Judge Wm. Lang for Secretary of State, with a full ticket for other State officers. In Missouri the Democrats have nominated Thomas T. Crittenden for Governor. In Vermont the Democratic candidate for Governor is Edward J. Phelps. A Greenback State Convention in California has nominated candidates for Congress in the Third and Fourth Districts. In the Eighth Ohio District Rev. J. W. Keifer has been renominated for Congress by the Republicans. General Tom Browne has been renominated by the Republicans of the Fifth Indiana District.

Foreign.

THE crop reports in England are more favorable.

THE Spanish Queen's confinement is expected to take place next month.

THE grist tax in Italy has been abolished, greatly to the relief of the agricultural classes.

DIPLOMATIC relations between France and Mexico will be resumed in October next.

THE village of Remus, Switzerland, has suffered a loss of ninety-eight houses by fire.

IT has been decided to erect the memorial to the French Prince Imperial in St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle.

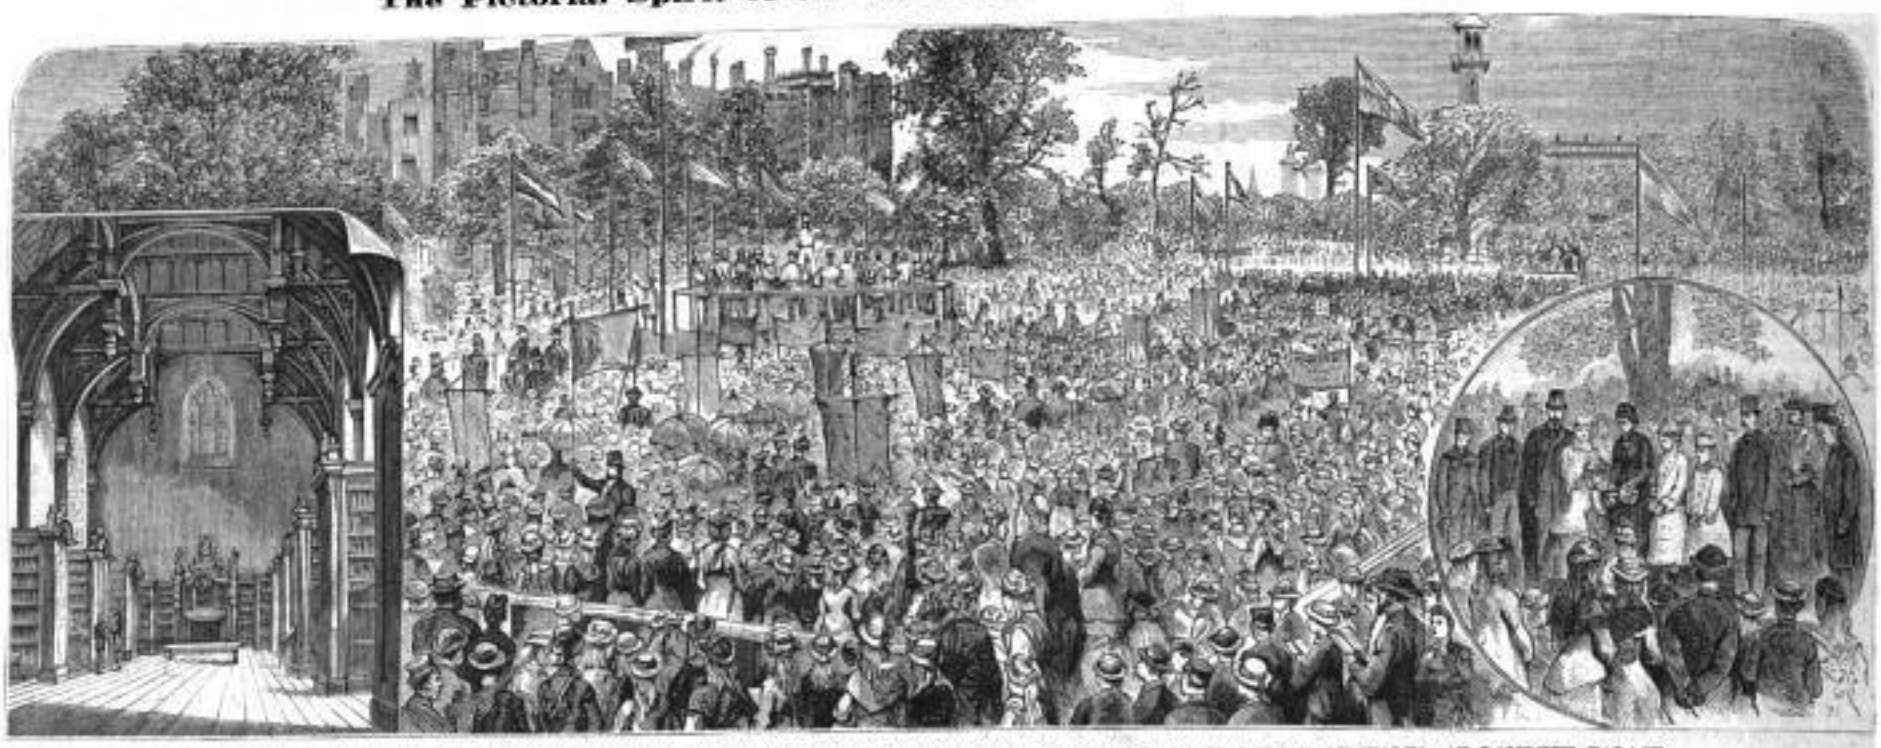
GENERAL THOMASSIN and other French officers will soon proceed to Greece for the purpose of reorganizing the Greek army.

IT is reported that the Turcomans have captured and beheaded the Russian General Skobeleff, whose mother was recently murdered by highway robbers.

IT is alleged that the real aim of Germany in sending certain officials to Constantinople was to hinder any of the Powers from forming a coalition against herself.

THE Governor-General of Canada will, it is thought, resign his post, in order to be separated less from his wife, who, after visiting a German watering-place, will return to England.

THERE are signs of a restoration of good feeling between the Prussian Government and the Catholics, who are well satisfied with the measures recently passed, and hope soon again to have divine service in the churches.



GEORGE BENNET, alias Dickson, who was convicted of the murder of the Hon. George Brown, the Canadian statesman and journalist, who had discharged him from his service, was executed at the jail-yard in Toronto on the 22d.

AN official dispatch, dated at Manila, Spain, July 21st, says there was another shock of earthquake at that place which lasted fifty-five seconds. Not a single public edifice was spared. The Convent of Guadeloup, which had lasted three centuries, was destroyed. Nobody was killed. The inhabitants encamped outside the town.

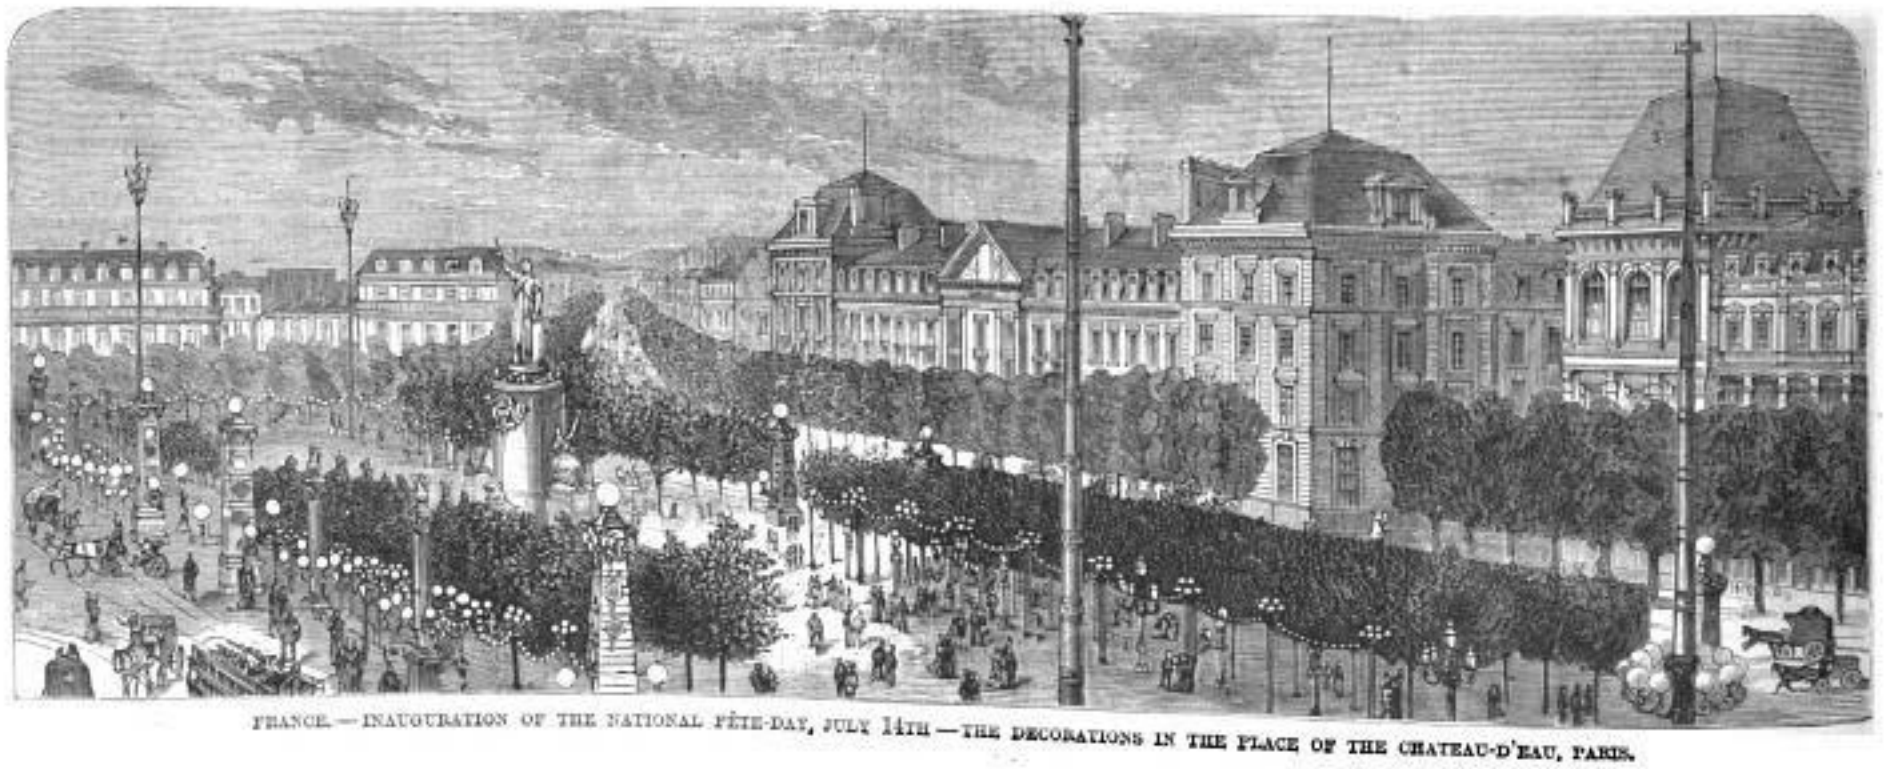
THE Turkish Council of Ministers has decided upon a reply to the collective note of the Powers. The reply asks the Powers to agree in principle that Janina, Larissa and Metzovo shall remain in Turkish possession, and proposes that the Porte shall reopen negotiations with Greece on this basis. This is substantially a rejection of the decisions of the Berlin Conference.

Digitized by Google

The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 383.

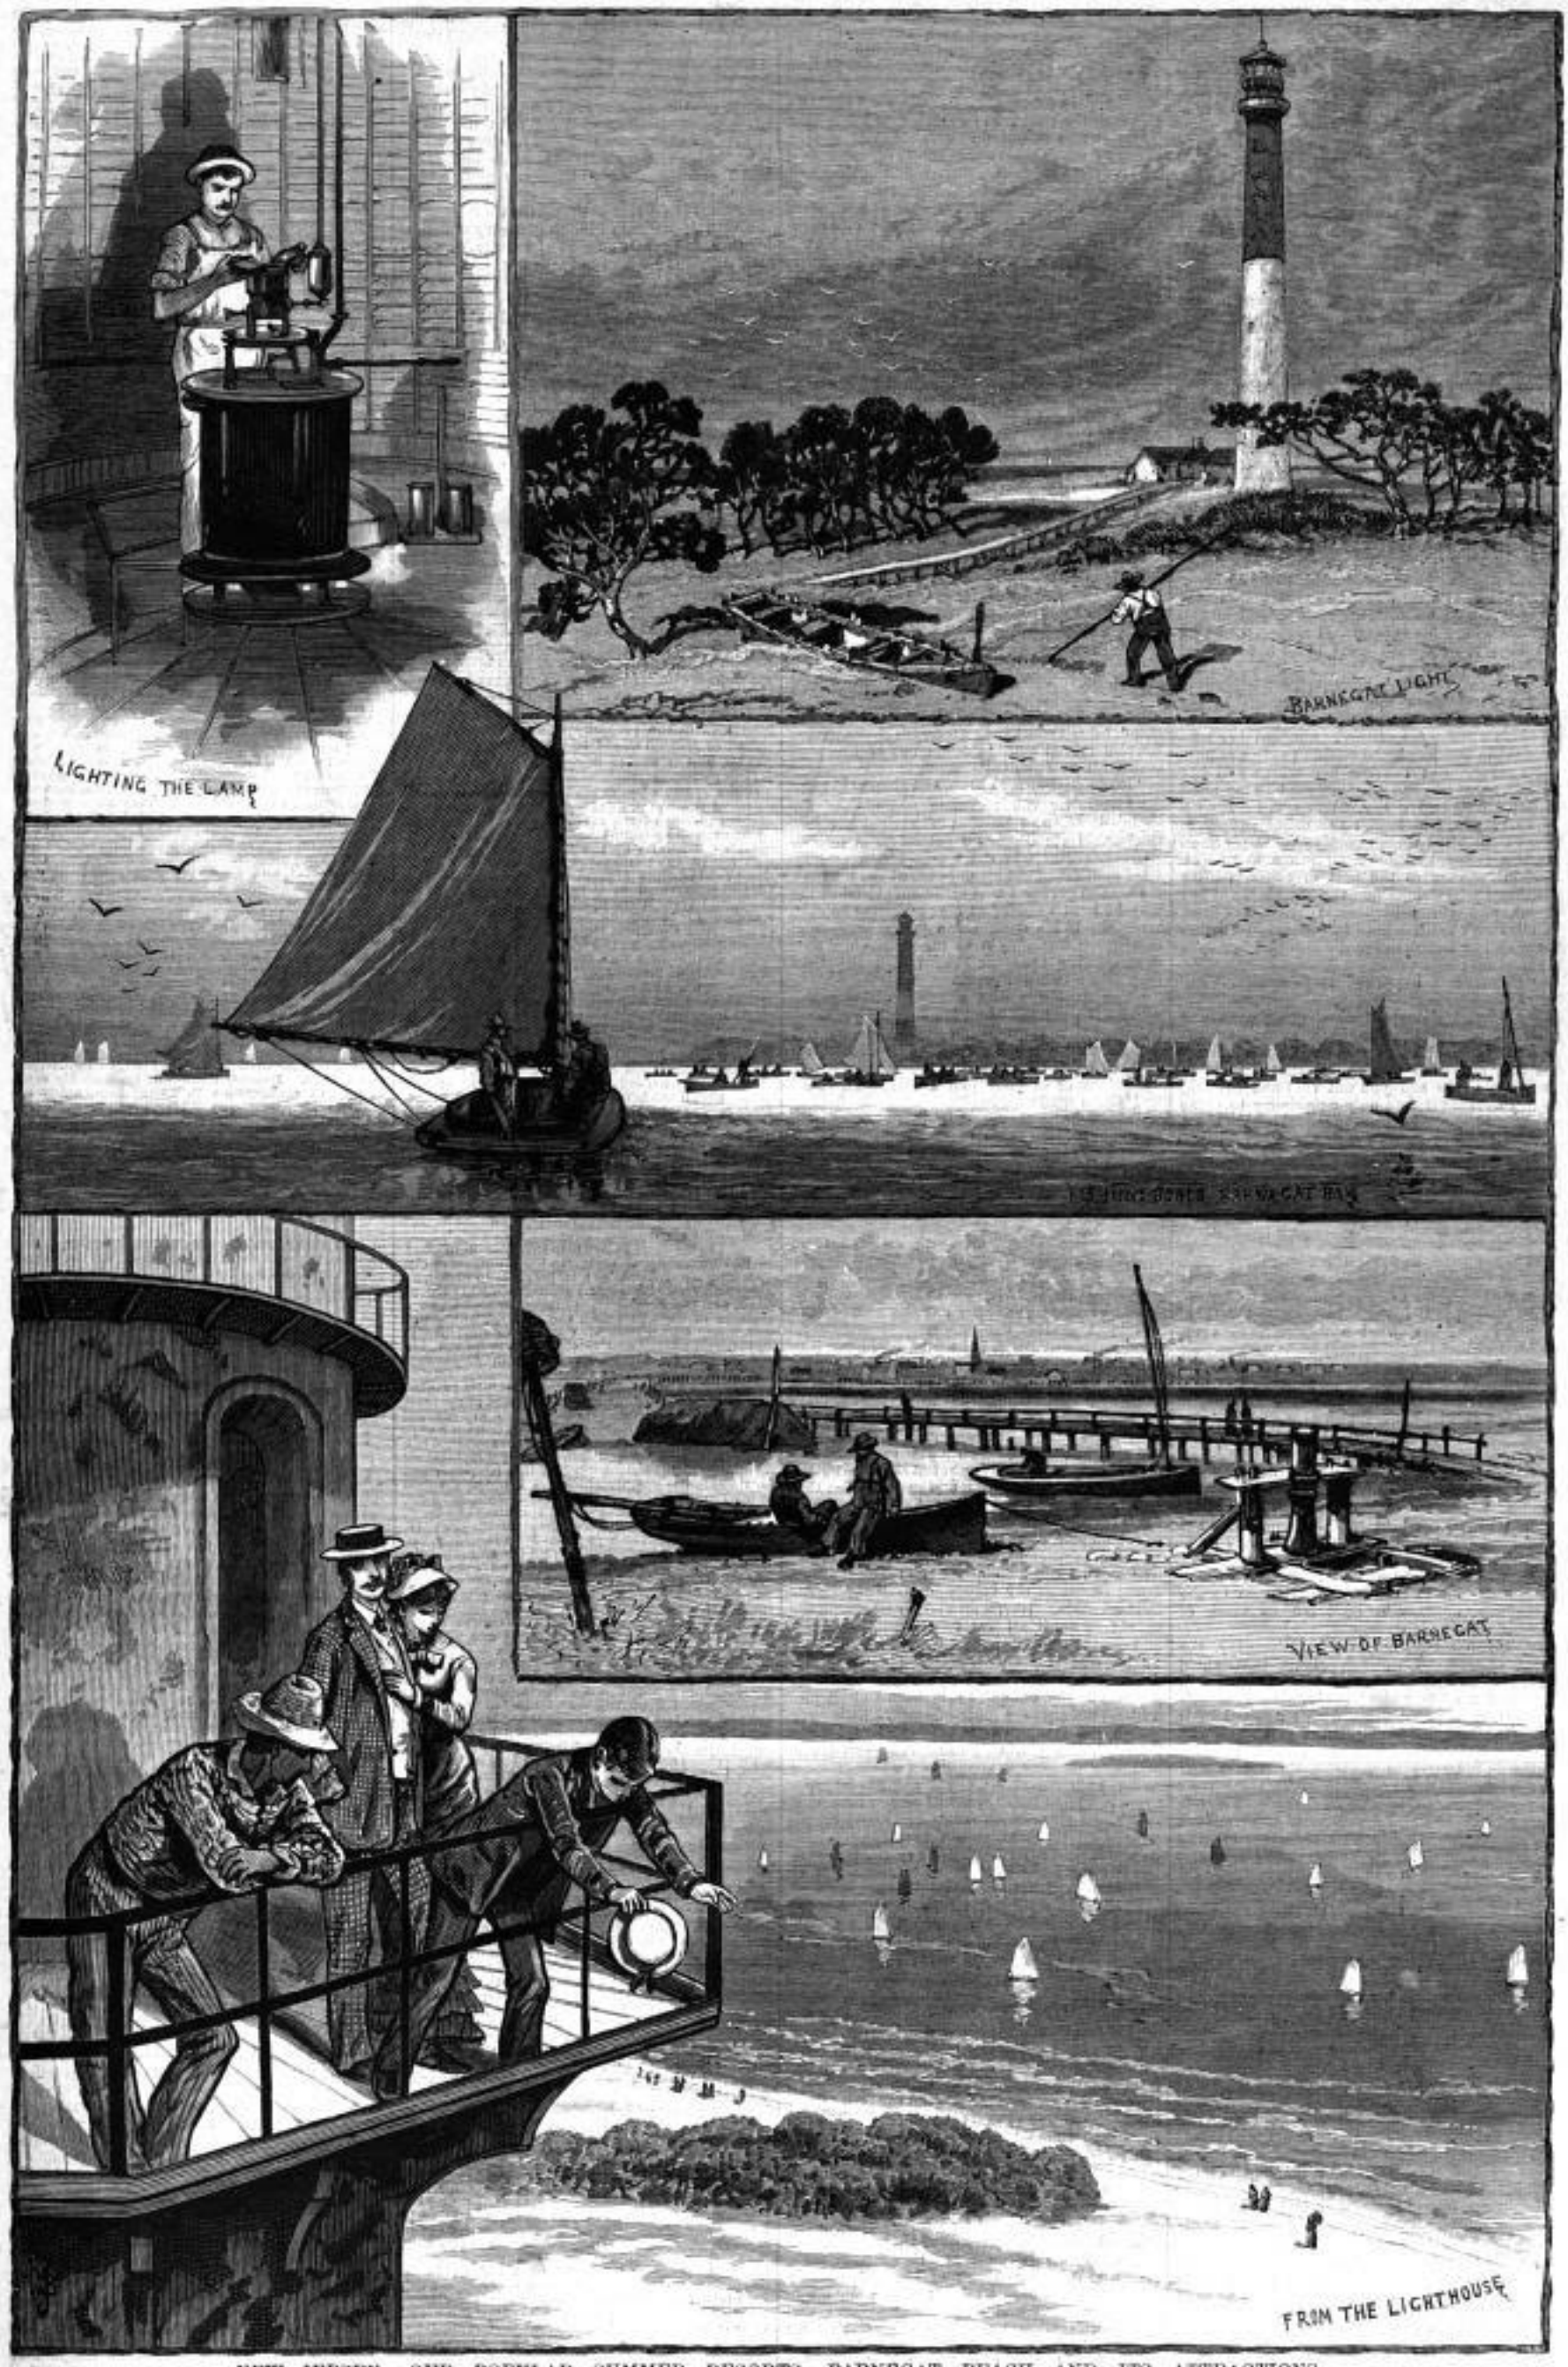
ENGLAND.—THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL CENTENARY—REVIEW OF TWENTY THOUSAND CHILDREN, BY THE PRINCE OF WALES, AT LAMBETH PALACE.

FRANCE.—EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS—THE POLICE OPENING THE CELLS.



FRANCE.—EXPULSION OF THE JESUITS—ARREST OF THE FATHERS IN THEIR CELLS.

GERMANY.—NORTH FRONT OF THE DUSSELDORF EXHIBITION BUILDING.



ASIA.—A CANOE REGATTA ON THE MEKONG RIVER, CAMBODIA.

FRANCE.—INAUGURATION OF THE NATIONAL FÊTE-DAY, JULY 14TH—THE DECORATIONS IN THE PLACE OF THE CHATEAU-D'EAU, PARIS.

Digitized by Google

NEW JERSEY.—OUR POPULAR SUMMER RESORTS—BARNEGAT BEACH AND ITS ATTRACTIONS.
From Sketches by Walter Goater.—See Page 382.

Digitized by Google

A QUEER CRAZE.

"WAL, 'twas curus the way it happened, and I ain't got tired tellin' about it yet. It was swelterin' hot that day, the sort of weather when folks would be glad to take off their flesh and sit down in their bones. There hadn't been a drop of rain for four weeks, and everything looked thirsty. I went about in the afternoon very sorrowful-like, sprinklin' the flowers and thinkin' that the time soon was a-comin' when some one else would be watchin' 'em. Things had been gettin' harder ever since brother Reuben was lost on his last voyage, and I hadn't been able to pay the mortgage interest, and old Squire Jones was gone, and everything in the hands of that wild son; and I'd got notice if the money wasn't paid by the 30th of June everything would be seized. I didn't rightly know how I was goin' to make a livin' either. I was gittin' elderly—nigh sixty—and when folks are as old as that they're like cats, and don't care about new homes. So I sat down very melancholy at the window, and looked out at the little scrap of a garden where I'd worked for years, and began to think of the time when I was a slip of a girl and not so bad-looking, and Pollonius Sawyer used to come and see me and bring me a momentum, as he called it, from every voyage. Lor', the house was just cluttered up with queer old things that Rube and he brought, that wouldn't bring a sixpence at a vandoo. Poor Pollonius! He was wrecked on a strange coast, and no one knows where his grave is. I reckon he had a present for me with him; but I'll never get that one. Ah, me!

"I was a settin' very retrospective-like when I see Miss Vanburen a-comin' in the gate. No hot weather could quench that woman's ardor for visitin'. She had her sunbonnet in her hand, and couldn't stay a minute of course. But I knew her tricks and her manners, and begun a-turnin' over in my mind what I could give her. You see, I'd been a savin' lately, and hadn't the usual supply in the house, but I wasn't goin' to demean myself before Hetty Vanburen. She's a mournful-lookin' woman at the best of times, with a husband who drinks and throws plates at her head, and six rollicking, roaring children. Well, that's neither here nor there. She comes in with her mouth drawed down and her eyes turned up; and I sez:

"'Wotever's happened to you, Mrs. Van,' says I.

"'Why, I thought I must come over and condole with you,' she says, a-turnin' over the word 'condole' with a sort o' relish. 'He says as how he heard down-town that Life Jones was a-goin' to sell you out root and branch, and I thought it was only neighborly to come over and see ef 'twas true. He don't get things straight more'n half the time, 'cos he "sees through a glass darkly," as the minister says.'

"I own I was took a-back at havin' the affair published afore I had time to think it over, as you might say.

"'It's real neighborly,' sez I, kind o' bitter, 'to come over and take tea with me once more; for you see yer opportunities in that line will be nipped in the bud if it's all true.'

"'Then it is true?'

"'Yes?' I sez, kind a desperate; 'very soon, I a'pose, the place that knows me so well will know me no more;' and the tears come into my eyes. 'I'm a lone, lone woman, and where I'll drift to I don't know.'

"'Twouldn't bring much at a vandoo,' she says, lookin' round very keen like.

"'No, I a'pose not; rubbish most of it.'

"'But you've got some good linen as I'd like,' she says, in a manner I considered unfeelin, 'and this ere armcheer's comfortable. I'm sort o' used to this armcheer, and I wouldn't mind biddin' it in at private sale if you'd wait a bit for the money.'

"I was sort o' disgusted at her selfishness—never seemin' to feel how used I was to the armchair, or how it hurt me to think of partin' with the things.

"'It's a melancholy world,' she says, the next minute. 'I think, perhaps, that she'd forgot about the condolin'. 'A pilgrim's progress of a male, and blessed be them what's got nothin'. I sometimes wish I was out of it all when he gets the tantrums and sends the plates flying at my head. I give you my word we ain't got a whole plate in the house, and we wouldn't have a thing to eat off it it wasn't for that cement they call stratena, as I mends 'em with continual. And abuse—you wouldn't believe it, Miss Haddock; a-tellin' me to go to —devilish place, you know. Says I, you'd better be wishin' me in heaven, says I, cos I'd be more out of your way.'

"'Every one's got their cross,' I sez, sighing. 'I've got more'n my share,' she sez, drawin' down the corners of her mouth. 'Sararann Haddock, you was a wise woman never to tie yourself to any male critter. Why it seems more like heaven to git over here to a little peace and quietness; and wotever I'm goin' to do when you're gone——?'

"'I ain't gone yet,' sez I, sort o' snappish—cos I couldn't bear her takin' it for granted that there wasn't a chance for me. We're such curus critters, you see! I kept a clingin' to the hope that God was goin' to work some miracle for me. Now He did, and this is how it came about. I excused myself to go and put on the tea-kettle, and then I found I hadn't a blessed thing for tea. I had milk in the house, but nary an egg, and what kin a body do without eggs. I only had a couple of hens, and they was a-setting and steadily purposed to bring up a family. So, thinks I, I'll just throw on a sun-bonnet and step over to Neighbor Parker's and git some, and Miss Van will never surmise the state of my larder. Lor, I wouldn't a-had the neighbors know that I hadn't a bit of chipped beef in the house for a fortune.

"So I picks up a plate—a queer looking thing, a monstrosity I calls it—that Rube had brung home once. It had a snake like life curled up in the middle of it, and for fear it wouldn't be natural enough it was riz on the stuff, looked as if you could knock it off most, and I often wished I could, for I couldn't stomach the thought of eatin' off it while that varmint was coiled up there: an' as if that wasn't enough, there was snails all around it, and on the border two lizards and beetles and various bugs colored like life, looking as if they'd just lighted there, and, more curious still, if there wasn't two fish laid out with their scales a-shinin'. I never set much store by the thing, but grandma had a great liking for crockery, and she had a pitcher that matched it, so on her account I had never given it away. 'One good of the vandoo,' I sez, with a sigh, 'will be clearin' out all this rubbidge as I suppose will go for a song.'

"Well, I hurried over the track and caught Miss Parker skimmin' her milk, and she was very accommodating about the eggs. When I got to the road again there was a great train stoppin' the way. It was so long, thinks I, I'll never take the time to go round, but just step up the steps and down on t'other side. I was up without givin' it a second thought, when, Lor'! if the pesky thing didn't give a start like it was shakin' itself and the most diabolical snort ye ever heard, and was off like the wind! And I was so skeered I tilted that there plate till the eggs rolled off and lay all smashed about my feet. I could have cried. I hadn't any money to pay for the ride, and I stood starin' about me in a daft way, wonderin' what Miss Van was a thinkin', when the conductor came along.

"'You can't stand on the platform, my good woman,' sez he—'not allowed.'

"'I'm lost! I'm on the wrong train—I mean, I don't want to be on no train at all!' sez I, quite mixed up. 'Put me out at the next station, if you please!'

"He looked at me sharp, and then said:

"'Well, we won't charge you nothin' for sittin' down,' and he sort of pushed me into the car. I stood, after I got in, for a minute scarcely seeing where I was, when a middle-aged gentleman got up and offered me his seat. He was so perlite I was quite surprised at the way he kept a starin' at me; and then he says somethin' to his daughter, a young woman in sage green, sittin' next to me—somethin' that sounded like 'real palacy,' and I supposed they was a-talkin' French.

"The daughter was a good-lookin' young woman if she hadn't had her hair like a Skye-terrier, and a large sunflower in her bonnet, and she talked to me very friendly like. And at last I made bold to say:

"'Wotever is your pah a starin' at. Do I look like a madwoman?'

"'He's a-lookin at that plate,' says she. 'Would you like to sell it?'

"'Lor, I might as well,' sez I, sighin'; and my heart was so full I up and tells them strangers somethin' of my troubles.

"'I have a fancy for that plate,' sez the gentleman, with a real feelin' manner, "and perhaps you've got other things like it at home. We may find a way to help you; who knows?"

"Lor! thinks I, here's another man who likes rubbidge as well as Rube did. So, of course, I invites 'em cordial. It would be nice to have a little money ef I did have to turn out on the cold world. And, bless us, before we stopped at Langley, ef he hadn't given me his card and a hundred dollars for the plate with all them reptiles a-coilin' and squirmin' over it. I couldn't believe my eyes, and took the up-train and got back home in a perfectly dazed manner. Miss Vanburen had gone home in a huff, and I sat down and counted out that money, and looked at it as if it was fairy gold. I most 'spected it would be nothin' but leaves in the mornin'; but there it was, just the same, and then I remembered the visit they had promised, and I hunted about for the truck that had always been in my way, and so troublesome to keep clean. It was all about and lots in the garret. I set it all out on the kitchen-table, and couldn't help laughin' when I looked at it. There was the queerest-looking monsters, dragons and such, rearin' up on their tails with gapin' mouths, enough to frighten a child into a fit. There was a pair of square little pots, lookin' like they was shakin' their fat sides laughin'. They was dull gray, and had Adam and Eve on 'em a shakin' an apple-tree. I never had 'em about, cos I thought 'em improper. Then there was one plate of a greenish-yellow glaze, with sober black-and-brown figures on it. Wal, nothin' very takin' about it, you would say; but that ere gentleman—Mr. Brumbold the card called him—took it up in his hands with a worshipin' look.

"'It's a Henry-Doo!' sez he, most in a whisper, with a look on his face like a fellow who's been to the anxious seat and got religion—sort of a rapt look as if the world might wag on; he was happy whatever came.

"'Never knowed if it's called a honry-do or a honry-don't,' sez I. 'Rube brought it home once, and seems as if it might be more useful than the kind with critters sprawlin' over it.'

"Well, if he didn't up and offer me three hundred dollars for that plate. Sez he, 'I won't take advantage of you, for you don't know the valley of the things, an' you've told me yer in a fix. But what you've got on that table's worth more than your house and lot, and I'm ready to pay the money down!'

"I looked at the young gal to see how she took her pa's speech, but she seemed as pleased as Punch, and was a-exclaimin' over this and screamin' fairly over that, till I began to think I was dreamin' and I'd soon see them go up in smoke as smelt of brimstone like a fairy story I'd heard on. It wasn't for me to refuse this offer under the circumstances, you see. But my heart misgave me as it wasn't doing right. Would you believe it, he'd paid me fifteen hundred dollars for the stuff I would have sold to a ragman only for the sake of Rube and my old lover! Why, I was set up. I only owed Life Jones five hundred, and there was a cool thousand to put in the bank!

"The young lady was so friendly when I was hustlin' around gettin' an empty box and straw for the packin' that I made bold to ask her a question. Her pa was a-fixin' the things in the box careful as if they'd bin live babies.

"'He isn't just all right here, is he?' sez I, touching my forehead. 'I see you indulge him, as I s'pose he has got plenty of money to pay for it, but it's a sort o' craze, isn't it?'

"Well, if she didn't laugh in a very confeelin' manner. 'Yes, it is a sort of a craze,' she sez, 'it's called the Keeramic craze.'"

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

FROM THE BANKS OF THE NILE TO THE HUDSON.

THE great historic obelisk of Alexandria, known as Cleopatra's Needle, and for the immediate acquisition of which this city is indebted to the liberality of Mr. Wm. H. Vanderbilt, has at length reached our shores—the steamer Dessoug in which it was brought across the ocean having reached here on July 19th. The history of the negotiations which resulted in its embarkation is interesting, from the part taken in them respectively by the Khédive of Egypt, Mr. Dixon, Consul-General Farman, and Commander Gorringe. The first practical steps towards bringing Cleopatra's Needle to New York were taken early in October, 1877. Mr. John Dixon, of England, was then transporting to London the prostrate obelisk of Alexandria, which now stands on the Thames Embankment in that city. Ismail Pasha, then Khédive of Egypt, expressed a desire to present the standing obelisk to the United States, with which country he wished Egypt to be on more intimate relations. This becoming known in New York, several prominent gentlemen at once became interested in the project. It was estimated that $75,000 or $100,000 would be required to remove the Needle, and it was at first proposed to raise the money by subscription. When Mr. Wm. H. Vanderbilt was called upon in regard to the affair by the editor of the Ward, he at once offered to defray the entire expense of the removal, $75,000 being then considered the amount necessary. Mr. Henry G. Stebbins, formerly of the Park Commission, who was active in the matter from the first, laid the project before Secretary Evarts, who at once became interested in it and had Consul-General Farman immediately open negotiations with the Khédive for receiving the obelisk. Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe, United States Navy, was selected to superintend the transportation.

The negotiations with the Egyptian Government from that time forward were conducted entirely by Mr. Farman, and extended over several months. Mr. Farman met with obstacles at every step, especially from the opposition on the part of a portion of the officials to parting with any more of the monuments of the past, which was sedulously fanned by the English representative at Cairo. But he finally succeeded in overcoming this, and procured the written order giving it to the City of New York. Had it not been for the general popularity of Mr. Farman with the officers of the Egyptian Government the consent for the removal of the obelisk would never have been given. New York is, therefore, indebted to him more than any one else for the fact that it was procured.

The removal and transfer of the obelisk was intrusted to Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe, who set about his enterprise on October 23d, 1879. During the whole of the Autumn of that year and the Winter of 1879-80 Gorringe was occupied with overcoming the severe material difficulties involved in the task he had undertaken. Owing to the condition of our own steam marine, it was impossible to obtain an American vessel for the service, excepting at ruinous rates, and the obelisk was shipped, therefore, on a steamer of English build, the Dessoug, which was purchased by Lieutenant Commander Gorringe in Egypt, and altered and modified there to suit his plans. In this vessel he sailed from Alexandria June 12th.

The obelisk is a single block of red sienitic granite, nearly 70 feet in height and 7 feet square at the base, and weighs 200 tons. Its four sides are covered with deeply cut hieroglyphics that at one time were filled with gold; and the top, which terminates in a pyramidal point, was once incased by a metal hood or plate. The inscriptions show that it was erected on its original site, by Thothmes III., the greatest of the Egyptian princes of the eighteenth dynasty, nearly sixteen centuries before the birth of Christ. The other inscriptions are those of Ramses II. (Sesostris), who lived over three centuries later.

When the earth and rubbish that surrounded the base of Cleopatra's Needle was removed to the depth of about sixteen feet below the surface, the column, which is not flat at the bottom, but rounded, as though it may have been broken, was found supported at opposite corners by two copper crabs, about 12 inches long, 18 inches broad and 8 inches thick, weighing 300 pounds each. These crabs are attached to the obelisk above, and to the pedestal below, by bars of the same metal, cemented firmly with lead, into mortises cut into the stone. A third corner rested upon stone, and the fourth had no support at all; but it appeared that both these corners had at one time been sustained by crabs like the others. The crabs were found badly mutilated, all the claws and legs of one were broken, and the other had only a claw and a leg remaining, which was broken in turning the obelisk to a horizontal position. The method of supporting the column by these crabs seems to have been adopted to avoid shortening the obelisk, which may have been broken in its removal, though more probably during the ravages of Cambyses in his conquest of Egypt, when, as a translation from Strabo tells us, he "ravished the holy buildings, mutilating them by iron and by fire."

In June, 1877, an excavation was made sufficient to discover the crab with the remaining claw, on the outside of which was found a Greek inscription telling when and by whom the monument had been placed where it then stood. On the inside of the same claw was the same inscription in Latin. At this time both the inscriptions were perfectly legible, but the Latin is now somewhat defaced. Translated they read: "In the eighth year of the reign of Augustus Cæsar, Barbarus, Prefect of Egypt, erected this monument by the Architect Pontius." Augustus Cæsar reigned from 29 B.C. to 14 A.D. The eighth year of his reign therefore corresponds to the year 22 B.C., which is the date of the erection before the Cæsareum, or temple of Cæsar, at Alexandria, of this obelisk and its companion now in London. It was generally believed before the discovery of these inscriptions that these monoliths had been brought from Heliopolis during the time of Tiberius, who reigned from 14 to 37, B.C., but it now appears that they were erected thirty-six years before the commencement of that reign, and about eight years after the death of Cleopatra. The temple was probably completed and dedicated by Tiberius, but it is not improbable that it was commenced by Cleopatra in honor of her son Cæsareum, and that the obelisks were brought from Heliopolis during her life. This is the only explanation that may be given of the origin of the name Cleopatra's Needle. The Cæsareum was also called the Sebastenium, a Greek word meaning august, majestic.

This great shaft was lifted and swung into a horizontal position by means of hydraulic machinery, and supported by nests of plank 38 feet in height that had been prepared for it. The pedestal, a block of red granite like the obelisk, nine feet square and six feet in height, weighing 43 tons, the existence of which was unknown until the excavations of Commander Gorringe revealed it, was removed into a side pit. Below the pedestal were three steps leading up to it composed of blocks of white sandstone with a polish like marble. These steps, or layers of blocks, were firmly fastened together by iron dogs three-quarters by one-quarter inches in size, and from one to two feet in length. The iron was protected with a covering of lead, in the same manner as it would be at the present day. Directly under the place occupied by the obelisk, and in this foundation, were found blocks of stone that are unmistakable Masonic emblems, among which is a mason's square, cut in relief on a slab of red granite; and adhering to one of the blocks of sandstone was a mason's trowel of iron, somewhat corroded.

The obelisk was slowly and successfully lowered nearly to the level of the sea, by removing one at a time the planks that supported it. The gigantic iron framework used in raising the obelisk and carrying it down to the vessel was constructed by Roebling Sons, of Trenton, N. J. The total weight of the machinery was 228,000 pounds. The obelisk, which was twenty feet from the shore, was first raised from its foundations by means of heavy trunnions, bolted at the centre of gravity, and iron bars secured at the base and connected to the trunnions with strong iron braces. Digging in the sand to the level of the water, the workmen constructed a pontoon, and lowered the obelisk upon a crib-work built upon the boat. Meanwhile the Dessoug had been placed in a dry-dock. The pontoon was launched on ways and floated to the dry-dock opposite the bow of the steamship. Then a hole was cut in the starboard bow of the Dessoug, thirty feet in length and twelve in height, and somewhat below the water-line. The crib-work on which the obelisk rested was just high enough to bring the obelisk level with the line on which it was intended to be moved into the ship. A track was then constructed of channel iron bars. The obelisk rested on the flat side of two lines of channel iron, and two corresponding lines were laid from the pontoon to the ship. Between these bars, in the grooves, iron cannon balls were placed, and when all things were ready it was an easy matter to roll the great shaft into the hull of the steamer, swing it into its place, and shore it securely in position.

The voyage of the Dessoug was interrupted only by one accident—a broken shaft. This fortunately was easily replaced. While at Gibraltar, the vessel was visited by persons of all classes. Commander Gorringe says: "Lord Napier, the Governor-General of Gibraltar, and his staff, and nearly all the ladies of the garrison, came on board. They all went down into the hold—not a very easy task for the ladies—and examined the obelisk. Lord Ripon, who was at Gibraltar on his way home from India, also called on us. They all seemed surprised that we had been so successful, and were very hearty in their congratulations."

The obelisk will be set up in Central Park, but at what precise point is not yet determined. A dry-dock will be located as near the point where the obelisk is to be raised as possible to it—somewhere about Eightieth Street. The bow of the Dessoug will be opened as it was opened before, the channel irons and cannon-balls will be brought into use, and the obelisk rolled from its place upon a pontoon or dock. Then a roadway will be prepared of heavy planks placed lengthwise on sleepers, and it can be drawn gradually, by the use of a steam-winch, to its place in the Central Park. The same machinery used in raising it at Alexandria will be brought into requisition here. Possibly there will be Masonic ceremonies in connection with its erection, many regarding the inscriptions as Masonic in character.

Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe, of the United States Navy, commanding the Dessoug, is about forty years old, apparently, five feet eleven inches in height, having a frank and open manner. The other officers were as follows: First Officer, John Bliss; Second Officer, James Cowell; Chief Engineer, John McIntyre; Second Engineer, John Much; Third Engineer, Angus McInnes. In addition to these there were four quartermasters, two boatswains, one carpenter, two stewards, twelve firemen, twelve seamen, two cooks and three waiters. All the money so far expended has been advanced by Commander Gorringe.

Our illustrations show the obelisk as it stood on the Nile, and as it was put aboard the Dessoug for transportation, the "crabs" discovered at its base, the square stones on which emblems, supposed to be Masonic in character, are inscribed, and incidents connected with the inspection of the obelisk by visitors in the hold of the vessel after its arrival here.

BARNEGAT AND ITS ATTRACTIONS.

AMONG the many attractive points on the New Jersey coast few have greater charms for sportsmen and persons in quest of recreation than Barnegat, lying on Double Creek, one mile from Barnegat Bay, in the southerly part of Ocean County. The locality has excellent sea-bathing, is famous for its fishing and great abundance of wild fowl, and has the additional advantage that so far it has not been invaded by the swarms of Summer dwellers who have so completely modernized other points on the coast, as to leave none of the primitive features which, in the eyes of so many, constitute in themselves a chief attraction. To visitors, one of the most interesting objects is the Barnegat Light, which towers majestically from a bed of sand and throws its beams twenty miles seaward, warning vessels against the dangers of the inhospitable coast. During the blue-fishing season Barnegat Bay is usually thronged with sportsmen from New York and elsewhere, who find there the amplest opportunities for testing their skill and experience in capturing this gamey fish.

It is every year becoming more generally known that few parts of the Atlantic coast are as popular with food-fishers as New Jersey. Some nineteen different species are caught in abundance, and over $1,000,000 worth is sold annually. In a single day recently, at one point on the coast, 40,000 pounds of weak, blue and other fish were secured from the "pound" owned by half a dozen fishermen. Persons who desire to enjoy themselves to the top of their bent in genuine sport, free from all restraints of society and fashion, cannot do better than run down to Barnegat for a week or month. The place is some eighty miles from New York, and is reached by the New Jersey Southern Railway.

AN EVENING ON MOUNT ADAMS, CINCINNATI.

WHILE there are a thousand and one attractions in Cincinnati, appealing to the favor of every conceivable taste, no tourist should leave the busy city without passing at least one evening "over the Rhine." Of all the picturesque suburbs, the section north of the canal is the most distinct and unique. It is, in a word, Germany condensed and transplanted thither. German population, German costumes, German diversions, German Mecca in the journey of life, prevail in all heartiness.

Mount Adams, overlooking the southeast corner of the plateau on which the city is built, has streets thickly lined with dwellings on its summit and the western and southern slopes. An inclined railway for passengers, by a plane of about 800 feet in depth and operated by steam, makes an ascent of 275 feet from the bottom to the top of the mount. Formerly the apparatus of the Cincinnati Observatory was erected on Mount Adams, but the property has been transferred to the university, and a site of four acres for a new observatory has been donated at Mount Lookout, some six miles from the city. But there is sufficient mirth, good feeling and attractions to compensate for the absence of scientific properties, and the Mount Adams of to-day is one of the choicest pleasure resorts of the West. The views from the point where our sketch was taken are unsurpassed on this continent. The Ohio River, spanned by three magnificent bridges, the romantic beauty of the Kentucky hills, the picturesque scenery of the Licking Valley, the charming landscape of Eden Park, together with a full view of the Queen City and her sister cities, Covington and Newport, form a panorama of the grandest and most varied character. If the reader has any affinity with the Germans he will not fail of pleasure during an evening on Mount Adams.

Digitized by Google

Bismarck at Home.

As all the world knows, when Prince Bismarck has fretted himself weary of life in Berlin he goes to evacuate at his country house near the village at Varzin. "Don't send me a secretary," he shouts out when leaving the Chancellory, and a secretary is seldom seen at Varzin. The Prince is generally accompanied by Privy Councillor Lothar Bucher, one of his intimate friends, who reads telegrams and letters and writes what instructions are necessary during the absence from the capital. Prince Bismarck goes as the country squire. When a railway journey of some hundred and seventy miles, and an hour's drive through a quiet, well-wooded, undulating country, has brought him to the seventeenth century mansion, purchased in 1867 with the money voted him by Parliament, the transformation is complete, and he is the country gentleman, surrounded by farmers, woodmen, builders, gardeners, shepherds and the large-boned peasantry of Pomerania, who swear by God and cold iron. The house, which he has greatly improved since 1870, is very unpretentious; it has two stories, and is furnished entirely with oak in the style of the early Renaissance. It is simple, massive and strong. The hall is decorated with trophies of the chase, and to its left is the Prince's workroom or study. A large sofa, an equally large table, a Luther's arm-chair, pictures of the war of 1866, busts of the Emperor and Crown Prince, a piece of Gobelin tapestry representing Henry IV. doing penance at Canossa, and a few chairs, comprise the furniture. Here Bismarck, the squire, plans improvements of his estate, drafts regulations for the local Anti-Poaching Game-Preserving Society, of which he is the founder, soundly rates any drunken lease-holder who may be behind with the rent, checks the accounts of the paper mills which he has established on the adjacent river, and drives bargains for the sale of timber and the carting of brushwood. He was sitting in this room in the Summer of 1870 consulting his gardener as to the best kind of onion for planting just then, when a telegram brought in caused him to exclaim, "One moment! I must give instructions in that Spanish business," and the instructions which led to war were given.

No one can make more desperate efforts than Bismarck to be let alone, and were he not Chancellor of the German Empire he would be "the playfullest man" in Europe. None but the members of his family and such friends as Bucher and Von Kendell, now the German Ambassador at Rome, and his cousin, Count Bismarck-Bohlen, are ever at Varzin. Yet the house is large enough to entertain half a company of dragoons, the woods are well-stocked with deer and the rivers and lakes with trout—the Prince's favorite dish. But let there be what visitors there may, the Prince rises at seven, dons a broad-brimmed soft felt hat and a light green coat with horn buttons, calls his dog and strolls about the fields and woods. The family assemble at breakfast at ten o'clock. This meal is served in the English style and consists of tea, cold meat and eggs. At eleven the Prince is usually to be found in his study, the table of which is by this time covered with dispatches, letters and newspapers. These occupy his attention until one o'clock, when the dog, who understands 200 words of German and who generally lies at his master's feet, reminds him that it is time for a drive or a ride. When the Countess Marie, the Prince's only daughter, now Countess von Rantzau, is at home, she never fails to be her father's companion, and he is naturally delighted at the expression of admiration which her horsemanship always elicits. On these afternoon excursions the Prince looks about to discover bold uplands where he may have trees planted, for he is a great lover of the woods, and speaks with enthusiasm of the magnificent oaks and elms he saw in England. These trips also serve as tours of inspection; unscientific farmers are advised as to rotation of crops, and the depredations of poachers are noted.

Five o'clock is Bismarck's dinner-hour, and this is not departed from even in Berlin when he gives the diplomatic dinner on the Emperor's birthday. Four plain courses are served. Bismarck was once a lover of light clarets; lately he has taken nothing but old, heavy wines and whisky. Beer and champagne he eschews altogether, but his guests can select from a large and varied wine-cellar. The Princess does the honors of the table. The Prince leads the conversation and is particularly animated when strangers are present. Should he, on graver thoughts intent, wander from the subject, the Princess recalls him by word or look, though she, for her part, is so busied with the cares of the household that she has been known to drop her knife, and run into the kitchen to scold the servants. When she returns the thread of the story is taken up where she left it. The Prince is never weary of descanting on the exploits of his youth, of which the neighborhood of Varzin was the scene. Touching upon this subject one evening, when he had taken his long patriarchal porcelain pipe to smoke upon the veranda, he said:—"I sometimes wish my father had carried out his idea of making a parson of me. It was very nearly done, too. One of his relatives had already a place in sight where I should at the end of the first year have had an income of at least $750 a year. Something unexpected, however, occurred, and the plan was frustrated; but," said the Chancellor, "I would have been a much better man had I turned parson." To this the Princess refused to agree, and the Prince went off into the laudation of England, which he said was like a garden where he could have lived quietly and happily.

John Sherman's Home Life.

Nothing can be simpler than the home life of this great worker. At home he is not the Secretary of the Treasury nor the Senator in Congress. He works hard, earnestly and to good advantage, in order that he may get through his task and leave his work behind him. When he leaves his office at night he leaves his table clear, and he begins the next day with a blank sheet of paper. Nothing is carried forward. At home he is the most domestic of men. He is demonstrative, he is considerate, he is thoughtful and affectionate. As he does not take his home life to the department, so he does not take his business to his home.

His home in Washington is on the most fashionable street in the city. It fronts on Franklin Square, one of the loveliest little parks in the world, and adjoins the old double mansion of the late Secretary Stanton. It is of brick, painted brown, with brown stone facings and basement. The windows are round and old-fashioned and the steps to the front door are winding from the side, with iron railings. Inside, the house is very comfortably and simply furnished. A few pictures, some pretty ornaments and the usual tables, sofas, chairs, etc., are in the parlor. The dining-room, running across the end of the house, is in the rear. The house would be considered small for a Secretary of the Treasury, but admirable management and clever housekeeping make the Sherman house a pleasant one to visit. The hospitalities are mostly confined to small receptions and dinner parties. Mr. Sherman's family is small, and, to use the language of a friend, "select." It consists of his wife, a lady universally popular here for her gentleness, culture and sincerity, and an adopted daughter.

Mr. Sherman's habits are remarkable for their regularity and method. He spends most of his evenings at home, and, with his wife, pursues his reading. He is a great reader. He takes a great many papers and keeps well up with current events, and he is by no means ill-informed of current literature. Everything new on finance he grasps eagerly, but his great passion seems to be the autobiographies of great men and the lives of those who have made a stir in the world. He often sits up late, but is always the first man in his office. He takes a little package of lunch with him in the morning, and never leaves his room until 4 o'clock, unless business calls him to the Capitol or to the White House. He leaves the office promptly at four, when he generally takes a drive in his "Victoria," behind an ordinary pair of black horses.

Mr. Sherman's house in Mansfield, Ohio, is more pretentious. It is of brick, three stories high, with porches, gables, balconies and creeping vines. It is in the midst of beautifully laid grounds, well kept and picturesque, and no comfort is lacking. Here are most of Mr. Sherman's books and all his private papers. He has twenty acres of land, which furnish him ample diversion when at home. It is here he "fixes his fences." When here, he spends much of his time in his favorite amusement of driving. He has a number of horses, and he makes them earn their living. He is not a lover of horses except for their use, and never owned a fast or a very valuable horse in his life.

It is not generally known that Mr. Sherman came near being the General Sherman of the family. His father died when he was six years of age—the youngest of eight children. Thomas Ewing, great in name and honored in memory, knew the family and offered to adopt one of the boys, either John or "Cumpy," whichever one was "the smartest and the best." After a consultation between the mother and the eldest daughter it was decided that "Cumpy" should be the one. Subsequently he was sent to West Point, and he is now the General of the American army. John went to law, and thence to politics, and it is hard to tell which of the brothers has achieved the greatest distinction. The two boys have always been bound together by a love that is seldom seen. It has never been broken nor disturbed by the slightest cloud. The two brothers have corresponded from the time they were little boys, and John has every letter that "Cumpy" ever wrote to him. They number thousands and make three huge volumes. These letters were written from every place under the sun, from school, from West Point, from the Plains, from California, from abroad, from headquarters in the saddle, in camp, on drum heads and from every place a soldier is likely to be—written, too, with all the honest outpourings of an anxious or a joyful heart, not for the public, but for a second self.

Models in Paris.

The number of models employed in Paris by painters, sculptors and photographers is 671. Italy comes first with a total of 230, or more than a third of the whole list. France is next with 120; but the test as regards France is of little value, considering that the natives of the place would naturally enjoy a greater chance of being engaged. The third and fourth places in order are occupied by nations which might, perhaps, fairly be expected to stand much lower down—by Germany, which provides 80, and by Switzerland, which provides 66. Belgium is represented by 49, and England by 45 models, while the Americans send a contingent of 30. Ireland, which has furnished so many English painters with models of the brunette type, boasts a solitary representative in Paris; Portugal, 2; and Austria-Hungary, 3; but Spain is unaccountably omitted from the list. Out of the whole 671, a great majority are between the ages of sixteen and twenty one. In fact, there are only 130 who are above the last-mentioned age. The professions from which they are taken are the dramatic, furnishing 60 models; the dress making class, 40; flower girls, 35; and workers with the needle, 30.

Burial of English Dissenters.

The burial of Dissenters is a matter that is now receiving much public attention in England. In bringing forward a new Bill on the subject, the Lord Chancellor very truly said that the present law of burials is anomalous and unnatural, and should not be allowed to remain longer in force. He claimed that all persons have a civil right of burial, and yet, as a matter of fact, a large number of Englishmen are denied burial in the parochial graveyards unless there be performed the burial service of the Church of England, and a very considerable number are wholly excluded. Thus, by the ecclesiastical law of the country, the burial service of the Church of England cannot be read over the bodies of those who have died without being baptized, nor over the bodies of those who have died by their own hands. The unbaptized are by no means few in number, since within this class are the children of Baptists, who do not perform the rite of baptism until maturity has been reached. This state of things, as the Lord Chancellor pointed out, shows a denial, not only of religious liberty, but also of a civil right. Efforts to bring about a reform are not made now for the first time. The subject has been repeatedly agitated in recent years, but without overcoming the opposition to a change in the existing law. One of the compromises that have been proposed is silent burial. But what right, it has been asked, has the Established Church to say that all persons who do not accept its burial service shall be interred without any religious ceremony? The Bill offered by the Lord Chancellor provides that on giving twenty-four hours' notice to the rector or person in charge of the parish church, the relatives or friends of any deceased person may have the body buried in the parochial graveyard without the service required by the Church of England. The friends of the deceased are allowed to have either no exercises, or services of their own choice, provided they are orderly and Christian. The Bill prohibits any proceedings which shall tend to "bring into contempt or obloquy the Christian religion, or the belief or worship of any Church or denomination of Christians"; and also the delivery of any address which is not a part of, or incidental to, a Christian religious service. Unitarians, Jews, Turks, heathens and agnostics are thus excluded.

How it is Pronounced.

As the query how Lord Beaconsfield's name should be pronounced occurs from time to time in the American press, the following anecdote may prove useful: When Mr. Disraeli chose his title, he chose a name of which the local pronunciation is beyond doubt "Beckonsfield." Nobody in Buckinghamshire, where this quiet village is situated, ever thinks of pronouncing the word otherwise. But it happened that when the new peer had his first audience of the Queen, her Majesty, in addressing him by his title, pronounced it Beeconsfield. From that moment local usage and immemorial custom went for nothing. Lord Beaconsfield gave it to be understood that her Majesty had settled the matter once for all. He was too good a courtier to dispute the royal orthoepy. If Louis XIV.'s blunder sufficed to change the gender of cerveau, the Queen's ignorance of Buckingham's speech was an equally good reason for metamorphosing the sound of a syllable. And since Beaconsfield as sounded of old is associated with Burke, it is well that a new enunciation should be invented for the title of Mr. Disraeli. Among his near associates his will is always followed. In society the pronunciation varies. On the platform in Midlothian last November, Mr. Gladstone invariably pronounced Beeconsfield.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Sunday-school Children at Lambeth Palace.

The great gathering of scholars and teachers at Lambeth Palace in celebration of the Sunday-school Centenary, was sadly marred by the unpropitious weather. The children, numbering about 20,000, and representing 320 Church of England Sunday schools, were brought from all parts of London, either by road or rail, and marched into the grounds during a drenching torrent of rain. The weather, however, suddenly changed, and the programme of the proceedings was gone through in lovely sunshine. The ceremony commenced with the singing of a hymn by the whole assembly, whose voices were accompanied by the band of the Grenadier Guards. Prayer was then offered by the Primate's chaplain, and this was followed by the reading of a long address to the Archbishop by Mr. Kitto, of the Sunday-school Institute, who presented His Grace with a golden medal commemorative of the centenary. After replying to this address the Primate inspected some of the schools, and presented each of the Superintendents with a copy of the "Teacher's Bible." This had scarcely been done when the shouts of the children announced the arrival of the royal party, which consisted of the Prince and Princess of Wales, the King of the Hellenes, Prince Albert Victor, Prince George Frederick, and the three Princesses Victoria, Louise, and Maud. The Duke of Cambridge and the Duchess of Teck, with her children, arrived somewhat later. As soon as the royal party had taken their places on the dais a bouquet of roses was presented to the Princess of Wales, whose children received handsomely bound Bibles and prayer-books, presented by a deputation of children, one from each school. Another hymn was sung by the children, after which the march-past commenced, enlivened at times by the drum and fife bands of the schools, and at others by the voices of the children singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers, Marching as to War." After passing the dais the schools marched out of the grounds.

The Expulsion of the Jesuits from France.

The three months' term of grace accorded to the French Jesuits to leave their establishments having expired on the 30th of June, the Government lost no time in fulfilling their threat of putting the decree of expulsion into force. On the morning of the 1st instant every Jesuit convent throughout France was forcibly entered by police agents, and their inmates compelled to quit the building. In Paris the chief interest was centred in the headquarters of the Jesuit contraternity in the Rue de Sèvres, where, at 4 A.M., M. Clement, a judicial functionary, and M. Dulot, a police commissary, duly presented themselves at the door and requested admittance in the name of the law. The outer door was opened, and the two officials found themselves in the lobby before the porter a little glass retreat, where the Superior of the convent, Père Pitot, was sitting, with one or two of his friends. The police agents read the decree ordaining the closing of the convent, and requested the inner doors to be opened. This was refused by both Père Pitot and Baron de Havignan, the latter as director of the lay society owning the premises, who protested against the action of the police as an illegal violation of that right of domicile enjoyed by all Frenchmen, and declared that they would only yield to compulsion. M. Clement accordingly sent for a locksmith, who broke open the inner door, and then M. de Havignan, calling attention to the fact that force had been employed, said that it was useless to waste any more time, and volunteered to guide the police to the various cells. At each cell the police halted, and summoned its inmate to quit the building; and as one and all refused to comply, the police took each brother gently by the shoulder in turn; and this being regarded as sufficient compulsion, he then shouldered his packet of clothing and left, being generally accompanied by some Deputy or Senator of the Right, of whom several were present during the proceedings.

New Exhibition Building at Dusseldorf.

The ancient city of Dusseldorf, famous for its art treasures and its art schools, has just added another to its many attractions in this line. The new Exhibition Building, of which we present a view of the north front, is an edifice of magnificent proportions, harmonizing well with the other grand structures in this purely art city. Landscape gardening can show no more beautiful effects than are seen about the grounds surrounding the building. In every particular the structure is an ornament to the city, and a rich offering to art.

Canoe Regatta in Cambodia.

In other lands than ours the Summer sports that have given us so much delight are being introduced from day to day. Perhaps the truth is that, if we knew more about faraway peoples, we would become convinced that in many respects they are ahead of us. Athletic exercises are commonly believed to be an essential part of savage and semi-savage life, but the citizens of the Occident would scarcely credit their brothers of the far East with a knowledge or experience of the more polite sports. And still, so far distant as the Further Indian Kingdom of Cambodia, bounded by Siam, Annam and French Cochin China, the aquatic instinct is strong. The artist, in his sketch of the canoe regatta on the Mekong River, has given us an interesting picture, deserving of being hung beside those of memorable struggles on the Thames, Lake George, the Potomac, the Passaic and the Connecticut.

The French Fêtes.

The fêtes which took place in Paris upon the 14th of July—the new national holiday—were fairly successful. The 14th was fixed upon as the most appropriate day for a national Republican festival, for that day is the anniversary of the capture of the Bastille. The morning was ushered in with salvoes of artillery and the music of military bands. A grand military review was held at Longchamps, where new flags, instead of the ones which were captured by the Prussians in the last war, were presented to the 436 deputations from the various regiments. The tribune from which the presentation was made was occupied by the members of the Senate, the Assembly and the Diplomatic Corps. President Grévy was supported on the right by Léon Say, the President of the Senate, and on the left by Gambetta, the President of the House of Deputies. The city was finely decorated with flags, bunting, statues and arches, but the too frequent appearance of the red, white and blue, without any relief from other colors, is said to have caused a tiresome similarity between the different streets and squares. At night Paris was magnificently illuminated, and military bands played selections from various operas and all the patriotic airs, among which the Marseillaise created a perfect tempest of applause.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—The latest news from Afghanistan seems to point to the early evacuation of Cabul by the British.

—The Austrian Government will send an ironclad to participate in a naval demonstration in Turkish waters.

—The French revenue of $600,000,000 is asserted to be the largest ever received from a population of thirty-six millions.

—This year's yield of tea in India is estimated at 70,000,000 pounds, nearly double that of 1878. Ten years ago it was under 14,000,000.

—The London Home Hospitals Association for paying patients has opened its first establishment. Every patient will be attended by his own doctor.

—There was a violent earthquake at Manila on July 18th. The Governor's residence and many other houses were destroyed, and several natives were killed.

—By the terms of a treaty between Hayti and Santo Domingo all Dominicans hostile to the latter country were notified to leave Haytien territory by July 19th.

—The livery stable in Washington in which John Wilkes Booth hired the horse on which he rode out of the city after shooting President Lincoln was burned July 22d.

—The chairman, manager and auditor of an English insurance company have been sentenced to hard labor for periods varying from six to eighteen months for falsifying the company's accounts.

—The so-called Bad Lands of Minnesota turn out to be very good land, and settlers are raising first-rate crops this season. A branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad is penetrating the region, which is being rapidly settled.

—At Wimbledon Camp the Americans have won the "Wimbledon Cup" and the "Albert Jewel." In the competition for the Elcho Shield, from which the Americans were excluded, the Irish team was again successful.

—The effect of the expulsion of the Jesuits from France is likely to promote their influence, inasmuch as it will so widely distribute them. Scarcely a day passes but we read that a detachment of them has settled in some new field.

—It is stated that the Prussian Government is shocked at the wide and rapid spread of irreligion throughout the Empire, and seriously contemplates the abolition of civil marriages as a means of recalling the people to a sense of their religious duties.

—The French Government apparently intends to leave the religious orders undisturbed until after the dispersion of the Jesuit schools on August 31st. Between forty and fifty novices from the Jesuit monastery at Argers, France, have left Dieppe for England. Numbers of Jesuits expelled from France are daily arriving at Rome.

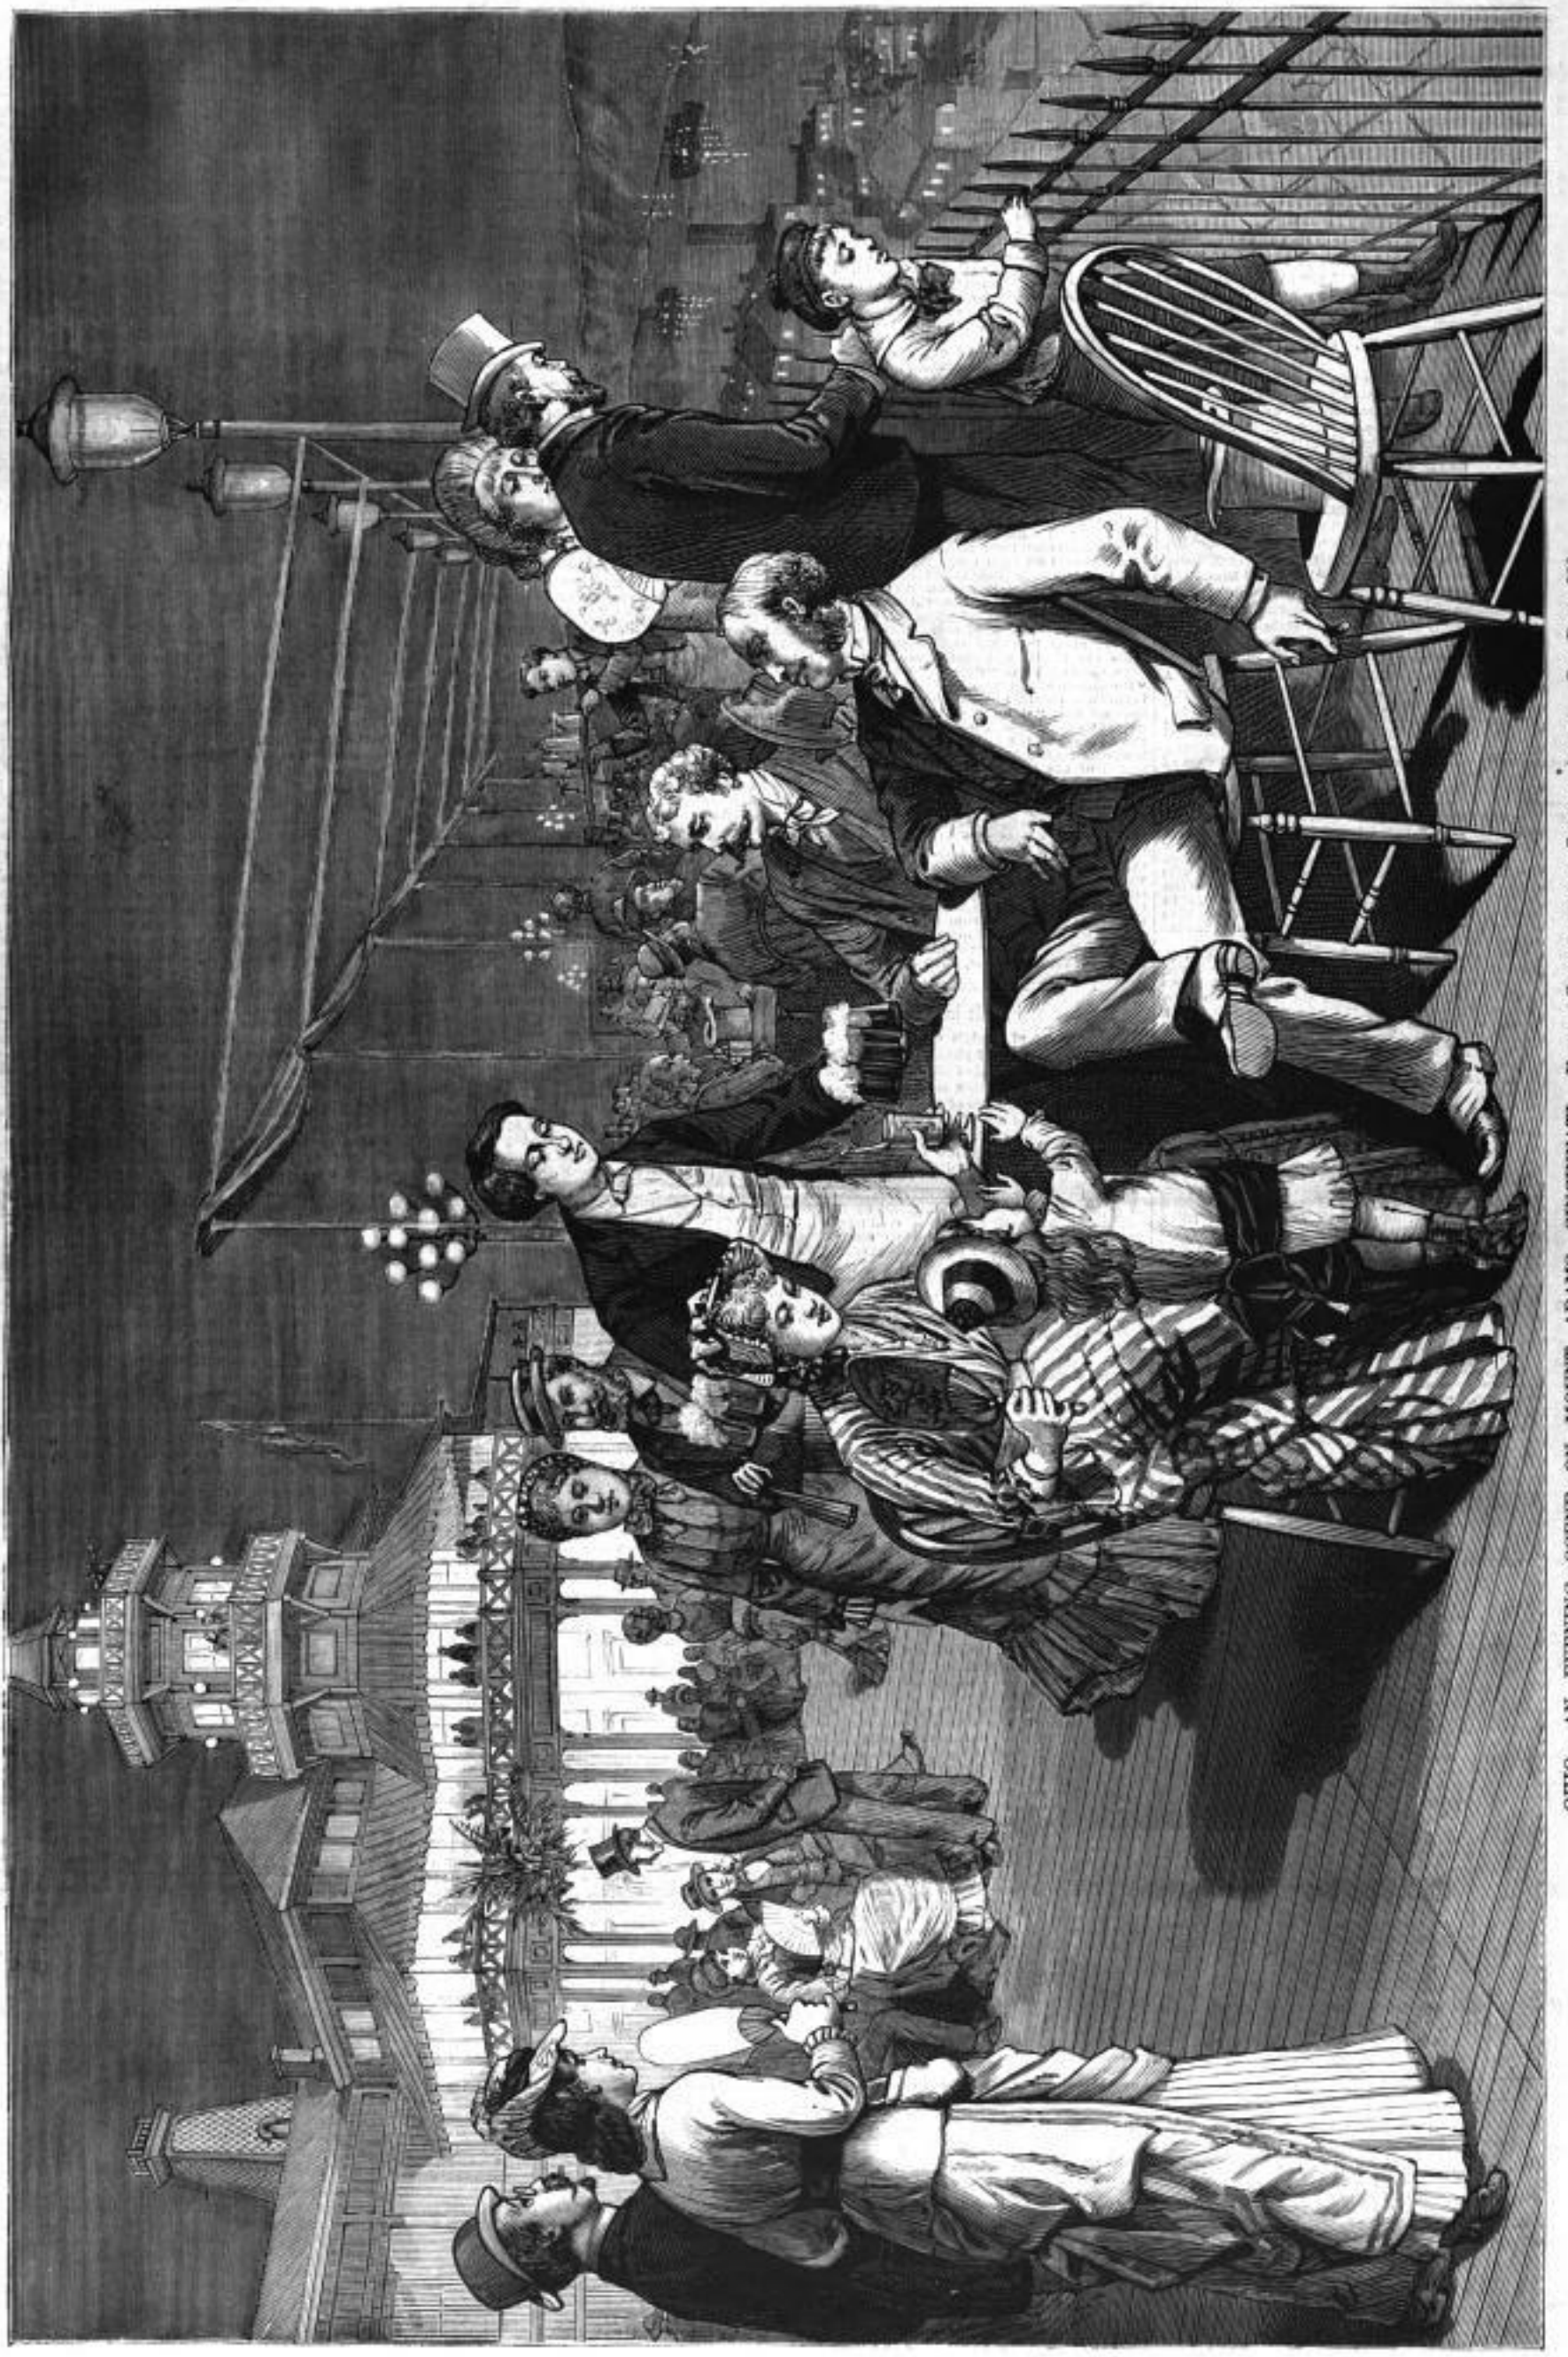
—The War Department, on July 19th, ordered 1,500 tents, along with a supply of cannon and flags, turned over to the committee in charge of the arrangements for the coming soldiers' reunion at Columbus, Ohio, August 10th, 11th and 12th. The President, General Sherman, and a number of prominent army and navy officers are making arrangements to attend.

—The Russian Consul at Alexandria has given notice of the adhesion of Russia to the International Committee of Liquidation. The acceptance of the Committee by the United States—the only Government which has not yet given its adhesion—is expected soon, the Egyptian Government having agreed to the conditions on which the United States made its assent depend.

—It is stated that Dean Stanley has formally communicated the resolution of the House of Commons to the Memorial Committee, under whose orders the Napoleon statue was executed, as an indication that they must find some other destination for it. The chapels at Windsor and Christ Church are spoken of. In Paris the Republican papers express approval of the Parliamentary resolution on the subject.

—The festivities of the fiftieth anniversary of Belgian independence began on Sunday, July 18th, with a grand review of the royal army and the civic guard. The Belgian press entertained that of the world in general on the same day, upward of 150 journalists meeting at a splendid banquet, with the President of the Chamber of Representatives in the chair. Europe, America and India were represented.

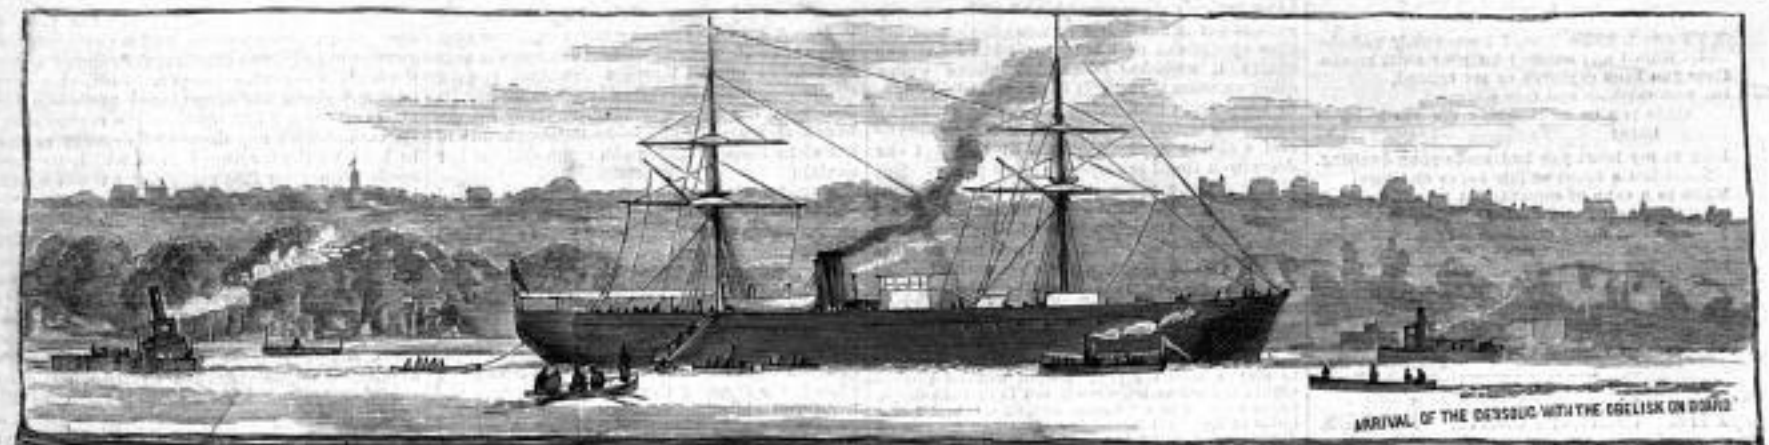
—Greece will acquire a considerable addition to her population by the readjustment of the boundary line between herself and Turkey, but not so large a one as she expected. According to the Greek line she would have had an accession in all of 434,365 inhabitants, while now she will have an accession of 490,865 inhabitants. As regards the extent of territory, according to the Greek proposal, there would have been an accession of 24,237 square kilometres, while, according to the line accepted, there is an accession of 22,075 kilometres.



—The scare of famine fever in the West of Ireland is rapidly dying out, official investigations having proved that the first reports were exaggerated, and that where fever existed it was not from starvation, but ordinary typhus, to which the bad sanitary condition of their dwellings constantly predispose the people. From all parts of the country come the most cheering accounts of the condition of the crops, which are only darkened by reports of the appearance of potato-blight in some districts in parts of Counties Dublin, Sligo, Cork and Mayo.

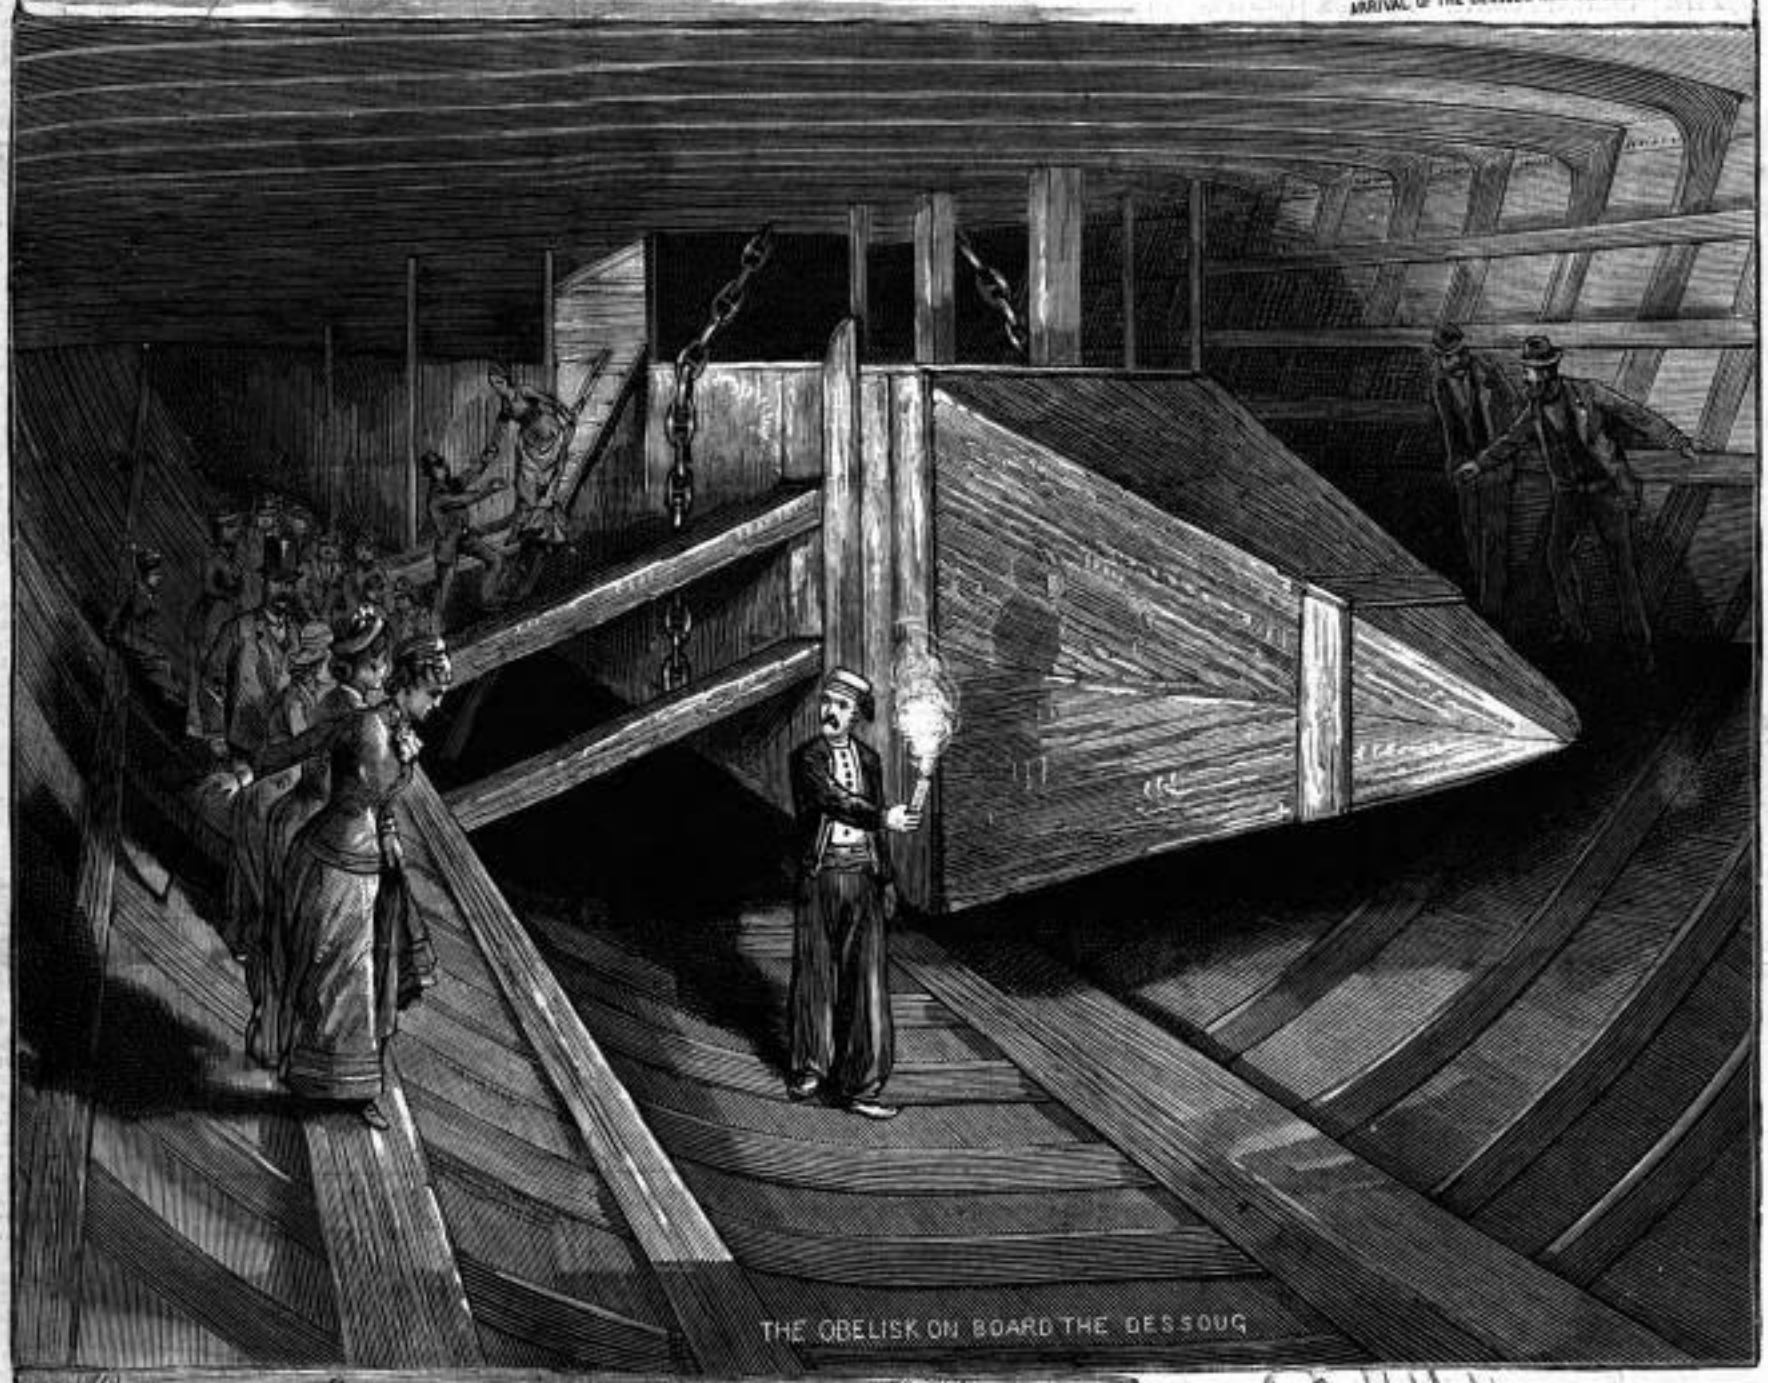
—The Consul of the United States at Havre, France, has transmitted to the Department of State a decision by the French Court of Appeal, Civil Chamber, with reference to the entrance of foreign vessels into French ports and brokerage fees. It would appear from the Consul's dispatch that under this ruling ships can be entered by consignees without the employment of brokers, and our shippers be thus relieved of onerous brokers' fees, which amount to ten cents per ton on French tonnage, reaching in many instances as high as $250.

—The Empire of Austria is composed to-day of the following countries, all of which have at some time enjoyed corporate existence: Archduchy of Austria, duchy of Salzburg, duchy of Styria, principality of the Tyrol, Trent and the Trentine, kingdom of Bohemia, margravate of Moravia, duchy of Silesia, kingdom of Gallicia and Lodomeria, kingdom of Illyria, kingdom of Dalmatia, republic of Ragusa, Bocche di Cattaro and the Primorie, kingdom of Croatia and Slavonia, the Military Confines, the Voivodina and Banat, kingdom of Hungary proper, principality of Transylvania, Sandjaks of Bosnia, Herzegovina and Novi-Bazar (Raschia).



—Of the $677,000 necessary to complete the Washington Monument, $250,000 has been appropriated by Congress; $92,000 has been expended on the foundation, $20,000 for an elevator capable of hoisting ten tons, which has been erected within the shaft and is run by a fifty horse-power engine to carry the blocks to the top. An iron staircase has also been erected at a cost of $10,000. Both will be permanent. The base of the monument is fifty-five feet square, which will be gradually reduced to thirty-four feet six inches at the top. The monument, a simple obelisk, is to be 550 feet high and surmounted with a pyramidion roof, 50 feet high.

Digitized by Google



OHIO.—AN EVENING SCENE ON MOUNT ADAMS, CINCINNATI.—From a Sketch by our Special Artist.—See Page 392.

Digitized by Google

ARRIVAL OF THE DESSOUG WITH THE OBELISK ON BOARD

THE OBELISK ON BOARD THE DESSOUG

SUPPOSED MASONIC EMBLEMS FOUND WITH OBELISK

METAL CRABS FOUND WITH OBELISK

NEW YORK CITY.—EGYPT'S GIFT TO THE UNITED STATES—SCENES ON BOARD THE OBELISK STEAMER "DESSOUG," OFF TWENTY-THIRD STREET.—SEE PAGE 382.

Digitized by Google

LOST.

My sweet, white dove, I have vainly waited—
Waited and watched for your swift return.
Have you been captured or yet belated,
Or, with caresses and care o'ersated,
Come you no more where the watch-lights burn?

Deep in my heart you had made your dwelling,
Nourished a brood of fair hopes and joys;
While in a calm of content past telling,
Sunlight glowing and bird-songs swelling,
I had no dread of the world's decoys.

Folly to love what a cage must stifle!
Folly to hold what would fly away!
Treasures of time are for change to rifle,
Life but a toy wherewith death does trifle,
Love is as long as a Summer day!

JOHN MORAN.

The Schaffuskie Lands.

By Annie Duffell,

Author of "Is the Measure," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.—THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE TRAGEDY.

When Maize enters the castle she goes, as is her custom, directly to Gypsy's boudoir, but the fairy nest of gold and white is empty. She is somewhat surprised, as Gypsy has told her that she will wait up until her return, and gently opens the door of the sleeping apartment. By the faint light from the night-lamp she traces a single form under the downy counterpane—a form from whose dimensions and certain particles of masculine attire tossed carelessly around the room, she instantly concludes is Jack's.

Hastily withdrawing into the outer apartment, she pulls the bell-rope, and a sleepy-looking servant responds.

"Where is Lady Ashhurst?" inquires the young lady, abruptly.

"I thought she was here. She dismissed Lizette in the early part of the evening, and said she was going to bed," is the half-sullen response, as the dark-faced functionary thinks of the sound sleep from which she has been awakened.

"Oh, very well. I expected to find her up, but I will not disturb her. You may go."

Maize speaks carelessly; but when the servant has disappeared a pallor sweeps over her face, and a nameless dread and pain settles upon her heart.

Never in all the years that have since come to her—those bright, triumphant years that have brought to her a beauty and glory that seldom comes to one woman—has she been able to efface from her memory one scene that was branded upon her brain as with a red-hot iron—a scene that shattered the sweet, holy faith of her childhood, and swept upon her a horror from which she never could quite free herself—and that was the sight of Gypsy in Toboskie's arms. She was awakened that night by Jack's drunken frolic, and had rushed to the parlor in time to witness husshame, though she herself was unnoticed. Stricken with a grief and agony that had never before touched her, she sank down in a stupor of misery behind the nearest divan, and received the second blow in beholding Gypsy's madness and sin.

And all this time she has carried about with her the rankling, festering memory of that hour. It has worn down into her heart like a galling band of iron. It has shattered all her faith in womankind. It has secretly embittered her spirit; yet, above all, remembering the courage with which Toboskie put from him this great temptation, this soft, dazzling, lovely woman, it has elevated him above all others. Whatever the future may hold, whatever of strife and hatred shall come between them, no other man can ever stand quite in her eyes as he stands, by right of that steady honor, that matchless strength, that sustained him in that hour of temptation. It tells her that all honor is not a myth, that in the soul of this man, this member of a dissolute court, there was yet that steadfast purity that cried out against injuring the man whose hand he had taken in friendship. It was impossible, after that, that Toboskie could be entirely indifferent to her.

But all confidence in Gypsy was for ever shaken, and she has lived in a great dread; sooner or later she knew that hour of madness would again overwhelm her, and when the noble spirit of this man was not by to save. Therefore, upon her, she felt, must devolve the care of watching over this gay, thankless, brainless thing—this woman, beautiful as the dawn, but a trap of evil. And she has constituted it her sacred office; all through Gypsy's gay, heedless life has watched a fidelity exhaustless, unrepaid by recognition and free from one murmur of reproach or suspicion. And all this has been done for Jack's sake—Jack, between whom and herself is a love deathless and for ever abiding—a love whose depths can never be fathomed or put into words.

Now, as she stands in this bower of beauty, she feels that the hour for which she has been looking and faithfully striving to ward off, has at last arrived, and she does not feel equal to it.

But she rouses herself, and resolves to make a thorough search before accepting the worst. First of all, she seeks Valentine's chamber and gently tries the lock. It refusing to turn, she instantly concludes that its owner has retired for the night, and noiselessly continues her search. Not a chamber in this old castle—all heavily shadowed and draped; all filled with gloomy beds of state and darkness—does she fail to inspect, while the darkness seems to take shape and advance towards her as she stands upon the long disused threshold and peers in these apartments which the spirits of those dead nobles seem still to inhabit.

But not a trace of Gypsy can she discover. The childish, lovely Lady of Ashhurst seems to have entirely disappeared, and with a weary pain at her heart, Maize returns to that dainty bijou apartment that is Gypsy's boudoir. She enters it noiselessly—always above every other emotion that great desire to shield Jack, to keep from him, as long as possible, every knowledge of Gypsy's weakness and perfidy—and sinks in a chair. Then at her feet she descries a small crumpled roll of paper. Mechanically she picks it up, and almost unconsciously straightens it out upon her lap. Then she starts as though a bullet had pierced her, and a death-like pallor suffuses her countenance, as she bends over, and, with staring, half-blinded eyes, reads the words before her.

"Lady Ashhurst—The affection with which you must see you have inspired me, will, I trust, in a measure, excuse in your sight, the liberty of this note. Claire, come to me—for the love of God come to me! I must see you. I shall look for you to-night; not before ten o'clock, not later than three. Come directly to my castle, and, by the honor of a noble of Russia, I swear you shall run no risk of discovery. I know the past, with all its sin and weakness. I know of that Summer spent in Greece with Claudio Despucio! I tell you this, not to torture you, Claire, for God knows I would save you every pang, but to show you that you must come to-night, and if you obey me your secret is safe.

"L."

As she ceases reading, Maize leaps to her feet, and her hands clinch; all the soft, Southern langor, all the rich, voluptuous beauty, die out of her face, and it hardens until, in its stern, set grandeur, it looks carved in iron. There is no name to the note, but it bears evidence more indisputable than a signature—the haughty, peculiar crest of the powerful Lagors, that she has often seen upon his communications when he has sent invitations to the opera, etc., and which is carved deep in the gray stone above his palace door.

An agony of rage and horror is upon her, and a shame that she never thought could touch her, bends her proud spirit to the dust—shame for this fickle, faithless woman, whom she has been taught to consider a mother, and who is the wife of the man who has been to her more than a father. Standing there, in the dead silence of the night, confronted by the gold and glittering toys that surround this faithless wife, she is stricken with a horror of her sin that briefly robs her of all strength.

In her agony she does not notice that allusion to the past—that terrible menace that held such a horror for this poor, weak, erring one, that she braved all things to obey the summons of the man who ever after must be her master—she only knows that Gypsy is sunk, lost forever; that Jack is betrayed, his honor outraged, his proud name dragged in the dust. Gypsy has gone to this nobleman, this roué, this man without an atom of reputation!

A great, dry sob breaks chokingly in her throat; it is for Jack, always for Jack! the woman herself is not worth the saving. But she thinks of the husband sleeping in unconsciousness in the next chamber—that husband noble through debauchery—dignified in his weakness, faithful in dissipation, and with all the grand entire faith of his soul centred upon his wife, who never had but one rival—wine!

She is aroused from her weakness and horror; she will save Jack, if possible, from a knowledge of this inestimable perfidy that encompasses him. In her eyes deepens a grand purpose as her haughty spirit rises in all its strength and heroism to go forth to its mission—that mission that shall slaughter her life, perhaps, for all eternity—that shall lay it waste like a devastating flame, with only charred and worthless cinders to show where once the plain of her life stretched clear and sun-draped in its rich promise.

Without wasting to change the trailing silken robes of her ball costume, she catches up a cloak and, leaving the chamber, steals noiselessly down the great steps through the broad hall, and finally, opening the door, stands out in the night.

Without an instant's hesitation she descends the steps and commences her journey. It is a wretched night. The darkness is intense, pierced only at intervals by the flickering uncertain light from the street lamps; around the corners and down the level aisles of the streets the fierce Russian winds sweep with a force that nearly staggers her, and the rain falls in torrents, beating mercilessly in her fair face and freezing to sleet upon her soft and delicate flesh. It is her first bitter experience with life, yet she never hesitates in her course; her resolution is taken and no mortal power could swerve it. She is chilled to the heart; her delicate limbs beneath the priceless robes are numb with the fierce cold; the silken sandals in which she danced away the earlier hours of the night cling wet and soiled to her aching feet; her small, jewel-flashing hands grasp, wet and senseless, the cloak heavy with the rain and the sleet. In all her life she has known no want or hardship, has been pampered and caressed almost to ruination, and her delicate Grecian nature makes her peculiarly sensitive to this terrible cold; yet her courage never falters. In her eyes is that steady purpose that sustains her as she makes her way with slowness and difficulty through this night, from which even the hardened, sturdy natures of the natives would shrink.

The rain and the wind and the sleet come down, yet on and on she staggers, growing weary with the way, her feet blistered by the stones that have worn away the slippers; her eyes are almost blinded with the cruel sleet. Yet she never falters; it is for Jack's sake—to save him from a consciousness of his wife's guilt—that guilt that would surely kill him did it ever come to his knowledge. And she prays as never before in all the glad, triumphant years of her sovereignty, has she ever prayed that she may not be too late, that she may bring Gypsy back to outward honor—may bring her back before Jack knows—even though her soul be stained with a blackness that even the blood of Christ could scarcely wash clean. On and on she presses in her dreary way, never faltering; and now behind her she hears steps. Turning, she sees by the aid of the lamps a drunken, reeling figure which she perceives is pursuing her. It is one of the people returning from his debaucheries, and as she looks he shouts out to her some Russian oath and a command for her to stop.

Half-fainting with terror she turns, and summoning all her strength speeds down the street with a celerity lent by her fear. On and on she runs, the exercise quickening her pulse and warming her chilled blood, in which way it is beneficial and probably saves her life. But in turning the sharp angle of a street her foot slips upon a piece of ice, and she falls with all her force upon her injured arm. Still delicate from the accident, though weeks have passed, the force of the fall again shatters the bone, and a blinding, maddening torture fastens upon her whole system which for an instant holds her prostrate upon the ground.

Then recovering herself she struggles to her feet and staggers on, white to the lips and blinded with her great, exhausting agony, still adhering by instinct to the right course. At last before her looms up a dark mass of masonry; looking up, she sees it is the castle of Count Lagors—that fatal, accursed den of iniquity which she believes has swallowed up Gypsy.

With her teeth set tight and her eyes blazing, she ascends the steps and rings the bell with her well hand, her broken arm hanging limp beside her, and, in her agitation, unconscious of the striking spectacle she presents with her soaked garments, her flashing jewels, her lovely face and golden wind-tossed hair.

CHAPTER XXII.—PETER'S SERIOUS MISTAKE.

The door of Castle Lagors is opened by Peter. He looks out curiously and sees that wild and lovely apparition as she stands upon the threshold.

Without a word he steps aside for her to enter, and recloses the door. He is, as nearly as is possible for one of his staid and steady nature, overwhelmed with amazement at the condition of this fair visitor, who, seeing his curious regard, draws herself haughtily erect, and flashes upon him the full fire of her magnificent eyes.

"Is your master alone?"

Her voice is low and eager, and through it runs a ring of command, showing the discriminating Peter that she is one upon whom wealth and rank have set their seal.

"Yes, madam," is his perfectly polite reply.

"Quite alone! Are you sure that no lady has been here this evening?"

"I am positive, madam. No lady has been here, or is likely to be here, such a night as this. No one is expected but yourself, madam."

In her joy and thankfulness, Maize fails to perceive the rather doubtful insinuation of Peter's speech. Of one thing she is plainly aware: Peter has been apprised that his master expects a guest, and has quite naturally mistaken her for Gypsy. She does not correct the mistake.

"Take me to your master at once."

Peter is scandalized by this indecent haste; even among that style of women that he has been in the habit of admitting to midnight revels with his master; such indelicacy is unusual. With Peter the bump of self-consequence is fairly developed, and his high station is always properly regarded by these midnight visitants, and himself treated with flattering distinction.

But this insolent young person who confronts him in her wondrous and magnificent womanhood, who issues her commands like a court-lady, who looks in her dazzling loveliness like a sovereign, even while yet, to his near-sighted vision, the stamp of evil is upon her haughty brow—for her Peter is seized with a violent and fatal prejudice, a deep-rooted dislike, the secret of which is jealousy. The whole nature of this man has become entwined about his master. He loves him with a love passing that of woman, holding in it all the watchfulness and forbearance of a parent, all the tenderness and faith of a child. And with a pang of rage and jealousy he conducts her to Lagors's private chamber, into which she disappears, and, with a gloomy brow, he returns to the hall.

A restless anxiety is upon him; over the house rests a ghostly silence, upon which breaks only the sound of his footfall as he paces back and forth the long, tiled hall, with its gloom and gore-hued splendor. Time passes, and now through the sleeping city comes the chimes of its clocks striking the second hour of the morning.

Peter can no longer control his impatience. Up the grand staircase he goes slowly, and down the corridor, past that closed door of his master's chamber. Here he cannot forbear pausing a moment; and as he stops, upon the silence suddenly breaks the loud, angry voice of Count Lagors, followed by the cold, resolute tones of a woman—that woman whom he admitted so recently. Strive as he will he can catch no word, nothing but that deep swell of voices, showing that a contest is waging. Deeply mystified, and as greatly surprised, he once more turns and descends to the hall. When he has been here perhaps half an hour he sees the visitor coming down the staircase. In the gloom and shadows her face, filled with an exhausted pain, gleams forth transcendently beautiful. He sees that she staggers with the faintness of suffering, and that her eyes are wild and agonized.

As she reaches him she pauses and leans heavily against a piece of statuary, and he notices more distinctly that great, appealing pain in her eyes as she turns them upon him, and with a suppressed groan raises her suffering arm.

"It is broken," she says, faintly. "I fell. Will you bind it up? It pains me very much."

Peter is amazed. Surely there has been a desperate battle up-stairs, and a vague shame sweeps over him at this brutal evidence of his master's execrable temper. Still, this fact does not shake his deep-rooted prejudice for his companion; but, despite his repugnance, he cannot with any degree of decency refuse to bind up the fractured arm, which he proceeds to do, after first procuring a towel which he tears into strips.

This somewhat eases the pain, and Maize starts out in the storm and night. Her heart is lighter than when she came, though the rain and sleet and cold are as bitter and the night as dark. Still, Gypsy was not there. That is the greatest blessing, and upon further consideration she easily convinces herself that Lady Ashhurst must have been somewhere about the castle—perhaps even in her own chamber asleep. This is quite possible, as the light in the sleeping-room was dim, and Jack's sonorous snoring might easily have drowned the dainty sound of his wife's soft breathing. Besides this, after a stormy interview and she had convinced the count of her knowledge of his love for Gypsy, she had succeeded in getting a partial promise from him to withdraw his addresses, which were a crime and a disgrace. So she walks onward through the tempestuous night, all unconscious of the nearness of her miserable destiny, her heart light, but the ache of physical suffering still heavy upon her.

CHAPTER XXIII.—THE WHILOM GUNSMITH.

"Henry Dornsdoff, Attorney of His Majesty's Law." These words are traced in gleaming letters upon a shingle tacked to one of the many broad doors similarly decorated that abound in the large public building situated close to the State houses in St. Petersburg.

If we step within we will see a large, square office, barren and devoid of all semblance of comfort, around which are strewn numerous high desks, above which crop up heads of every color, and belonging to the young aspirants of His Majesty's law, commonly known as "clerks." These miserable victims of necessity, at present in a relax state, are perched in a reckless manner upon high, three-legged stools, and with wild abandonment are devoting themselves to the enjoyment of the moment, which, for the oldest, consists in a few minutes silent rest from the wretched scribbling kept up from dawn until nightfall; for the next in age, in cracking stale jokes, some a trifle dark; and for the youngest, in firing sundry dilapidated and aged pen-wipers at their neighboring contemporaries.

But a step sounding from an inner chamber warns the idlers of the appearance of the enemy, and instantly every head is ducked, and every hand resumes its weary journey across the sheets of writing paper. A door opens disclosing an inner office comfortably and even luxuriously furnished, and now into the midst of his dominions steps Henry Dornsdoff, attorney-at-law.

He is a man of medium height, but thick set and powerfully built. His head is of immense size, with long bushy hair that looks like a bull's. Though his head and body are so massive, his face is thin, even cadaverous, giving him a startling appearance. His features are straight and well-shaped, his lips particularly being thin and evenly chiseled and firmly closed. His eyes are large and brilliant, shrewd, quick, suspicious, showing the keen and able nature of the man. The width of the head is startling, showing of what immense size is the brain. Henry Dornsdoff is a man of the people. The son of a clever gunsmith, at an early age he showed signs of an unusually powerful intellect and a great fondness for study. Being possessed of the same insatiable ambition that characterized his father, with that father's assistance and persistent toil, young Henry was given an education far beyond his station and finally sent to a law school. After that for for some years the world lost sight of him. Then one auspicious (for him) day, he reappeared before it, pleading the cause of the kingdom in a great criminal case then agitating the country. And he was successful. No one asked whither he had come—no one made unpleasant inquiries as to how and where his past had been spent, but the world accepted him. He had dropped among them as a thunderbolt, and from that day his fame and fortune were established. His indomitable perseverance and ambition, his powerful brain and energy, had cleaved their way to eminence.

To day if you were to say to the most ignorant of that great city, "My friend, who is the cleverest man in St. Petersburg?" the answer would be—"Henry Dornsdoff." His advice is solicited in all the most intricate and important cases of the day. He is freely acknowledged to be the greatest criminal lawyer of his age.

Yet this eminence has not been attained without bitter pangs of deadly struggle. Henry Dornsdoff, were he inclined, could tell a surprising story to the world; for, in his down-trodden, locked up heart he has kept a chronicle of all the ills of his life, which have neither been light nor few. The years that have hidden him from the sight of the world have been marked with the weary torture of struggle, poverty and ambition. Coming of that crushed and down trodden order, the people, every circumstance in his life was against him. Scorned and ignored by the aristocracy, gibed and ridiculed by his own order, those hidden, shut up years of the attorney's life hold an agony and torture inestimable.

Therefore it is, perhaps, not unnatural that in his heart should be a rancorous and implacable hatred for the nobility. This class has been his enemy; were it not for them he could have stepped upwards to his high goal with comparative ease. All that hidden torture of shame and poverty and neglect, of hours of endless labor and abuse, all the want and bitterness that set upon his life are due to the haughty and exclusive aristocrats.

Digitized by Google

From his station of obscurity and deadly want, as he struggled on to his high attainments of the future, he watched with a sort of envious and maddening fascination the career of one man his own age, and by whose castle he, in his boyhood, dwelt; watched as he, the young aristocrat, the son of a long line of haughty counts, glided on without the slightest knowledge of want or trial to his high distinction among the nobles of his land—this land that honored and courted the scion of nobility—that showered upon him its brightest smiles and choicest favors, while it oppressed, scorned and frowned upon the struggling son of the gunsmith.

Watching, as he did, the brilliant career of this favored individual, this pet of royalty and fortune, it was quite natural that the distinguished success that crowned his efforts should sow seeds of hatred and bitter hostility in the breast of this beggar, this wretch, standing outside of the heaven of fame and distinction, looking with weary, envious eyes at the station from which he was for ever debarred.

Therefore, to the soul of Henry Dornsdoff his career and that of that proud and powerful statesman, Count Raoul Tobolskie, are entertwined. And even now that he has attained his eminence, in his breast is that bitter strife, that envious, rancorous dislike that took root in his youth. Do all he can, struggle as he will, he tells himself he can never be this man's equal—this man, distinguished above all others by right of his haughty order, and shielded and sustained by the proud purple of aristocracy; this man, whose voice literally governs the kingdom, who makes the rules that he, the attorney, with all his brain and wealth, can but execute.

While one is the confidant of the Emperor and the Russian courtiers, the other is, in one sense, a slave to his laws and a member of the people.

It is this secret bitterness and strife that have won for him the reputation of a cold and unfeeling man; that have soured and embittered his nature; that gives to his emotionless countenance that cold and icy exterior. He is a man entirely alone. His father, not allowed to witness the triumph of his son, and the result of his sacrifice and toil, died of a malignant fever soon after his son graduated in his studies. Since then no human being has had any title upon the attorney. His existence is dull and solitary. Outside of his office he has no confidants, no friends, and would be happy if he could have no acquaintances.

Such a man is Henry Dornsdoff, and who will presently figure more largely in this history, but who we will now leave in his office surrounded by his satellites.

(To be continued.)

THREE NEW STEAM YACHTS.

THE progress and improvement made in marine architecture during the last few years are quite as remarkable as in any other department of invention and enterprise. Much of this improvement is, no doubt, due to the stimulus supplied to inventors and builders in the growth of the yachting spirit among men of wealth. Among the latest and most elegant additions to the yachting fleet of New York are the Stranger, built for Mr. George Osgood; the Corsair, built for Mr. C. J. Osborne, and the Polaris, built for James Gordon Bennett. The Corsair and the Stranger are practically sister ships. Their tonnage and dimensions are almost exactly the same, and their construction is on the same model. They are both schooner-rigged, with hulls remarkable for beauty, grace and delicacy of lines. They are 186 feet long, 24 feet beam, 11 feet hold, and of 247 60-100 tons measurement. The Corsair's engine is of 170 indicated horse-power. It is like an English compound engine with improvements, is very compact, and is a beautiful piece of machinery. The high pressure cylinder is of 24 inches diameter and has 24-inch stroke. The low-pressure cylinder is 44 inches in diameter. There are two tubular boilers of 11 feet diameter, 20½ feet long. There is one iron collision bulkhead and four water-tight compartments. The engines and boilers are cased in by iron bulkheads. She carries forty-four tons of coal, and will use about ten tons in twenty-four hours under full steam. A steam windlass, two steering apparatuses, electric bells and other modern improvements are part of her equipment. The propeller is a graduated screw of 11 feet diameter and 18 feet pitch. There are four boats on deck, three of wood, one of iron.

The hatch-coamings and joiner-work on deck are of mahogany, and the brass work is profuse and tasteful. Below everything is in mahogany and cherry, with tiled floorings, and ceilings picked out in exquisite taste in light, delicate colors and graceful designs. The interior decorations are extremely elegant. The main saloon is 10 by 18 feet. It is upholstered in raw silk and plush, with black and old gold as predominating colors. A handsome fireplace, with a mantel of odd design in Eastlake style, is opposite the companion way. A large sideboard is on each side, the two spaces between at each end being filled by divans richly covered. The principal stateroom is large and roomy. It is on the starboard side and is about twenty feet long, divided into two rooms by a crimson velvet plush curtain. There are three other staterooms of smaller size, a bathroom, closets and innumerable conveniences, such as steam-heaters and steam-ventilators, electric bells, etc. The forecastle has accommodation for fourteen men. Aft of this is the officers' messroom, with their staterooms opening off. Abaft of this again is a kitchen that is a model and a marvel of convenience. Under its tiled floor is a tank containing 2,000 gallons of water. The wine closet, refrigerator, staterooms and other auxiliaries are perfect, and space has been economized to a wonderful degree. There are two companionways connecting with the main saloon. The principal one opens upon a social hall and smoking room on a level with the quarter-deck. Both these yachts were built in Philadelphia, and on their trip from that city to New York made an average of fourteen knots an hour.

Mr. Bennett's yacht, the Polaris was built by Messrs. Ward, Stanton & Co., of Newburg, N. Y., and is a model in its way. The dimensions are as follows: Length over all, 157 feet; on deck, 152 feet; on water line, 146 feet; beam, 18 feet; depth of hold, 10 feet. The engines are of the compound style, one high-pressure cylinder and two low pressure cylinders. They are respectively 24 and 32 inches diameter, and 24 inches stroke, and will turn a propeller of 9 feet diameter and 14 feet pitch. Steam is supplied from two steel boilers, to carry a working pressure of 120 pounds. The yacht is exceptionally strong, being built of iron, according to Lloyd's rules. She has four bulkheads; the deck is flush, with the exception of an 18-inch break amidship, which is surrounded by netting and stanchions. The accommodations, which are aft, include a roomy saloon, the owner's stateroom and bathroom, storerooms, pantry, etc., and three staterooms for guests, all furnished in Eastlake style and chastely decorated. The kitchen and the quarters for the crew are under deck, forward, and the pilot-house and smoking or chartroom are around the foremast on the spar-deck.

FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE HUDSON TUNNEL.

AT an early hour on Wednesday morning, July 21st, Jersey City and New York were thrown into intense excitement by the report of a caving-in of the tunnel now being constructed beneath the Hudson to connect the two cities. The scene of this disaster is but a short distance north of the Erie Railway yards. A working shaft 65 feet deep and 30 feet in diameter, walled with brick and with a bottom of concrete, affords the means of entering the tunnel at its western extremity, and into this the sand and silt from the excavation have been forced through pipes, to be afterwards drawn up to the surface. At a depth of 30 feet in this shaft is an air-lock, through which the tunnel itself is entered by way of a temporary tunnel 30 feet long running on a slight decline into the main tunnel, the arch of which at this point has a span of 40 feet. Just beyond, the tunnel divides into two tunnels, each 22 feet high and 20 feet broad, including the two-foot brick walls. The work in the northernmost of the tunnels has been finished to a bulkhead over 300 feet out under the water of the North River. The southern tunnel has been excavated a distance of 25 feet, and the iron shell has been laid and securely braced on all sides. The work here has been abandoned for the time, and the men were engaged in laying the iron shell in the temporary tunnel. The iron plates had been laid and bolted together up to within about a foot of the brick wall of the working shaft. The men must have been laying the last row of plates about the entrance to the air-lock at the time of the accident. These plates are about two and a half feet wide and four feet long, and are curved to fit the brick-work of the shaft. They are bolted together through the flanges on four sides.

A feature of the work has been the introduction of condensed air into the tunnel under a pressure of twenty pounds to the inch, to support the walls. Three large pumps have furnished this supply night and day. Its use was an experiment, and by the engineers it was considered most successful. This same pressure of air was also used to force the waste sand and earth out through pipes into the working shaft.

The air-lock is simply a heavy plate boiler 18 feet long by 6 feet in diameter, with large closely-fitting doors at each end. The door on the tunnel end opens into the tunnel, and is therefore held closed by the pressure of air. The air-lock, in fact, works exactly on the principle of a canal-lock. To enter the tunnel the workmen first enter the air-lock and close the outside door. Air from the tunnel is then admitted until the pressure from the tunnel on the inner door is relieved and the men can simply push the door open. To leave the tunnel this process is reversed. The men enter, closing the inner door behind them, and the compressed air in the air-lock is then allowed to escape until the pressure is relieved from the outer door.

By means of electric lights work has been continued night and day, each gang of from fifteen to twenty-eight or thirty men working eight hours at a time. The shifts were just changing for breakfast at 4:30 on Wednesday morning when the accident occurred. One set of the men had returned to their work from their morning lunch, and the others were about to leave the tunnel. They were, indeed, waiting at the door of the air-lock for those who were entering the tunnel to make way for them. At this instant a hissing noise as of escaping air was heard, and presently the loose earth directly overhead began to fall. The pressure of the air was so great that it forced its way up through the twenty feet of "made" ground overhead, with a puff, it is said, even throwing up fragments of earth a little way into the air. The whole surface over the leak then fell in, and the water, of which the loose soil was full, began to fall in until it reached the level of the river in a pool twenty feet across directly over the break. It also entered the working shaft through the air-lock, the pressure thereon being, of course, relieved at once by the break overhead. All of the tunnel as far as finished must also have filled with water.

Eight of them—Brady, Hansen, McGovern, Van Nostrand, Moline, Doyle, Hayes and Crimmins—had time to leap into the air-lock. A ninth, Foreman Frank Olson, passed his right arm through the open door, but before he could enter, the heavy iron of the roof fell against the door, swinging it partially to, and crushing him before the eyes of his companions. The other twenty men were now completely cut off from all escape, and were literally buried in the falling timbers, iron and mud. The men in the lock seemed doomed to almost certain death, for the compressed air, pushing against the door giving egress to the shaft prevented them from opening it, and the water of the river coming through the mud and loose soil, was rapidly pouring in, and threatened to drown them.

At the time of the accident Moses Pierson, the engineer, who was above ground, saw a stream of condensed air coming up on the outside of the shaft, and divining what had happened, rushed quickly to the mouth of the shaft. "Open the door!" came to him in stifled tones from the imprisoned men below. He sent a messenger for Michael Hurley, the day foreman, who lived but a short distance away, and also for J. H. Andersen, the general superintendent. Hurley reached the scene in a very short time, and clambered quickly down the shaft to the rescue. He was followed by Patrick Meehan, Michael Burchell and Thomas Anderson, and the four tried to force open the door of the air-lock, but without success, the pressure of the air against it from the inside being too great. Hurley then seized a crowbar and broke one of the bull's-eyes. At the same time Thomas Van Nostrand, one of the imprisoned men, broke the other. The compressed air rushed through the lock with a whizz, followed by a stream of water, and the pressure being thus removed, the door was forced open. The eight men rushed out and hurried across the shaft to the stairs leading to the surface, followed by a flood of water which threatened to engulf them. They escaped without injury, and at once went to work on the surface, digging for the purpose of rescuing their buried comrades. Among the dead was Peter Woodland, the assistant superintendent, of whom the survivors speak in the warmest terms for his courage and self-denial. When he saw that the other men were unable to get the door open so that the rest of the shift and Woodland, who was with them, might escape from the tunnel, and when the water began to rush into the tunnel and thence into the lock, he called to the others to save themselves. "Get into the shaft," he shouted, through the door of the lock; "get into the shaft and save yourselves. You can't do anything for us. Get out, and then, if you can, help to save us."

Immediately after the accident the officers of the company put the full force of men at work, in the hope that the bodies of the unfortunate men in the shaft might be speedily reached. The attempt to clear the shaft of water by pumping proved a failure, and a diver who was sent down to ascertain the cause discovered a leakage which, it is thought, will necessitate the sinking of a coffer-dam between the river bulkhead and the vertical shaft, before the bodies can be reached.

A Home for Aged Animals.

WITHIN the last few years "Homes for Lost Dogs" have been established in several European capitals, with excellent results, and are become familiar institutions; but a "Home for Aged Animals" is, so far as we know, an absolute novelty out of India, and, as such, deserves especial notice. It appears that a wealthy French gentleman, owning an estate at Gobesse, near Paris, has for some time past devoted his time, money and attention to soothing the declining years of superannuated beasts and birds by accommodating them with comfortable residence in his spacious park. He has already collected a strange assemblage of venerable creatures, duly provided with authenticated records of their respective ages and careers. The patriarch of this quaint community is a grizzled old mule, just entering his seventy-third year, between whom and an obese goose of thirty-seven an affectionate intimacy subsists. Mother Goose is beset by infirmities. Her legs are so distorted that she cannot waddle straight, and her webbed feet are studded with huge warts which sometimes disturb her temper, but, on the whole, she is cheerful and even sprightly for one of her years. Among the companions of this oddly-assorted pair of friends are a cow of thirty-six Summers and a hog who will never see his twenty-seventh birthday again. In an aviary overlooking the park, feebly pipe and twitter a bullfinch of twenty-eight and a sparrow hatched in the year 1862. Their acte de naissance and other unimpeachable documentary evidence of their antiquity, such as the French Civil Code prescribes, are in the possession of their benevolent host, who treats them with the assiduous consideration due to their great age and eminent respectability.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

The New Royal Irish University does not promise to become of great importance in science. The Senate consists of ecclesiastics, politicians and lawyers—classes of men seldom favorable to the investigations of nature.

By recent intelligence from New South Wales we learn that very rich silver lodes, with a large quantity of gold, had been discovered at the Nambucca River, and that gold had also been found near Moama, on the Murray.

T. A. Brecklebark estimates that in a single decade 500,000 persons engaged in industrial pursuits in Great Britain sustained personal injury or are killed; in mines, 300,000; in railways, 70,000; and in factories, 180,000.

Count Ludovig Krasenak is desirous of buying from the Russian Government the huge building at Warsaw known as the Brulof Palace, with a view to converting it into an industrial museum and presenting it to the town.

According to advices from Helsingfors, Professor Alkvist, the celebrated Finnish savant, will shortly set out for Siberia, to investigate the language and customs of the Ostiaks. Before leaving Finland he will publish his Ostiak dictionary.

The Geologists will be in force at the meeting of the British Association at Swansea, South Wales, which commences on August 25th, when Dr. Ramsay, director-general of the Geological Survey, and president elect, will deliver his address.

Pere Marc Decheverens, the Director of the Zikawei Observatory, near Shanghai, has lately published an important essay on the disastrous typhoon of July 31st, 1879, accompanied by remarks on other typhoons in the Autumn of the same year.

We notice some interesting geological researches by M. Koatkevatch on the eastern slopes of the Ural Mountains. They will be an important addition to the well known map of the western slope published some years ago by Professor Möller.

Among the statues which have been exhibited in the salon at the Palais de l'Industrie, Paris, two large monuments, to commemorate Denis Papin at Blois and Leverrier at Paris, have largely attracted public notice. The astronomer is represented erect, wearing his usual dress, and supporting in his left hand a celestial sphere; the right is pointing to the heavens.

M. Doubree, director of the French School of Mines, has published an essay on Descartes, in which he summarizes the services rendered by that philosopher to science. He reminds his readers that Descartes advocated the theory of an igneous origin for the earth, and he enters into a lengthened discussion of the objections which may be raised against the theory of actual causes, as advocated by Lyell.

The Establishment in Paris of a system of pneumatic clocks has not put a stop to the experiments for transmitting the observatory time by electricity not only to the several public clocks at Paris, but all over France, taking advantage of the telegraph wires. A commission has been appointed by the Municipal Council of Paris to select between the several systems which have been proposed on competition.

In the last aëronautical ascent which was made at Rouen on Monday, June 13th, by M. Jovis, M. Desmeret, one of the aëronauts, tried with success to take photographs of the land below. About fifteen different views were taken by him, and are wonderfully executed. The car had a hole in the centre, and the photographic apparatus was supplied with a patent obturator working in one hundredth of a second. The photographs were, of course, taken by instantaneous process.

The City and Guilds of London Institute for the Advancement of Technical Education has definitively accepted from Her Majesty's Commissioners for the exhibition of 1851 a site for the Central Institution on Exhibition Road. The site is 300 feet long, and is between the temporary French and Belgian Courts. The advantages of this site are its proximity to the museums and libraries, and science and art schools of South Kensington. The central institution, when erected, will be used for the training of teachers, and will provide the highest technical instruction to students who have already obtained such a knowledge of the elements of science as furnished by the School of Mines and other scientific institutions.

The First International Geological Congress having been held in Paris some two years ago, it was determined that a second meeting should take place at Bologna in 1881. The principal objects for which this association will meet will be the determination of two important questions—the unification of geographical figures, and the formation of some identical geological nomenclature. For the study of the first, two commissions were named who are to report at Bologna at the close of 1880, when such matter will be printed for the use of the congress. Aside from these reports, which will be of the most interesting character, the following programme has been determined upon for 1881: There will be a competition, having in view the establishment of an international system of colors and signs, adapted for the representation of geological maps. The method must be accompanied by an explanatory memoir, and with maps drawn and colored to the system proposed. The memoir is to be written, if possible, in French. All competitors must have their maps and explanations forwarded to the president, M. J. Capellini, president of the congress, at Bologna, on or before the 1st of May, 1881. The first prize will be 5,000 francs.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

GUSTAV RICHTER, the celebrated German painter, is seriously ill with consumption.

MINISTER ZAMACONA will return no more to Washington, as he is hereafter to represent his country in France.

REV. W. H. MILBURN, the blind preacher, is in San Francisco, and will make a two months' visit on the Pacific Coast.

MR. ARTHUR SULLIVAN has written a Canadian National Hymn in D major, which he has just sent to the Marquis of Lorne.

HERR MARKART has completed his picture of "Diana at the Hunt," and has sold it to a firm of picture dealers for 100,000 marks.

THE Conservative Independent clubs have, with his consent, nominated Mr. Ruskin for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University.

M. CHEVREUL, of Paris, is the oldest working scientist in the world, and now, in his ninety-fifth year, he has begun a course of lectures on chemistry.

MISS ROGERS, daughter of the sculptor, Randolph Rogers, has just been married at Rome to Signor Pio Santini, a handsome young Italian gentleman.

MRS. D. P. STONE, of Malden, offers to finish Memorial Hall at Bowdoin College, and will give $60,000 to endow the chair in mental and moral philosophy.

THE Portuguese Government wants Captain Reda to furnish plans and terms for the removal of obstructions from the mouth of the river Douro, at Oporto.

LADY ELIZABETH CAMPBELL, the second daughter of the Duke of Argyll, who accompanied her father on his visit to this country, has just been married to a Commoner, Mr. Clough Taylor.

PRINCESS MARY of Hanover is not, it is now stated, about to follow the example of her sister, Frederica, and marry in a lower rank than her own. She has never thought of such a thing.

CARDINAL NINA, the Papal Secretary of State, has resigned. It is thought that negotiations for the renewal of diplomatic relations between the Vatican and Belgium will shortly be opened.

YAN PHOW LEE, of China, gained the highest rank in this year's graduating class from the Hopkins Grammar School at New Haven, Conn., and won the first prize in English composition.

MISS FRANCES EVELYN MAYNARD, the beautiful young English heiress, to whom Prince Leopold was at one time reported to be engaged, is shortly to be married to Lord Brooke, heir to the historic Earldom of Warwick.

THE Sultan of Zanzibar, weary of the mere work of reigning prince, has become a business man. He has bought a British steamer, and is running it at cheap rates for passengers and cargo between Zanzibar and Bombay.

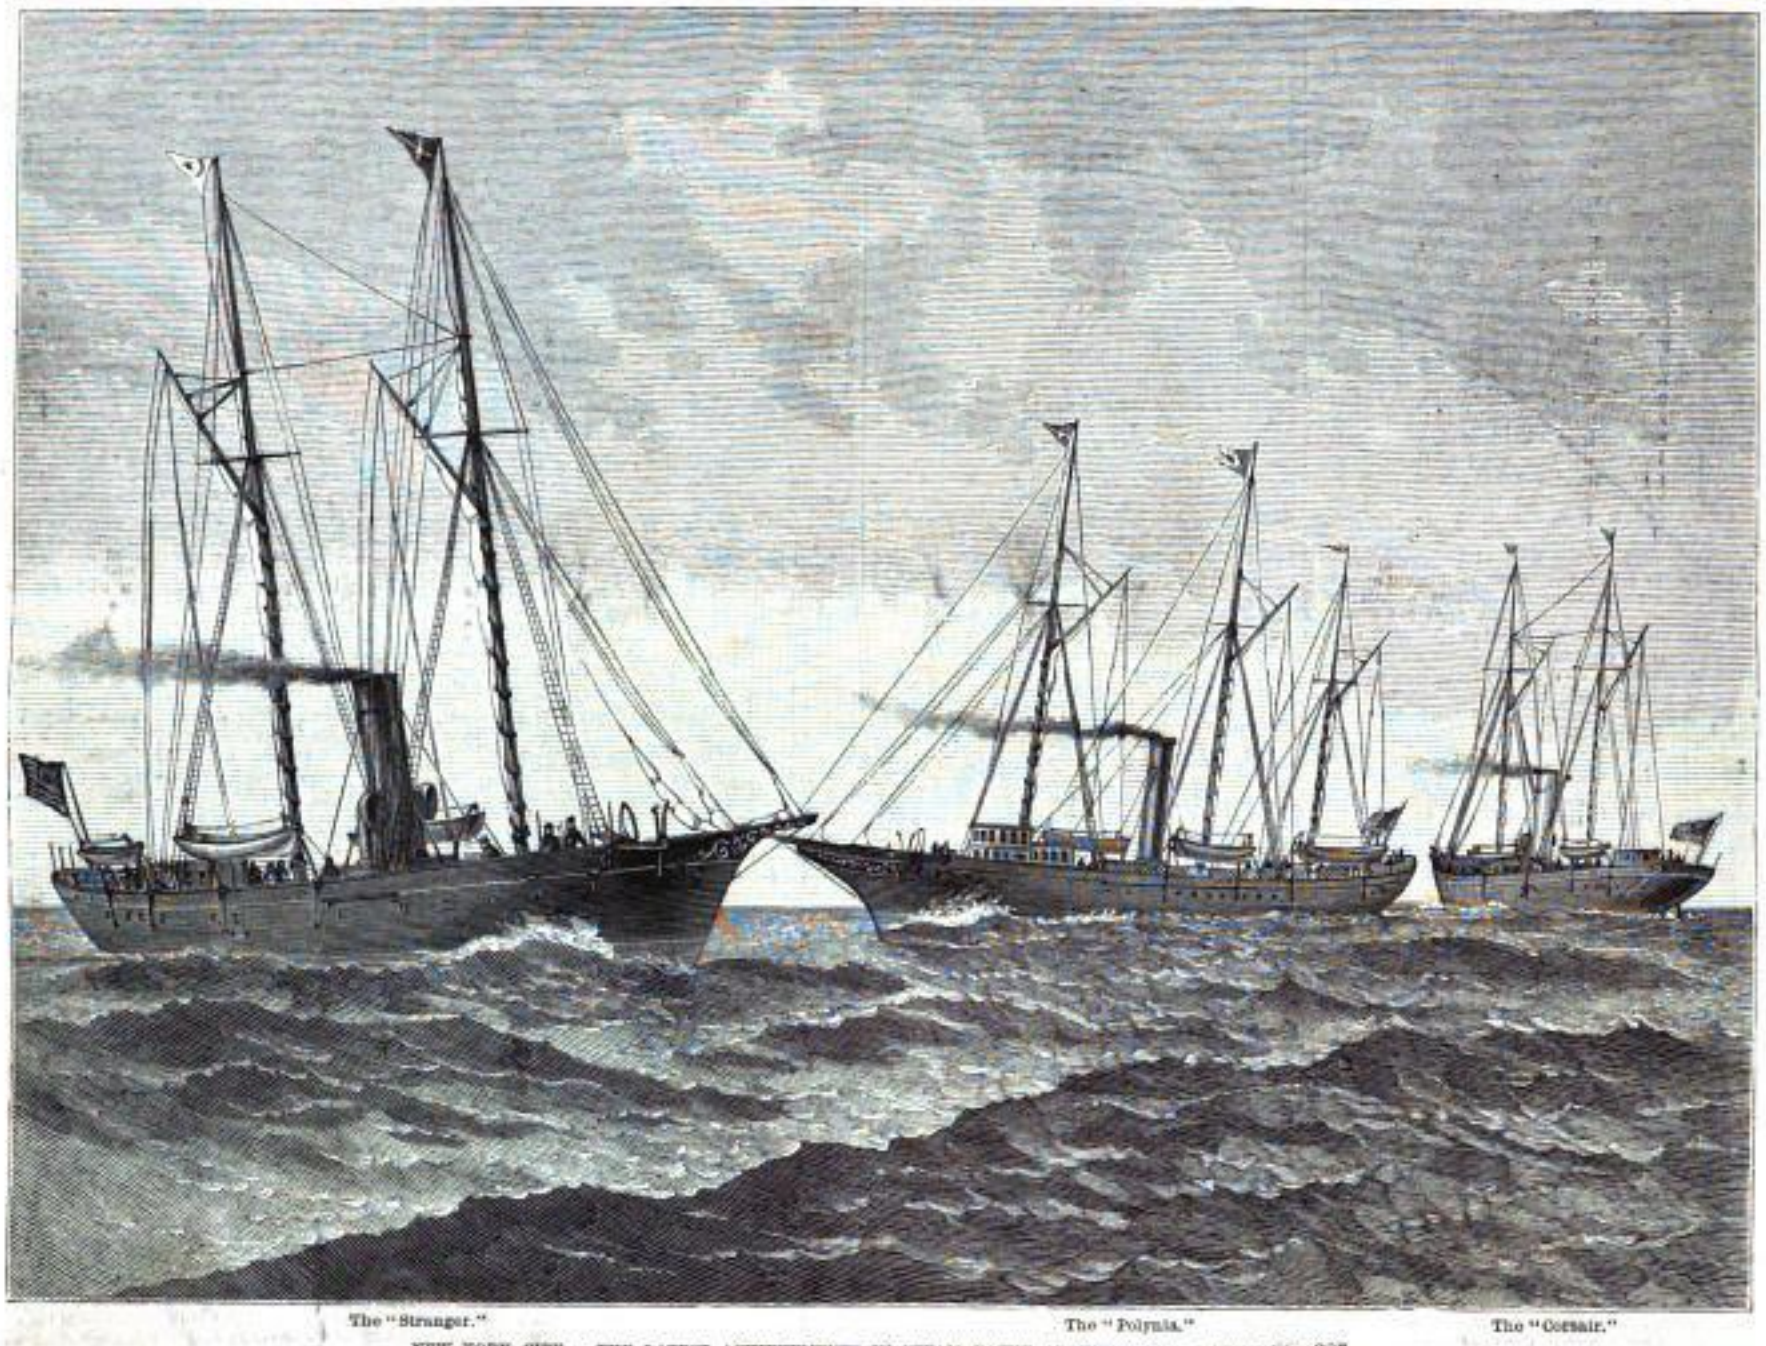
THE German sculptor, Miller, whose magnificent statue of "Prometheus Bound" has just been bought for 60,000 marks by the Government and placed in the Berlin National Gallery, was, when a poor boy, a cook in a Munich hotel.

CHIEF JOSEPH, of the Oka (Canada) Indians, is quite a scholar. He has recently been ordained a clergyman. He has already translated the four gospels from the French into the Iroquois language, and hopes to complete the translation of the remainder of the New Testament during the year.

IT is reported from Newport that the marriage of George Cavendish Bentinck, eldest son of the Right Hon. George Cavendish Bentinck, M. P. for Whitehaven, and cousin of the Duke of Portland, to Miss Bessie Livingston, daughter of Mr. Maturin Livingston, of New York, will take place at Newport, August 12th.

REV. DR. J. T. CONANT, of Brooklyn, has accepted the offer of Captain Ebenezer Morgan, of Groton, Conn., to give $25,000 for a revised translation of the Bible, which shall give due prominence to the doctrine of immersion, and a contract has been executed. Dr. Conant has long been at the work, and expects to finish it in about four years.

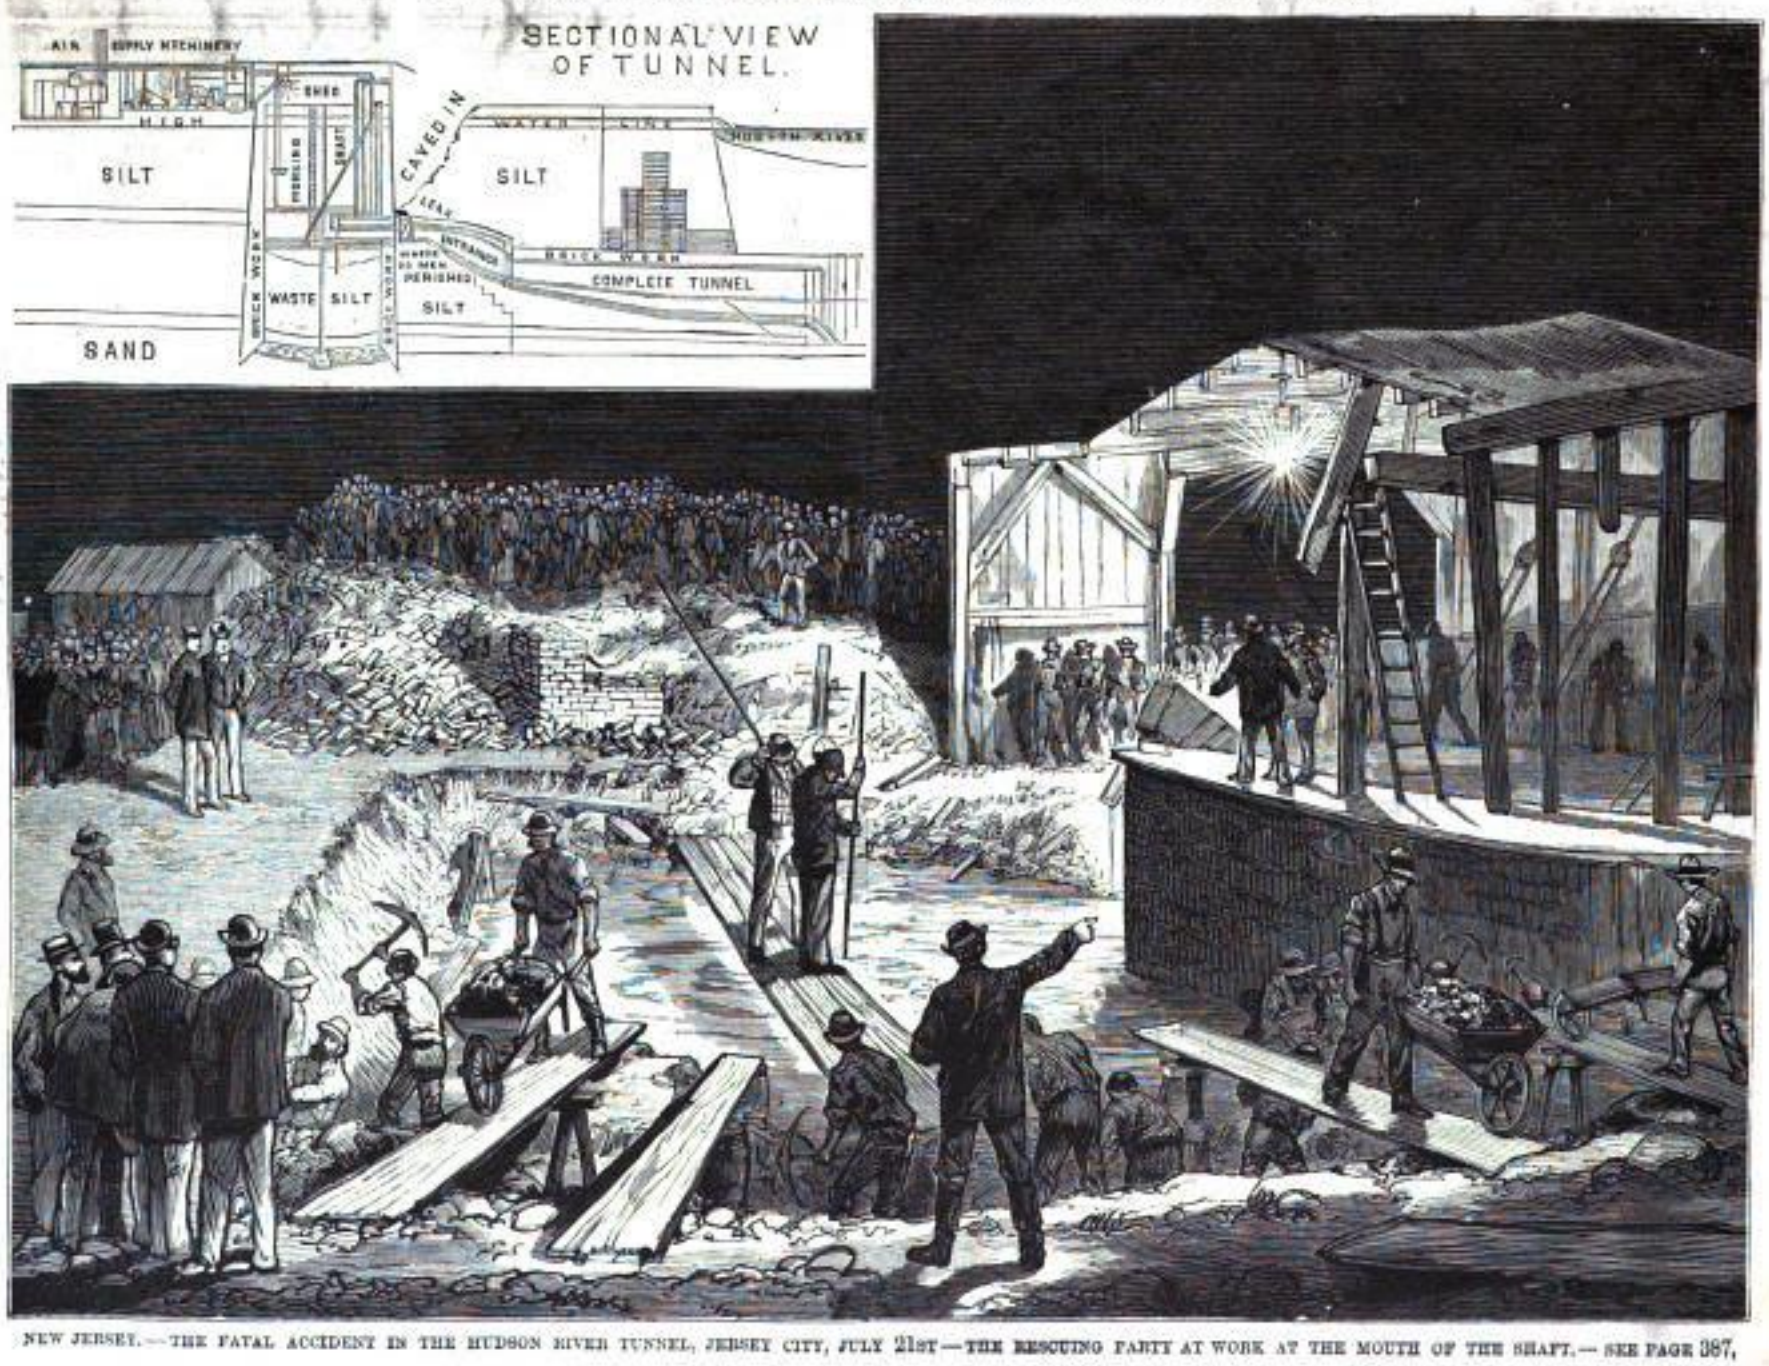
MRS. FENIMORE A. SMITH is gathering folk lore among the Tuscarora Indians for a paper to be presented by her before a scientific society in the Fall. She is well treated by the Indians, and has received from them, after appropriate ceremonies, the name of "The Beautiful Flower of the White Bear of the Tuscaroras." She speaks of not having seen a pale-face for a fortnight, except in her mirror.



THE late celebrated painter of the Huss and Luther pictures, Herr Carl Friedrich Lessing, had at Carlsruhe a funeral as imposing almost as that of a sovereign. Thousands of people were present, including the Grand Duke of Baden, and the coffin was carried by artists wearing the mourning costumes of the sixteenth century. The dead painter lay in state in the Royal Gallery, whence he was borne to the sound of Beethoven's Funeral March, the music of which was accompanied by a majestic choir of more than a hundred voices.

THE following is a statement of the public bequests of the late Dr. Daniel T. Coit, of Norwich, Conn. To Yale College, subject to annuities of $1,000 each to his two sisters, $100,000; to Carleton College, Minnesota, $5,000; to Berea College, Kentucky, $2,500; to Oberlin College, Ohio, $2,500; to the Howard Benevolent Society of Boston, $1,000; to the Coit Library, Griswold, Conn., $3,000; to the Otis Library, Norwich, $5,000. The Otis Library and Carleton College, as residuary legatees, are likely to receive as much in addition to these bequests as the original amounts.

GENERAL SKOBELEFF'S mother left Constantinople on July 17th in a carriage for Tchirpan, with money and medical supplies for the hospital there. She was attacked when halfway on the road by armed men. Madame Skobeleff was killed, and a servant and steward were dangerously wounded. Considerable money was stolen. Gendarmerie were sent out in pursuit of the murderers. A later telegram reports that a Russian captain named Mussoff, who committed the crime, has been captured. When arrested he shot himself with a revolver, and is not expected to recover. The steward and coachman have since died. Madame Skobeleff had been in Constantinople for some time organizing schools and hospitals.



DR. YOUNG J. ALLEN, a missionary of the Methodist Church, South, now at Shanghai, has been made a Mandarin by the Chinese Government. He is the first foreigner who has received the distinguished honor. The position of Mandarin is a civil office of great dignity among the Chinese. The Emperor of China, to whom is vested the appointing power, never makes a Mandarin unless he is profoundly learned. Dr. Allen is a native of Georgia. He was born in Coweta County. He graduated at Emory College about the year 1858. Immediately after leaving college he went as missionary to China, where for twenty years he has done noble and devoted work among that people. So familiar is he with the Chinese tongue that for a number of years he has edited a literary review in that language. About two years ago he visited the United States. Before entering upon his missionary labors he joined the North Georgia Conference, and is still a member of that body.

Digitized by Google

The "Stranger." The "Polynia." The "Corsair."

NEW YORK CITY.—THE LATEST ACHIEVEMENTS IN STEAM YACHT ARCHITECTURE.—SEE PAGE 387.

NEW JERSEY.—THE FATAL ACCIDENT IN THE HUDSON RIVER TUNNEL, JERSEY CITY, JULY 21ST—THE RESCUING PARTY AT WORK AT THE MOUTH OF THE SHAFT.—SEE PAGE 387.

Digitized by Google

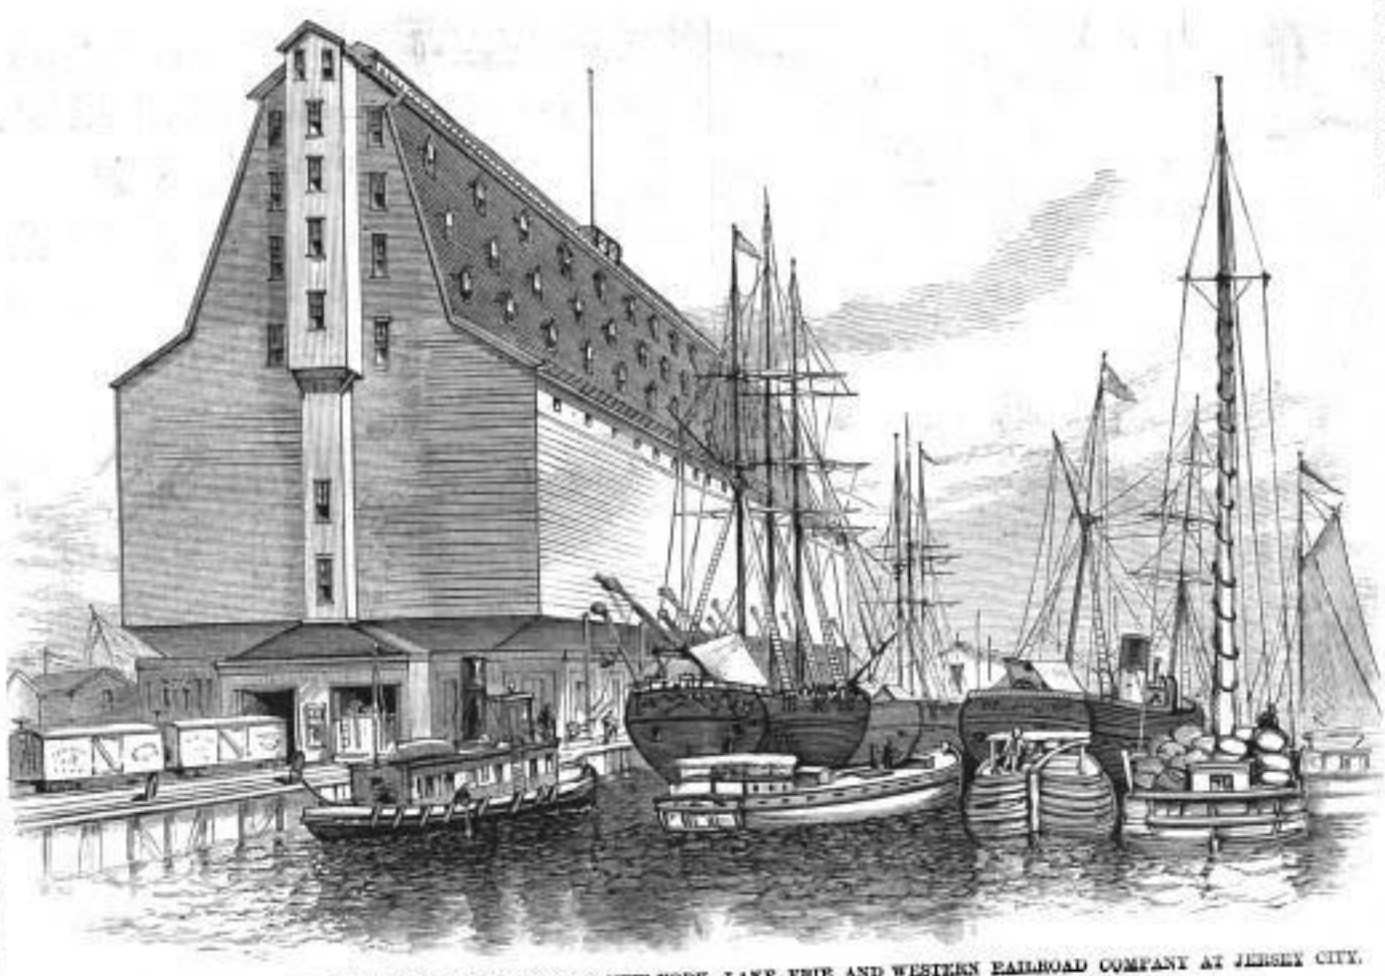
THE NEW PRESIDENT OF MEXICO.

GENERAL MANUEL GONZALEZ, the President-elect of the Republic of Mexico, was one of Diaz's most devoted adherents, and events have proved that his choice of that side was a sagacious one. Before the fleet which, in 1862, conveyed the allied forces of France, England and Spain to Vera Cruz, Gonzalez, then a colonel, was politically opposed to the late Benito Juarez, then President of Mexico; but upon the arrival of the said fleet Gonzalez hastened to offer his services to the administration representing the national defense. His offer was at once accepted, and he was ordered to report in person to General Porfirio Diaz, then commanding a brigade in the Army of the East. General Diaz appointed Gonzalez chief of his staff, and afterwards, when the French army was before the gates of Puebla, he was given the command of three battalions, with which he defended that part of the city called Tecali, fighting gallantly and several times repulsing the assaults of the French. After the surrender of Puebla he was taken prisoner, but soon made his escape, bearing with him important dispatches from General Diaz to the Secretary of War. During the war, Gonzalez distinguished himself in Miahuatlan, Carbonera, Oaxaca, and again at Puebla, where he took by storm the strong position of San Marcos, converted by the enemy into a fortress, in which victorious assault he lost his right arm and two-thirds of the forces under his command. For this he was rewarded by a promotion to the rank of general of brigade. The sequel to San Marcos was the famous battle of the 2d of April, 1867, won by General Diaz, and which virtually terminated Maximilian's empire in Mexico.

In 1878 Gonzalez was made Minister of War in the Diaz Cabinet, in place of General Ogazon. The appointment was generally believed to be the fulfillment on the part of Diaz of a promise made to General Gonzalez on the battle-field of Tecoac. On that momentous occasion it was the timely arrival of Gonzalez that saved the day and secured the triumph of the Revolution, and Diaz, in his gratitude, clasped his friend and savior by the hand, and promised him the position he was afterwards called to fill. After the accession of Diaz to power, Gonzalez was engaged first in the pacification of the State of Michoacan, and next in organizing the Army of the West—that is, the Federal forces in Jalisco, Sinaloa and Sonora. On the 14th of November, 1879, a Ministerial crisis occurred, and Gonzalez retired from the War Office, Señor Carlos Pacheco succeeding him. On the 30th of the same month Gonzalez was arrested and placed in close confinement on the charge of conspiracy, the cause of this action, it is supposed, being the suspicion, or fact that he had secured in Pacheco a strong partisan, and had made the ministerial change for revolutionary purposes. A formidable coalition was formed between the partisans of Señores Benitez, Vallarta and Garcia Cardena, who favored Señor Zamacona, former Minister to the United States, as their candidate. General Gonzalez was favored by President Diaz. The canvass has been very bitter and exciting. The opponents of Gonzalez claimed that he is not a Mexican, but a Spaniard, and hence disqualified for the Presidency. Gonzalez was challenged to prove his nativity or produce records showing that he has one blood relation in Mexico. Despite all opposition, however, he appears to have made his way to the Chief Magistracy.

GENERAL MANUEL GONZALEZ, PRESIDENT-ELECT OF MEXICO.

THE NEW COLORS OF THE FRENCH ARMY.



THE new colors lately presented to the French Army form the subject for conversation over all France. The staff to which the colors are attached, instead of being of gilded wood, bearing upon one side the number of the regiment, on the other a crown, and on top an iron lance with a gilt-bronze tip, is now replaced by a staff with the initials of the Republic and a simple iron spear-head. The appearance of the new colors is decidedly less rich than that of the former, but they are less heavy, both artistically as well as materially. This last detail is not unimportant when we reflect that at certain times, whether by the wind or by rain, or by the rapidity of the march, the weight of the colors is considerably augmented. The names of the battles are inscribed on the new colors, but not of mere engagements, as on the old. The colors as they now stand are composed of an oaken staff two yards and a half high, painted in blue, and terminated by a bronze ferrule. At the top of the staff, next to the spear-head commences the color, the material being that quality of silk known as gros de Naples. It is divided into three equal parts, red, white and blue, richly embroidered on their sides, and fringed with massive gold lace. On one side in gold characters is, "Honor and Country," surrounded with the names of former victories; on the other, "The Republic of France," and the number of the regiment. The value of the new color is 300 francs.

NEW FLAGS DISTRIBUTED TO THE FRENCH ARMY ON THE NATIONAL FÊTE-DAY.

ERIE RAILWAY ELEVATOR IN JERSEY CITY.

THE new elevator of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, at the terminus of that road in Jersey City, which has just been completed and opened to business, is one of the largest structures of the kind in the country. It occupies an area, superficially, of 90 feet by 360. It has a total height of 156 feet, without including the lofty flagstaff on its roof, and the building is a conspicuous object to passengers by the Pavonia ferry. Its foundation rests on 6,000 piles driven into the water and the soft earth. This part of the structure was very difficult and costly, the greatest care being necessary to obtain a secure foundation for the great weight of the superstructure that rests upon it. The piles vary from 67 to 72 feet in length, and were driven as close to each other as possible, and cut off 4 feet below low water. Upon these is a grillage, or platform, of solid timber, 2 feet thick, upon which rest 248 stone piers 14 feet in height, 7½ feet square at the base and 3½ feet square at the top, and upon this stands the superstructure. The building contains 350 bins for the reception of the grain, each 60 feet deep. The bins are constructed of well-seasoned planking, 6 to 8 inches wide and 2 inches thick, spiked one on top of the other. The entire bin capacity is 1,450,000 bushels, but the convenient working capacity will be about 1,000,000 bushels. The house contains 20 lifters—as the machinery for carrying the grain is called—and there are 10 on each side of the building. These lifters are of an improved kind and will be used either for unloading cars or for delivering to vessels and barges. In all other elevators, it is said, this part of the machinery is not made to serve a double purpose, the pipes being either shippers or receivers. The hoisting power is supplied by two powerful engines, each of 600 nominal horse-power, but capable of being increased beyond this. In front of the elevator is a pier 1,000 feet long, and at each side of the house is a large and commodious basin. The one on the north side is for ships and larger vessels. It is from 175 to 210 feet wide by 1,604 feet in length, and has a uniform depth of water of 25 feet. The basin on the south side of the pier is 120 feet wide by 1,605 feet in length. It has a depth of water of 15 feet, and is intended for the use of canal-boats and light-draught craft.

NEW JERSEY.—NEW GRAIN ELEVATOR ERECTED BY THE NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE AND WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY AT JERSEY CITY. FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

ELBERT E. FARMAN,

UNITED STATES CONSUL-GENERAL AT CAIRO.

MR. ELBERT E. FARMAN, United States Agent and Consul-General at Cairo, Egypt, was born in Oswego County, N. Y., April 23d, 1833, and at the age of twenty entered Genesee College, whence he graduated with honor in 1855. In 1858 he was admitted to the Bar and secured a desirable practice, at the same time giving some time to journalism. In 1865, determined to enlarge his field of observation and extend his studies, he visited Europe, where he spent two years in travel, attending the universities of Heidelberg in Summer and Berlin in Winter, and listening to lectures on criminal, international and the civil law. In 1868, having returned to this country, he was appointed District Attorney of Wyoming County, in this State, to fill a vacancy, and was subsequently elected for three years. In May, 1876, he was confirmed as Agent and Consul-General at Cairo, and has since occupied this important position, the duties of which are chiefly diplomatic. His personal relations with the Khédive and the members of his Government have been eminently friendly, and he has been able to protect every interest confided to his care.

Among the negotiations successfully conducted by Mr. Farman are those for the increase of the number of American judges in the International Tribunal of Egypt, by and through which the United States was permitted to send a third judge. His official reports show that he has taken an active interest in the welfare of the people of the country to which he is accredited. His conviction of the divine equality of all men in privilege leads him naturally to help the oppressed. Eight slaves have been freed through his efforts. The first was a negro boy brought by a slave-dealer from Soudan. The slave was brutally treated, and an American lady brought him to the notice of the Consul-General. He at once interested himself in the case, and in June, 1877, secured an order from the Egyptian Government freeing the slave. He obtained another order freeing three slave girls.

This sketch would be incomplete without mention of Mr. Farman's services in securing the obelisk, known as Cleopatra's Needle, which has just been brought to this country. The City of New York is greatly indebted to Mr. Farman for this interesting monument of one of the oldest civilizations.

Mr. Farman's professional training is an important qualification for his present position, as the Consular Court over which he presides is the only tribunal in Egypt authorized to try an American citizen for crime committed in that country. Mirzan, an Armenian, naturalized in Boston, assassinated Dahan Bey, a legal adviser of the Khedive, in Alexandria, July 13th, 1879. He was arrested by the Egyptian officers, and turned over to our authorities for punishment. He can only be tried by the United States Consular Court of Egypt

HON. ELBERT E. FARMAN, U. S. CONSUL-GENERAL AT CAIRO, EGYPT.

Digitized by Google

with the Consul-General as presiding judge. This court has also jurisdiction in other cases not infrequently arising there.

A Roll of Distinguished Writers.

THERE is not another roll of contributors to any publication in Europe like the contributors to the Edinburgh Review. It takes in almost every name that is distinguished in statesmanship, in eloquence and learning for a couple of generations. It includes a Prime Minister, Lord John Russell; a Chancellor, Lord Brougham; a Lord Chief Justice, Lord Denman; two Chancellors of the Exchequer, Mr. Spring Rice and Sir G. C Lewis; two or three Lords of Session and puisne Judges on the English bench; a Secretary of War, Macaulay; a Secretary of State for the Colonies, Lord Lytton; metaphysicians like Sir William Hamilton; historians like Henry Hallam, Carlisle and Napier; politicians like Charles Buller and John Arthur Roebuck; political economists like John Stuart Mill and McCulloch; theologians like Henry Rogers and Dean Milman; almost all the poets who were invited to dine with Apollo, Tom Campbell, Tom Moore and Samuel Rogers; essayists like Sir James Stephen and Hazlett; and it was only by accident Charles Dickens was not enrolled among the contributors, with the greatest of his rivals and contemporaries—W. M. Thackeray.

Burying a Chinese Mason.

A SINGULAR ceremony took place recently at Virginia City, Nevada—the burial of a Chinaman who had been a Mason, as the Order exists in the Celestial Empire. A very noisy, discordant (native) brass band led the procession, made up of Mongolians, wearing badges and other insignia of the fraternity, followed by the hearse and a large covered wagon, in which were seated a number of feminine Chinese musicians. Their instruments consisted of fiddles, drums, guitars, cymbals, gongs, and each made as much racket as possible, without the least regard to harmony. The din was wellnigh deafening, and may have been intended to prove the actual death of the man in the hearse. If he had been in any ordinary trance he would certainly have revived in self-defense, as it is impossible to imagine that any sentient thing could remain unconscious of such an infernal clamor. Behind the Chinese musicians came a van loaded with roast pig and other delicacies, edible and potable, to be left at the grave for the benefit of the deceased. Strips of paper, pierced in three places with crescent-shaped holes, in rows of five, were strewed by thousands along the route—the custom under such circumstances—and the queer procession attracted a great deal of attention from the curious Nevadans, many of whom had never before seen anything like it. The next time a Chinese Mason is buried, the natives intend either to put cotton in their ears or to steal the roast pig as some compensation for auricular suffering.

The Use of Oaths.

APROPOS of the Bradlaugh affair, the London Standard publishes the following summary of the declarations of allegiance made by members of the Legislature of the countries mentioned: "In France, since the abolition of the Empire on the 4th of September, 1870, no oath or affirmation has been administered in any form to members of the Legislature of the Republic. Nor is there any formality which might be regarded as an equivalent. Under the Empire new members made a declaration to the following effect: 'I swear fidelity to the Emperor and the Constitution.' But the name of the Deity was not included.

"The members of the German Parliament take no oath, nor do they make any affirmation whatsoever. The members of the Prussian and most other State Parliaments, take an oath of loyalty, beginning with the words: 'I swear by God the Omnipotent and Omniscient,' and concluding with the words, 'So may God help me.' To this latter formula those who wish it may add, 'through Jesus Christ, to eternal bliss, Amen.' Any one refusing to take the oath, or commencing upon it, would undoubtedly be excluded from the Prussian and other State Parliaments. In conformity, however, with the laws regulating the administration of oaths in civil and criminal courts, an exception would be made in the case of persons belonging to recognized theistic religious communities, who, like certain Mennonite and Jewish sects, regard the name of the Deity as too awful to be invoked in the transaction of secular business. In these cases a simple affirmation would be regarded as equivalent to an oath. The omission of any oath in the German Parliament is occasioned by the wish to avoid the delicate question as to the amount of loyalty due to the Emperor, in contradistinction to State sovereigns.

"By the law passed on the 15th of May, 1868, Parliamentary oaths were abolished in Austria, and a simple affirmation was substituted. The first paragraph of the standing orders of the Austrian Reichsrath reads as follows: 'New members, on entering either of the two Houses, have, on the President's challenge, in place of taking an oath, to promise loyalty and obedience to the Emperor, inviolable observance of the Constitution, as well as of all other laws, and conscientious fulfillment of their duties.' Upon the President reading words to this effect, the new member simply replies, 'I promise.'

"Articles 37 and 38 of the Rules of the Spanish Congress say that Deputies, before they can take their seats, shall make the following oath, which is read aloud by the Secretary of the Congress, all present standing: 'Do you swear to observe and make others observe, the Constitution of the Spanish Monarchy? Do you swear fidelity and obedience to the legitimate King of Spain, Alfonso XII.? Do you swear well and truly to behave in the mission confided to you by the nation, always and in everything seeking the welfare of the nation?' The Deputies then, two at a time, approach the table of the President, and, kneeling on his right hand, he remaining sitting, they place their hands on the Gospels lying open before them, and say, 'Yes, I do swear'; and the President then answers, 'If you do so, may God reward you; and if not, may He call you to account.' This formula was re-established in 1876 in the Constitution voted by the First Cortes under the Restoration. It is copied from the Constitution in force during the reign of Queen Isabella. At the time of the Spanish Revolution, from 1868 to 1874, no oaths were required in the Cortes, and when the First Cortes of the Restoration met, in February, 1876, Señor Castelar protested against the oath, and at first refused to take it, but finally submitted. In the Second Cortes of the Restoration, in 1876, the Democratic and Radical minority of fifteen Deputies, under Castelar and Marios, again protested against the oath of allegiance. And took it after publicly stating their mental reservations, but no instance exists on the records of the House that a Deputy declined to take the oath on the ground of atheistic convictions. For such cases no rule has ever existed in the Spanish Cortes.

"The President of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, seeing a new Deputy in his place, says: 'I invite the honorable gentleman to take the oath in the form following: "I swear to be faithful to the King, and to observe loyally the fundamental statute and the other laws of the State, with a single view to the inseparable welfare of the King and the country."' The new Deputy then, in his place, stretches out his right hand and pronounces the one word, 'Giuro' ('I swear')."

FUN.

TWO deaf mutes were married the other day in Chenango County, N. Y. It is pleasing to think that no harsh words will ever pass between them.

THE number of one-armed young men seen driving out with young ladies these Summer evenings is truly appalling. An old soldier at our elbow says that one arm is invariably lost during an engagement.

A COMMERCIAL editor, who was once a small boy with a mother who knew the value of a slipper in case of emergency, cannot to this day write about a "movement in leather" without hitching uneasily in his chair.

YOUNG men should take warning from the story of the watchful mother, who, thinking that her daughter's guests had staid long enough, walked out on the piazza and inquired if the morning paper had come.

GOVERNESS (to small boy): "Benny, I shall keep you in if you don't learn your lesson better to-morrow; I'm going to turn over a new leaf with you." Small Boy: "You can't turn over a new leaf; it's tear'd out."

"DO YOU believe in second love, Mr. McQuade?" "Do I believe in second love! Humph! If a man buys a pound of sugar, isn't it sweet? and when it is gone, don't he want another pound, and isn't that pound sweet, too? Truth, Murphy, I believe in second love."

A SMALL boy of Bath, Me., had just gone to bed the other night, when he began to dream about cows. Some slight noise woke him up and he said, "Mamma, I saw some cows." "Where?" she asked. "Up there," said he, pointing to the ceiling." His mother remarked that that was a queer place to see cows, and the little fellow got slightly angry and said, "Well, I guess they could be angel cows, couldn't they?"

TWO young men in light plaid clothes were riding down town on the Metropolitan "L" road, reading their papers, when one of them saw an item about a robbery in a boarding-house, in which it was said that the perpetrators of the crime took the jewelry of the landlady and of the three boarders. "It is funny, Billy," said the reader, "that they always get away with the jewelry in a boarding-house. They never steal anything to eat."

NERVOUS EXHAUSTION.

"COMPOUND OXYGEN" is especially valuable where, from any cause, there exists great paleness or nervous exhaustion. Our Treatise will tell you all about it. It is mailed free. Address Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1112 Girard Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HE went into a prominent drug store, and said to the dentist: "You pulls out fifteet yaws for $5." "Certainly." "What does dat cost?" "One dollar." "Py shiminy—you dinks dat don't hurt none, py gracious."

"NEW-FANGLED NOTIONS"

May not work injury to people when they relate to matters of little consequence, but when entertained as to what we shall take when afflicted with serious disease they may lead to dear experience. Don't, therefore, trifle with diseases of the blood manifested by eruptions, blotches, scrofulous and other swellings and grave symptoms, but take that well-tested and efficacious remedy, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery—the greatest blood-purifier of the age. If the bowels are very costive use also Dr. Pierce's Pellets (little sugar-coated pills).

CURES FEVER AND AGUE.

PLEASANT VALLEY, Jo Daviess Co., Ill., March 31st, 1879.

DR. PIERCE, Buffalo, N. Y.:

Dear Sir—I write this to inform you that my child, one year old, has been permanently cured of the fever and ague in a week's time, and the use of but half a bottle of your Golden Medical Discovery. My wife, a long sufferer from liver complaint and biliousness, by the use of the Discovery and Pellets has been entirely relieved. The Discovery has never disappointed us for coughs and colds.

Yours truly, JAMES STRICKELL.

TO HOUSEKEEPERS.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS. They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the factitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE restores enfeebled digestion, imparting vitality, and correcting the feeling of lassitude so common in midsummer.

AFTER years of travel to and from health resorts, and after a most careful trial of all the various prescriptions, ladies have given up in despair with an almost total loss of appetite, pale, bloodless, languid, and without ambition; finally, having learned of DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, although having been sick for years, gain flesh and a fine constitution upon investing a small amount in it. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

THE ST. NICHOLAS, New York, is as fresh and youthful as in its earliest days, and well deserves the reputation it acquired years ago. Exquisite order and neatness, and a luxurious table, are attractions that experienced travelers always appreciate; and these are just the requisites which make the ST. NICHOLAS such a personal favorite.

PLEASURE travel over the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad is unusually large this season. All the old-time and favorite resorts among the Virginia mountains are filled with visitors, and many new and attractive places have been made available by the opening of the Chesapeake and Ohio road. Each season the patronage and appreciation of this line steadily increase.

SUCCESSFUL because of superior merit. MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Sold by Druggists.

A HARVEST of broken bones, cuts, bruises, etc. Now is the harvest season. Insure in THE TRAVELERS.

HALFORD TABLE SAUCE.—Relish for soups, fish, steaks, chops, cold meats, gravies, etc.

OLD ORCHARD HOUSE, Me., June 18, 1880.

THE "HOUR."

THIS admirably edited weekly, which has now safely passed the very early stages of infancy, gives goodly promise of a vigorous future. The reading matter is varied as it is interesting, and the news is so artistically prepared as to suit the most fastidious taste. The colored portrait of a distinguished American accompanying each number is "true to the life," and fully equal to the best efforts of Fanny Fern. The breaking up of "Le Gossip" into paragraphs, after the fashion of the London society journals, induces the reader to skip "never a one," the arrangement being so grateful to the eye. The Hour does its spirting gently.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York.

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with Investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and Investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

To the H. W. Johns Mfg. Co., 87 Maiden Lane, N. Y.:

The Old Orchard House having just been completed with two coats of Johns' Asbestos Paints in a manner perfectly satisfactory to me, I would inform them as being not only of the most wonderful covering capacity, but also on the point of economy and mildew of working under the brush. . . . Although two coats were called for under the contract, yet under the large piazza I found one coat was entirely sufficient.

(Signed) E. C. STAPLES, Proprietor.

Stuttering cured by BATES'S APPLIANCES. Send for description to STAPLES & CO., Box 2230, New York.

A CHARMING NEW NOVEL,

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"PHYLLIS," "MOLLY BAWN," etc.,

BEAUTY'S DAUGHTERS.

Fifth Edition. 12mo. Extra cloth, $1.25. 16mo. Paper cover, 60 cents.

"A novel well worthy of the author of those popular feminine romances, 'Molly Bawn' and 'Phyllis,' and perhaps it may be more admired than either of them. The thread of the story is always visible, and no one can fail to follow it with pleasure."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

"A charming novel. It is a love story, pure and simple, and will be eagerly welcomed by the great army of Summer readers who are able to discriminate between what is good and bad in the line of fiction."—Boston Evening Transcript.

 For sale by all Booksellers, or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of the price by

J. B. LIPPINCOTT & CO., Philadelphia.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for securing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each 2 for $1; or per dozen, $2.

GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent),
No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100 page pamphlet, 10c.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time-tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.

STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA DAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 6.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 11.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.10 to 9.20 P.M., and 10.40 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.55 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

To New York.
BOUND BROOK ROUTE
The Pioneer 2-hour Route.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 7.0, 8.30, 9.20, 10.15 A.M.; 12.30, 2, 3.30, 3.45, 5.40, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 9.30, 11, 11.50 A.M.; 1, 2.45, 4.35, 6.10, 6.11, 8.20, 10, 10 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

LEAVE NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 6.45, 7.45, 9, 11.15 A.M.; 1.30, 4, 4.30, 4.45, 5.30, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.25, 10.10, 11.30 A.M.; 1.40, 4, 6.10, 6.40, 7.20, 8.10, 10.05 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

To Long Branch, Ocean Grove, etc

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.20, 10.15 A.M.; 2, 3.30 and 3.45 P.M.

LEAVE OCEAN GROVE: 6.32, 6.27 and 7.28 A.M.; 2.15, 4.13 and 6.07 P.M.

Trains connect at Jersey City by Annex Boat to Brooklyn, where a connection in addition to that from New York is made with steamers for Rockaway, Brighton and Manhattan Beaches.

H. P. BALDWIN, G. P. A., New York.
C. G. HANCOCK, G. P. & T. A., Phila.

CHAMPLIN'S
LIQUID PEARL

An unequaled toilet preparation. Restores, preserves and beautifies the complexion. Used and indorsed by Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Clara Louise Kellogg, Lotta Janauschek, and hundreds of others. Contains nothing that will injure the most delicate skin. Sold by all druggists 50 cents per bottle. Beware of imitations.

CHAMPLIN & CO., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N.Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.

$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 226 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3086.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.

Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE
For August Now Ready.

WITH THE FOLLOWING BRILLIANT TABLE OF

CONTENTS:

"Sister Dora"; A Model Christian Nurse. Illustrated.
"Venice; Its Past and Present." Eleven Beautiful Illustrations.
"Missionary Effort in Patagonia." By Rev. Daniel Edwards. Seven Illustrations.
"With St. Paul at Athens." By Rev. Professor Porter, D. D. Nine Illustrations.
"Religious Aspect of Gothic Architecture." By Dean Stanley
"Binding the Feet in China." By Rev. Rose C. Houghton.
"Nebuchadnezzar." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"The Children of the Bible." No. VII. Abijah, Prince of Israel.
Serial and Short Stories, Sketches, etc.—"Bo-Bo, the Nailmaker's Daughter," by the Author of "Queen's Rock" (Chaps. XXXII. to XXXIV.); illustrated. "The Clerk's Marriage"; illustrated. "Little Ringes" (Chaps. I. to IV.); illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the author of "Little Ringes" (Chaps. I. to IV.); illustrated. "The Mayberrys at the Seashore," by Albert Wallwyn; illustrated. "Robinson in New York," by Rev. E. E. Hale; illustrated. "A Night of Anguish"; illustrated. "Battle between Hawk and Crows"; illustrated. "Bishop Ryle of Liverpool," (with portrait). "The Methodist Bishops," (with portraits of Rev. Drs. Cyrus D. Foss, John F. Hurst, Henry W. Warren, and E. O. Haven). "A Bit of a Scrape"; illustrated, etc., etc.
Essays.—"The Lord's Prayer"; illustrated. "The Christian Slumber-Song." By Augusta Browne Garrett. "Culture of the Clergy," etc.
Poems.—"Beneath the Cross"; illustrated. "Thoughts"; illustrated border. "Pane Nights" and "Song of the Twilight." By E. W. Bellamy (from Victor Hugo). "Village Children." "A Summer Day Myth." "The Rose in the Rain." "Missionary Hymn." By Carrie L. Post. "The Owl and the Lamb."
Miscellany.—"Filled with Fire." "Jabez of the Chronicles, identified with the Pharaoh of Joseph." "Action for Damages among the Jews." "Good Advice for Everybody." "On the Housetop." "Hassuna"; illustrated. "Caracas, in the Land of Earthquakes"; illustrated. "The Catacombs"; illustrated. "Christian Warfare." "What Music Did." "The Sealing of the Sepulchre"; illustrated. "Watering Plants in Jerusalem"; illustrated. "Traveling in the Seventeenth Century," by Lord Macaulay. "The Sea," etc., etc.
"Wit, Wisdom and Pathos of Childhood." "Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Reflections for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep"—The Christian Slumber-song; composed for the SUNDAY MAGAZINE by Augusta Browne Garrett.

128 Quarto Pages—100 Engravings.

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. B. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDERSON, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 42, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.

General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

JORDAN ALUM SPRINGS,
Rockbridge County, Va.

A strictly first-class Summer Resort. Open for visitors from June 1st until October.

At Goshen Depot (C. & O. R. R.) take the stage for Jordan Alum Springs. Distance, eight miles.

Mrs. M. J. COILEY, Proprietor.

THE WARM SPRINGS,
Bath County, Virginia,

Are now open and will be kept open until the 15th of October. Six thousand gallons of Warm Sulphur Water per minute. The baths are said to be the finest in the world. The water has been found signally beneficial in rheumatism and gout, neuralgia, paralysis, dyspepsia, disorders of the urinary organs, chronic diseases of the skin, all diseases of the blood, and the diseases peculiar to females. JNO. L. EUBANK, Proprietor.
Send postal for pamphlets.

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS, VA.
JAMES A. FRAZER, Owner and Proprietor.
COLONEL N. COBB, General Manager.

The Rockbridge Alum Waters are indorsed and prescribed by leading physicians in all sections of the country, among whom may be named Professor James L. Cabell, University of Virginia; Professors T. Gaillard Thomas, Thomas A. Emmet, New York City; Dr. M. M. Pallen, St. Louis; Dr. Thomas L. Madden, Nashville. Consumption, Bronchitis and Scrofula are often arrested and frequently wholly cured by the Rockbridge Alum Waters. Post-office as above. Send for pamphlets.

Get off at Covington for the
HEALING SPRINGS, BATH COUNTY, VA.

The mineral water at its natural temperature affords a most exhilarating bath, while by steam it can be heated to any temperature desired. The Healing Springs are in the valley of the Warm Springs mountains, and 2,400 feet above tide-water. The air is pure, dry and bracing. Vehicles in attendance on every train. Daily mails and telegraph office. Board, $2 50 per day; $15 per week; $50 per month of 28 days. Water delivered at R. R. station, $5 per doz. two-quart bottles. DR. J. E. CHANCELLOR (late of the University of Va.), Resident Physician.
H. C. EUBANK, Proprietor.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, post-paid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

THE LATEST SUMMER FASHIONS
Received from Paris,
IMPORTED EXCLUSIVELY FOR
Frank Leslie's
LADY'S JOURNAL,
THE
Acknowledged Fashion Periodical of the Country.

"FRANK LESLIE'S LADY'S JOURNAL," says the Philadelphia Covenant, "is, without doubt, the most attractive fashion journal published. It is the acknowledged authority in European and American fashions, the fashion plates being imported monthly. It gives the latest styles of Parisian indoor toilets, promenade and carriage costumes, children's dresses, etc; also elaborate articles illustrative of what New Yorkers are wearing. Each number contains serial novels and short stories, sketches, etc; illustrations of home and foreign subjects, poetry, fashionable intelligence, social gossip, useful information on family topics, etc., etc."

This popular periodical has now entered on its Eighteenth Volume; it will be especially notable for the completeness of its fashion reports, always earlier and more reliable than those of any similar publication; the beauty of its art illustrations; the excellence and variety of its serial and short stories, and the comprehensiveness and interest of its miscellaneous articles.

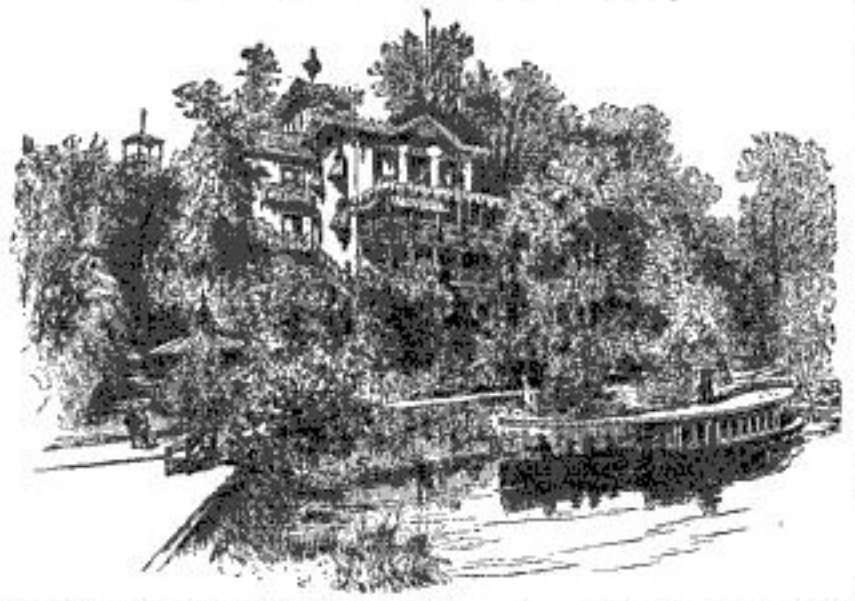
Every effort will be made to surpass, if possible, the high standard of merit which the paper has since attained, and to render the LADY'S JOURNAL not only indispensable in every household, but the recognized arbiter of Fashion throughout the Western World.

Accurate Reports and Illustrations of the Prevailing Fashions at Home and Abroad.

16 PAGES, WITH BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.

The literary contents comprise Brilliant Serials, attractive Short Stories, Sketches of Life, Character and Scenery, Fashion and Society Gossip, etc., etc. Its art and other miscellaneous engravings are selected with a view to variety, interest and beauty.

Published every Friday. Price 10 cents, at all newsdealers'. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.



Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

HEKTOGRAPH

Dry process of copying. Patented May 18th and June 1st, 1880. One Hundred Copies of any writing or drawing made in 20 minutes. Patents for this process having been issued to us, the manufacture, use or sale of any Gelatine Copying Pad other than the Hektograph is illegal, and will be prosecuted.

HEKTOGRAPH CO., 82 and 84 Church St., New York

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"
THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

THE PHILADELPHIA PREMIUM BOOK CO., No. 610 Chestnut St., Philad'a, Pa., is advertising new and standard Books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and its list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises.

Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 159—165 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Streets, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF

By sending 35c money or 40c, postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

GENUINE SECRETS WORTH MILLIONS RELIABLE
Lecturer Reveals in 21 days! Dancing
Complexion in 6 hours! Glorious Health!
Boundless Wealth! Ruinous Love! Book
FREE—Address, Darrow & Co., Toronto, Can.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE | THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. B. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 233 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromos, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

AGENTS WANTED for "The Life and Times of GEN. W. S. HANCOCK," by T. C. WILLSON, Editorial Staff New York World, with facts and figures since the days of Washington. A Cyclopedia for voters. A book worth having. Over 500 pages, 60 illustrations, $2. The outfit for the business, 50 cents. Apply at once.
E. B. TREAT, Publisher,
757 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Campaign Goods
We are headquarters for Campaign Goods, such as Suits, Capes, Caps, Belts, Shirts, Torches, Pipes, Photographs, Banners, Badges, etc.
Agents Wanted! Clubs Supplied. Complete samples sent by express $1-50, sample Badge 10c. by mail, ten for 50c., one dozen by mail $1 00. Either candidates. Portraits 12x16, 10 cents each; 4 for 25 cents.
E. G. RIDEOUT & CO.,
10 Barclay St., N. Y.

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED $105 A Month and Expenses selling to DEALERS SAMPLES FREE. Send 2c. STAMP to S. FOSTER & CO., Cincinnati, O.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

L.S.L.
Take Notice!

This is the only Lottery ever voted on by the people of a State, and, under a late decision of the United States Supreme Court at Washington, is the only Legal Lottery now in the United States, all other charters having been repealed or having no existence.

Louisiana State Lottery Company.

This institution was regularly incorporated by the Legislature of the State for Educational and Charitable purposes in 1868, for the term of Twenty-five Years, in which contract the inviolable faith of the State was pledged, which pledge has been renewed by an overwhelming popular vote, securing its franchise in the new Constitution adopted Dec. 2, A.D. 1879, with a capital of $1,000,000, to which it has since added a reserve fund of over $350,000.

ITS GRAND SINGLE NUMBER DISTRIBUTION has always taken place on AUGUST 10th.

It has been the custom of this Company to offer a CAPITAL PRIZE OF $30,000, and 100,000 TICKETS AT TWO DOLLARS EACH, HALF TICKETS, ONE DOLLAR.

LIST OF PRIZES IN FORMER DRAWINGS.

1 Capital Prize		$30,000
1 Capital Prize		10,000
1 Capital Prize		5,000
3 Prizes of	$2,000	6,000
5 Prizes of	1,000	5,000
20 Prizes of	500	10,000
100 Prizes of	100	10,000
200 Prizes of	50	10,000
500 Prizes of	20	10,000
1,000 Prizes of	10	10,000
APPROXIMATION PRIZES.
9 Approximation Prizes of	$300	2,700
9 Approximation Prizes of	200	1,800
9 Approximation Prizes of	100	900
1,857 Prizes, amounting to		$130,400

M. A. DAUPHIN,
New Orleans, La.; or, No. 319 Broadway, New York.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 Chromo, Glass, Scroll, Wreath, and Lace Cards, 10c. Try us. CHROMO CARD CO., Northford, Ct.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

55 ASSORTED Perfumed Cards, with name, 10c. SHEFFIELD CARD CO., 2186 Ward, CINCINNATI.

25 Hancock & English or Garfield & Arthur Cards, name printed, 10c. Samples free. Hill & Co., Lebanon, N.H.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!
Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
THE
August Number Now Ready.
CONTENTS:

"Oberammergau and its Attractions—The Passion Play in 1880." By N. Robinson. Twelve Illustrations.

"Some Remarkable American Women—At the Bar, in the Pulpit, and on the Dramatic and Operatic Stages." By George J. Hagar. Seventeen Illustrations and portraits.

"What the Japanese Eat." By Edward Greey. Twelve Illustrations.

"An Anglo-French Watering-place—Granville." By HENRY ALDIS.

"The Massacre at Chicago." Illustrated.

"Colbert—Minister and Favorite of Louis XIV." Illustrated.

"Cameo-cutting." Illustrated.

"Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn." Illustrated.

"A Soap Bubble." By John A. Bower. Nine Illustrations.

Short and serial Stories.—"Not Guilty," by Eliz. W. Pierce (Chaps. XXIII.-XXV.); Illustrated. "In the Wrong Box"; Illustrated. "How May Pink Became the Richest Girl in Chester," by Richard R. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger." "Fergus Blake's Rule," by John Moran; Illustrated. "Was it Better?" by S. Annie Frost; Illustrated. "The Dead Hand," by Walter Edgar McCann; Illustrated. "The Revenge of Gerald Geraghty"; Illustrated. "Flick et Flock"; Illustrated. "The Ban of Blood"; Illustrated—etc.

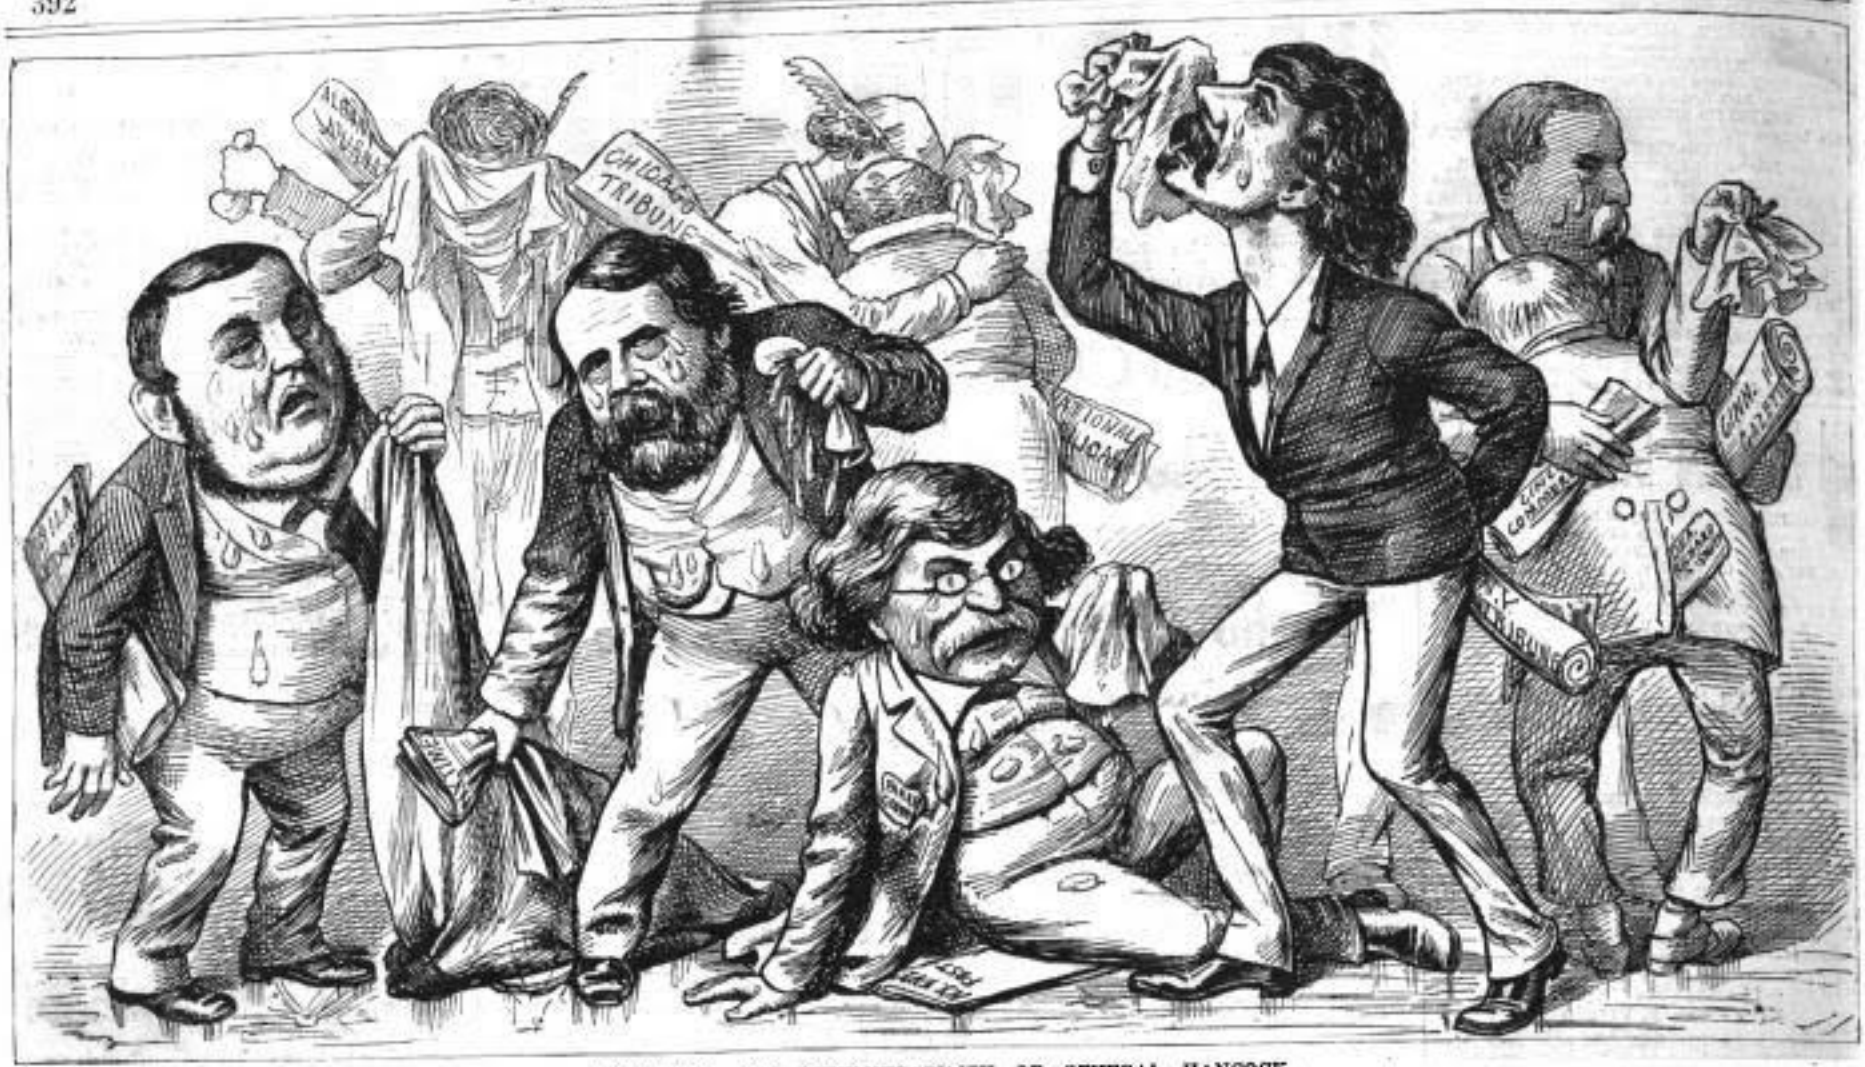
Sketches.—"A Wild Beast Shop"; Illustrated. "An Adventure in a Forest," by James Payn. "A Rubber Saved"; Illustrated. "A Scratched Cameo"; Illustrated. "The Boy who did not Know what Fear was"; Illustrated. "Letters Oddly Lost and Found—Some Cases which should Teach Caution in making Charges of Theft"; etc., etc.

Poems.—"That Dream of Ours." "A Dilettante." "Summer Pastime"; Illustrated. "Captain Otis's Booty," a Ballad, by A. Mary F. Robinson; Illustrated. "Flowers"; Illustrated.

Miscellany.—"An Invalid's Experience," with comic illustrations. "Clocks in China." "Who First Drew Down the Lightning?" "The History of Writing." "Violin Makers." "Dyak's Trays." "The Prairie Dog's Home, and its Unwelcome Visitors"; Illustrated. "How Kings Traveled in the Fourteenth Century." "Goobers." "Recent Progress in Science," "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES, over 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

COLORED FRONTISPIECE:



"An Ancient Egyptian Lady's Toilet—Painting the Eyes with Kohl."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; and four months, $1. Sent postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

BEWAILING THE INVULNERABILITY OF GENERAL HANCOCK.

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS
For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.
NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane route at all seasons of the year.
CITY OF RICHMOND.....Saturday, July 31, 1 P. M.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, August 7, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS...Thursday, August 12, 9.30 A. M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, August 21, 3 P. M.
CITY OF MONTREAL..Thursday, August 26, 9.30 A. M.
From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.
Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.
Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.
These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.
JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.
Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,
Furnished free.
GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 452, N. Y.

KIDNEY-WORT
The Only Remedy
That Acts at the Same Time on
The Liver, The Bowels and The Kidneys.
This combined action gives it wonderful power to cure all diseases.
Why Are We Sick?
Because we allow these great organs to become clogged or torpid, and poisonous humors are therefore forced into the blood that should be expelled naturally.
KIDNEY-WORT WILL CURE
Biliousness, Piles, Constipation, Kidney Complaints and Diseases, Weaknesses and Nervous Disorders.
By causing free action of these organs and restoring their power to throw off disease.
Why Suffer Bilious pains and aches?
Why tormented with Piles, Constipation?
Why frightened over disordered Kidneys?
Why endure nervous or sick headaches?
Why have sleepless nights?
Use KIDNEY-WORT and rejoice in health. It is a dry, vegetable compound and
One package will make six gts. of Medicine.
Get it of your Druggist, he will order it for you. Price, $1.00.
WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,
(Will send post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65
Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogues free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

Chesapeake & Ohio Railway
A favorite route for freight and passenger traffic between the East and West, in connection with packets on the Ohio River; railroads diverging at Cincinnati to West, Southwest and Northwest, and with various roads intersecting it; also with steamers and sail-vessels on the coast connecting at Richmond, Va.
Particular attention is called to the
GREAT REDUCTION
IN
EXCURSION FARES
TO THE
Various Springs and Summer Resorts
IN THE
MOUNTAINS OF VA. AND W. VA.
DURING THE SEASON OF 1880.
Tickets on sale at the Freight and Passenger Office of the Company, 229 Broadway, New York, and at the principal Ticket Offices throughout the country.
CONWAY R. HOWARD, G. P. & T. A.,
Richmond, Va.
Rates will be given and contracts made for freight to or from all points reached by the C. & O. Railway and its connections, by
H. W. CARR, Gen'l Eastern Ag't,
229 BROADWAY.

THE Admiration
OF THE
WORLD.
Mrs. S. A. Allen's
WORLD'S Hair Restorer
IS PERFECTION!
FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.
IT IS NOT A DYE.
It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use is all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio
A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH
SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail 50 cents. Circulars free. J. Bingh & Co., 38 Dey St., N.Y.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!
Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of
TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

WILHELMS-QUELLE
IMPORTED
NATURAL MINERAL WATER
FOR SALE AT ALL GROCERS AND DRUGGISTS.
LIBERAL DISCOUNTS TO THE TRADE.
SOLE IMPORTERS,
MACK & BRUNLER,
7 BARCLAY ST., NEW YORK,
Near Post Office.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.
SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.
ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
139 to 151 Bowery, New York.
Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE
A practical road machine. Indorsed by the medical profession as the most healthful of out-door sports. Send 3c. stamp for 24-page catalogue with price list and full information, or 10 cts. for catalogue and copy of "The Bicycling World." THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

JUNIOR AIR GUN, $10
Send for Catalogue of Air Guns, Pistol Rifles, Darts, Cap Pistols and Targets.
HAVILAND & GUNN, Hion, N.Y.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,
Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.
SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.
KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY.
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, &c. (Will take 8x12 Larger sizes for larger work. For all printing. Steel or wood cuts. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

MAIRE, TODD & BAIRD.
GOLD PENS.

Pencils, Holders, Cases, etc.
180 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send for Price-List.
Our Goods are for sale by First-class Dealers in U. S.

Mining Trust Company
OFFICE 115 BROADWAY N.Y.
Transact all business pertaining to Mining Interests: The custody and investment of funds, registry and transfer of stocks, payment of dividends, consignments of bullion, etc.
American Mining Stock Exchange
(Under the auspices of the Mining Trust Company).
EXCHANGE ROOM AND OFFICES, No. 63 BROADWAY.

$2—WEIGHT, 12 LBS.—$2 Griffith's Portable Bed opens and closes on an entirely new principle. Single movement, and done instantly. Every part locks firmly into position, and self-fastening. We challenge comparison for durability and strength with anything ever offered to the public. No mattress nor pillow required. With fancy covering, $2.50; painted tastily, $3. Express charges very low to all points. Sent promptly on receipt of price. Liberal discount to the Trade. E. S. GRIFFITH, Manager, Toledo, Ohio.

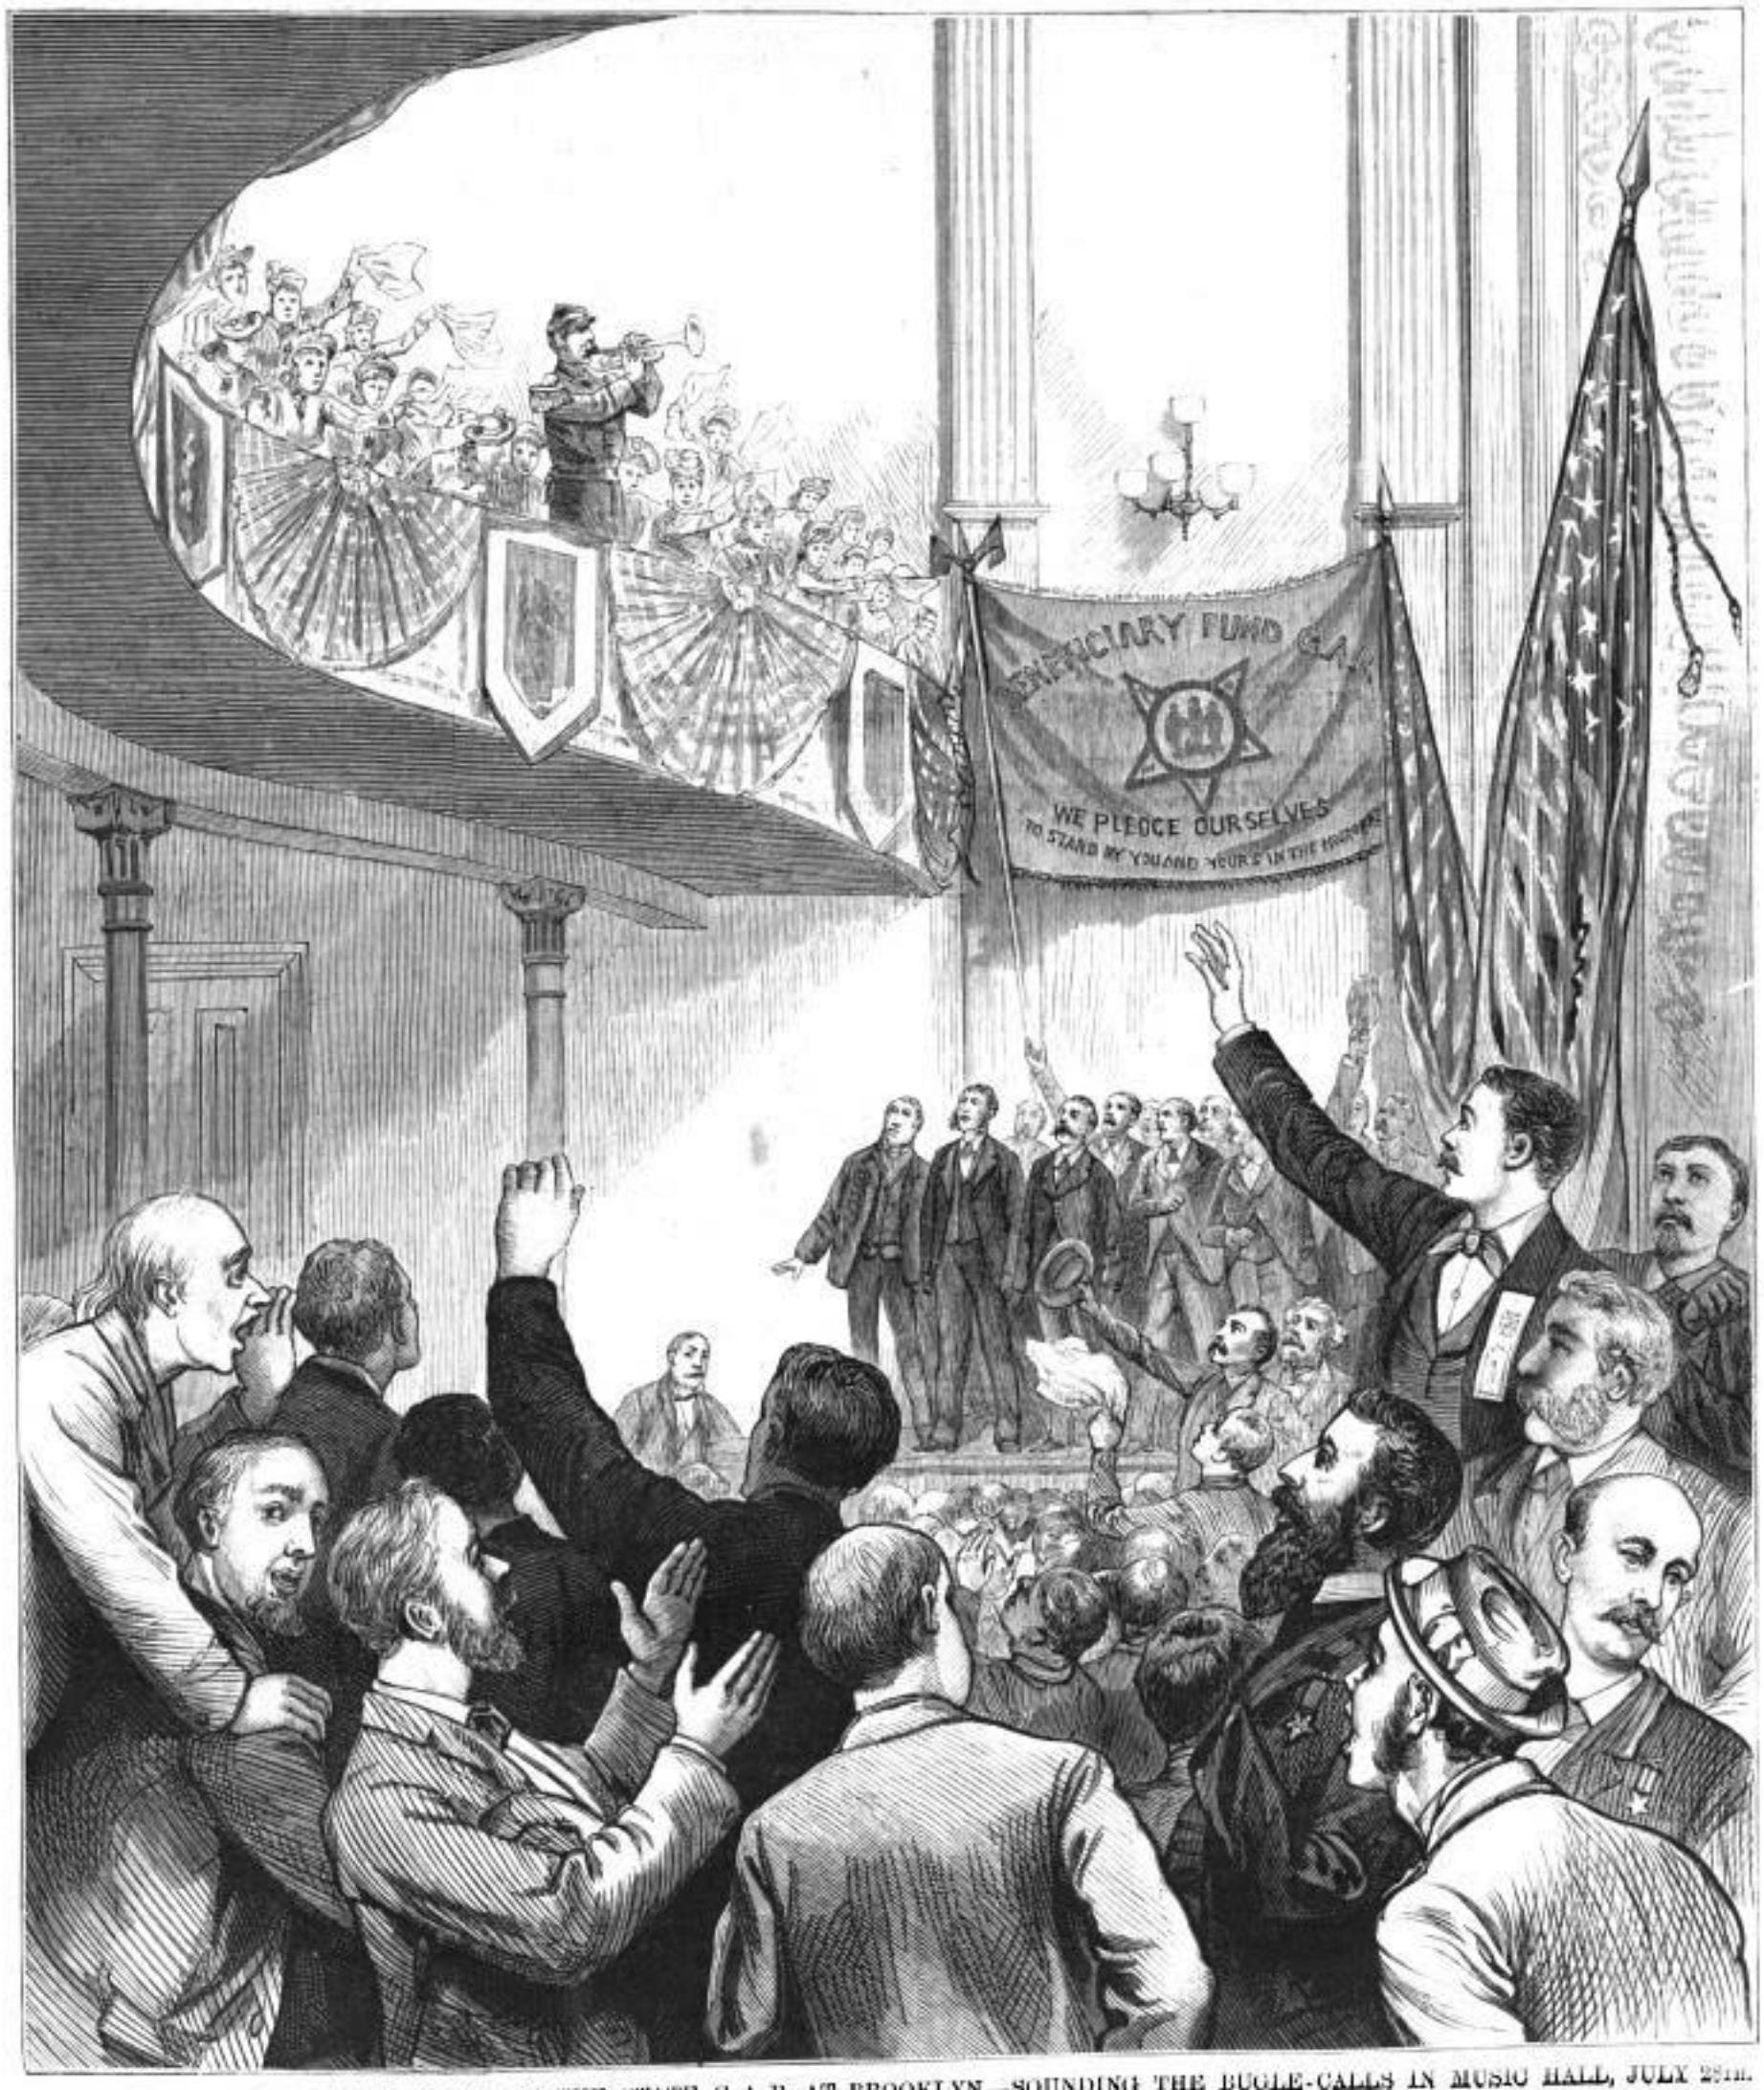
BAD DEBTS BOUGHT
From Farmers, Merchants, etc., by W. S. CURTIS, Broker. Protested Notes, Bad Book Accounts, and all classes of Doubtful Claims. Send full memorandum of old Judgments, Notes and Accounts (provided the debtors are still living), and my offer will be sent.
W. S. CURTIS,
127 W. 34th St., New York.

TRUSS EGGLESTON-SENSIBLE-TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1016 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for Illustrated Catalogue of 148 pages. Mention this paper.

FIRM'S
Can for Explosive Fluids.
PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.
P. O. Box 4278, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S
Illustrated Newspaper
$1.50
FOR 22 WEEKS
OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN,
Beginning with No. 1,290.
Political subjects will be ably represented editorially, and fully illustrated, during this period.
Address,
FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53-55-57 Park Place, New York.



Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.
A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE.
INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.
For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Ehelland, Assignee, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,298.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, AUGUST 14, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly. 13 Weeks $1.00.

NEW YORK.—SUMMER ENCAMPMENT OF THE STATE G. A. R. AT BROOKLYN—SOUNDING THE BUGLE-CALLS IN MUSIC HALL, JULY 29TH.
See Page 398.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 14, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4325.

NEW YORK, January 12th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4325, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

CAUTION.

Subscribers, in sending subscriptions for any of our publications, should be careful, in order to insure the safe delivery of their letters, to direct them plainly to the street numbers of the Frank Leslie Publishing House, Nos. 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York.

THE POLITICS OF BUSINESS.

IF we may judge from the present signs of the times, it would seem pretty clear that, in the pending Presidential campaign, the country may congratulate itself on the prospect of being spared the sound and fury of "a red-hot campaign." Many causes have conspired to produce this beneficent result. Prominent among these causes is the absence of "critical" issues, involving the life or death of the country; and the elimination of such issues may be said to date from the nominations made respectively by each of the great historical parties at Chicago and at Cincinnati. The nomination of General Grant for a third term would have opened the floodgates of an angry conflict, in which the charge of a meditated "imperialism" would have drowned, with its hoarse clamors, the still small voice of men pleading for economical policies and for administrative reforms; while the nomination of General Garfield offers to the country, in the case of his election, a reasonable ground for expecting that his administration, in its general methods and aims, would be at once a normal projection and lineal continuation of the administration of President Hayes. In like manner the nomination of General Hancock has wellnigh put an extinguisher on the fervid oratory by which, in former Presidental campaigns, the Republican canvassers have exhorted the soldier class "to vote as they shot." It is not easy to fan the smoldering embers of the late civil war, in the hope of making such a political bonfire out of them as shall light the way to a Republican victory, when it is a distinguished Union general who stands at the head of the Democratic forces, and when the Republican candidate has himself expressed the opinion, on a notable occasion, that the man who at this epoch "attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issues will find himself without a party and without support."

And, then, the debatable territory in the present campaign is a comparatively narrow one. The Democratic Party enters into the conflict with the assumption (and almost with the admission of its adversary) that it may confidently count on the one hundred and thirty-eight votes of "the Solid South." The Republican Party enters into the conflict with the assurance that the great mass of the Northern States will adhere to its banner, leaving only a few "pivotal" States like New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Indiana to bear the chief brunt of the campaign. There will be a strenuous canvass in States like Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Maine, Ohio, California and Oregon, but we presume that in these there is a reasonable preponderance of chances in favor of the Republicans.

While we do not look with complacency on this sectional preponderance of the Democrats at the South and of the Republicans at the North, we are glad to recognize the fact that this sectional political schism is stripped of nearly all significance in the present canvass. It is historical, and no longer vital. The "bloody chasm" was filled when President Hayes restored the States of Louisiana and South Carolina to their rightful autonomy under the Constitution; and there was a "shaking of hands" across the late chasm when "the Confederate Brigadiers" helped to nominate "the hero of Gettysburg" as their chosen candidate for the Presidency.

It is a matter of congratulation that neither considerations of public safety nor considerations appealing to the "sentiments" of the people, need any longer stand in the way of the serious and practical business which will be devolved on the administration of the Government during the next four years. General Garfield was entirely right when, in advance of his nomination, he held the following emphatic language: "The man who wants to serve his country must put himself in the line of its leading thought, and that is the restoration of business, trade, commerce, industry, sound political economy, hard money, and honest payment of all obligations." This, we are sure, is the direction in which "the leading thought" of the country is pointing to-day. The fervid Republicans who seek to place "the Southern issue" in the forefront of the campaign, and to fight the battles of the war over again in the lists of the Presidential canvass, are really contributing to the success of the Democratic candidate. The people see clearly enough that questions of public business and of civil administration cannot be safely intrusted to men whose minds are still saturated by the smoke and passion of the late civil war. And the people, too, see clearly enough that the election of General Hancock would put an end for ever to the hierarchical pretensions of the politicians who propose to rule the country simply by virtue of the war passions preserved in the bosom of peace.

And the Democrat who, in the presence of the mild and unostentatious administration of President Hayes, professes to be alarmed by the "centralizing tendencies" of the Republican Party, is likely to be suspected of raising a panic cry only because he fears to face the real issues which he knows to be on the country at the present juncture. It is a "bad year" for dealers in portents and spectres, whether they belong to the one party or to the other. And the party which shows itself the most willing and skillful to grapple with the real business problems of the present and the future is the party which is not only the most likely to deserve, but the most likely to receive, the suffrages of the people.

If the Democratic Party had maintained the purity and consistency of its ancient traditions in the matter of the currency, and if it could be trusted to reform the civil service by some agency a good deal more certain in its operation and more permanent in its effects than by a sweeping change in the mere incumbents of Federal place, we incline to think that its path to victory in the present campaign would be an open and easy one. Or if, with its comparative advantages under each of these heads, the Republican Party was not handicapped with obsolete notions of political economy in regard to the tariff, it might better hope for success by more clearly deserving it. Between the weakness and the strength of each of these two great parties, it seems to us that the independent and solid opinion of the country is likely to oscillate, until it shall finally gravitate to the one party or to the other, according to the conceived exigencies of the times and according to the tendencies which are likely to be most needed in the next Administration at Washington. What these tendencies are likely to be will become evident in the course of the impending canvass, and will call for further remark as soon as they shall be fully revealed.

OUR TRADE EXHIBIT.

THE trade exhibit of the United States for the fiscal year ending with the 30th of June, just made up by the Bureau of Statistics, shows that both the value of the imports of merchandise and the value of the exports of merchandise were larger than during any preceding year in the history of the country. The total exports for the year were $835,793,924, and the total imports, $667,885,565. In 1873, the next largest, the imports were $522,479,920, and the exports $642,136,210. For the year 1879 the exports were $710,439,441, and the imports $445,777,775. The value of the exports of merchandise during the last year exceeded the value of the exports of merchandise of the preceding year about $125,000,000, or eighteen per cent., while the value of the imports of merchandise during the last year exceeded the value of such imports during the preceding year about $222,000,000, or fifty per cent. The increase in the value of the imports of merchandise exceeded the increase in the value of the exports nearly $97,000,000. The value of the imports and exports of merchandise during the fiscal year just closed exceeded the value of such imports and exports during the preceding year about $347,000,000, an increase of thirty per cent. "The rapid growth of the foreign commerce of the country"—we use the language of the report—"is strikingly exhibited by the fact that the value of the imports and exports of merchandise during the fiscal year just closed amounted to $1,503,679,489, being about eighty-one per cent greater than the value of the imports and exports of 1870, and nearly one hundred and nineteen per cent. greater than the value of the imports and exports for 1860."

During the year just closed, for the first time since 1861, the imports of coin and bullion exceeded the exports of the same nearly $70,000,000. The fiscal year may fairly be regarded as the most prosperous the nation ever had. As illustrating, comprehensively, the value of our merchandise exports and imports for twenty years, from 1860 to 1880 inclusive, with the excess of exports over imports, or the excess of imports over exports, in each year, we subjoin an exhibit from the latest official report:

Year ended June 30	Total exports	Imports	Excess of exports over imports.	Excess of imp'ts over exports.
1860...	$333,576,057	$353,616,119	.....	$20,040,062
1861...	219,553,853	269,310,542	.....	49,756,709
1862...	310,463,501	189,596,677	$1,313,824	.....
1863...	333,964,447	242,243,813	.....	20,371,168
1864...	348,847,988	316,447,281	.....	157,000,595
1865...	260,020,303	328,145,540	.....	72,719,237
1866...	348,859,722	434,842,066	.....	85,957,344
1867...	294,566,141	395,761,686	.....	101,254,945
1868...	281,452,899	357,436,440	.....	78,483,545
1869...	284,117,627	417,506,379	.....	131,388,692
1870...	392,771,768	439,988,408	.....	48,186,640
1871...	442,820,178	520,2[illegible],684	.....	77,405,506
1872...	444,177,586	626,199,077	.....	182,417,491
1873...	522,479,920	642,136,210	.....	119,656,288
1874...	586,269,040	563,906,342	18,876,089	.....
1875...	513,842,731	533,989,490	.....	19,564,725
1876...	540,384,673	460,741,190	79,642,483	.....
1877...	602,475,223	491,323,1[illegible]6	111,152,494	.....
1878...	658,985,746	422,031,522	237,814,224	.....
1879...	710,439,442	445,777,775	264,661,666	.....
18 0...	85[illegible],793,924	667,885,565	167,908,359	.....

As to the bullion movement, taking the record of the last twenty years, the facts are both interesting and encouraging. From 1861 to 1879, there was a steady outflow of coin and bullion to Europe. Now, having become a creditor instead of a debtor nation, we are steadily adding to our store of the precious metals. In the year 1862 the excess of exports over imports was $20,472,588, and up to 1876 it was never less than $31,000,000 in any one year. In 1864 the exports exceeded the imports by $92,280,929; in 1866 by $75,343,979; in 1871 by $77,171,964, and so on. In 1879 the excess of exports over imports was $4,701,441. In 1880, as before stated, the tide turned and the imports exceeded the exports by $75,891,301. The large influx of gold during the last fiscal year began in August, while this year the movement begins nearly a month earlier, $800,000 gold from London and Havre having reached here last week.

THE COMPENSATION ACT.

THE Disturbance Compensation Bill, which has passed the British House of Commons by a decisive majority, has as its object the correction of abuses growing out of the ejectment of tenants for non-payment of rents in certain parts of Ireland. It provides, substantially, that no tenant shall be ejected between the passage of the Act and December, 1881, if it shall appear to the tribunal in which, under an Act passed some years ago, agrarian cases are decided, that such non-payment of rent is owing to the tenant's inability to pay; that the tenant is willing to continue in the occupation, often holding upon just and reasonable terms as to rent, arrears of rent and otherwise, and that such terms are unreasonably refused by the landlord. This provision, to say the least of it, is humane, and we can only account for it on the ground that the Irish tenant is still regarded by the landlord as a vassal who has no rights which the privileged classes are bound to respect. The Liverpool Post, in portraying the situation out of which the proposed legislation has arisen, says:

"Up to 1870 no compensation whatever upon disturbance was given to farmers for anything they put on or in the land. They were turned out at their landlords' pleasure without a farthing. From 1850 compensation was guaranteed by Mr. Gladstone's Act. But many landlords have largely recouped themselves by forcing up the rents—a process called rack rent, almost unknown in England. Tenants could have no benefit on disturbance under Mr. Gladstone's Act if they did not pay their rents. Three bad seasons in 1877, 1878 and 1879 rendered it impossible for many of them to pay their rents, and the farmers to a large extent had to live on charity from England and America. Thereupon the landlords virtually say to certain tenants, 'Out you go. We won't wait, and as you can't pay your rent we will turn you out without the compensation which the 1870 Land Act meant you to have, and which in Ulster you would have without any Act at all.' But Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster say, 'No. A temporary inability to pay rent arising from overwhelming calamity shall not deprive those tenants of the status which is permanently secured to them (rent being paid) by custom in Ulster, and by the statute of 1870 in the rest of Ireland.' How is it to be secured to them? Both parties shall go before a judge, and if he finds the landlord unreasonable, he shall make the landlord wait or give some just concession. The operation of the Act is strictly limited to a brief time, the probable duration of cruel distress, and thus resembles the grace given by special Acts to acceptors of bills whose acceptances fall due at a time of commercial crisis."

The Bill will be strongly opposed in the House of Lords, and its defeat is by no means impossible, several of the Liberal peers being violently hostile to its passage. Its rejection would undoubtedly be followed by a renewal of agitation, and a possible renewal of outrages, in Ireland; and in this view of the case—leaving out entirely the consideration of justice—the success of the measure will certainly be hoped for by all well-wishers of the Empire.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENSHIP.

THE doctrine of "once a citizen always a citizen" has recently been reasserted in a most offensive fashion by the German Government. The facts in the case are substantially these: Some years ago, A. C. Boisselier, who had emigrated from Germany to this country and settled in St. Louis, returned to the fatherland with his two sons, who were native Americans, born respectively in 1852 and 1854. The father became again a Prussian subject, but the sons before they became of age returned to the land of their birth, and are now living in St. Louis, where they exercise all the rights of American citizens. A year ago last November they were published as military fugitives by the Provincial Government of Eckernfoerde, in Sleswick, and in January, 1879, proceedings were commenced against them in the Royal Circuit Court under a statute which, if they had been convicted, would have confiscated the property coming to them as heirs of the elder Boisselier. The court, however, acquitted them very properly on the ground that the young men were not Prussian subjects but American citizens. The Boisselliers naturally supposed that this was the end of the matter; but it now appears that the father has received a letter from the President of the Royal Provincial Government at Sleswick, which takes the extraordinary ground that the court to which the Government itself had submitted the question did not possess jurisdiction; that its decision was based on an "erroneous presumption" that the sons were American citizens, and that orders have been given "to catch the sons as soon as they shall show themselves in Germany, and treat them as 'insecure military duty-bound fugitives,'" which means to put them into the military or send them as criminals into some penitentiary or fortress. The letter adds that the young men can evade such treatment only by making application to be dismissed from Prussian State allegiance before they enter the territory of the German Empire.

We can well understand the anxiety of the German Government to maintain its hold on persons of military age; but upon what ground it can claim the services of citizens of the United States, born here of naturalized parents, is, we must confess, entirely beyond our comprehension. It is stated that our Minister at Berlin will be instructed to institute inquiries and ask an explanation of the German authorities, and, if the facts shall prove to be as represented, we may hope that the State Department will assert the dignity and rights of American citizenship with an emphasis and clearness which will effectually deter Germany or any other European power from ever again asserting a doctrine so indefensible and a pretense so audacious.

MUNICIPAL INDEBTEDNESS.

THE investigation by the Census Bureau into the growth and character of municipal debts in the United States has developed an array of facts on this important subject which, to say the least, cannot be contemplated with satisfaction. The results, so far as determined, show that the local indebtedness of the State of New York is $224,079,859; of Pennsylvania, $128,000,000; of New Jersey, $47,314,802; of Illinois, $51,821,691; of Ohio, $41,490,574; of Massachusetts, $87,000,000; of Wisconsin, nearly $10,000,000; of Minnesota, over $5,000,000; of Kansas, $13,000,000; of Missouri, $40,000,000; of Connecticut, $17,000,000; of Rhode Island, $12,000,000; of New Hampshire, $5,500,000; of California, $11,000,000; of Tennessee, $10,000,000; of Iowa, $6,000,000; of Nevada, $900,000; of Indiana, $14,000,000; of Louisiana, $20,000,000, making a total of $764,206,926. The totals in round numbers in all the other States amount to $87,800,000. Thus the total local indebtedness of the United States, as computed for the census of 1880, appears to be $852,006,926. The total county, town, and city indebtedness, as given in the census of 1870, was about $515,000,000, of which $328,000,000 were assigned to town and city. The remainder, about $187,000,000, represented the debts contracted by the counties. The census officials believe that the census of 1880 will not reveal a large increase in this county debt, and will not be surprised to find that it is no larger than it was in 1870. The greater part of this debt was created by giving aid to railroads, and the counties have not invested their money in this way to any great extent since 1871. The increase in local indebtedness, therefore, which is exhibited, is due almost entirely to the action of cities and towns; it is municipal in character. The Times correspondent, who supplies these interesting details, adds that "there has been a remarkable change in the amount of State indebtedness. In 1839 the States owed only in the neighborhood of $13,000,000. In the era of prosperity which followed, the heads of the people were turned. The crash of 1837 came, but the States had caught the fever of creating debt, and statistics collected for the first time in 1840 showed that the total State indebtedness, almost entirely contracted between 1830 and 1837, was $188,610,000. The total had risen in 1870, according to the census, to $352,000,000." The statistics now gathered show that to-day the total State indebtedness is only $266,638,000, a falling off of one-quarter in ten years. This decrease is accounted for almost wholly by repudiation in certain States."

Digitized by Google

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE news from Turkey represents a most grave condition of affairs. The reply of the Porte to the collective note of the Powers objects to the cession of such an enormous slice of territory to Greece, and says that the conference of Berlin did not authorize the Powers to arbitrate between Greece and Turkey, but merely to offer their good services as mediators. Hence the Porte refuses to be bound by the action of the so-called arbitrators. As concerns Montenegro, the Sultan expresses his willingness to carry out, as far as he can, the required cession of Albanian territory, and promises to aid the Montenegrins in their efforts to take possession of the places ceded. It now depends upon the great Powers either to maintain peace by joining together in good faith and insisting upon Turkey carrying out to the letter the obligations which they have imposed upon her, or else to risk the probably universal war which will ensue upon a declaration of hostilities between Greece and Turkey.

About the time that General Burrows was flying, routed, before the pursuing Afghans a grand review was held in Windsor Park before the Queen. According to competent judges, the appearance, marching and drill of the forces on that occasion were almost perfect. The Queen, who was accompanied by several members of the Royal family, was very much pleased, and expressed her entire satisfaction with the manœuvres. A new feature was introduced into the usual evolutions which promises to be very popular at such displays. While the cavalry and horse artillery had been passing the Queen's carriage at a canter, the field batteries had been forming along the whole length of the front, and they now came forward at a trot, unlimbered, loaded and fired a round. Then limbering up again, they rode to the rear, while the first cavalry brigade advanced in a long line, performing the sword exercise. Then halting, the brigade retired, doing pursuing duty, and as the heavy cavalry passed the Hussars and Lancers, these also, advancing, performed the sword and lance exercise. Then all the cavalry on the field combined in one charge past the Queen, at racing speed. The effect of these manœuvres is said to have been remarkably fine; but how different was this mimic war in its results to that which was going on at about the same time on the banks of the Helmund! The principal musical event of the present London season was the production of Boito's "Mefistofele." This opera—of which the libretto and music are both by Boito—was composed several years ago, and at the time of its first production in Italy was a complete failure. Years passed by, and Boito made many changes, cutting and pruning, until he reproduced it in Italy, where it made a grand success. This year Mr. Mapleson has produced it in London, and the musical world is wild with excitement over the revolution in Italian music which it promises. The composer has not restricted himself—as Gounod did—to the episode of Marguerite, but he accompanies Faust through all his temptations to the end of his career. Of course, such a scheme gives a wonderful variety to the composer of dramatic music. He has borrowed from Goethe the Prologue in Heaven, Easter revel, the part between Faust and Mephistopheles, the garden scene, the witches' sabbat, Marguerite's death, the classical sabbat, and Faust's death. Every scene and situation of these is full of musical suggestions, and Boito has given them life with wonderful success. He has adopted Wagner's style to a certain extent, but at the same time he has preserved the peculiar properties of the Italian school. Verdi's "Aïda" showed that the great German's method could be imitated in its essence by an Italian composer, and Boito's "Mefistofele" shows that it can be surpassed. This new departure is considered to form a revolution in Italian composition, and Boito is recognized as the most rising composer of the day.

The vacillating conduct and character of the present Pope Leo XIII. is so strongly opposed to that of his predecessor, Pius IX., and the policy which is at present pursued by the Vatican is so much at variance with that of the immediate past, that it has become a subject of general interest. The policy which has been adopted with regard to Belgium has brought about a withdrawal of the Bolivian Legation from Rome. The Pope censured the Belgian bishops in public for "too much zeal," and approved of their conduct in private. Nor did he do this with any double-faced intention, but merely from his inability to say "No" to any one. In France it has been the same thing. He could not make up his mind to support the Jesuits whom he hates, and he could not urge upon them to conform to the laws of the land. The French Ambassador, after almost daily conferences with Cardinal Nina, said he could "come to no other conclusion whatsoever," and finally the Pope adopted the abject counsel of ordering the Papal Nuncio in Paris to take a month's furlough as soon as the decrees were promulgated. The Nuncio replied that it was his duty to remain at his post, and that he should do so—an act of disobedience scarcely ever equaled in the annals of the Vatican. In Germany the Pope's vacillation has been so great that Cardinal Jacobini has peremptorily refused to take any further part in the negotiations between Germany and Rome unless he is endowed with full plenipotentiary powers.

Up to Saturday morning (July 31) the British military authorities had had no further communication with Candahar. The country from Krojak to Candahar is greatly disturbed, and it is believed that ten days will elapse before the messengers sent out to ascertain the details of General Burrows's defeat will be heard from. In the meantime several tribes are reported to be collecting along the Bolan route, and General Phayre has been prevented marching to the rescue through lack of a proper force. It is admitted that Ayoob Khan's army was vastly under-estimated, and that the attack upon Burrows's brigade has produced a most serious condition of affairs in the Afghan country. Heavy reinforcements are being hastened from India, and 12,000 men will be sent from England within a fortnight. General Sir Garnet Wolseley is mentioned as the possible commander-in-chief.

SECRETARY SHERMAN has issued a circular requiring all supervising inspectors of steamboats to make daily reports, and directing that every passenger and ferry steamer shall be visited several times in the interval covered by its inspection certificate. This is an eminently timely order, but, unfortunately, there is no law under which it can be enforced if the inspectors choose to disregard it. The inspection service can never be made what it should be until the defects in the existing laws are positively remedied

THE Democratic managers are blundering again. The whole drift and tendency of their campaign policy seems to be to exalt Mr. Tilden as a patriot, a statesman, a martyr, etc., rather than to develop the great personal strength of General Hancock and utilize the opportunity to deepen and intensify the popular appreciation of his patriotic record as an element of power in the canvass. They ought to understand that if their candidate is to be handicapped with all the sins and blunders of the party for the last twenty years, and made to play second fiddle to Mr. Tilden or anybody else, he will be beaten, just as every other candidate whom they have treated in this fashion has been beaten during the whole oft hat period.

THE growth of railroad enterprise in this country is very clearly shown by the statistics embodied in Poor's Manual, advance sheets of which have just been given to the press. These statistics show that during 1879 the gross earnings of 86,497 miles of railroad amounted to $529,012,999, as against $490,103,351 in 1878, and $503,065,505 for 1875. The increase in the number of miles of road built during the year was 4,721. As the reports cover the operations of 84,232 miles out of the total of 86,497, it is probably safe to conclude that the total railroad earnings for 1879 amounted to nearly, if not quite, six millions of dollars. The total tonnage of the year was 67,092,549, as against 45,557,002 tons of freight carried in 1873, the year of the greatest prosperity to railroads prior to 1879.

THERE is said to be a decided improvement in the iron trade in Pennsylvania. Prices of pig-iron are stiffer and better, according to grade, by $1 and $2 than they were a few weeks ago. Old rails, that in the last two months were $22 and $23 a ton, are now in active demand at $26 and $27, and large quantities are not to be obtained even at higher figures, manufacturers holding off for better prices. Several large orders have been taken by manufacturers within the last few days for new railroad iron, and the mills controlled by them will at once go into active operation. This improvement in the iron trade, of course, affects the coal market favorably; but it is understood that the operators will continue the present system of half-weekly suspensions for another month, instead of removing the restrictions on production.

IT is intimated that suits may be brought against the directors of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company on behalf of the stockholders whose interests have been so injuriously affected by their mismanagement. The suits, it is said, will be brought under an Act of the Legislature which provides that every director voting for any division of profits not actually earned shall be personally liable for the amount so divided unless he enters a formal protest and causes his protest to be published in the daily newspapers. There certainly should be some way in which to protect stockholders against the criminal mismanagement of their property by boards of directors, and in this case it would seem that the simple enforcement of the law, upon proof of the facts in the case, would fully accomplish that result, if, indeed, the directors are not as bankrupt as the corporation they have wrecked.

THE last addition to the list of society insurance associations is the Beneficiary Fund of the Grand Army of the Republic of the Department of New York. This society was incorporated on the 11th of May last, and is designed to supply a fund for the benefit of families of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors and marines, and the sons of such, sixteen years of age and over, who may receive membership. The fee for membership is fixed at fifty cents, the death assessment at ten cents, and the death benefit at $500. Nearly every one of the benevolent societies in the United States which observe a certain amount of secrecy in their business has now in successful operation an enterprise for securing a gratuity to the families of deceased members more or less similar to the above plan. Under the general scheme, no large salaries and commissions are paid out of the assessments of the members, nor is the money devoted to the erection of costly buildings. Contests for the payment of claims after death are unknown, and no portion of the sum guaranteed in life is ever deducted on technical irregularities. The success of this feature of secret society life has led to the inception of quite a number of Orders in the United States during the past five years, for the express object of securing at least a burial fund for deceased members; and day after day, the clerks engaged in the drygoods business, in our bank, fire and marine insurance offices, the Post Office, Custom House, various departments of the City Government, and, in fact, employés of nearly every trade and profession, are organizing these simple, secure and practical associations.

THE bill for the Afghan war, so greatly in excess of all expectation, is giving John Bull a good deal of annoyance. The truth appears to be, that the Government of India, the heads of a military monarchy, after rushing into a needless war, failed to ascertain not only its probable cost, but the actual expenditure upon it month by month. The Spectator says it is a positive fact that no statement of the money paid monthly by the treasuries on military account was ever laid before Government. The war had been going on for two years before it was discovered that the sums expended in excess of the sums reckoned on were of a magnitude such as affects even the finance-managers of empires. It was no blunder of a few score thousands, or even of a million or so, such as has once or twice occurred before in Indian accounts, but of at least $18,000,000 a year. It was calculated that the war would cost $30,000,000, whereas it has already cost nearly $75,000,000, according to the confession of the Indian authorities. And the Spectator says: "If we get out of the war, an utterly purposeless war, begun in arrogance and ending in muddle, for about $100,000,000, we shall be surprised; and if it lasts another year, $125,000,000 will not pay the bill, even though we do not include in it the great and permanent addition which it will incidentally force us to make to the wages of the native Sepoys." If the latest news from Afghanistan is to be relied upon, and unfortunately there is no room to doubt it, it is quite obvious that the war is by no means over, and the estimate of the London journal may prove to be nearer the mark than seemed probable when it was made a fortnight ago. We can scarcely wonder, in the face of facts like these, that John Bull is rapidly losing his admiration for the "splendors" of the Beaconsfield foreign policy.

THE public will very generally approve the movement now making to put an end to the garbage-dumping nuisance in the Bay. Three civil suits for damages have been instituted against the head of the Street Cleaning Bureau, and it is understood that an injunction will be applied for to restrain the Police Board or any of its employés from dumping any of their garbage or street sweepings at sea excepting on the first of the ebb tide. Besides this, Mr. Corbin, who is interested in Manhattan Beach, has served a notice in writing upon the Comptroller of this city that he will begin a suit against the city for damages, a notice of thirty days being required by law before the city can be sued. With these suits and the criminal charges against such employés of the bureau as may be found hereafter violating the law, it may be said that the war is fairly inaugurated. Mr. Corbin declares that he will prosecute the struggle until the illegal dumping of garbage off Manhattan Beach is stopped, and he is not the man to recede from a position once assumed. As an illustration of the pernicious results of the present methods of dumping, it is mentioned that the shores of Governor's Island are frequently littered with garbage and dead animals floated in at flood tide. An official statement shows that during the last six months, just 500 animals have been washed ashore, and have been either buried or burned by workmen employed for the purpose. Unless the evil shall be abated, it will be necessary to construct a sea wall around the island for its protection. As a temporary remedy a cordon of logs is being built. By all means, let the courts intervene as speedily as possible for the protection of the harbor and of the public health, now so seriously endangered.

THE action of the Government in dragging the Ponca Indians from their homes, in defiance of every consideration of justice and fair play, is justly provoking the condemnation of all right-thinking citizens. A statement recently issued by Bishop Clarkson of Nebraska, and other members of the relief committee, states that some four hundred of the Poncas are still in the Indian Territory, whither they were forcibly removed, and where they are detained against their protest. Since their removal there, more than two hundred have died of malarious fever, and the survivors are dispirited and unhappy, regarding themselves, with too much truth, as the victims of Government rapacity and deceit. One hundred and fifteen members of the tribe have returned to their old reservation, and are diligently at work putting land under cultivation, and trying to recover what they lost by their removal from their farms. It is gratifying to observe that friends of the Poncas in Nebraska are preparing to test legally the question of the right of the Government to rob them of their property; and it is to be hoped that meanwhile the arbitrary and vindictive proceedings of the agents in charge of the reservation may be so held in check as to secure to the peaceable and law-abiding Indians exemption from further outrages and brutalities. As indicating the spirit in which the agency is conducted, we may cite the fact that one of the chiefs who disobeyed some command of the agent, was ordered by him to be taken to Fort Reno for imprisonment for life, and when the chief protested, was shot through the head in the agent's office, by his order. The white employés are constantly armed and form a military guard, and the Poncas, since this assassination, being unarmed, are of course utterly hopeless and helpless.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.

THE cotton worm is doing some damage in the South.

WHEAT harvesting has begun in Wisconsin and Dakota, with very favorable weather.

THERE was a two hours' snow-storm on the summit of Mount Washington July 29th.

A FIRE in Buffalo, N. Y., July 29th, destroyed lumber-yards and sawmills valued at $225,000.

THE fusion of the Democrats and Greenbackers in Maine has been completed, the former securing four of the Presidential Electors.

GENERAL HANCOCK and Hon. William H. English have formally accepted the Democratic nominations in letters published on Saturday.

FORTY-EIGHT chiefs and headmen of the Uncompahgre Utes have signed the treaty, and Ouray assures the commission that the others will do so.

THE Massachusetts Republican Convention will meet, September 15th. It is thought that the whole State ticket, with probably one exception, will be renominated.

THE captain of the schooner George Washington, of Baltimore, has made affidavit that his vessel was boarded and searched by a Spanish war vessel on his homeward trip.

FOUR employés of the New York Street Cleaning Bureau, charged with illegally dumping refuse in the Bay, were last week sentenced to the penitentiary for sixty and ninety days.

A NATIONAL Labor Convention, held at Sharon, Pa., July 29th, indorsed the nominations of Garfield and Arthur for President and Vice-President. Fifteen States were represented.

SEVERAL vessels of the American whaling fleet in the Arctic regions have been seen by the revenue cutter Corwin, which, however, was unable to render assistance because of the ice.

GOVERNOR COLQUITT has ordered the militia to Jonesboro, Ga., in consequence of the killing of a colored man and his daughter by masked men, and the excitement prevailing therefrom.

POST-OFFICE Department officials estimate the total deficiency for the present fiscal year at $2,600,000, and if it is kept within this amount it will be less than for any previous year since 1863.

GEORGE M. BRANSCOM, of Jacksonville, Fla., has been committed for trial in New York on the charge of having forged and uttered bonds of the city of Jacksonville to the amount of from $135,000 to $160,000.

THE Kansas Greenbackers have nominated H. P. Vrooman for Governor. The Ohio Greenbackers have nominated a full State ticket. The New Jersey Democratic State Convention will be held September 1st.

THE Democratic campaign in this city was opened, July 28th, by a mass ratification meeting, at which Mr. Tilden presided, and speeches were made by Congressmen Randall, Ewing and Tucker, and Senator Jones and others.

THE total receipts of the Internal Revenue Department from all sources for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1880, were $123,981,919, against $113,449,621, in 1879, showing a total increase from internal revenue of $10,532,298.

WILLIAM H. CUSHMAN, formerly President of the First National Bank of Georgetown, Col., was arraigned in New York on July 30th, charged with having misappropriated and embezzled the funds of the bank to the amount of over $100,000.

THE Abbott and Butler Democrats in Massachusetts have agreed to call a joint Convention for September 1st. General Butler can have the regular nomination for Governor, if he insists, on condition that he accepts the Cincinnati platform.

DURING the triennial Templar Conclave at Chicago, commencing August 16th, $4,000 in prizes will be awarded for drilling. Over 150,000 invitations have been issued for the ball in the Exposition Building, and 1,389 tents that will hold 7,200 people have been erected.

THE jury on the Seguranka disaster have rendered a verdict that the loss of life was the result of a fire caused by the bursting of the clasping of one of the tubes in the starboard boiler, whereby the flames were driven under the grate-bars into the fire-room, thereby igniting the woodwork.

COLONEL VALLE, of the Mexican army, with 520 men, attacked Victoria's band of Apaches on July 21st, forty miles from Fort Quitman. The fight was indecisive. On the 25th the Mexicans again attacked the Indians, but they succeeded in escaping. In both fights the Mexicans lost nine men, and the Indians four. Colonel Grierson is waiting on this side the line to attack the Indians.

Foreign.

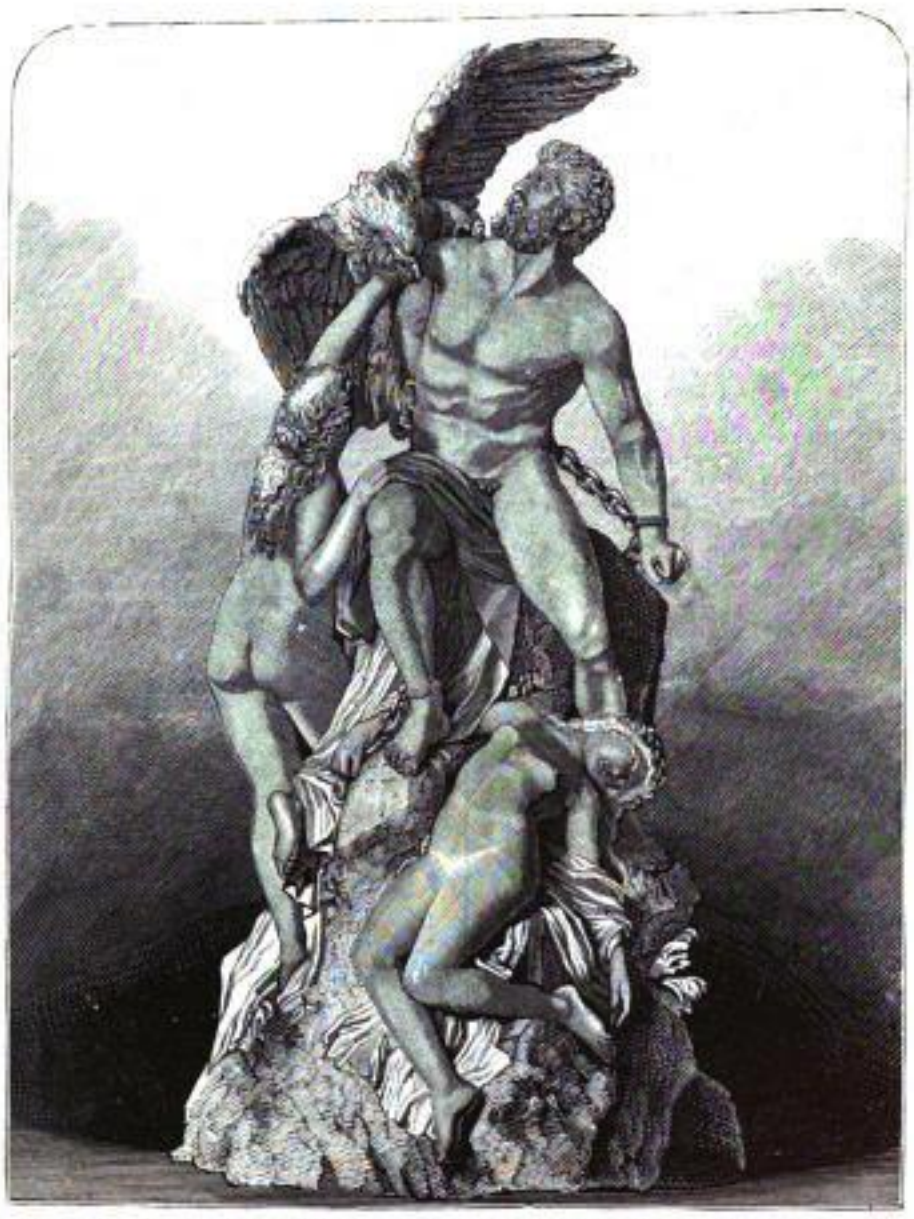
HOSTILITIES have been begun between the Albanians and Montenegrins. Serbia has ordered the mobilization of her army.

THE Master of the Rolls has granted a judgment against Albert Grant for £120,000 in favor of the Emma Silver Mining Company.

FRANCE and Mexico have agreed to resume diplomatic relations, and they will appoint their respective representatives on the 5th of October.

IT is reported that the figurehead of the missing training ship Atalanta was picked up at sea by a British bark which arrived at St. Johns, Newfoundland, July 29th.

ENGLISH Liberals, in view of a possible conflict between the House of Lords and the House of Commons over the Irish Compensation Bill, propose holding meetings in favor of abolishing the hereditary peerage and creating an elective Senate.

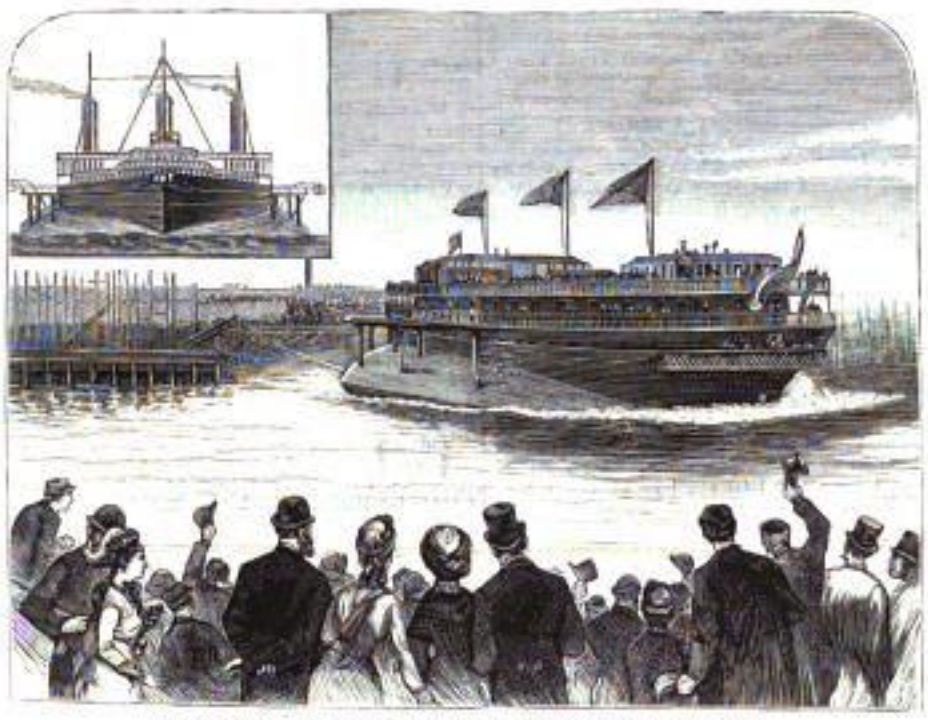


IT is believed in official circles that the Porte will come to a direct understanding with Montenegro and cede Dulcigno and the Bojana district. The Greek question will be reopened, at the request of the Sultan, on the ground that Turkey was not heard at the Berlin Conference.

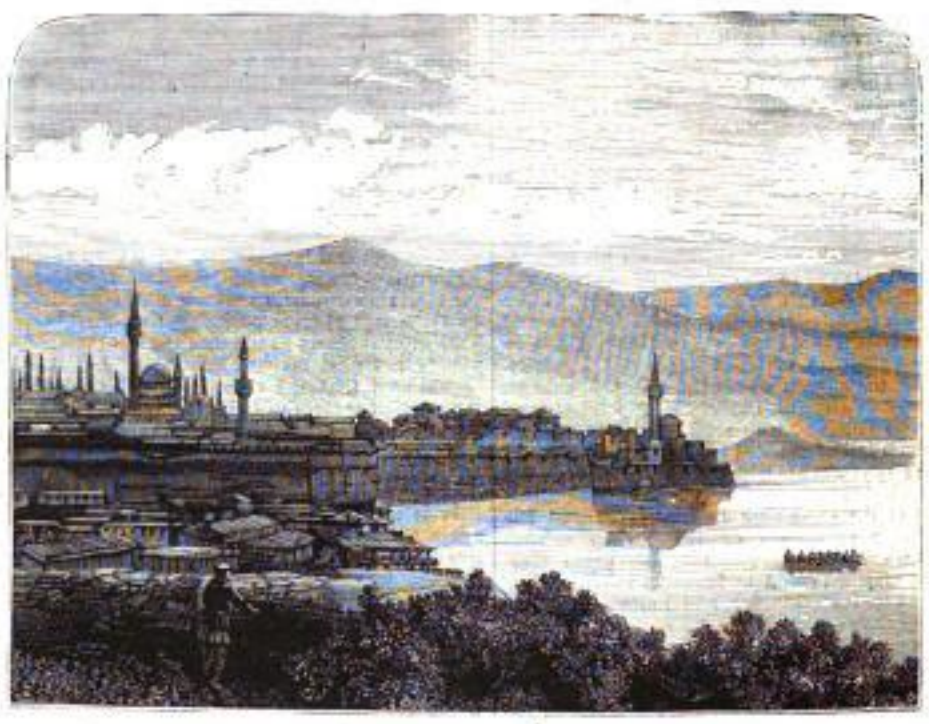
IN accordance with the Convention between France and the United States instituting a Commission to adjudicate claims for private losses arising from the secession war and Franco-German war, France has appointed M. Geoffry, Commissioner; M. Lamen, Agent; and M. Chambrun, Councilor.

THE Constantinople papers have been threatened with suspension if they reproduce articles hostile to Turkey. The Sultan is continuing military preparations and endeavoring to obtain a small advance of money. It is said that the European Powers are determined to carry out to the last extremity the conditions of the Berlin Conference. A military paper says that the number of Turkish troops stationed on the Greek frontier is 24,000 foot, 1,440 horse, and 218 cannon, ready for active service.

Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 399.

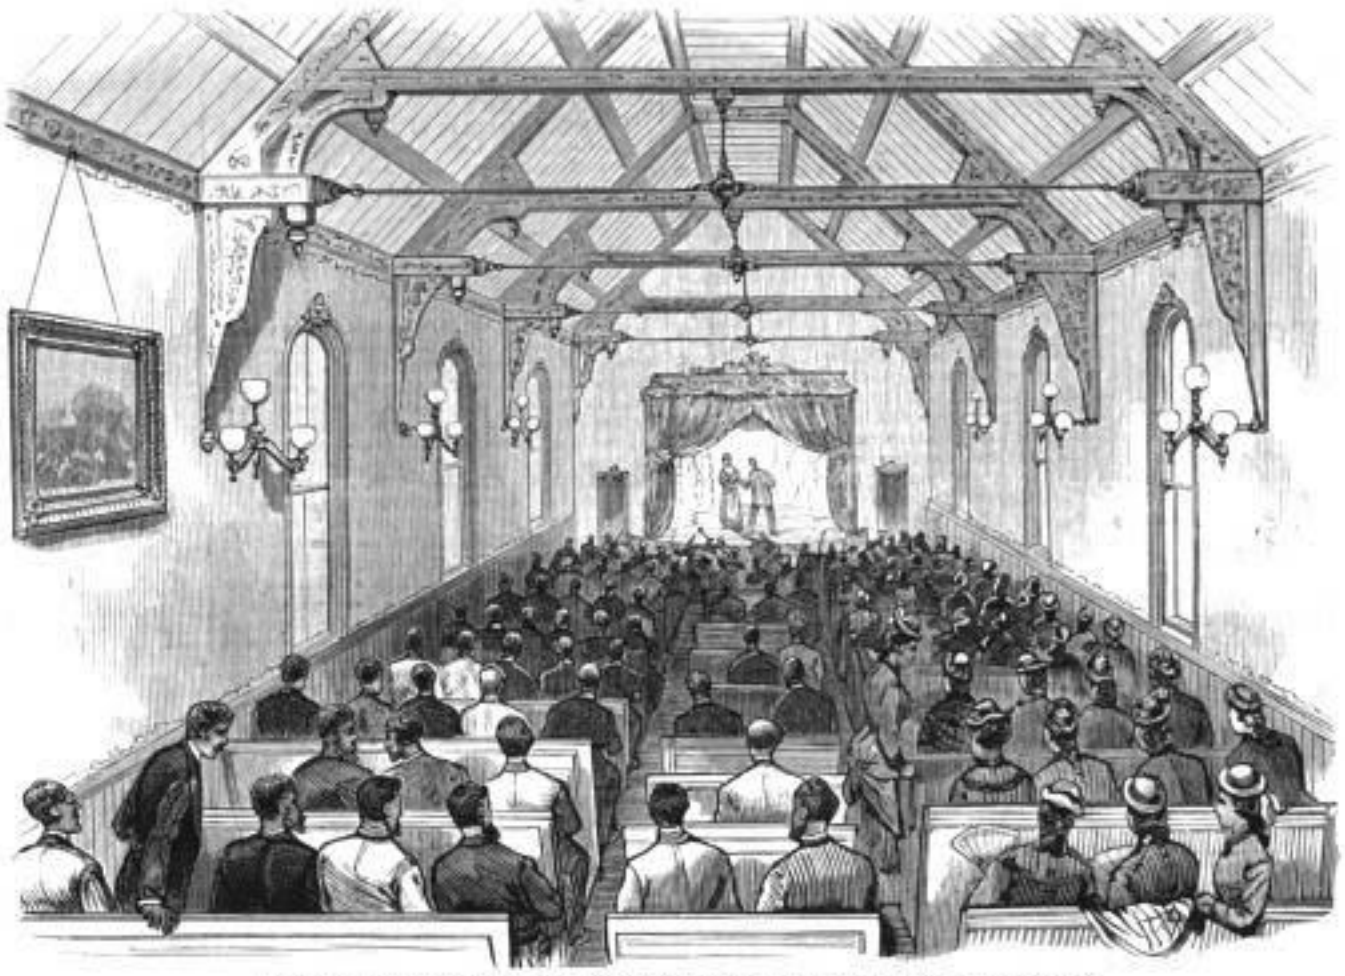


GERMANY.—MUELLER'S "PROMETHEUS" GROUP IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY, BERLIN.

FRANCE.—THE NEW MONUMENT TO THE REPUBLIC IN PARIS.

SCOTLAND.—LAUNCH OF THE CZAR'S YACHT AT GLASGOW.

GREECE.—JANNINA CITY CEDED TO GREECE BY THE BERLIN CONFERENCE.



SPAIN.—A SESSION OF THE DIPLOMATIC CONFERENCE ON THE MOORISH QUESTION, IN THE PALACE OF THE PRESIDENCY, MADRID.

Digitized by Google

PENNSYLVANIA'S NEW INSANE HOSPITAL.

THE new Insane Hospital for the south-eastern district of Pennsylvania, located near Norristown, and formally opened on July 13th, has a capacity of 750 patients, with provisions for extension looking to the accommodation, if necessary, of 2,000. The origin of the institution may be briefly stated: Some years ago the insane wards of all, or nearly all, the State charitable institutions became so crowded, that serious thoughts were entertained of building an asylum for the insane alone, but it was finally determined to apply to the Legislature for an appropriation for the erection of a hospital. This application was favorably considered, an appropriation made, and in the Spring of 1877 the work of erection was commenced. On the 17th of February, 1880, the work was finished, and the institution was handed over to the commission appointed to take charge of it. The hospital occupies an elevated site on the north of Norristown, and overlooks the valleys of Stony Creek and the Schuylkill River. The main part faces the southeast, and the buildings are so placed that all parts of them have good ventilation, and are flooded by sunlight at some hour of the day.

The hospital consists of seven ward buildings (as shown on the extreme right and extreme left of our illustration), an administration building, amusement hall, chapel, kitchen, boiler-house and laundry—in all eleven distinct structures. The ground area of each ward building is 15,816 square feet. Each has four wards, all complete in themselves, with dining-room, washroom, bathroom, etc. The kitchen is furnished with a range thirty-two feet long, with a full complement of steam-kettles, boilers, and cooking apparatus of every description. The laundry contains eighteen steam wash-tubs, three washing-machines, a centrifugal wringer, steam mangles and all other necessary appliances. An engine propels all machinery connected with the place. There are also boiler-houses containing six boilers, with a capacity of 800 horse-power. These furnish steam to drive the engine and supply heat to the buildings by a system of indirect radiation. Underground air-ducts are used for ventilation. All the buildings are provided with fireproof stairways, and the grounds and buildings are provided with both water and gas brought from Norristown. The hospital and grounds cover about 265 acres. The cost of the institution was $500,000. All the buildings are of brick, the trimmings are of blue marble from quarries near Norristown; the interior finish is of Carolina pine, oiled. The architects, Messrs. Wilson Bros. & Co., of Philadelphia, have made no attempt at architectural display, their sole object having evidently been to construct a well-arranged and thoroughly-built institution.

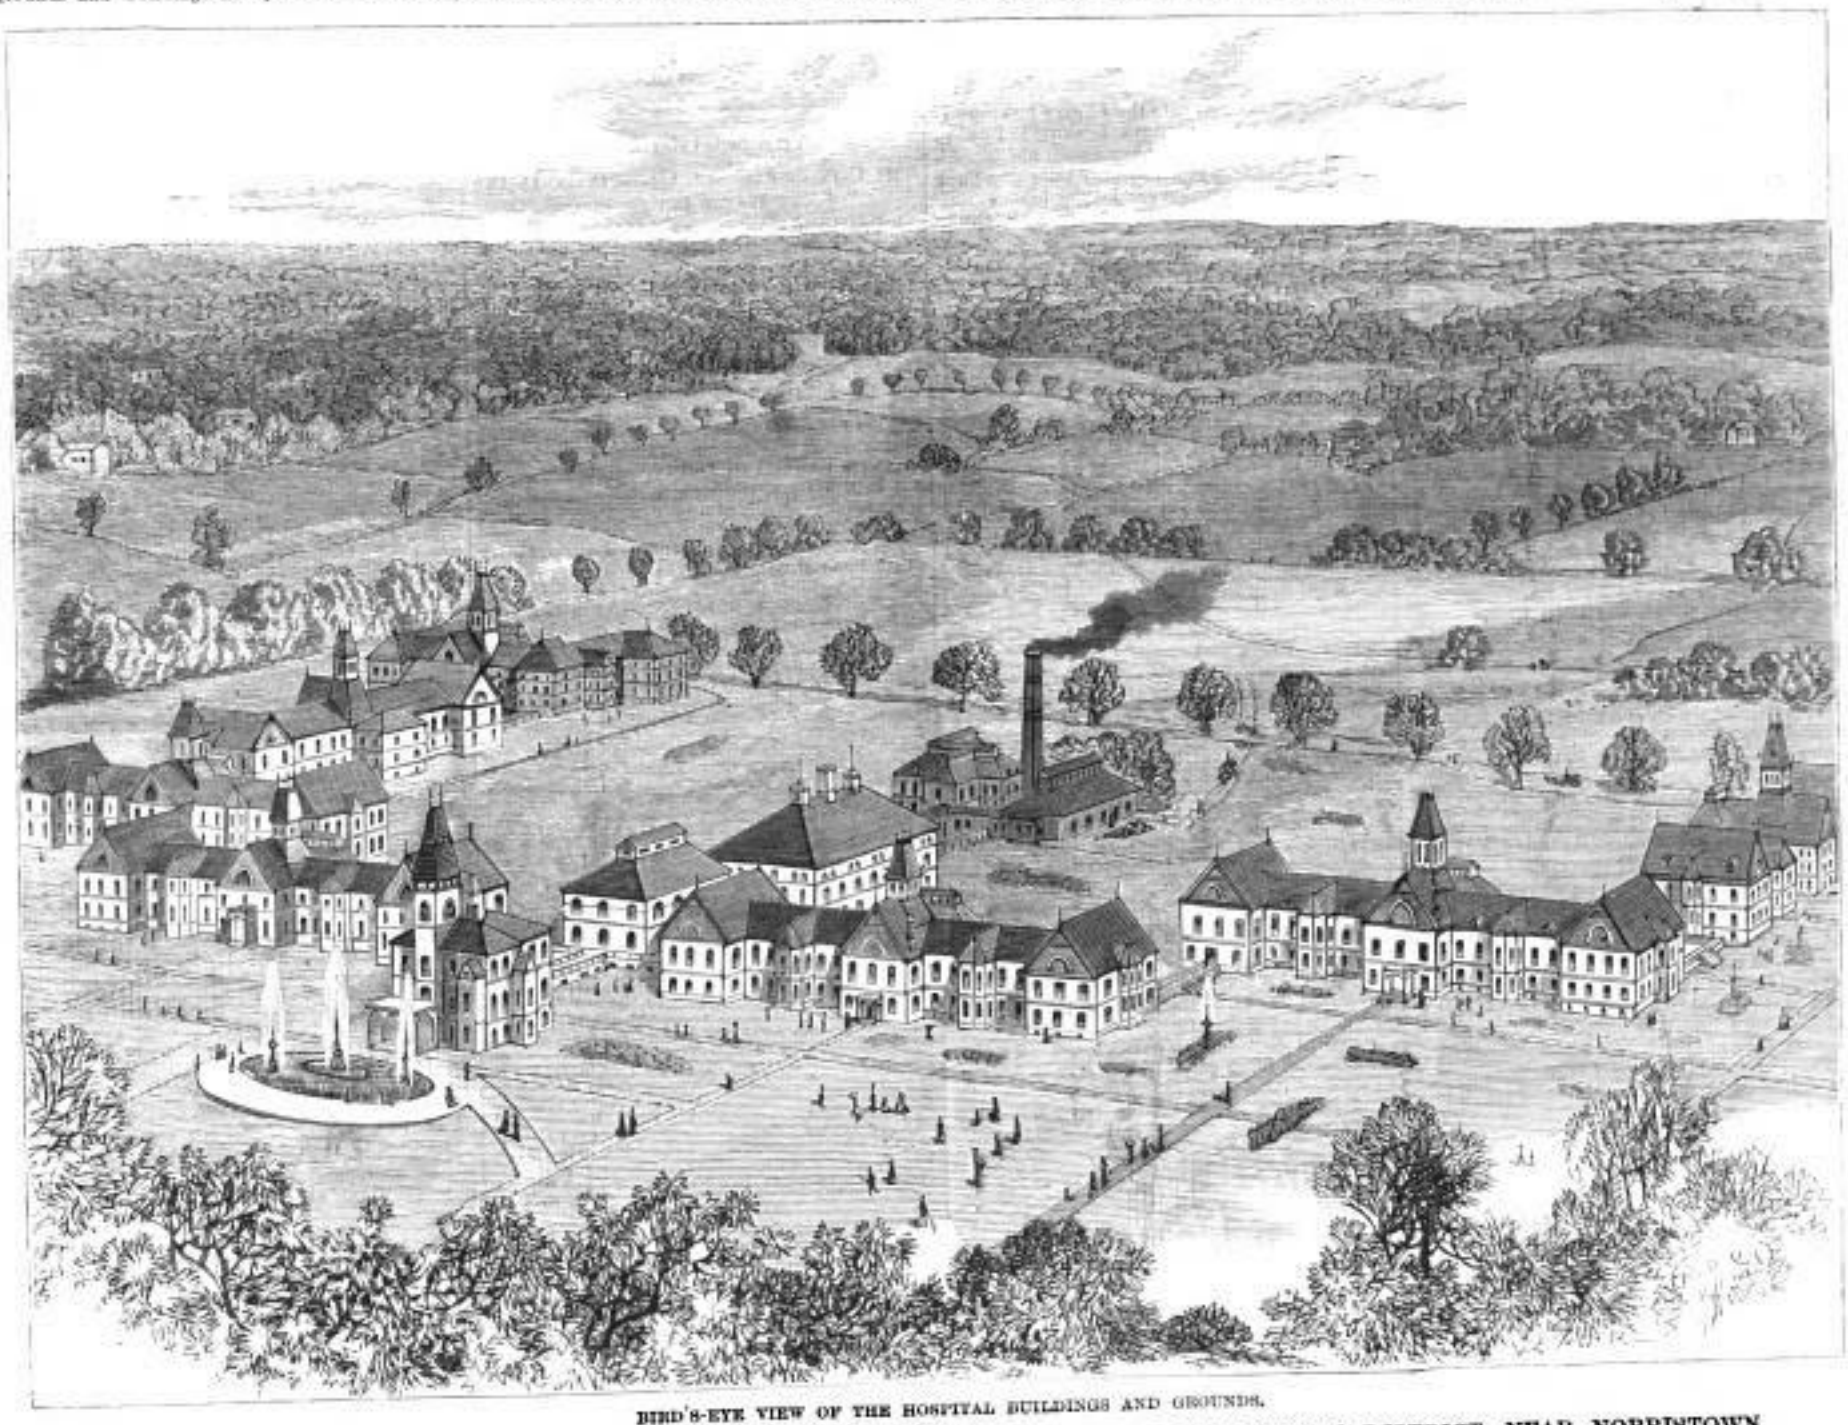
INTERIOR OF THE HALL FOR THE ENTERTAINMENT AND AMUSEMENT OF PATIENTS.

SERVANTS' FEES IN EUROPE.

A PETTY but endless trouble of the traveler in Europe for the first time is the matter of gratuities. You give a trifle all the time to every one who does you the least service. Even for an apparently friendly word of information on the street you are expected to pay in this way. In England it is "a tip"; in France, the pour-boire; in Italy, buona mano, the good hand; in Germany it is trinkgeld, drink money. It is not much money in any one instance, but foots up pretty well after an active day's work. The practical trouble, however, is to know what to give. The inhabitants and the servants themselves know exactly what they are entitled to, for it is a matter of right, just as much as any other charge, although the amount is never fixed or published in any written form for the information of strangers. They must learn it by experience.

We, as a rule, to whom the European measures are new, give too much. Englishmen of rank and wealth complain that Americans raise the costs of travel wherever they go.

For the gratuity of cab-drivers, waiters at restaurants, etc., the recognised European usage is in England one penny for every shilling spent in fare or at the table, and in France and Italy two sous for every franc spent. This rule disposes of a large portion of the cases.



For porters, twopence in England and two sous on the Continent for every piece of luggage handled, if it is only to carry it across a pavement. An umbrella or a shawl is a piece as well as a trunk. The driver of an omnibus, cab or fiacre, as a point of etiquette and out of professional consideration for the porters, will refuse to touch a piece of luggage himself, even to lift it from three feet away into his vehicle.

Visiting at private houses of the upper classes in England, the servants expect their tips in gold coin if your stay is over a day or two. The smallest English gold coin is a ten-shilling piece—$2.50. You "see" the footman, who attends your bedroom; the maid, if you have ladies, who serves their chambers; the butler, who has charge of the dining-room and force of waiters; the keeper, if you hunt; the groom you use, if you ride, or the head of the stables if there are several, and generally any servant that you specially use. You will soon learn how to grade these fees according to the rank of the servant and the length of your visit.

On first-class ocean steamers the gratuities are much analogous to those in a gentleman's house. The steward who waits on you at the table, and the one who attends your stateroom, will each expect a fee in gold—ten shillings ($2.50 at least—from a single passenger; and $5 if you have baths brought into your room every morning, are particular about having your wines warmed or iced, or, in short, use the servants up to their full capacity. When the passage is $60 to $75 or less, these fees are less—about one-half of the figures above. The "boots" also looks to be remembered, about one-half the amount given the steward.

The expense of this gratuity business in ordinary travel is in general rather exaggerated. The sums given are very small, and you get a great deal for them—a willing, perfect, kindly service which you do not get in our country at all. To the traveler the custom is an annoyance rather than a burden.

The usage degrades and demoralizes and unmans him who takes the vail, or gift, or tip, or bounty, or whatever you please to call it; yet a great portion

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE HOSPITAL BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

PENNSYLVANIA.—THE NEW STATE HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, FOR THE SOUTHEASTERN DISTRICT, NEAR NORRISTOWN.
FROM SKETCHES BY S. F. YEAGER.

Digitized by Google

of the people of Great Britain and Europe do receive their wages in this way, look for it, and feel no humiliation in the transaction. You can scarcely insult anybody across the water by offering them anything, no matter what appears to be his or their official position. I have given a shilling in London to uniformed policemen, and a franc in Paris to magnificent-looking hotel managers. A Philadelphia acquaintance in London had several hundred dollars brought to him from his banking house, one of the largest there, by a clerk of the establishment, and the nattily-dressed young gentleman asked for a shilling for his services. Imagine the consequences of offering ten cents to a conductor of an American railway who had shown you to your seat in the car and given you information as to when to get out; yet this is done all over England every day, and the uniformed and respectable-looking guard hangs around stickily till he gets his sixpence.

LOTTA'S BURGLAR.

IT was unprecedented at Erlsham for the students to break out so late in the term. Still more unprecedented was it for a potent, grave and reverend senior to have any share in the mischief. Yet, only three nights before Commencement, the students "made things howl," and Tom Anstruther was head and front of the offending. They nailed up over the chapel-door the sign, "To Providence and way-stations," stolen from the railroad. They serenaded obnoxious members of the faculty in terms anything but flattering. They built a huge bonfire on the campus and indulged in a promiscuous song-and-dance performance around it.

In the midst of the uproar there was the cry of "Faculty! faculty!" followed by an instant hush. The students scattered in all directions, Anstruther as fast as any—faster, indeed, when he found himself closely followed. His particular pursuer appeared to be one of the younger and more active of the professors, who quite caught the spirit of the chase. Tom found it impossible to shake him off. Was the valedictorian of the graduating class to be caught thus ignominiously?

An open basement-window gave him an inspiration. He sped past it; then, doubling cleverly on his foe, sprang through it and laughed to hear his footsteps grow fainter in hot pursuit up the street.

Up-stairs Lotta Desmond was brushing out her pretty brown hair preparatory to retiring. On her daintily-frilled toilet-table, looking oddly out of place, lay Cousin Jim's revolver. There had been a great many jokes about that revolver. Her uncle and cousin had solemnly installed Lotta as man of the house during their absence. Jim had reminded her of the exploits of brave Mrs. Brown and plucky Mrs. Peters, as recorded by the Daily Chronicle. The first of these ladies had, alone and unarmed, held a burglar captive until help came. The second, under like circumstances, had completely routed two desperate villains.

And Lotta had demanded Jim's pistol and declared that she only longed for a chance to emulate their heroism. And Jim had promised to watch the papers for a similar mention of daring Miss Desmond.

So Lotta smiled when her eyes fell on the pistol, for as yet no opportunity for glory had come to her, and Jim would be home to-morrow.

Just then her aunt came into the room, fancying, as she had fancied every night since her husband's departure, that she "heard a noise, and would dear Lotta, who was so fearless, mind going down-stairs to investigate?"

So Lotta thrust her little bare feet into slippers, threw on a wrapper and sallied forth, pistol in hand.

Aunt Lucy detained her with a last word—in case it should be any one, to "let her know immediately, immediately; but otherwise not to disturb her, as she was extremely fatigued."

With a dim recollection that the dining-room window had not been closed, the young girl made her noiseless way thither at once. The gas had been put out and a miserable candle left burning. What Lotta saw by its dim light was a tall young man, rather roughly clad.

Alas! Tom, usually something of a dandy, had that night donned his poorest array, his hair disordered, his clothes grimed with dust and soot, from which not even his face had escaped, coolly examining her uncle's silver. Spirit of Mrs. Brown and Mrs.—the other lady—inspire her!

"Drop that or I fire!"

Tom turned with a start. What he saw was a pretty girl in a charming négligé, whose voice and hand both shook as she uttered this doughty threat, and in whose face a certain timid determination, a look of one frightened at her own daring, appealed to his sense of humor. But it would never do to laugh at her. Besides, that pistol in her uncertain, unfamiliar hand was no joke. So he said with due humility:

"I surrender. But for heaven's sake put up that revolver! You are as likely to shoot yourself as me."

"Not at all," evidently nettled. "I am perfectly accustomed to using it."

Need it be said that this was a deliberate lie, uttered with intent of striking terror to the bosom of the robber?

For the same purpose Lotta continued to level her pistol and eye him with much outward severity and not a few inward tremors, thinking withal that your housebreaker is not the bold desperado he is painted. Still keeping watch over one is weary work, heigh-ho! Tom rapidly determined to see the adventure through. Time enough to make his escape should she call for help or should any fresh complication arise. He hoped she was not going to keep him standing all night. Presently he ventures to suggest that she could mount guard over him quite as well seated.

Lotta assented gladly. Her burglar was quite a model, she thought. And why should she incumber herself longer with that unnecessary pistol, of which, she acknowledged to herself, she was much more afraid than was her prisoner?

Accordingly she laid it carefully down within reach. Then, with what seemed to Tom a most amazing underrating of his strength, she announced her intention of holding him until assistance should arrive.

To him the situation was not without its charm. It does not often happen to any of us that a pretty girl will insist on sitting next us and holding our hands—and that she was pretty, exceedingly pretty, Anstruther managed to satisfy himself in spite of the stingy light.

Once or twice he addressed a remark to his fair captor, but she discouraged all attempt at conversation.

And so they sat in silence, while the candle burned low and finally went out, and the cold gray light of dawn crept into the room. Even this did not cause Lotta to change her position. And, looking curiously at her, the young man discovered that his stern guardian was asleep!

How long and dark were the lashes resting on the fair cheek, he thought, gazing down at the sweet, peaceful face framed in its wealth of nut-brown hair. Surely none of the young lady's ball-dresses could set off her beauty as did that old blue wrapper.

Tom was strongly tempted, in his character of robber, to steal a kiss, but there was a certain odd chivalry in his composition that kept him from taking any advantage of her unconsciousness. He withdrew his hands from hers without awakening her—such cold, little, soft hands! And no wonder. The chill breath of early morning made him shiver, although it was June.

He might as well make her comfortable before he went. He groped his way into the hall. On the hat-stand lay a heavy shawl. In it he wrapped his unconscious captor as well as he could, then left through the still open window.

* * * * *

If Miss Desmond was not the belle of the college ball it was because, strictly speaking, there are no longer belles of balls. But, in the language of the other young ladies, she "received a great deal of attention." And how she did enjoy herself!

About the eleventh hour Cousin Jim begged to introduce his friend, Mr. Anstruther.

Lotta's large eyes grew larger with astonishment. Mr. Anstruther composedly requested the pleasure of a dance, and before she could collect herself sufficiently to refuse, his arm encircled her and they were gliding over the polished floor in perfect time and measure.

"You have my step exactly," said Miss Desmond, when they stopped.

"Have I? Then it must be by direct inspiration, for I never was known to keep time with any one before."

Now did ever a man waltz to perfection without knowing it? Lotta looked at him a little contemptuously. Her thought did him injustice. Tom was not affecting modesty, only making talk to keep off the question he expected.

"May I take you into the library? There is an anxious-looking youth I should like to avoid. I suspect that I have stolen his dance."

"If you have, you are only pursuing your profession as a robber," laughed Miss Desmond. "What were you doing that night in uncle's dining-room?"

Then it all came out, and Tom explained and apologized, seated in an alcove of the great college library.

"And how frightened you were when I and the pistol appeared on the scene!" said the young lady, maliciously.

"I was not!"—indignantly.

"You turned very pale."

"Then we must have been a well-matched pair for courage. The pistol shook so in your hand that I was afraid it would go off accidentally. That was the worst feature of the case, for I do not believe yet that you would have been bloodthirsty enough to shoot me."

"I am sure I would not. I was immensely relieved to wake up and find my captive fled.

"What did you do?"

"Counted the spoons and went to bed."

"The spoons were all right. There was but one thing stolen that night."

"Mercy! what was that?"

"Only the burglar's heart"—sentimentally.

Lotta looked at him and began to laugh. Then she said:

"You might advertise for it as people do for stolen articles. And you might say, 'Of no value to any one but the owner.'"

"Thank you, but I am not sure that I want it returned," said Anstruther, laughing too, but letting his eyes rest upon her fair face until the warm color surged up beneath his gaze.

"'Thou hast a thief in either eye
Would steal it back again,'"

he quoted, low.

Lotta was a little glad as well as a good deal sorry that her ill-used partner at this moment appeared in the doorway.

"Before that fellow comes can't you promise me one more dance?" murmured Anstruther.

"I am engaged for all but the last. I can give you that one if you are going to stay till the end."

How Miss Desmond contrived to pacify the rightful claimant, and how partner succeeded partner till the end of the evening, need not be told. It is certain that she enjoyed no dance as she did that last one with Tom. And then Tom's worst enemy could not criticise his dancing.

As he relinquished her to her cousin's care, Anstruther heaved a sigh of exaggerated but very real regret.

Then Lotta put out an impulsive little hand and said hastily:

"Mr. Burglar, if you can conquer your fancy for entering people's windows enough to call in a more orthodox way, I shall be pleased to see you."

"Thank you," murmured Anstruther, pressing the soft warm hand with quick unnecessary warmth.

"Happy's the wooing that's not long a-doing."

The acquaintance so oddly begun was prosecuted with ardor. Lotta's burglar laid hot siege to her affections, and before long induced her to set up housekeeping—I had almost written housebreaking—with him.

PLEASURE ENCAMPMENT OF THE G. A. R. OF NEW YORK.

FOLLOWING its annual custom of having one encampment in Winter for business, and another in Summer for pleasure, the New York Division of the Grand Army of the Republic began a grand reunion in Brooklyn on July 28th. The members of the Brooklyn posts took charge of their visitors, and made an exceedingly lively and pleasant day for them.

The ferryboats from New York and Jersey City landed at the foot of Fulton Street in the morning the delegates and the visiting posts from this city. They were received by Rankin Post, of Brooklyn, and Lew Benedict Post, of Albany, and were conducted to the Pierrepont House, in Montague Street, where the headquarters were established. The line of the parade was formed in Montague Street. The members of the posts and the delegates were escorted by the Fourteenth Regiment, National Guard, of Brooklyn, under command of Colonel James McLeer, and a detachment of the Eighth Regiment of New York. The streets through which the parade moved were gay with flags and bunting, the public buildings and many private dwellings were finely decorated.

The line of march was as follows: Up Montague Street and along Court Street, Joralemon Street, Fulton Street, Smith Street, Schermerhorn Street, Lafayette Avenue, Clinton Avenue, Fulton Street, Hanson Place and Flatbush Avenue to the Music Hall at Fulton Street and Flatbush Avenue. About 1,500 men were in line. The order was: Grand Marshal and staff, Fourteenth Regiment, Eighth Regiment, Grand Army posts, officers of Convention and delegates. Music was furnished by the Fourteenth Regiment Band. The march was begun at 10:45, and at 12:30 the hall was reached. Here the delegates were welcomed to Brooklyn by Corporation Counsel William C. De Witt. Allusions to Grant, Hancock, Sherman and other heroes of the war were received with enthusiasm.

The response on the part of the veterans was made by Department Commander L. Coe Young, of Binghamton. His references to the work done in Brooklyn for the Soldiers' Home were applauded, and three cheers were given for Henry Ward Beecher and Corporal Tanner for their work in behalf of that enterprise. Speeches were made by General Lewis A. Wagner, commander-in-chief, Henry A. Barnum, John F. Henry, of Brooklyn, and Corporal Tanner, who holds the office of Tax Collector in Brooklyn. A feature of the proceedings was the bugle-calls, which were given on opposite sides of the gallery, and which produced the utmost enthusiasm among the boys. After the public proceedings a secret session of the delegates was held. The body adjourned at 3 P. M., to go to Coney Island, taking a boat at the foot of Montague Street for the depot of the Sea Beach Railroad at Bay Ridge. There the train for the island was taken, and the delegates spent several hours in sight-seeing and partook of a liberal banquet. The bands of the Fourteenth and Forty-seventh Regiments, of Brooklyn, furnished an abundance of excellent music. On the 29th the soldiers indulged in an excursion to, and in an old-fashioned clam-bake on, Glen Island.

THE SOUTH IN 1880.

THE CITY OF AUGUSTA, GA.—ITS CANAL AND WATER-POWER.

AUGUSTA is the third city in population and importance in Georgia, and the second in point of age. The town was laid out in the year 1735, under authority from the Government of Great Britain, and in the following year a British garrison was stationed in the place. A frontier outpost, it was the resort for scouts and trappers and Indian traders, who bartered with the savages. It is computed that over two thousand pack-horses and six hundred men visited the place annually. The town was the theatre of several severe struggles during the American Revolution. Three of the cannon that were mounted on Fort Cornwallis, the principal British work, are still in existence. One of them is in possession of a local military company, and is used in firing salutes.

The progress of the city up to the commencement of the late war was slow. The population in 1860 was 12,493. Since the war a spirit of enterprise has seized the people, particularly in regard to manufactures, and the advancement of the place has been something remarkable for an inland Southern city. The United States Census of 1870 showed a population of 15,389. A city census in 1872 placed the number at 19,163; another census in 1878 gave a result of 23,768, and still another, in 1879, showed that the population had increased to 27,012. There are at present not less than 30,000 inhabitants within the corporate limits of the city. This estimate does not include the population of the adjoining villages, which amounts to several thousand more.

Augusta is at the head of navigation of the Savannah River, and a considerable business is done by small steamboats plying between the city and Savannah.

The city is regularly laid off in squares, and its streets are wide and level. Broad and Green Streets are two of the finest boulevards in the Union. The width of the former is 247 feet, with substantial pavements on either side. Spacious and well-lighted stores line it for more than a mile. Among these are several wholesale establishments which carry on an extensive trade with the surrounding country. The volume of wholesale and retail trade amounts annually to many millions of dollars. The city is one of the most important of the Interior cotton ports, and receives every year from 160,000 to 200,000 bales of the great staple. This branch of business alone brings from ten to twelve millions of dollars into the city during the twelve months, and gives employment to a large number of people. Several large houses and manufactories of the North and in Europe have agents in Augusta, who purchase thousands of bales of cotton annually for their principals.

The total value of property in the city as indicated by the tax digest of 1880 is $14,039,067. The tax assessed is one and fifty-eight and one-third one-hundredths per cent. One quarter of one per cent. of this is paid over to the Sinking Fund Commission to be used in retiring city bonds. The bonds of the city are now selling at 105 for 6 per cents, and 107 to 109 for 7's. The Sinking Fund Commission was created for fifteen years, and it is computed that at the end of that time it will have retired more than a million dollars of the city's indebtedness, leaving less than a million in existence. The interest on the bonds is paid promptly and regularly, and the people are determined that the faith and credit of the corporation shall always be rigidly maintained.

The streets are kept in excellent condition, and several of them have been macadamized. The city is two miles and a half in length and one mile and a half in width. There are forty-four streets, all wide and generally bordered by trees. Green Street and the upper and lower portions of Broad, especially, are noted for their fine avenues of oaks and elms, and the stranger visiting the city never fails to speak of them in terms of admiration.

The chief pride of Augusta is its magnificent water-power, which cost the people from first to last nearly two millions of dollars. This power is furnished by means of the Augusta Canal, extending from the city to a point on the Savannah River seven miles above. In proportion to its length this canal is one of the greatest works of the kind in existence, and answers the twofold purpose of furnishing water to the city and turning the wheels of the cotton mills and manufactories of various descriptions which dot its banks. It was projected originally by several public-spirited citizens, who saw in it the germ of future prosperity for Augusta. The work was commenced in 1845 and completed early in 1847. The dimensions were forty feet surface width, twenty feet bottom, and five feet depth, affording a total mechanical effect of about 600 horses power. It soon became evident that the canal was too small to supply the demands for power and for water for fire, domestic and other purposes, consequent upon the growth of the city. Temporary expedients having failed, the enlargement of the canal was decided upon by the City Council, and in March, 1872, the work was commenced and in July, 1875 was completed. The dimensions and capacity of the canal are as follows: Length of main canal or first level, 7 miles, and including second and third levels, 9 miles. Minimum water way, 150 feet at surface, 106 feet at bottom, and 11 feet deep, making an area of cross section of 1,698 square feet. The bulkheads, locks, dam and other structures are composed of stone masonry, formed in granite rock, laid up in hydraulic cement mortar, and are of the most substantial character. The area of openings for the supply of the canal amounts to 1,463 square feet, and the entire waters of the Savannah River are made available for maintaining the supply. There are about 275 acres of reservoirs, exclusive of the canal proper and the pond above the bulkhead and dam. There is a bottom grade or descent in the main canal of one hundredth of a foot in 150 feet, giving a theoretical mean velocity of two and seventy-four one-hundredths feet per second, or a mechanical effect under the minimum fall between the first and third levels, or between the first level and the Savannah River of upwards of 14,000 horses power, not including available supply from the surface of the reservoirs. Of this immense power about 3,500 horses power have been contracted for, leaving, at least, 10,000 horses power to be disposed of. The present price for the water is five dollars and a half per water-power. The canal is owned by the City of Augusta and is under the immediate control of the City Council. The total cost of the canal enlargement was $822,864.63.

The people of Augusta very naturally expect great things from their canal, and their expectations bid fair to be fully realized in the near future. There are already in operation five cotton factories, one of which—the Augusta Factory—has a capacity of 24,000 spindles; another—the Enterprise Factory—has 15,000, and will increase the number in a short time to nearly 25,000; and a third—the Summerville Mills—has over 4,000. The latter, which has just been completed, and belongs to two enterprising citizens of the place, is the first experiment in the manufacture of colored goods, checks and plaids in Augusta. The product is equal to that of any other similar mill in the Union.

A new company has been organized with a capital of $600,000 to erect a large cotton factory on the canal, at the site of the old Confederate Powder Works. Two-thirds of the capital was subscribed by merchants of New York City. Work will be commenced at once, and the Sibley Mills—the name of the corporation—will be in operation in less than twelve months. The capacity of the factory will be 25,000 spindles, and it will manufacture principally colored goods. It will give employment to about 1,000 operatives, and add fully 5,000 people to the population of the city.

As an instance of how manufacturing pays in Augusta, it may be mentioned that the Augusta Factory has paid to its stockholders, in dividends, since the war, $1,350,000. The capital stock of the company is nominally $600,000, but it is really $1,000,000, as the property of the corporation is worth fully that amount. Of this the stockholders have only paid in $60,000. So great was the success of the factory from the very start that no more was required, and the property has gone on increasing from year to year until it has reached its present figure. For nine years the dividend was twenty per cent. per annum, and it is now paying a regular annual dividend of eight per cent.

The county of which Augusta is the seat has a public school board in active operation. It levies a tax annually of $25,000 on the people of the county for the support of the schools—white and colored. The colored schools are taught by colored teachers elected by the Board. The system is thoroughly graded.

The business outlook of the city is encouraging. Merchants anticipate a heavy volume of trade next Fall and Winter. A new railroad, extending from Augusta to Greenwood, in South Carolina, is in course of construction, and will, when completed, bring 25,000 bales of cotton additional to the city annually. Six railroads now terminate in Augusta.

The section of the State in the vicinity of Augusta is rich in copper, gold and coal, and is being extensively mined.

THE SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

THE Concord Summer School, which held its second term for lectures and conversations on philosophical subjects during the month of July, was founded by A. Bronson Alcott, and in its permanent establishment and the possession, through the munificence of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of a pretty chapel, the venerable philosopher sees the realization of the dreams of forty years or more.

Some forty-four years ago, before the great transcendental movement in New England began, he became widely known by conversations with his schoolchildren in Boston—conversations which Miss Peabody faithfully reported and embodied in a little volume entitled "Record of a School." Nearly the same time "Conversations with Children on the Gospels" was published, and it was this volume that the Legislature of Massachusetts branded as dangerous and heretical. But the worst thing that could be found in the book was in a familiar conversation about the Holy Ghost.

Long ago Mr. Alcott gave up formal conversations with children, and it is within five years that he has engaged regularly in conversations with professional and literary men. His conversations at Joseph Cook's parlors and at the Chestnut Street Club have been chiefly instrumental in giving him the unique reputation which of a sudden he has acquired in his old age.

In these "conversations" he was usually seated in a large armchair, his benignant face aglow with the fes sacré, opening a conversation with twenty-five or thirty friends gathered around him. The subject had just been chosen by the company, and, with a mind well stored by wide reading and deep meditation, the thoughts drop from his lips like honey from the honeycomb. From the first he spoke calmly but discinctly, and his melodious, captivating voice charmed the attention of the hearer. Even in the most abstract metaphysical reasoning he did not deviate for a moment from the uniform simplicity of his language, and, with occasionally a gesture, vividly pictured his thoughts in space, even the darkest thought was made clear. He is a venerable and striking figure. He looks like an ideal Egyptian. His eyes are clear, dark, luminous; his hair, which is now long, is fine and white, and his face full of gentleness, sympathy and benevolence. He was born at Wolcott, Conn., November 29th, 1799.

Digitized by Google

In the second term of the school, which opened July 12th, Mr. Alcott delivered the salutatory and valedictory, and had the general charge of the conversations of the school. His own special contribution were lectures on "Mysticism." Dr. H. K. Jones gave five lectures on "The Platonic Philosophy" and five on "Platonism in its Relation to Modern Civilization." Professor William T. Harris furnished five lectures on "Speculative Philosophy" and five on "The History of Philosophy," including Plato, Aristotle, Kant, Fichte, and Hegel. The Rev. Dr. J. Steinforth Kidney, of Minnesota, delivered three lectures on "The Philosophy of the Beautiful and the Sublime." Mr. Denton J. Snider gave five lectures on "Shakespeare," taking up the Philosophy of Shakespearean Criticism, the Shakespearean World, the Principles of Characterization in Shakespeare, and the Organism of the Individual and the Universal Drama. The Rev. William H. Channing instructed the pupils in "Oriental and Mystical Philosophy," his special subjects being Historical Mysticism, Man's Fourfold Being, True Buddhism, and Modern Pessimism. Mrs. Edna D. Cheny spoke on "Color" and "Early American Art." Mrs. Julia Ward Howe on "Modern Society"; Mr. F. B. Sandborn on "The Philosophy of Charity," and Dr. Elisha Mulford on "The Personality of God" and "Precedent Relations of Religion and Philosophy to Christianity"; Mr. H. G. Blake contributed readings from Thoreau's manuscripts; the Rev. Dr. Cyrus A. Bartol shed light upon "The Quandary"; Dr. Peabody, of Harvard University, read a lecture on "Conscience and Consciousness"; and Ralph Waldo Emerson, David A. Wasson, the Rev. Dr. F. D. Hedge, Professor Benjamin Pierce and Professor G. H. Howison were represented by single lectures.

FIGHTING SHARKS IN NEW YORK BAY.

SHARKS have been unusually plentiful in New York waters during the present Summer, and some exciting encounters have been had with them by fishermen and others. One of the most notable of these encounters was that of Captain Alexander Robertson, of Fort Hamilton, L. I. While sailing about the Narrows on the afternoon of July 25th, the captain noticed a dark object moving towards the Long Island shore, irritating the water meantime and tossing it into miniature bits of foam that flecked an acre of the water's surface. He sailed rapidly towards the spot, and almost the instant that he saw that the disturbance was caused by sharks his skiff ran into the school. The sharks snapped angrily at the boat's sides, and lashed the water into a foam. One fish, larger and uglier than the rest, leaped towards the stern and crushed the back strip and rudder between its jaws. It appeared to be fully ten feet in length. The water seemed alive with black fins, which darted in all directions. Robertson tore up one of the seats, with which the little craft was filled, and used it effectively on the hard black snouts of more than one of the sharks. The breeze filled the sails and carried the boat steadily through the danger; but not until Bay Cliff was reached did the boat get clear of its pursuers and rest safely on the beach.

On the same day, one Block, who was fishing in company with a friend off Bay Ridge, encountered stray portions of the school of sharks. They had then advanced a mile above the Narrows. His fishline was violently snapped, the bait, hook and all being carried away. The second line thrown out caught a young shark about four feet and a half long. After a struggle he landed his prize. Again and again his lines were broken, but he replaced them with the stout lines of the rigging, and caught four of the fish. They are all about the same length. Three "bites" got away, and one nearly dragged him overboard. The captured sharks were viewed by scores of South Brooklyn people.

A few days previously, Captain John Sanford, of Clifton, L. I., while fishing off Sandy Hook, was startled by seeing just in front of his boat what appeared to be an island, about a couple of acres in extent, and completely covered with sharp rocks. The boat was traveling slowly, and on coming up to the supposed island it was discovered that it was an immense school of sharks, whose big black fins over water looked like rocks in the distance. There were some thousands of the monsters, some of them of enormous size, and all of a grayish color. They moved along slowly, without seeming to mind the boat, and the water in their wake was somewhat discolored. Captain Sanford reports that, in his opinion, the monsters were genuine man-eaters, and that some of them would measure from twelve to fifteen feet in length.

New York Bay is now full of dogfish and sharks, and it is the general opinion of the pilots and fishermen that they are attracted here by the contributions of the Street Cleaning Bureau.

Site of the Obelisk.

THE Park Commissioners have decided that the Alexandrian obelisk shall be placed on the natural knoll in the Central Park, lying southwest of the Museum of Art building, and on the west side of the East Drive, and north of the Greyrock Arch. At this point the ground is about 117 feet above the level of the sea, and the top of the knoll is about thirty feet above the level of the drive. It is the intention of the Park Commissioners to cut away the uneven surface of the rock so that the knoll will be symmetrical. A carriage way and walk will be laid out around the base of the knoll, and footpaths will lead up to the base of the obelisk. Trees will be cut down in order that a good view of the monolith may be had from all points. When the obelisk is put in position there it will be formally presented to the city. Commander Gorringe, of the United States Navy, who brought it to this city in the Dunoon, will superintend the erection of the obelisk.

Our Educational Progress.

A PAPER by the late Rev. Dr. Barnas Sears on "Educational Progress in the United States during the last Fifty Years," read at the recent meeting of the American Institute of Instruction, furnishes some facts of general interest. Up to the time of the Revolution, schools were not very numerous except in Massachusetts. In 1633, the first public school was established in New York, 1635 in Boston, 1659 in New Haven, 1683 in Hartford. In Virginia the people petitioned for a school in 1660, and were refused. Grammar schools were established in Maryland in 1773. Girls were excluded from free schools as late as 1781, and not until after 1800 were free schools established in Boston where girls could learn to write. After 1820 public high schools began to be established. President Humphrey says the first school he attended, in about 1800, was kept in a barn. Robert Coram, who wrote in 1791, at Wilmington, Del., said the schools about the country were despicable. Dr. Sears gave his own experience as ten years a pupil and six years a teacher before 1830. The greater part of the whole performance in common schools was radically wrong or sadly defective. In academies the teachers, as a class, were better educated than in common schools. Colleges were few, and the officers and professors had small salaries. In the college where Dr. Sears was graduated the president had $1,200 and the professors from $500 to $800 a year. The year 1837, when the Massachusetts State Board of Education was formed, with Horace Mann as Secretary, may be looked upon as the beginning of the modern epoch of education in this country. This was seven years after the organization of this institute. The difficulties of procuring proper and preventing improper legislation were described in a feeling manner, and the advantages of a State Superintendent of Education were noted. The normal school opens a wide field of thought, entirely new to a majority of primary teachers, and ignorance regarding the points taught in the normal school is the source of most of the failures in primary schools. Teachers' Institutes, held under State auspices, give new views and new impulses, which act ever after. A visit to a City Superintendent of Education and the schools under his charge will show the great extent of the work now done in free schools. No public enterprise contributes so much to the progress of civilization as our schools—there every family is represented. The high school is especially large and important in its influence. There is no danger of tyranny or lawlessness where education is general. During the past 50 years the school system of New England has spread over all the Western States, and in the last ten years has made good progress South.

Mr. Bancroft's Workshop.

GEORGE BANCROFT'S Washington residence, where he does most of his literary work, is a spacious, double brick house, with a stuccoed front, in H Street, near Lafayette Square, and hard by the dwellings of General Beale, Bancroft Davis, and the bankers, Corcoran and Riggs. The residence is three stories, and has a hall in the centre, with large reception, dining and drawing-rooms on each side. These last are handsomely furnished, many mirrors and pictures hanging on the walls, the most conspicuous being a full length figure of the present Emperor of Germany, presented by him to Bancroft when in Berlin. The historian's workshop is on the second floor in a great square room facing the street. In the middle is a huge desk, with many willow and leather chairs of commodious pattern, and a vast number of books, ranged against the walls. There are three other rooms equally stocked with books—some 15,000 in all, remarkable for their selectness—and an ample collection of rare manuscripts. No other American has, it is said, so many valuable documents, military and political, relating to the United States. Bancroft may be seen at the desk from an early hour in the morning hard at work, opposite to a young secretary, copying, verifying and arranging numberless books and manuscripts. He began his history in 1825, and has been engaged on it ever since—a period of 55 years. He expects to finish it, too, though he will be 80 in October. Very few men of his age are so vigorous and capable of prolonged work. He ascribes his robustness to his regular habits, temperate mode of living, and continual outdoor exercise. He would readily pass for a man of 60.

The Banking System of Russia.

THE banking system of Russia is quite worthy of comparison with that of England, France, or the United States. At its head is the Bank of Russia, the magnitude of whose operations has but one or two parallels in the world. It was established soon after the Crimean war to replace the first two Banks of Russia—which were established by Catherine II., in 1769—and their successors. Its affairs are in the main managed by Government officers, but nobles and merchants sometimes give them advice. As the capital of the bank belongs to the State, there are no stockholders, and the profits accrue to the Russian Treasury. The capital is 28,000,000 rubles, and the profits of 1877 were 7,000,000 rubles, a ruble being equivalent to 66 9-10 cents, according to this year's valuation by the United States Treasurer. In 1877 its total operations reached 12,000,000,000 rubles. In 1862 the deposits were 160,000,000 rubles, and ten years later they were 277,000,000. It alone can issue paper money, the Government's currency issues being solely made by its aid, and in the form of bills drawn upon it. On August 27th, 1879, its total circulation consisted of 1,131,000,000 rubles, 794,000,000 issued on its own account, and 415,000,000 on account of its 57 branches. To secure this currency it had only 189,000,000 rubles in coin, and the bills were at a discount of 30 per cent. Besides the national bank there are local banks not less intimately connected with the Government. In 1877, 263 communal banks reported a total capital of 15,000,000 rubles, deposits of 130,000,000, and discounts of 250,000,000, and in 1874, 18 provincial banks made reports, of which particulars are not given. The communal banks are administered more or less directly by the communal Councils, and the provincial banks of the Zemstvo or provincial representative body. In each case the capital and profits are public funds. The Russian commercial banks number 38, with 80 branches, and answer to our joint stock corporations. In 1865 their total capital and reserves were 2,000,000 rubles, in 1870 they were 86,000,000; in 1865 their deposits were 1,450,000 rubles, and in 1879 256,650,000; in 1865 their discounts and advances were 2,300,000 rubles, and in 1879 they were 548,680,000. In 1877 the total operations of these banks reached 24,826,000,000 rubles, or about one-half more than that of the Bank of France in 1878. The profits were 9,600,000 rubles, and the dividends were at the rate of about 9 per cent.

There is also a class of institutions which do work similar to some corporations in our Eastern States which advance money on Western farms. Of these, 11 are joint stock companies, having a capital of 19,000,000 rubles and loans of 118,000,000 rubles on country property, and of 49,000,000 on city property. The other 17 banks of this class are mutual in their character. The largest of this class has a capital of 45,300,000 rubles, and loans in 45 provinces aggregating 746,000,000 rubles. The detailed statistics of this society would alone give a fair idea of the agricultural development and possibilities of no small fraction of the globe. To complete the scheme of banks there must be added 80 establishments which seem to do for personal property pretty much what the banks just spoken of do for real—that is, they are, in part at least, pawnbroker shops, carried on by societies numbering 4,764 members, and doing a business several times larger than their capital of 23,000,000 rubles. These figures are eloquent of a progress which is not usually associated with the Russian name, and afford no slight nor empty prophecy of what Russia might become if its rulers would only recognize the fact that a good small bank is equal to a regiment, and a great one to an army.

A New Anæsthetic.

THE new anæsthetic, bromide of ethyl, as to which such glowing reports have been published in the medical journals, has not altogether justified the sanguine predictions of its advocates. Not long ago, before the New York Academy of Medicine, Dr. J. Marion Sims narrated a case in which this agent was employed in the performance of Battey's operation, and the patient died in 21 hours, apparently from the effects of the anæsthetic—the operation not being one of especial peril when performed by an expert surgeon. From his limited experience in the use of the drug, Dr. Sims expressed the opinion that it was not best to employ it in prolonged operations, or where there is organic renal disease. Dr. I. Ott, after a careful series of experiments with the bromide of ethyl, concludes that its anæsthetic effect is due to its action upon the gray matter of the nervous centres. It decreases the frequency of respiration, he thinks, by acting upon the central nervous system, while increasing the pulse-rate and augmenting the blood pressure by direct influence upon the heart. Dr. Sims spoke very cautiously respecting the physiological properties of the new anæsthetic, not having investigated the matter experimentally; but the lesson of a collapse under its use, or at least in probable consequence of it, is one that will deter medical men from acting upon the first enthusiastic statement of those whose reports have thus far governed the formation of medical opinion respecting it. It is claimed, on the other hand, by the advocates of the drug, that the preparation used by Dr. Sims was an extremely poor one, manufactured by inexpert chemists, and that the fatal result was probably due to this fact.

Progress in this Century.

AT the beginning of this century the manufactures of France were valued at $30,000,000, in 1876 at $3,080,000,000. The 15,000 watchmakers of Besançon and the 3,000 jewelers of Paris now turn out goods equal in value to the whole manufactures of the country when this century was born. In the last fifty years commerce has grown twelve times faster than population, having increased eight-fold. Shipping has trebled in fifty years. In forty years the number of lighthouses has more than doubled. Since 1839 the manufacture of wool has been quintupled. Nottingham now makes more lace than all the rest of Europe. The United States makes about 1,000,000 sewing-machines yearly, which can do as much as 12,000,000 women working by hand. The circulation of newspapers multiplied fourteen-fold in fourteen years; in 1840 the world had 3,658, today it has 17,348, requiring 1,470,000 tons of paper in the year. The exportation of books from England has increased tenfold in fifty years. At the beginning of this century there were no public libraries worth speaking of; in 1848 there were 536; since then the number has doubled.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The French Republican Monument on Fete Day.

A special splendor was reserved in the Paris fêtes for the Place de la République. The fountain of the Chateau d'Eau having been demolished, and the trees, which spoiled the perspective, uprooted, in the centre of the cleared space was erected a model in plaster, the idea of which had been adopted by the Municipal Council for the ornamentation of this site. This monument is the work of M. Leopold Morice, to whom has been awarded the statue, and M. Charles Morlo, the accompanying architecture. All around were trophies, Venetian masts, girandoles and illuminated borders, while two pyramids were erected at the entrance to La Rue du Temple.

Mueller's "Prometheus."

The German Government has recently purchased and had placed in the National Art Gallery at Berlin a remarkable piece of statuary. The subject is "Prometheus," and the sculptor is Mueller, who, when a boy, was a cook in a Munich hotel. From the size of the group and the sharpness of the outlines, as well as the high artistic merit displayed by the sculptor, the new attraction has become the object of much attention.

The Czar of Russia's New Yacht.

The new Russian Imperial yacht Livadia, may without exaggeration be called a floating palace. She is of huge proportions and entirely novel construction, having been designed by the great Russian Admiral Popoff, the inventor of the circular ironclads. The Livadia resembles an ordinary vessel, resting upon a substructure shaped like a turbot, the object of this peculiar formation being to render the vessel as steady as possible when at sea, and thus to guard against the horrors of mal de mer, against which even Imperial voyageurs are not always proof. The length of the vessel is 240 feet, breadth 150 feet, depth 50 feet, tonnage 11,510, and displacement 4,000, and she has three screws and three sets of engines, which it is expected will give her a speed of fourteen knots an hour. She will be manned by a crew of 260 men, and carry three swift steam launches, two lifeboats, and other boats, eleven in all. The apartments of the Emperor and the suite might compare with some palaces on land.

Jannina and the Greek Frontier.

The diplomatic conference of the six European Powers at Berlin has decided that the Sultan of Turkey shall cede nearly all Epirus and Thessaly to the Kingdom of Greece. Epirus and Thessaly, divided from each other by the Pindus mountain range, occupy that part of the southeastern European peninsula between the Adriatic and Ægean seas. Epirus is the southern portion of what has usually, in modern times, been called Albania, a province of the Turkish Empire. It is situated on the east coast of the Adriatic, just opposite Corfu, which, together with the more southerly Ionian Island, was given up to Greece by the British Protectorate some fifteen years ago. The town of Jannina, in Epirus, is the seat of Turkish provincial government for Epirus and Thessaly together. It owes this political supremacy partly to its central position, but far from the dividing range of mountains, and partly to the great influence and renown obtained early in this century by the famous Ali Pasha. It is in a fertile elevated plain, twenty miles long and seven miles broad, with a lake, the ancient Pambotis, at the foot of Mount Metzikeli, or Tomaros, which rises to 2,500 feet. The lake is six miles long and two miles wide. At its south end is Kastritza, which was the ancient Greek city of Dodona. But the classical temple, grove and seat of the renowned oracle of Dodona were on the western shore of this lake, probably just where the Castle of Jannina stands, upon a rocky peninsula jutting forth into the water. The town was probably of Byzantine foundation, but was of no great historical importance before Ali Pasha's time, from 1798 to 1822. The Porte says it will not surrender Jannina.

Diplomatic Conferences on the Moorish Question.

The diplomatic conferences which were inaugurated in Madrid on the 19th of May last, with the sanction of the Spanish Government, had their origin in a proposition made by Sidi Mohammed Vargas, Minister for Foreign Affairs for the Empire of Morocco, addressed to the consuls at Tangier representing the nations accredited to that empire. The object of this proposition was to determine the relations of Morocco with foreign powers, as marked out in the treaty entered into with Great Britain in 1856, and five years later with Spain, guaranteeing certain rights and protection to foreigners in the Empire of Morocco, and claiming similar privileges for Moorish subjects in strange countries. The representatives of the foreign powers at these recent conferences were: For Spain, His Excellency Don Antonio Canovas del Castillo, President of the Conference; for Austria and Hungary, Count de Ludolf; for the United States, General Fairchild; for Great Britain, Mr. Sackville West; for the Empire of Morocco, Sidi Mohammed Vargas; for Portugal, Count Casal Ribiero; for Germany, Count de Solms Sonnenwilde; for Belgium, Mr. Anspach; for France, Admiral Jaurès; for Italy, Count Greppi; for the Low Countries, Mr. Liddewier; for Sweden and Norway, Mr. Ackerman. The proceedings of the Conference dealt with the question of guarantees and personal security, and in a memorandum presented by Count de Ludolf, representing Austria, protection and guarantee was demanded for the Catholic religion in Morocco. The question of the protection of the Jews was not discussed.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—BOSTON has a population of 363,565, an increase of 71,608 in ten years.

—THE decrease in the public debt since August, 1865, has amounted to $635,536,230.

—A LARGE number of emigrants from Germany are about to locate in the State of Georgia.

—THE Massachusetts Prohibitionists will hold a State Convention at Worcester, September 8th.

—A FRENCH sculptor named Emile Jeannin claims to have discovered that caffeine is admirably adapted for stereotyping.

—FRESH orders have been given to French Ambassadors and Consuls abroad to facilitate the return of amnestied Communists.

—THE city authorities of Natchez expect to realize enough money from the drummer tax to pay for the public cisterns recently built.

—THE German Government has expelled from the country some Mormon missionaries, who were making proselytes for their Society.

—A NEW weekly journal, to be called Saturday Afternoon, is about to appear in London under the editorship of Mr. Farjeon, the novelist.

—THE population of Oregon will foot up almost 170,000. It was 90,000 ten years ago. The increase is about ninety per cent. This is a remarkable gain.

—THE water in the Petersburg (Va.) reservoirs has become so impure that the Board of Health has warned citizens against using it for drinking purposes.

—A MOTION to reject the Government's proposal for an increase of the income tax was lost in the British Commons by 220 to 94, many Conservatives voting with the Government.

—ROCHESTER is to have a colossal tower surmounted by an enormous statue of Mercury. It will advertise a tobacco factory. The foot of the god is to be twenty-two inches long.

—A LETTER from Havana says the insurrection is virtually ended. The customs revenues during May fell off $1,224,406 as compared with May, 1879, and during June, 1880, $350,745.

—THE Roumanians desire a Minister from the United States, and are, therefore, delaying the acceptance of Mr. Eugene Schuyler, who is designated only as diplomatic agent and Consul-General.

—THE Canton of Schwyz, in Switzerland, has re-established capital punishment and has enacted that executions shall be public. This makes the fourth canton which has restored the punishment of death.

—WAR is threatened between Siam and Burmah over a strip of territory claimed by the latter. The Queen of Siam and her favorite child were drowned June 1st, being run down by a steam-launch in the River Menam.

—SPECIAL dispatches from Vienna state that the Powers will draw up an ultimatum summoning the Porte to fulfill within three weeks the Montenegrin Convention, and, in the event of refusal, a naval demonstration will take place.

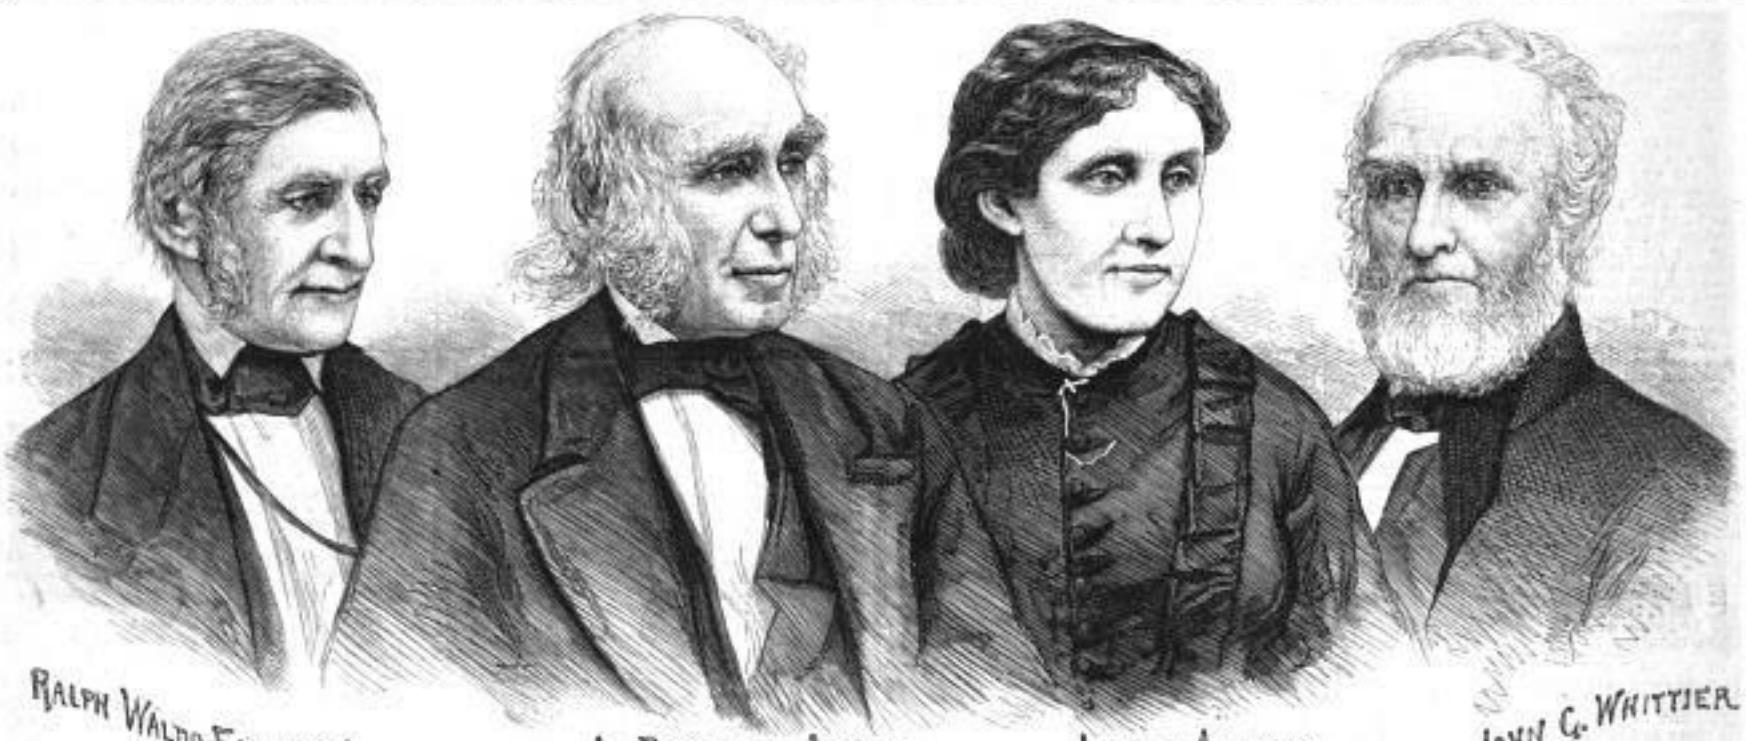
—THE official census of the Second District of Kansas—comprising 50 western counties—gives a population of over 355,000; an increase of 275,000 since 1870. The census of the entire State will probably show a population of 1,000,000.

—A DISPATCH from Bucharest says the Turkish Ambassador has received information that Aleko Pasha, Governor of Eastern Roumelia, is treating with the Bulgarians for a union with Bulgaria with the object of dethroning Prince Alexander in his favor.

—CORRESPONDENTS state emphatically that there is no further need of American contributions for Ireland. The potato crop is ripe; blight appears occasionally, and mostly on fields planted with old seed in Southwestern Ireland. There is no apprehension of its spreading. Killarney hotel-keepers say that there are fewer American tourists this season than there have been for years.

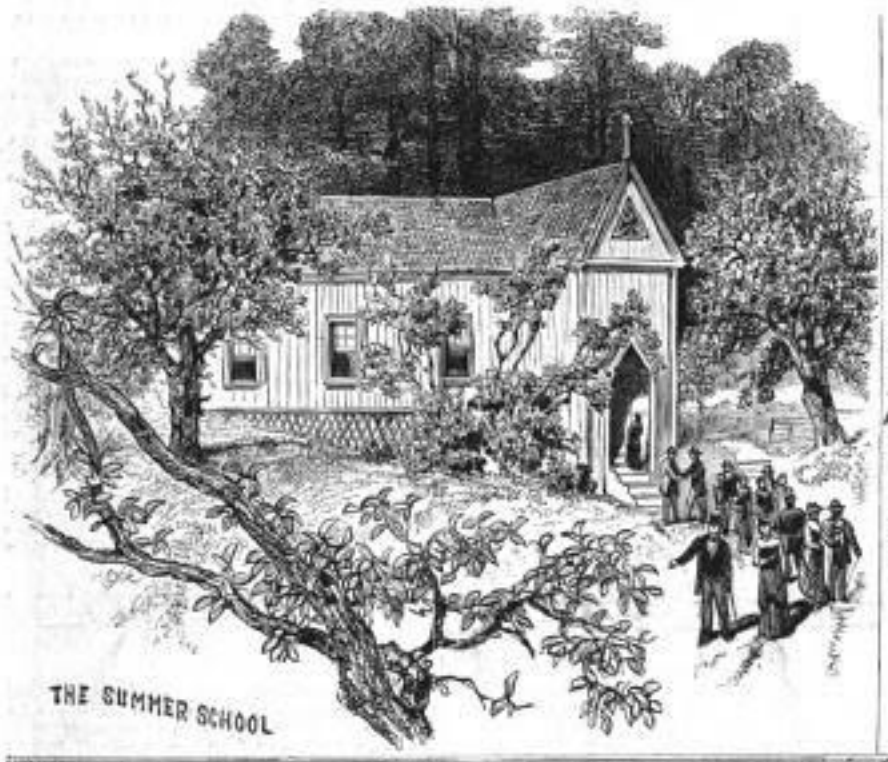
—THE total losses by the national banks during the six months ending March 20th, 1880, amounted to $7,563,886. The losses for a corresponding period in 1879 were $10,238,324, and in 1878, $10,993,145. Of these losses during the last six months, $1,208,521.02 was on account of depreciation in the premium upon United States bonds held by the banks, chiefly bonds which were about to mature.

—GREAT interest is felt in China as to the object, scope and seriousness of the errand of the American commissioners now en route to that country, and an anxious feeling is expressed in consequence of their visit being coincident with those of the Spanish and Brazilian Envoys. A peculiar suspicion of joint operation prevails, and distrust of amicable intentions is said to be freely discussed in high quarters.



—THE highest percentage of municipal growth shown by the census is that of Denver, which has increased during the decade at the rate of 650 per cent. Minneapolis ranks second, with a rate of 400 per cent., and Oakland, Cal., third, with a rate of 233 per cent. St. Paul and Camden, N. J., share fourth place with the rate of 167 per cent. Grand Rapids, Mich., is credited with 93 per cent.; St. Joseph, Mo., with 87 per cent.; Omaha, Neb., with 79 per cent.; and Atlanta, Ga., with 78 per cent.

—THE year 1880 is destined, it is believed, to be very memorable in the ecclesiastical annals of Germany, inasmuch as not only is it to see Cologne Cathedral completed, but the venerable cathedral of Frankfort-on-Main, part of which was burnt in 1867, restored. Interest in this structure centres in the electoral chapel, in which the Archbishop of Mentz used to crown the German emperors, who were then anointed before the high altar. The first was thus crowned in 1562, the last in 1792.



—THE Finance Ministers of the various German States have been in conference at Coburg in order to open up new sources of revenue. It appears that the new taxes and duties voted by Parliament in 1879 have deceived the expectations of the Government. The tobacco duties alone have shown a return of 20,000,000 marks less than was expected. It is, therefore, necessary to invent new means for increasing the revenues. It is believed that the Ministers will propose a tax on all transactions of the Stock Exchange, and increase the taxes on beer and spirits.

—FOR the second time within twenty years, the flourishing city of Manila has been laid in ruins. The total loss of life by recent earthquakes is about 320—a figure which falls a little short of that reached in the terrible earthquake of 1863, but the destruction of property, public and private, seems to have been as great now as then. When the Duke of Alencon visited the Philippines in 1866, he found the whole city temporarily constructed of wood, and, after this new experience, it is not likely that Spain will venture upon the use of any other material in rebuilding this so often devastated capital of her Asiatic empire.

Digitized by Google

RALPH WALDO EMERSON A. BRONSON ALCOTT LOUISE ALCOTT JOHN G. WHITTIER

THE SUMMER SCHOOL

THE HOME OF MISS ALCOTT.

SCENE IN THE INTERIOR OF THE CHAPEL DURING A LECTURE BY A. BRONSON ALCOTT.

MASSACHUSETTS.—SECOND TERM OF THE SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY, IN THE CHAPEL ON THE ORCHARD GROUNDS, CONCORD

FROM SKETCHES BY W. PARKER BODFISH.—SEE PAGE 398.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK.—A REMARKABLE SCHOOL OF SHARKS ENCOUNTERED IN THE UPPER BAY, OFF BAY RIDGE.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE PAGE 390.

Digitized by Google

INTENSE.

HOW could I help it, ma belle Cerise?
How could I stifle my love for you,
When you fixed your hair à la marquise
And smiled on me, as you always do,
To show on each dimple a jolly patch?
Such delicate rouge on your rounded cheek,
And your hair and eyebrows poudrés to match,
How could I help it? You are so "chic"!

A foot so fine that old Suckling would Give you a place in a roundelay;
If I could write, I know I should—
I long to lie at your feet all day,
To touch the hem of your petticoat,
Made after the Flemish in dear Paris;
And on your delicate wrists to note
"Effects" in bangles from over the seas.

Yes, I've a taste for past fashions, you know;
I'd like to go back to Versailles of old,
When all the "unpleasant" passions, you know,
Wore point-de-Venise and filigreed gold.
Ah, you're the most perfect bric-à-brac,
You might have been made by ce cher Watteau,
On a Sèvres saucer you'd nothing lack!—
Piquante!—from your head to your pointed toe!

Louise, your cousin? Well, you are right;
She'd do, after Greuze, but she doesn't try;
She never poses in "chiaro" light,
She's out of drawing, I don't know why—
But if I might always look at you,
I'd not long for "les luxes" in this gray life;
You'd be my Whistler in gold-and-blue,
And I'd ask Louise to be my wife!

MAURICE F. EGAN.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUPPELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MAGUIS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV.—PETER'S DISCOVERY.

IT is a beautiful morning after the tempestuous night. Count Toboskie, fresh from the dressing-room and the hands of his valet, stands looking out of a window into the street. There is an absent, gloomy look in his eyes and a great ache in his heart; the last night's adventure with Maize has left its effect, and this morning he is restless and discontented. State cares press heavily upon him, and the nation demands his attention; but his mind being in such an unhealthy mood, he has sent word to the royal buildings that he will not be present during the day, and, immersed in bitter meditation, stands staring out of the window, looking but seeing nothing.

At last his mind is brought to his surrounding by strange sounds proceeding from the corridor. They attract his attention, and he turns. Surely there is some sort of a struggle in process, and occasionally he hears the loud, angry voice of his chamberlain in expostulation and command. Then the door of the outer apartment is thrown open and he hears sounds of another struggle as the outraged official of the bedchambers makes one final effort to prevent the intrusion.

"I tell you the count has given strict orders not to be disturbed. If you will persist in a hearing, tell me your business and I will lay it before him, though you don't deserve such consideration, you persevering, gray-headed villain!"

"I must see him myself. Let me go!" This in a dull, strained voice, utterly unfamiliar to the listening noble.

"But you can't see him, stupid fool!" cries the chamberlain. "Do you think I am put here for a farce? I tell you my word is law, and I have been given orders to admit no one. What is your business—official or private?"

Toboskie terminates the altercation by stepping to the door. In the outer chamber he sees in the hands of his chamberlain a man whom he at first takes to be a stranger—a man whose gray hair is in the utmost disorder, as is also his gray attire—and from whose ashen face twitching and quivering spasmodically, two wild, haggard eyes gleam forth filled with horror and misery. The second glance shows him that it is Peter, and he starts with surprise and apprehension.

"What is the matter?" he inquires, sharply.

At his voice Peter breaks from the relaxed grasp of the chamberlain and staggers to the count, while in his throat breaks a great, hoarse cry.

"What is the matter?" repeats Toboskie, and grasping Peter's arm shakes him violently. "Can't you speak? What are you here for?"

Peter essays to respond but his lips are voiceless, and only that vast, wordless cry again breaks from him.

"Fool!" and in a fury the noble shakes him as if he would shake his life out. "Can't you tell me what you are after? Do you come from your master?"

At that question Peter flings up his hands as if he had been stabbed, but has just strength to nod his head.

"Is there anything the matter with him?"

It requires several efforts before Peter can speak, then the words come from him in a shriek, so wild and ungovernable is his agitation:

"He is dead!"

For an instant a sensation of faintness sweeps over Toboskie, and he actually feels that he shall drop. Then, overcoming this weakness, he straightens himself and looks sternly at Peter, while his eyes are piercing and incredulous.

"Man, you are mad!"

Again the faithful servant flings up his arms in that gesture of inestimable suffering.

"Mad!" he cries, "oh, my God, I wish I was! but I am not. He is dead, dead, DEAD! Do you hear me? Dead this minute, now, while you and I stand here alive! He is gone—gone for ever. Oh, Lord, and I loved him so! If it had only been me—but to take him—him, the only one I had!" Burying his face in his hands Peter's form sways to and fro like a reed. That icy horror, that frozen grief are melted; all the magnitude, the horror, the poignancy of his loss and misery settle upon him, and through his quivering old hands that shield his face rushes a flood of tears.

Toboskie, driven almost wild with fear and suspense, still gives voice to his doubt, though he speaks now mechanically.

"It can't be; you must be mistaken!"

Peter turns like a brute maddened with his torture.

"Mistaken!" he cries, and his voice is shrill and changed. "Mistaken, when I saw him with my own eyes stiff and cold; mistaken, when I saw him stretched before me with the blood streaming from his heart! Come with me and see for yourself. He loved you, he would send for you if he could, but he can't! Oh, my darling, my poor murdered one; and I have held him in my arms oftener than his mother had, and it was for this—for this. Come with me—look at him—see that horrible sight, then tell me I am mistaken!" In his wild agony the old man's manner is really tragic as he staggers from the room; and, giving a few hasty directions to his servant, Toboskie speedily follows.

It is still early morning, none of the upper order being yet astir, and the laboring class busy at their duties; the count and his companion reach Castle Lagors unobserved. With a hand that trembles piteously, Peter inserts the key and opens the door. That supreme silence of the night before reigns over the castle; not a soul is stirring. If tragedy there is, it is evident that the alarm has not yet been given. With that sickening feeling again at his vitals, Toboskie hastens up the grand staircase and on to his friend's chamber, the old man staggering behind. Only an instant he hesitates, then, with a desperate courage, he flings open the door and steps into the chamber.

Ah! yes; death, dealt by crime, has been here. For a second Toboskie stands as if turned to stone, then he reels back as though himself death-smitten, and clutches a chair for support. Prostrate upon the floor is stretched the long, slim form of Count Lagors. He is attired in full dress, and from a spot above the left breast is the stain of the crimson tide that has welled forth and congregated in a dark and congealed pool upon the floor. The face, upturned to the light, is horrible in its purple hue, its contracted muscles, its wide-open, staring eyes filled with an agony and horror incomputable. The thin lips, so perfect in life, are drawn tightly, with hard lines around them, and disclose the teeth and a portion of the discolored tongue; while the hands, locked tightly, lie upon either side of the lifeless form.

It is death, but not in its mysterious majesty, its invincible grandeur; it has not come as the mighty Sovereign of all life; but it is death in its most frightful and ghastly aspect, death dealt by crime and stealth! That unfortunate life, thrust forth into eternity without a moment's warning, has left traces of its struggle and horror in that dark, stiff face; and the two men looking on shudder in mortal horror, and one, tottering across the floor, sinks down beside that ghastly spectacle, his gray hair bent in the blood.

Three times does Count Toboskie pass his hand before his eyes, his face more pallid than the dead; then he, too, staggers across and stands beside his murdered friend. All the friendship of old rises warm and faithful in his breast along with an agony and remorse that have never before touched him. He remembers that this man has been his life-long friend; he also remembers that the last speech between them were words hard and angry—words that now, standing above that lifeless form, he would give ten years of his life to recall.

Like a flash of lightning that last interview sweeps before him, and every circumstance, in his present agitated condition, assumes a different hue. He sees how this dead man came to him for comfort and advice, which he in his Pharisaical righteousness refused. He sees the quivering, sensitive lips of that mouth now set in death, the piteous expression of those eyes as he confessed to a love, which, though perhaps unsanctioned by the dictates of society, should have softened his wrath and appealed to his sympathy, since he, too, loved!

As he stands there in his rigorous self-examination, his bitter self-denunciation, and brought suddenly face to face with death, a groan is wrung from the breast of this cold and haughty statesman—a groan whose grief and remorse might almost rouse the dead; and for the first time in all the years of his magnificent manhood a mist of tears dims the proud brilliancy of that eagle eye. A self-condemnation fastens upon him for enjoying the blessing of existence while this man, this friend of his youth, stretches in eternal death at his feet.

He glances around the room; everywhere is life—in the cricket that sings in its concealed nook around the hearth—in the birds that have commenced their morning matins, as they swing in their golden cages; in the great Russian bear-hound that has slipped through the open door and crouches in one corner with his gaze fixed upon his master; in that old man kneeling, broken-hearted with his gray locks in the life-blood; in himself as he stands stricken with his horror and remorse—everything is reveling in the glories of existence, save that frozen, ghastly thing at his feet, from which the haughty, erring, luxurious life has been quenched for ever.

He is dead, Count Nicholas Lagors, and his illustrious family is at last extinct. This thought rouses the man who stands above the corpse like a block of marble, and, stooping, he places his hand upon the breast. A minute's waiting convinces him that all life is extinct, and this last hope fled, he lays his hand gently upon the bent, gray head of Count Lagors's faithful friend and servitor.

"Peter," he says, and his tones hold that wondrous sweetness which at rare intervals characterizes them. But the man lays motionless. "Peter, you must rouse yourself," continues Toboskie, and his voice is a trifle husky, "rouse yourself, my boy, and try to give me some coherent account of this horrible affair."

Still no sign or motion of life from that stiff, gray figure, and the noble is half-inclined to believe that his life has also fled. He moves his hand around to the brow that has suddenly grown aged and wrinkled, and finds that it is parched and burning with a raging fever. Thus assured, he continues:

"It does not need for me to be told how bitter and miserable is this blow that has fallen upon us. Did not I, too, love him?"

From that dead breast, with its life-gore, Peter lifts his head—lifts it with a slow, dazed gesture, though in his haggard eyes is a fierce light as he spreads his hands out over the dead in a peculiar, protecting way, as though even in death he was jealous of his idol, and still claimed him as his entire possession, and his alone.

"You may have loved him!" he cries, with a savage scorn and pain; "but what was your love to mine? Have you lived with him all your life? Have you worked and sinned for him, and hidden his evil away from the world as you would hide pestilence? Have you been beaten and kicked by him, and suffered all manner of abuse, yet known at the same time that you were all in all to him—that life would not be possible apart from you? Have you loved him with all your heart—you, who parted with him not a week ago in hard words and bitterness. Oh, my God!" he lifts his gray, agonized face, and shudders as the light of the day smites it. "I never gave him a hard word or a hasty one! I loved him—loved him always; as mothers love their children—as Christians their God. Yet he is gone—gone, and the sun shines and the flowers bloom, and the world moves just the same! I can't bear it—I can't!" Through the silence of that luxurious chamber floats the wailing cry of that breaking, crushed-out soul. Before such grief as this Count Toboskie stands silent. He knows that this man has loved the dead with a love of which he has known nothing—boundless in its might, grand in its patience and humility, and reaching to sublimity in its faithfulness.

He stands silent. He suddenly feels that he has no right to interfere with this man's woe. He has purchased his title to grief through a life-long fidelity and love, and his sorrow is sacred. At last Peter staggers to his feet and turns his heavy, haggard eyes upon Count Toboskie.

"What is to be done?" he says.

"First of all the authorities must be notified;" but as he speaks, Toboskie shudders. Not even the sanctity of death is allowed him—this poor murdered noble. All this horror must be dragged before the public—this purple, distorted corpse viewed by a hundred inquisitive eyes. He thinks of that long line of counts sleeping beneath their marble tablets; and yet what must this lifeless body—this ghastly thing that represents the last of the powerful and haughty Lagors—what humiliation must be swept upon it ere it, too, reposes among the honored remains of those illustrious noblemen.

He thinks of the haughty, unbending, sensual life of this dead man—that life entirely given over to pursuits of sin and pleasure, and upon his brow starts out dank dews of a painful horror as he realizes to what, in death, he is reduced—this noble, who has gone through existence like a conqueror; who has known no touch of want, or toil, or hardship; who has been far removed from all contamination of that class before which his dead body must be exposed.

Stronger than every other tie is that freemasonry of aristocrats, that bond that binds together the haughty conservatives of rank and power. Such a tie as this united Toboskie to this figure at his feet, and a shame and bitterness settle upon him as he realizes that the prestige and proud distinction of a state funeral—that honor and glory shown the dead of their rank—must be abandoned for the common court of justice.

In years gone by the Lagorses have been a numerous race, and have died many deaths. Their bones bleach upon battle-fields, and lie buried in ocean beds. Others, still further back and in times of war and rebellion, have with smiles laid their heads upon the block, rather than sacrifice their views of the kingdom. But this one at his feet, this poor, slaughtered noble, stricken down in the dark, murdered by some paltry enemy without sufficient courage to confess his vengeance—slain as shamefully as swine—he is the first to meet such a death. And it is well that he is the last of his race, that none survive him to bear the shame. With one final struggle with his clannish pride and fidelity that adheres to the noble even in death, Toboskie's resolution is taken.

"Peter," he says, and his tone is gloomy and bitter. "Peter, Count Lagors is ours no longer, he belongs to the people."

Again that cry of great pain escapes Peter, and again he spreads out his hands over the dead.

"He is mine! They shall not have him," he cries, fiercely. "He belongs to me and to no one else. When he was alive I was his all, even as he was mine. No one shall see him, no one touch him but me. Oh, my dear one, gone from me for ever, never to hear his voice, never again to feel his touch! Dead—dead, and what a death! stricken down as you would fell a brute, wounded, bleeding, dying, and I only a step away—slaughtered and left to die alone! And how he must have suffered! Look at this gash in his breast, see his eyes! Oh, God! if I could get that look out of them—that horrible, wild, agonized look! How he suffered!" In his delirious anguish the broken, almost incoherent, words break from him as he wrings his quivering hands and lives through that scene of horror of the night before.

"All you can say will make no difference, my poor man," says Toboskie, gently. "The remains of your master must be handed over to the authorities, that is the first step we can take. A foul and dastardly crime has been committed, but I pledge you my word that the perpetrator shall be brought to justice."

Once more Peter lifts his haggard, sunken face, filled with its passionate grief, its savage wrath, its desperate purpose.

"I will do that—I will avenge the slaughter of Count Nicholas Lagors." His voice is low and hoarse, while his sunken eyes gleam like a maddened brute's. "I know his murderess—God curse her! the white-faced, golden-haired sorceress! I would recognize her among ten thousand—this daughter of Satan, with her angel face. I felt that she brought evil when she came. Oh! my master, my master! Here, above his dead body, I swear to hunt his murderess to her death!"

His gray hair is stained with the blood, his face ashen as the dead; his eyes, sunken and fierce, gleam with a fire never again to be quenched, and his hands are locked upon that lifeless breast. As Toboskie hears his wild words and that solemn vow, which will be religiously kept by this poor, ignorant, faithful soul that knew but one god, his master, a shudder convulses him, and he remains silent a minute.

"If you have any knowledge or suspicion of the murderer," he says, finally, "keep it to yourself. Do not speak a word upon the subject. Your testimony, which I hope will be instrumental in convicting the guilty one, must be reserved for the court. Remain here while I seek some one to notify the authorities."

He goes out of the chamber of death, and as he steps into the corridor a speck of gleaming light attracts his attention to the floor. Stooping, he picks it up and sees that it is a corner of gold lace, rare and valuable, and of a peculiar pattern that he has never seen but once before—upon the ball-dress that Maize wore last night. For an instant he stands motionless; then under the smooth and dusky skin of his haughty face the proud blood comes and goes swiftly, and he staggers back and leans against the wall of the corridor for support. A horrible, deathly sickness is upon him, and his brain is in a chaotic mass. When it clears there rushes upon him the memory of that history imparted to him by that dead noble but a few weeks before his death—that history that gave a line of secret but invincible connection to his life and that of the woman of Toboskie's love.

Maize! Maize!

The name floats through his brain, and a mortal fear, a shuddering cowardice are upon him. A wild and almost uncontrollable impulse has seized him to flee from this terrible tragedy—to take his idol and himself far away from this crimson mystery that has struck him with a sudden terror and dread! Then his head clears. His strong and powerful brain asserts itself, and in his sudden composure that chill, proud smile sets upon his lips—that smile that bespeaks better than all else, the haughty supremacy, the cold dominance of this man's nature.

He looks at the lace, then places it calmly in his pocket. In no way, he tells himself, can the woman of his Pagan worship be connected with this tragedy. If she were—a brief spasm of pain flits athwart the stony composure of his dark face, and his breath breaks from him sharply—if by any possible means the guilt of this crime could be attached to her, well, it were right and proper that he and the world should know her sin.

Again he smiles, that cold, mirthless smile, as he thinks of the madness of this idea, and passes down the corridor intent upon his miserable duties.

CHAPTER XXV.—LADY JET.

AND now, in pursuing this narrative, and after begging the reader's indulgence, we must take him to new scenes and characters, which, though strange, are none the less necessary and important.

Our story being strictly Russia, we must not fail to present another well-known feature in Russian life—that of exiling unfortunates to Siberia. And to this land, amidst the horror and gloom of an eternal Winter, we invite the reader's attention.

The population of Siberia, it is well known, is about 4,000,000, mostly occupying the river valleys of the south. A large part of the inhabitants are exiles from Russia, whence 12,000 criminals are banished yearly. The worst are condemned to labor in the mines, while the others take their families with them and occupy small grants of land. In the east of Siberia are the famous gold mines, in the working of which thousands of exiles are employed. Here these miserable unfortunates, victims of the rigorous execution of the law, toil from dawn until nightfall, their lives passing in the gloom and bitterness of the mines. And it is a brutal, cruel punishment—worse than death—that dooms the hapless victims of Russia's severity to drag their lives through the endless torture of an existence like this. Here, in these mines, are found the proudest of the Russian aristocracy; nobles under the ban of royal displeasure; peers of all grades; statesmen accused of treason; warriors adhering to views prohibited by the Emperor; knights, earls and counts, chained in this horrible, common existence, to criminals of the deepest dye—human brutes, blood stained and sunk beyond redemption. Here all mingle in one miserable, revolting mass—monuments to that despotism that draws no line of distinction between the dissenting noble and the blood-dyed wretch of the slums. These gangs of exiles are presided over by officers appointed by the Russian Government, the superior official of all, in the settlement of which we are writing, being Count Karl Zickwoff.

Digitized by Google

Upon the morning which we have selected to introduce him and his miserable colony, the count can be found in his domains, which are situated but a short distance from the mines. He is a tall, military man, and shows himself to a good advantage as he stands this morning in the breakfast-room, gazing absently out of the window at this frozen, ice-girt land of his adoption. He is a man perhaps sixty years of age, with a dark, stern face that shows no traces of sentiment of any kind. He was once, years ago, one of the most powerful rulers of his land; but in the height of his glory and supremacy he was smitten with a deadly blow in the death of his wife, the only being to whom he was ever sincerely attached, and, growing to loath the land where she died, he renounced his high order as a statesman, petitioned for this office, which was readily granted him, and, with his motherless child, came to this foreign land in the hope of forgetting his misery. Whether he has succeeded no one will ever know. His life is a shut-up book, which includes no weaknesses or confidents. He is a loyal subject to his Emperor and devoted to his cause.

As he stands now in moody contemplation a step sounds, and he looks up. Through the door comes a woman, evidently an upper servant. Her tall, slim form is clad in a plain cloth dress; her face is remarkable, not so much for its beauty as for the sadness and pathos that rests like a vail upon it; her features are small, dark, and straightly-shaped, her eyes large, pathetic, appealing, and hair once dark now plentifully strewn with gray. Her motions are easy and even graceful as she comes forward and arranges the breakfast-table with a few touches

"Where is your mistress, Phedora?" inquires the count.

"She has not yet come down, my lord," replies the woman, and her voice is low and sad, but sweet with a mournful melody.

The count frowns.

"Go at once and tell Lady Jet that breakfast waits," he commands, sternly.

The woman disappears from the dining-room and goes out to a long hall extending through the centre of the house, which is furnished with a degree of luxury surprising in this far-off land. Up the stairs she goes, passing down another hall, until she comes to a broad door, which she opens, and steps into a chamber elegantly appointed, and which is the commencement of a suite of apartments of similar elegance. It is a fairy bower, and over all is a soft, rich dusk, sweet with the rare perfume of many flowers. Hangings of amber satin richly embroidered adorn the walls, along with paintings from the oldest masters; in every available place are divans and easy-chairs, and the floor is a strange mixture of white and amber velvet carpets, fur and Turkish rugs; in every fireplace through the golden bars gleam the crimson coals, and through the purple scented dusk flashes the calm clear faces of rare statues.

The queen of this royal abode is not yet visible, and Phedora hesitates. Then from the inner apartment of all comes a sweet, sharp voice:

"Phedora!"

"Yes, my lady."

"Come here."

The woman obeys, and as she enters the apartment a small, brilliant figure rises from a couch where she has lain half buried in marabout, eider, and gold-hued cushions

(To be continued.)

HON. HORACE RUSSELL,

JUSTICE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF NEW YORK.

HON. HORACE RUSSELL, recently appointed Judge of the Superior Court to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Chief-Justice Curtis, is still a young man, having been born in Franklin County, New York, on June 19th, 1843. His father was Charles Russell, a well-known merchant and farmer of that county, who represented his district in the Assembly in 1857 and 1858. Horace entered Dartmouth College in 1861, graduating with honors in 1865. He then entered the Law School of Harvard University, where he studied for a year under Governor Washburne, Chief-Justice Parker, and Theophilus Parsons. He next studied law in the office of ex-Judge William C. Brown, of Ogdensburg, and having been admitted to the Bar in October, 1866, commenced practice as partner of the Hon. H. H. Vary, then District-Attorney of St. Lawrence County. In 1869 he accepted a law partnership in this city with the Hon. William H. Waring, late member of Assembly from Kings County. On the accession of District-Attorney Phelps, in 1872, Mr. Russell was appointed one of the Assistant District Attorneys, and held that position until his appointment to the bench. During his career as Public Prosecutor he has tried a number of most important cases. In January last he was appointed Judge Advocate General on the staff of Governor Cornell, and in that position displayed marked ability in disposing of cases submitted to him for review. He is a stanch Republican in politics, and during the past ten years has taken an active part in the various campaigns. He is a member of the Union League Club, the University Club, the Young Men's Republican Club, and various other Republican organizations, and is an intimate friend of Vice-President Wheeler. The new Justice was married to a daughter of ex-Judge Hilton in 1868.

THE HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN MONUMENT.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, the great Swedish story-teller, whose writings have delighted hundreds of thousands of children all over the world, has had a monument erected to his memory in Copenhagen. It was unveiled on June 26th, with services that were doubly appropriate by reason of the large number of children who participated. Andersen was born April 2d, 1805, and died in August, 1875. Although he had suffered many years from poverty, and in middle life had been enabled to travel considerably, the vast hold he had in his latter days on the heart of the public was due, not to the finished volumes he wrote for mature minds, but to the narratives he composed, such as "Fairy Tales," for the special interest of the little folks. His language was choice, picturesque, natural, and none of his adroit and absorbing stories are aught but pure, instructive and ennobling. His contributions to the mass of child's literature will last for generations; and doubtless many of the juveniles whose affections he held in his great heart will envy their fellow-readers of Denmark the privilege of visiting his last resting-place, of recalling again the delights of his tales beside the appropriate monument that a grateful people have erected to his memory.

BRITISH DISASTER IN AFGHANISTAN.

THE British army has met with another terrible disaster in Afghanistan, at a time when preparations were being hastened for the evacuation of that country. An Afghan army from Herat, led by Ayoob Khan, almost annihilated General Burrows's brigade near Candahar, and forced General Primrose to retire with his troops into the citadel of that city.

The intelligence was first announced in the British House of Commons on Wednesday, July 28th, by the Marquis of Hartington, the Secretary of State for India. After reading the dispatch from the Governor of Bombay, the marquis added that General Phayre had been instructed to collect all available forces and march at once to Candahar. Later in the day further telegrams were received which indicated that the disaster was but little worse than at first supposed. General Burrows's forces numbered between 2,000 and 3,000 men, and was composed of Horse Artillery I and E, a company of sappers, six companies of the Sixty-sixth, two squadrons of Scinde horse, one regiment of Bombay cavalry, and the First and Thirteenth Native Infantry. The army under Ayoob Khan was stronger than was expected, consisting of 12,000 men and 36 guns, well served.

General Burrows's brigade had been detached from the Candahar garrison to co-operate with Shere Ali, whom the British appointed Wali of Candahar, against Ayoob Khan, the aspirant to the Ameership. When Shere Ali ordered his forces to retire towards Girishk, his infantry deserted in a body, but were pursued by General Burrows, who recovered the guns and wagons they had carried off. Weakened by the desertion of Shere Ali's infantry, General Burrows effected a retrograde movement to Kushk-i-Nakud, thirteen miles nearer Candahar. Ayoob Khan's forces had reached the Helmund River above Girishk, and spies reported that he had crossed that river at Hyderabad, and that 4,000 Ghazis had joined him, while parties of his cavalry were foraging near the British camp. It would seem as if the Indian Government felt some misgiving with regard to General Burrows's position, for a fortnight ago a reserve division in Scinde was placed under orders for active service. The division comprises a battery of artillery, one battalion of British and two regiments of native infantry, and one regiment of native cavalry. By moving this force quickly to the front the Quettah and Pishoen contingents can be relieved for active duty under General Phayre. Ayoob Khan's forces will doubtless make a rush on Candahar, but as the recent crop reports are very satisfactory the garrison will probably be well provisioned.

How the Prince Imperial Died

BRIGADIER-GENERAL SIR EVELYN WOOD, who accompanied the ex-Empress Eugénie to Zululand, has sent to the papers a description of the death of the Prince Imperial, collected from the independent narratives of eighteen of the Zulus who participated in the attack upon the Prince's party, and showing that the attacking party numbered forty, twelve of whom followed the Prince, and eight being immediately concerned in his death. The Zulus, having nearly surrounded the Prince's party, fired, and rushed on them as they were mounting. The Prince not having succeeded in mounting, ran alongside his horse until it broke away. The Prince followed the horse into the donga, until, being closely pressed by his pursuers, he turned upon them—in the words of the Zulus—"like a lion at bay." Being struck by an assegai inside the left shoulder, he rushed at the nearest opponent, who fled. Another Zulu then fired at the Prince, when only ten yards from him. The Prince fired his pistol and faced his rapidly increasing foes, until, menaced from his right and rear, and struck by another assegai, he regained the level on which he had first stood in the donga, where he was speedily surrounded. He seized an assegai which had been thrown at him—in struggling with his terrified horse his sword had fallen from its scabbard—and thus defended himself against seven or eight Zulus, who state they did not dare to close in on him until he sank exhausted on his hips. The above facts were elicited from the Zulus, who were examined separately on the scene of the attack. It may be remarked that this is the first correct description of the affair that has yet been published.

A Priest's Timely Bequest.

THE will of the late Rev. Thomas Farrel, Pastor of the Roman Catholic Church of St. Joseph, in this city, was offered for probate in the Surrogate's office yesterday. The testator died comparatively poor, owing to the largeness of his benevolence among the needy during his lifetime. Among his bequests is one of $3,000, in trust, to aid in the purchase or erection of a Catholic church in this city for the use of colored Catholics. He desires that this church shall be located in a part of the city convenient for the attendance of the colored people, and says:

"My motive in making a bequest for the benefit of the colored people is simply this: I believe that the white people of the United States have inflicted grievous wrong on the colored people of African descent; and I believe that Catholics have shamefully neglected to perform their duties towards them. I wish, then, as a white citizen of these United States and a Catholic, to make what reparation I can for that wrong and that neglect. I hope that God will accept the reparation, and avert from these United States, so dear to me, and from the Church of God I love so well, any punishment they may have deserved by their injustice and neglect. And I empower and command my executors, hereafter mentioned, if within three years after my death no steps shall have been taken by the Most Reverend Archbishop and the priests of this city for the purchase or erection of a Catholic church for the colored Catholics of New York, to hand over and pay the last above mentioned $5,000 Alabama State bonds to the asylum or home for colored people or children now located at One Hundred and Forty-third Street, Western Boulevard of this city, for their protection and support."

Excursion to Mount Vesuvius.

A CORRESPONDENT writes from Naples: "Excursionists have now added to their Summer trips a visit to the summit of Vesuvius. Cheap trains have been arranged, and from Rome and elsewhere crowds come to run up the cone. On Saturday night it was brilliantly lit up with electric lights which dazzled all the bay, while from the crater, which is in a state of partial eruption, flames were shot up as if in resentment at the puny efforts of its rival. The exhibition continued till dawn. It is expected that these visits will be repeated during the Summer, and, leaving Rome in the middle of the day of Saturday, much may be done by the visitors before they get back to business on Monday morning. Vesuvius can be scaled on the night after their arrival. Then, on Sunday, excursion steamers will take them to Sorrento and on to the Blue Grotto of Capri for the price of about 40 cents, while another will carry off a portion of the crowd to Procida and Ischia, returning in ample time for the night train to Rome. Thirty years ago realities such as these would have been ridiculed as dreams. There are fifteen electric lights used for these night trips, each equal to about forty gaslights, the effulgence being extraordinary, but far eclipsed by that of the streams of lava, which can be seen and traced as they course madly down the mountain. A thousand objects of interest which in the olden time have fascinated the traveler have been missed; but who cares for them? The mountain has been seized, and that is enough to talk about. Vesuvius will, however, some day or other, have the last word." It is stated that an eruption commenced on July 25th.

Recent Discoveries at Babylon.

AMONG the antiquities recently received at the British Museum from the excavations at Babylon is a fine clay cylinder of Antiochus the Great, containing sixty lines of cuneiform writing in a perfect state of preservation. The inscription presents a good deal of variety from the alphabet of the same type which was used in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, but the language is to all intents and purposes the same that is found in Babylonian documents dating three centuries earlier; and the legend itself, recording the repairs by the king of the two great temples of Babylon, together with prayers for the royal protection of the tutelary divinities Nebo and Merodach, exhibits the stereotyped phrases with which all Assyriologists are familiar. The chief interest, therefore, of the document consists, not in any direct historical discovery, but in the evidence which is afforded that official records, of the same type as the early cylinders of Nineveh and Chaldæa, were deposited in the temples of Babylon long after the date of the Macedonian conquest, and in the hope which we are thus authorized to entertain that contemporary accounts of the campaigns of Alexander and his successors will be brought to light as excavations are continued in the mounds of Amran and Jamjameh, from whence, it is understood, all the recent relics, including the cylinders and tablet of Cyrus the Great, have been exhumed. At the personal solicitation of Sir Henry Layard before he left Constantinople, the Sultan was pleased to extend for another two years, dating from next Spring, the period during which the employés of the British Museum are to be permitted to continue their excavation of the mounds of Assyria and Babylonia.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

M. de Ujfalvy is to leave Paris at the end of the Summer on his new journey of exploration in Central Asia.

Dr. Hermann Muller's long-promised work on Alpine flowers is being printed, and will be published towards the end of the year.

The Museum at Toerzol, in Central Asia, has been enriched by several hundred specimens of birds obtained during a recent zoological survey of Küldja.

The Russian Government has granted a subsidy of 4,500 marks to Professor E. P. Aspelin, to enable him to undertake archæological investigations in Esthonia and Lithuania.

The Commission for the construction of the trans-Saharan Railway has determined that this great work shall be preceded by the establishment of a telegraphic line connecting Algiers with St. Louis in Senegal via Timbuctoo.

A Society for prosecuting the systematic excavation of ancient sites in Egypt is in process of formation. Several Egyptologists have promised their support. Miss Edwards is contemplating a lecture tour in the United States, with the object of assisting the fund.

Two Biological Expeditions are to be dispatched this Summer to the northern provinces of Russia. One will explore Lapland, the other the Mourman coast of the White Sea. To the former the St. Petersburg Society of Naturalists has allotted 1,000 roubles, and a similar sum to the latter.

The Collections in Natural History and ethnography brought home from the coasts of Siberia and Eastern Asia by the Vega are to be exhibited in the old hall of the Royal Library at the Palace, Stockholm. Baron Nordenskjöld invites naturalists and geographers to visit the collection.

Dr. M. C. Cooke, having been placed by the India Office at the disposal of the authorities of the Royal Gardens, Kew, has now entered upon his duties as cryptogamist attached to the Herbarium, and will for the present take charge of the collections of non-vascular cryptogams.

M. Ferry, French Minister of Public Instruction, presided at the first meeting of a commission established for the improvement of popular publications. It has been resolved that a sub-commission shall decide what works shall be rewarded and what subjects proposed by way of competition.

The Number of lions in Algeria is fast diminishing, and it is expected that the animals will soon be extirpated from the colony. As there is an increasing demand for public exhibitions at fairs and zoological gardens, an establishment has been formed at Bona, by a private individual, for lion-breeding.

Natural Caverns of enormous size—one being 600 feet long—has been discovered within the last few days in the neighborhood of West Harptree, near Wells, in Somerset, England. The investigations are still being carried on, and the discoveries have excited some interest among antiquaries and archæologists.

M. Tresca, whose name has been connected with the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers for about twenty-five years, no longer belongs to that establishment. His office has been suppressed by a recent decision of M. Tirard, the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. This unexpected resolution has created some sensation in the Paris scientific world.

Mr. L. Fletcher, M. A., Fellow of University College, Oxford, has been appointed to succeed Professor Story Maskelyne as Keeper of the Mineral Department of the British Museum. Mr. Fletcher was appointed first assistant in the department a little over three years ago, and the energy and ability with which he discharged the duties of that appointment promise well for the future of the Mineral Department.

Two Important Accessions have recently been received by the Herbarium of the Royal Gardens, Kew. The corporation of Carlisle has transferred to it the herbarium of Dr. Goodenough, who was formerly Bishop of the Diocese, and who died in 1827. This is rich in specimens of plants cultivated at Kew and Chelsea in the end of the last century, but which have hitherto been very imperfectly represented in the Kew Herbarium. The very extensive collections of mosses accumulated by the late Professor Schimper, of Strasburg, and upon which his well-known works upon this group of plants were based, has been purchased from Professor Schimper's family by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts, and also presented to Kew.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

M. ROEDERER, the head of the great champagne house, died at Rheims, France, July 28th.

GENERAL G. G. DIBRELL, Democrat, has been renominated for Congress in the Third Tennessee District.

GENERAL GRANT has been elected President of the San Pedro and Canon Del Agua Mining Company, the property of which is located in New Mexico.

SAMUEL MARLIN, a well-known resident of Kennett Square, Pa., recently deceased, has left by will $35,000 to various educational establishments in the State.

MRS. HAYES is soon going to Fremont to put her remodeled house in order for future residence. Her son, Webb Hayes, will, it is said, become a merchant in Toledo next Spring.

DR. MARION SIMS, Dr. Edward L. Keyes and Dr. Fordyce Barker are receiving, during their Summer vacation abroad, deserved attention in Paris from French surgeons and physicians.

PROFESSOR HENRY W. PAUL, a Dartmouth graduate, has gone to Tokio, Japan, to teach astronomy. He will receive $4,000 a year and house-rent free. His engagement is for three years.

QUEEN OLGA of Greece has a kitchen so admirable in all its appointments as to be the wonder of that classic land. It may be said that she has made cooking a fashionable accomplishment in Greece.

COLONEL J. L. YOUNG, of Union, S. C., has been appointed Deputy United States Commissioner to gather and arrange the products of that State for the great national exhibition in New York in 1883.

JUSTICE MILLER, of the United States Supreme Court, rests himself by reading novels. He is a great diner-out. He was thirty years old before he began to study law. Previously he was a physician.

GENERAL HANCOCK, in addition to his present duties, has been assigned to the command of the Department of the South, during the temporary absence of Brigadier-General C. C. Augur, United States Army, on detached service in Washington.

MR. WHITTENBAKER has been librarian of the University of Virginia fifty-four years. His commission was signed by Thomas Jefferson himself, January 30th, 1826, only a few months before his death and a year after the University was opened.

JOSEPH STRONG CURTIS, son of George Ticknor Curtis, of New York, who is a distinguished mineralogist and mining expert on the Pacific Coast, has been appointed Special Census Expert in connection with the Geological Survey of Nevada and California.

MRS. HARRIET GIRARD CLARK, the widow of the late Dr. John Tartley Clark and last surviving niece of Stephen Girard, the founder of Girard College, died in Philadelphia July 26th. Her first husband was Baron Henry D'Allemand, a General of artillery under the first Napoleon.

MR. RUSKIN has consented to run against Mr. Bright as a Conservative candidate for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University. Mr. E. A. Freeman has been nominated by the Liberal students of St Andrew's University as their candidate for the Rectorship now held by Lord Selborne.

ON her return to England at the end of this month, the Empress Eugénie will only stay for a few days at Chiselhurst, as she intends to spend the Autumn at Arenenberg, her beautiful place on Lake Constance. Before going to Switzerland, the Empress will pay a visit to Queen Victoria at Osborne.

A PORTRAIT of ex-Governor A. H. Reeder, the first Territorial Governor of Kansas, is to be placed in the executive office at Topeka. The painting represents Governor Reeder in the guise of a deck-passenger escaping from Kansas City on the steamer A. B. Chambers, in 1856, when the armed invaders of the State sought to take his life on account of his devotion to freedom.

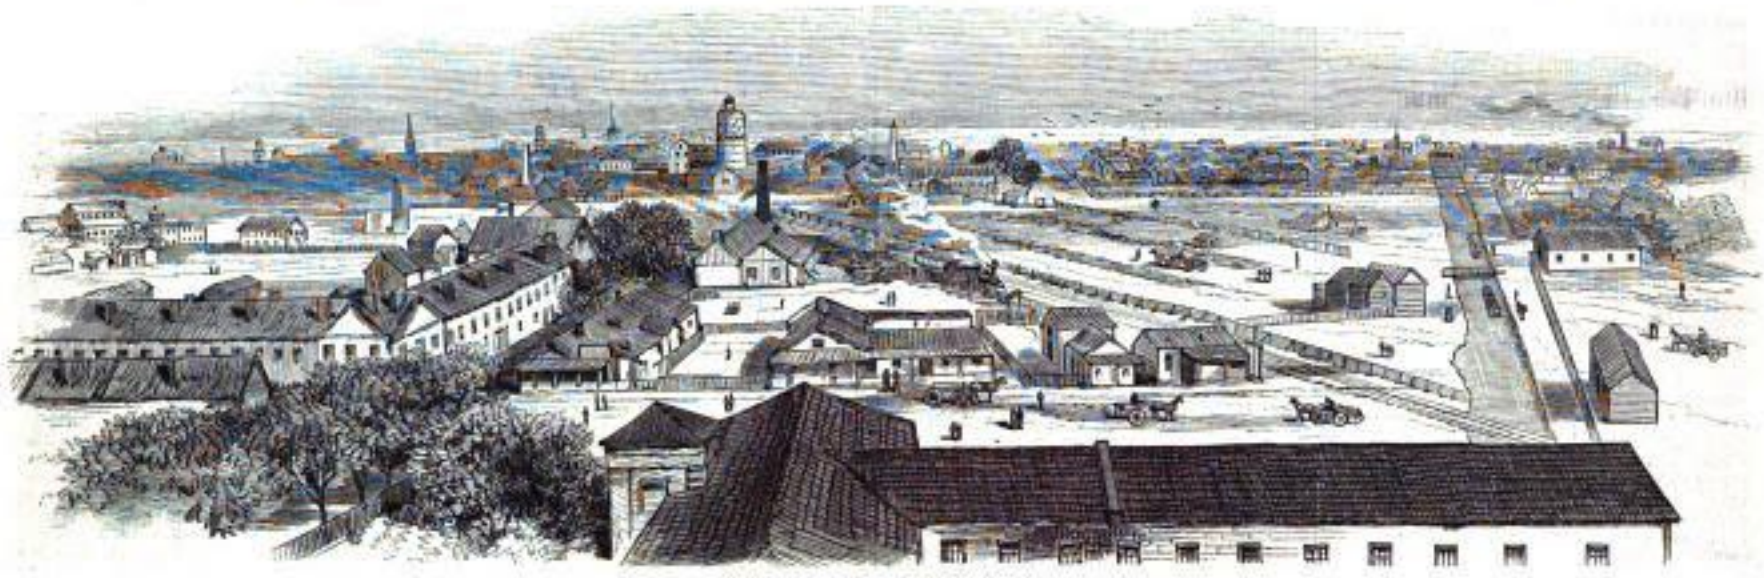
THE Orphans' Court of Philadelphia has finally settled up the estate of Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution, just seventy-four years after his death. The principal asset consisted of shares owned by the decedent in the North American Land Company, which by his will were left to his wife and her issue. The final settlement of the estate divides $19,385 between the Hepburn estate and Robert Morris, as next of kin.

MR. CARL PETERSON, whose name is connected with some of the most renowned Arctic explorations, died at Copenhagen on June 24th. Mr. Peterson was a born Dane, but had lived many years in Greenland, and had there acquired a perfect knowledge of the Esquimaux language, being at the same time a most skilled hunter and fisherman. At the age of thirty-seven he was engaged by Captain Penny as interpreter, and accompanied his expedition in the years 1850-'51. Some years later he followed Dr. Kane on his unfortunate expedition, when the vessel had to be left in the ice and the crew were nearly starved and frozen to death.

CONSTANTINE HERING, M. D., the founder of homeopathic practice in this country, and a physician of great eminence both here and in Europe, died suddenly in Philadelphia, July 23d. This famous physician was born in Oschatz, Saxony, January 1st, 1800. He was a student and an explorer of the realms of nature from his boyhood. From 1811 to 1817 he attended the classical school at Zittau, where he made some fine collections. Thence he went to Dresden and Leipsic to study medicine and surgery, and, picking up some of Hahnemann's books, was profoundly impressed with the maxim, "Similia similibus curantur." At his graduation his thesis was on "The Medicine of the Future," and on the 23d of March, 1826, he received his degree of M. D. from the University of Wurzburg. He came to this country in 1833. It is said that Dr. Hering, when a young man, was betrothed to a daughter of the poet Richter, but the engagement was broken off.

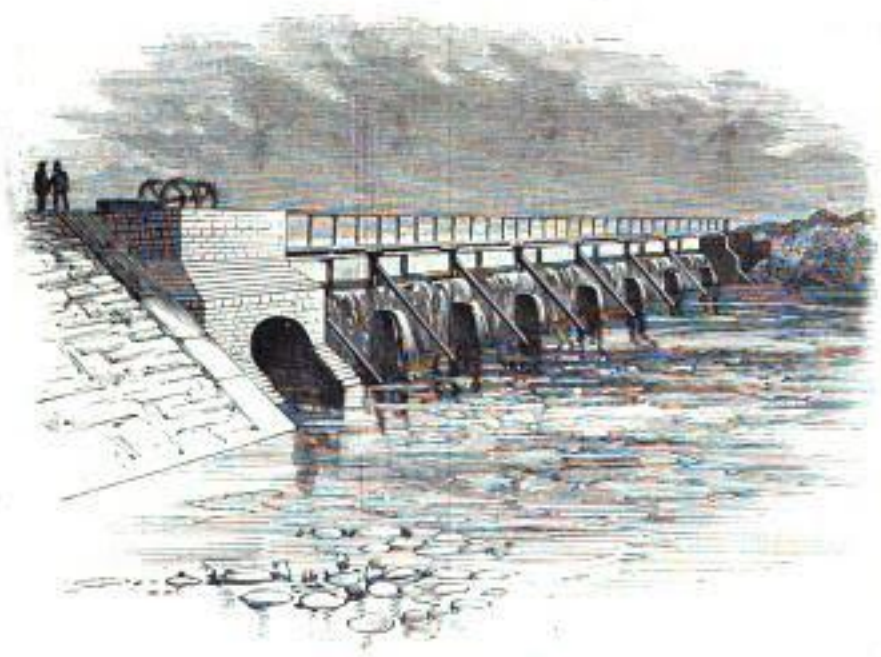
PRINCESS ZORKA, who, it is stated, is to be married to Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, is the favorite child of the ruler of Montenegro. Krasjavy, the Croatian artist, describes her as a "charming, well-trained, sweet child, slender and agile as a roe, and with deep, soulful eyes." She was the only Montenegrin maiden whom the artist was permitted to paint. "When I showed her the finished portrait," he says, "she was so pleased that she asked, in the naivest manner possible, 'And am I, then, so beautiful?' To which I could only answer with the excuse that my work did not do justice to the original." She is not the first fiancée that rumor has given to Prince Alexander. It was said quite lately that he was to marry Miss Vesnpoff, the daughter and co-heiress, with her younger sister, of a Russian prince, who is popularly credited with being the Czar's wealthiest subject. The Muscovite millionaire's income is chiefly derived from house property in the Russian capital, and not very long ago he was prosecuted by the police authorities of St. Petersburg for allowing his tenements to fall into decay and to lack the commonest sanitary appliances prescribed by law, so that an epidemic broke out among his tenants. It appears, however, that his daughter was an amiable and clever young lady, who would have brought the ruler of Bulgaria a dowry of $10,000,000. The Emperor of Russia was believed to have arranged this match, but for some reason it was never brought to pass.

Digitized by Google

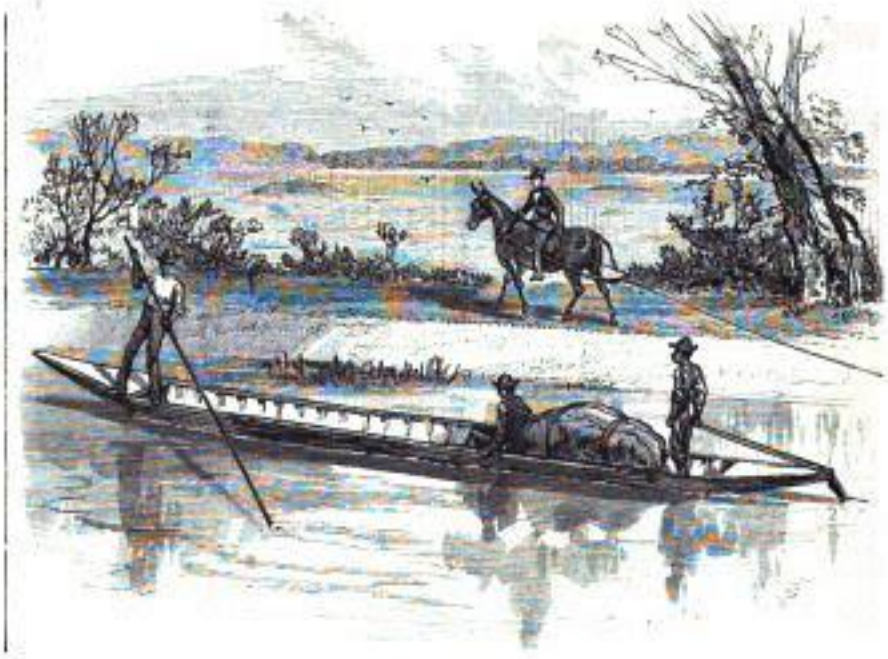


THE COURT HOUSE.

WHEELHOUSE OF THE CANAL.



THE MASONIC TEMPLE.



VIEW OF THE CITY OF AUGUSTA.

A VIEW OF THE CANAL.

WASTE GATES OF THE CANAL.

A SCENE ON THE CANAL.

GEORGIA.—THE SOUTH IN 1880—THE CITY AND CANAL OF AUGUSTA.—FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 398.

Digitized by Google

SIGNOR ARRIGO BOITO, COMPOSER.

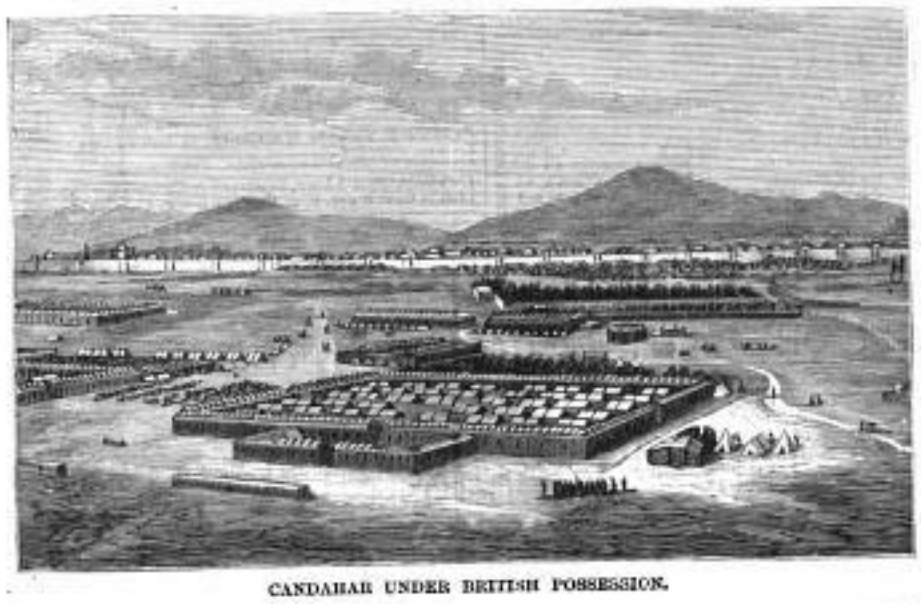
SIGNOR ARRIGO BOITO.

SIGNOR ARRIGO BOITO was born in Padua in 1842. His father, a painter, was a Venetian, and his mother was a Polish lady of high birth and cultivation. He entered the Conservatoire at Milan in 1853, and remained there for nine years, until September, 1862. While here his teacher was Alberto Mazzucato, and his comrade Signor Faccio, the eminent conductor of La Scala. The first work in which he came before the public was an allegory entitled "Le Sorelle d'Italia," for which he wrote the libretto, and which he produced in collaboration with Faccio. The two coadjutors were subsequently sent by the Government to Paris, Vienna and Berlin. His most important composition "Mefistofele," which has just been received with so much applause at Her Majesty's Opera in London, was first performed at La Scala on the 6th of July, 1868. "Mefistofele was written before M. Gounod's "Faust," and was intended to be called by the latter title; but the name had to be altered and much of the libretto modified to avoid the suspicion of plagiarism. As Faust was transformed into Mefistofele, the title-part necessarily had to be developed very materially in the process. The critics were very severe upon it. Innovators are seldom received with favor. Boito had for a while to reconcile himself to reputed failure, but by degrees Bologna and other towns in Italy reversed the verdict of Milan. Boito has written an opera, "Ero e Leandro," and is engaged on two works—poems and music—"Nerone" and "Oreste." He is the author of several libretti, which are written with the hand of a dramatist and a musician. As a composer he is one of the great individualities of the time.

THE IRISH LOURDES.

THE little village of Knock, near Claremorris, County Mayo, Ireland, has lately become famous as the scene of several miraculous visions, and thousands of pilgrims are now flocking to it, some for devotional purposes only, and others in the hope of being cured of various diseases which afflict them. The first of the apparitions was seen on the night of August 21st, 1879, by about twenty persons, who remained watching it nearly three hours. They agree in describing it as a kind of raised picture or group of living statuary, standing out, so to speak, from one of the walls of the chapel, the figures being those of the Blessed Virgin, St. Joseph and St. John, beside which there was the likeness of an altar and a lamb, with a crucifix in the background. On January 24 last, at noon, the parish priest, the Rev. Archdeacon Cavanagh, and some other persons, saw mysterious lights upon the gable and on the outside of a pillar, supporting a figure, which latter was, however, too indistinct for recognition, whilst on the outside were more pillars and some luminous scrolls. These supposed supernatural appearances have been repeated on several subsequent occasions, and are firmly believed in by thousands of the faithful, who travel from all parts of the United Kingdom to pray at the shrine. A great number of miraculous cures are also alleged to have been effected—lameness, blindness and deafness being cured by the eating or outward application of bits of the brickwork and cement from the wall, which has been so much picked and scraped away for this purpose that it has now been boarded over. More than 200 such cures are vouched for by those who have taken pains to investigate the cases. An inquiry into the alleged visions and cures has been made by a commission, consisting of learned priests and Church dignitaries, appointed by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, and they have reported officially that the testimony is trustworthy and satisfactory. The Church has, however, as yet made no declaration concerning them, and even among Roman Catholics there are some who still have doubts. Suffice it to say that the place is now a centre of intense religious excitement, and will probably be for some time to come an Irish Lourdes.

GENERAL PIEROLA, DICTATOR OF PERU.



IRELAND.—GABLE END OF THE CHAPEL AT KNOCK, AGAINST WHICH THE APPARITIONS ARE ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN SEEN.

HON. HORACE RUSSELL, NEW JUDGE OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF NEW YORK.—SEE PAGE 403.

GENERAL PIEROLA AND THE SOUTH AMERICAN WAR.

THE latest intelligence concerning the war between Chili, Peru and Bolivia is certainly of an exciting nature. The Chilian Admiral Riveros, it is said, has announced his intention to bombard Lima, and has notified the diplomatic body in that capital to that effect. The notification also conveyed to the Foreign Ministers the intimation that the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's steamers would be

CANDAHAR UNDER BRITISH POSSESSION.

THE BRITISH DISASTER IN AFGHANISTAN.—CANDAHAR AT THE TIME OF THE OCCUPATION. SEE PAGE 403.

STATUE OF HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, THE WRITER OF CHILDREN'S STORIES, ERECTED AT COPENHAGEN, DENMARK.—SEE PAGE 403.

Digitized by Google

permitted to enter Callao Harbor up to the 8th inst., and receive all foreign families, or women and children, who desired to fly from the doomed city. From certain portions of the adjacent coast, no doubt, Lima can be reached by the artillery of the Chilian fleet, the distance in a straight line not being more than four to four and a half miles from the centre of the city to a depth of ten fathoms of water. Its destruction is, therefore, a mere question of time, even without the assistance of a land force. The number of long-range guns which the Chilians have at command is small, however, and the work of seriously injuring the city at the distance stated will be exceedingly tedious. The Chilian admiral has already threatened that Lima, when taken, will be given up to destruction and the ravages of the Chilian troops, as were Moliendo and Arica, because, as he says, the Chilian officers cannot restrain their men. The Peruvians are preparing to give their women, children and household valuables an asylum. Tarma, a beautiful little town, situated beyond the impenetrable ramparts of the Cordilleras, has been selected as the place, and great activity is shown in its preparation for the large increase of population which it will doubtless soon receive.

In view of the critical state of affairs existing in Lima, the Dictator, Pierola, has decreed that every man between sixteen and sixty years of age, excepting the clergy and the medical profession, and a few employés of the Government offices, must present himself in uniform, and to drill every day from 11 o'clock until 1. To enable men to do this, all places of business are to be closed from 10 A. M. until 2 P. M. Those who do not comply with this order will immediately be sent to join the active army. All foreigners are invited to form themselves into corps to maintain order and protect property. In the event of the city being left at any time without the usual guardians of the peace. No inhabitant of the province of Lima is allowed to go beyond its limits without a passport. As an example of the spirit which animates the people, the Archbishop of Lima has placed the treasure of the church at the disposal of the Government, to be used in the service of the country.

The Dismal Swamp.

A VIRGINIA paper tells some things which are not generally known about the Dismal Swamp. It is not a vast hole sunk low in the ground, into which the drainage of the surrounding country flows. On the contrary, it is above the level ground some fifteen or twenty feet, as was demonstrated by actual surveys. Instead of being a receptacle into which rivers and streams enter and flow, it is in reality an immense reservoir that, in its vast sponge-like bulk, gathers the waters that fall from the heavens and pours them into the five different rivers which flow onwards to the sea. Any one would imagine that the Dismal was a veritable charnel-house that spreads it miasmas throughout the country. On the contrary, it is the healthiest place on the American continent. The swamp is entirely of green timber. There is absolutely no decomposed wood; one sees trees lying around the forests and swamps. The two principal woods that grow in the place are the juniper and cypress, which never rot. They fall prone on the ground like other trees, but instead of the wood decomposing it turns into peat, and lies indissoluble by air or water for ages, perfectly sound. There is nothing in the swamp to create miasma; no rising of the tides and decomposition of rank vegetables; no marshes exposed to the burning rays of the sun. All is fresh and sweet, and the air is laden with as sweet odors as the fragrant woods in May, when the fragrance of the flowers mingles with the pungent scent of the pine and dogwood. In the ante-bellum days all planters were anxious to hire their slaves to shingle-makers in the swamp on account of its healthfulness. Mr. Reddick, a well known contractor, says he worked a gang of fifty hands for fifteen years in the Dismal, getting shingles, and in all that time there was not a single case of ague and fever. I have seen numerous affidavits of overseers and agents who have lived in the swamp their whole lifetime, and they never knew a death caused by miasma or a solitary instance of ague and fever. The air is pure and sweet, and the water, tinged to a faint wine hue by the juniper, is as potent a medical drink as is to be found at the famous watering-places of the Virginia mountain spas. It is often used by vessels going on a foreign cruise on account of its healthful properties, and also because it keeps fresh and clear for years. It is a strong and invigorating tonic, with a pleasant taste.

The United States and Europe.

THE United States number now nearly or quite 50,000,000 people. A hundred millions could be sustained, without increasing the area of a single farm or adding one to their number, by merely bringing our product up to the average standard of reasonably good agriculture; and then there might remain for export twice the quantity we now send abroad to feed the hungry in foreign lands. No longer divided by the curse of slavery, this nation is now united by bonds of mutual interest and of common speech, tied by the iron band of 85,000 miles of railway, and is yet only beginning to feel the vital power and grandeur of a truly national existence. What may be the future of this land few can yet conceive. Texas alone comprises as much as the German Empire, England and Wales combined. Texas has now about 2,000,000 people within her boundaries: the Empire of Germany, England and Wales, about 67,000,000. The good land in Texas is equal in area to the good land in Germany and Great Britain. Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa combined more than equal France in area and possess more fertile land. Only 25 years ago John Brown and his companions redeemed Kansas from slavery: Nebraska was then indicated on our maps as a part of "The Great American Desert," and Iowa had scarcely become a State. Their population may now be 2,500,000. France has 37,000,000. The great middle section of Eastern Tennessee, Northern Georgia, Western Carolina, and Southern Virginia has been hemmed in by the curse of slavery, and is yet almost a terra incognita, but it is replete with wealth in minerals, in timber, and in fertile valleys of almost unequaled climate for health and vigor. This section is almost equal to the Austrian Empire in its area, and more than equal in resources. It has a sparse population of only one or two millions. The Austrian Empire has over 37,000,000. The healthy upland country of Georgia, Alabama, and the Carolinas contains vast areas of fertile woodland, which can be bought by the hundred thousand acres at half a dollar an acre, on which sheep and cotton thrive equally well. These sections are being slowly occupied by white farmers, and wait for immigrants who can bring them to use. In a few short years, sheep, fed mainly upon the kernel of the cotton-seed and upon the grasses that follow the cotton, will send to market from the same fields, alternately occupied, as much wool as cotton. This warm section is more than equal to Italy in area; it has perhaps 2,000,000 people. Italy contains 27,000,000. The fertile lands of the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia, and along the Potomac in Maryland, more than equal Belgium. They may contain half a million of people. Belgium has more than 5,000,000. In the consideration of this problem of productive capacity, there are other factors of the greatest importance. What are the burdens to be born by our people compared to others? What is the mortgage on this land that we possess?

BOOK NOTICE.

GEORGE P. ROWELL & Co's. American Newspaper Directory is one of the most complete works of the kind ever produced. It is copious, without being inflated, communicative without being verbose. It gives the essence, and in homeopathic but effective quantities. It contains what purports to be an accurate list of all the newspapers and periodicals published in the United States, Territories and the Dominion of Canada, together with a description of the towns and cities in which they are published. Such a book is now an absolute requirement, and when we come to glance at the volume for 1880 before us, we feel that the herculean task has been performed exceptionally well.

FRANK LESLIE'S "SUNDAY MAGAZINE"

for September will contain the opening chapters of a new serial story, entitled "Hester Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade, a powerful and well-known writer, and the concluding chapters of the interesting serial, "Bo-bo, the Nailmaker's Daughter." An illustrated article on the "Benedictine Order" comes in apropos in view of the recent millennial celebration of the birth of the founder. "The Roman Breviary" is a valuable article, and "Peter Paul Rubens," "Florence the Beautiful" and "The Crusades," are interesting. "Timothy" is the subject of the Children of the Bible; "Balaam," the Old Testament portrait and sketch, and "The Pharaohs," are the Gentile rulers mentioned in the Scripture series. "Maid Marjory," the new juvenile serial, becomes more interesting as the story develops. The younger members of the family are well attended to, and the miscellaneous contributions are all valuable and interesting. The number is strong in poetry of a high order. In the editorial department some attention is given to the question, "Who was the Real Founder of Sunday Schools?"

FAIRBANKS SCALES IN RUSSIA.

EVERY ten years an agricultural exhibition is held at Riga, Russia, an important port on the Baltic. The exhibition which has just closed was the largest of its kind ever held in Russia. Fairbanks Scales were represented in large assortment, and carried off the highest prize, as they had done a few weeks before in the exhibit made before the Russian Imperial Technical Society at St. Petersburg.

FUN.

A YOUNG TURK.—Governess: "How dare you, Tommy? I shall tell your mamma!" Tommy: "Oh, I don't care what mamma says! She's too young!"

A CLEAN "CHEEK."—Examiner: "What is the meaning of the verb 'prepare'"? Small Boy: "Dunno, sir." Examiner: "What did you do before you came up for examination?" Small Boy: "Er—washed my face!"

SUNDAY-SCHOOL SCHOLAR (to the teacher): "Did you say that the hairs of my head were all numbered?" Teacher: "Yes, my dear." Sunday-School Scholar: "Well, then" (pulling out a hair and presenting it), "what's the number of that one?"

TEACHER: "What is a score? Pupil: "A baseball record." Teacher: "No, no; what I mean is, how much does a score signify numerically? What idea does it give you? That is to say, if I were to tell you that I had a score of horses, what would you think?" Pupil: "Please, marm, I should think you was stuffin'."

"WILLIAM, you have again come up unprepared!" "Yes, sir." "But from what cause?" "Laziness, sir." "Johnson, give William a good mark for uprightness." "Bates, you proceed." "I have not prepared, too, sir." "But why not?" "From laziness, sir." "Johnson, give Bates a bad mark for plagiarism!"

A MERCHANT in a provincial town in Scotland had a habit of saying, "It might hae been waur" to everything that was told him, however sad the story might be. A neighbor, thinking that he would knock the wind out of him, one morning said, "Man, I had an awful dream last night." "Ay, what did ye dream?" "I dreamed that I was in hell." "It might hae been waur." "How could it hae been waur?" "If it had been a reality."

THE SCOTCHMAN AND THE MINERALOGIST—"Ton man gave me his bag to carry by a short cut across the hills to his inn, while he took the other road. Eh! It was dreadfully heavy, and, when I got out of his sight, I determined to see what was in it, for I wondered at the unco weight of the thing; and, man, it's no use for you to guess what was in that bag, for you'd ne'er find out. It was stones." "And did you carry it?" "Carry it! Man, did you think I was as mad as himself? Nae! nae! I emptied them all out, but I filled the bag again from the pile near the house, and I gave him good measure for his money."

TWENTY YEARS A SUFFERER.

DR. R. V. PIERCE:

Dear Sir—Twenty years ago I was shipwrecked on the Atlantic Ocean, and the cold and exposure caused a large abscess to form on each leg, which kept continually discharging. After spending hundreds of dollars, with no benefit, I was persuaded to try your Golden Medical Discovery. And now, in less than three months after taking the first bottle, I am thankful to say I am completely cured, and for the first time in ten years can put my left heel to the ground. I am, sir, yours respectfully,

WILLIAM RYDER,
87 Jefferson Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE FOR DYSPEPSIA AND NERVOUSNESS.

THE late WINSLOW LEWIS, M. D., the distinguished physician of Boston, said: "Having in my own person experienced those ills for which the Acid Phosphate is prescribed, I, having found great relief and alleviation by its use, most cheerfully attest my appreciation of its excellence."

THE ST. NICHOLAS HOTEL, Broadway, New York, so long the leading Hotel of the great city, fully maintains its high standard of excellence, and in comfort and luxury has no superior in this country or in Europe. Its location for healthfulness and the convenience of travelers is the very best. On account of its thorough good order, safety, and superior rooms, it is especially adapted for families and ladies travelling without escort, who are treated with every respect and consideration. The proprietor, with his family, resides in the Hotel, giving to it his constant personal supervision; the result is that the ST. NICHOLAS is, in every respect, the Model Hotel.

TO BEAUTIFY and dress the hair and restore it to its natural color, and impart that beautiful gloss, etc., use MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Sold by Druggists.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE is the best and cheapest Hair Dressing in the world. It kills dandruff, allays irritation, and promotes a vigorous growth of the Hair.

INSURE in THE TRAVELERS and you needn't pass a subscription paper when disabled by accident.

PERSONS desiring to secure late and excellent photographs of General Hancock or Hon. W. H. English, can do so by calling upon Fredericks, No. 770 Broadway.

FISK & HATCH,
Bankers,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with Investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

AGENTS WANTED IMMEDIATELY TO SELL THE LIFE OF
Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock
By Rev. D. X. JUNKIN, D.D.,
AND
FRANK H. NORTON.
Illustrated with Portrait and Battle Scenes.
This is the only authentic edition authorized by General Hancock. Address the Publishers,
D. APPLETON & CO., 1, 3 & 5 Bond St., N. Y.

Bouquetiere.
The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for arranging the Bouquet in Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in tint or bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each. Five for $1; or per dozen, $2.
GEORGE B. COOPER (Sole Agent),
No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

TO THE PUBLIC.
BOKER'S BITTERS.
BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS
In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their fineness as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will hereafter be put up and sold not only in quart, but
ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,
for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. H. FUNKE, JR., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,029.

Starin's Glen Island.
NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.
THE ELEGANT STEAMERS
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,
Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time tables see daily papers.
Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.
A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of
HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,
The celebrated caterer.
MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.
EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.
SHELTER ISLAND.
Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves Pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single, $1.25; excursion, $2.25.
STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.
VIA GREENPOINT.
Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half hourly to 5.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A.M.; 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.
VIA BAY RIDGE.
Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M. Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.
The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.30 A.M. to 12.30 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.30 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.55 and 10.40 P.M.
GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

ANGOSTURA LIQUEUR
The Finest and Purest Sweet Cordial in existence. Prepared by DR. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS, the manufacturers of the world renowned
ANGOSTURA BITTERS
J. W. HANCOX, Sole Agent, 51 Broadway, New York.

CANDY
Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.
BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100 page pamphlet, 10c.

ROYAL
Havana Lottery.
GRAND
EXTRAORDINARY DRAWING
AT HAVANA, CUBA. Has always drawn
SEPTEMBER 4th.
Only 18,000 Tickets issued.
CAPITAL PRIZE, 300,000 Spanish Dollars.
524 Prizes, amounting to 1,350,000 Pesos.
Tickets have always been $15; halves, $7.50; quarters, $3.75; fifths, $3; tenths, $1.50; twentieths, $1.
LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 10th and Sept. 14th. Tickets have always been $2; half tickets, $1.
KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 16th and 31st. Tickets, $1.
COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY—Has always drawn Aug. 31st. Tickets have always been $2; halves, $1. Prizes cashed. Full information sent free. Address, J. DUFF & CO., Bankers, 42 Nassau St. (corner Liberty), New York.

52 Gold, Crystal, Lace, Perfumed & Chromo Cards name in Gold & Jet, 10c. CLINTON BROS., Clintonville, Ct.

TAPE-WORM
INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp,
H. EICKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!
Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
THE
August Number Now Ready.
CONTENTS:
"Oberammergau and its Attractions—The Passion Play in 1880." By N. Robinson. Twelve illustrations.
"Some Remarkable American Women—At the Bar, in the Pulpit, and on the Dramatic and Operatic Stages." By George J. Ragar. Seventeen illustrations and portraits.
"What the Japanese Eat." By Edward Greey. Twelve illustrations.
"An Anglo-French Watering-place—Granville." Six illustrations.
"The Massacre at Chicago." Illustrated.
"Colbert—Minister and Favorite of Louis XIV." Illustrated.
"Cameo-cutting." Illustrated.
"Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn." Illustrated.
"A Soap Bubble." By John A. Bower. Nine illustrations.
Short and Serial Stories.—"Not Guilty," by Etta W. Pierce (Chaps. XXIII.–XXV.); illustrated. "In the Wrong Box"; illustrated. "How May Flint Became the Richest Girl in Chester," by Richard B. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger." "Fergus Blake's Wife," by John Moran; illustrated. "Was it Better?" by S. Annie Frost; illustrated. "The Dead Hand," by Walter Edgar McClean; illustrated. "The Revenge of Gerald Geraghty"; illustrated. "Flick et Flack"; illustrated. "The Sin of Blood"; illustrated—etc.
Sketches.—"A Wild Beast Shop"; illustrated. "An Adventure in a Forest," by James Payn. "A Robber Saved"; illustrated. "A Scratched Camel"; illustrated. "The Boy who did not Know what Fear was"; illustrated. "Letters Oddly Lost and Found—Some Cases which should Teach Caution in making Charges of Theft"; etc., etc.
Poems.—"That Dream of Ours." "A Dilettante." "Summer Pastime"; illustrated. "Captain Obi's Booty," a Ballad, by A. Mary F. Robinson; illustrated. "Flowers"; illustrated.
Miscellany.—"An Invalid's Experience," with many illustrations. "Clocks in China." "Who First Drew Down the Lightning?" "The History of Writing." "Violin Makers." "Dyak's Tears." "The Prairie Dog's Home, and its Unwelcome Visitors"; illustrated. "How Kings Traveled in the Fourteenth Century." "Goobers." "Recent Progress in Science," "Entertaining Column,' etc., etc.
128 QUARTO PAGES, over 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.
COLORED FRONTISPIECE:
"An Ancient Egyptian Lady's Toilet—Painting the Eyes with Kohl."
Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; and four months, $1. Sent postpaid.
Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Fifth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
THE STEWARTS in SIXTH, MUSIC AND MIRTH.
HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 41, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.

Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing disease, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth; price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.

The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."

An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.

The author refers, by permission, to Hon. F. A. BESSELL, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.

Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.

HEAL THYSELF

DAY'S Kidney PAD

A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW; apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.
DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

ESPECIAL NOTICE.

The Commonwealth Distribution Co.

Is authorized by charter from the Legislature of Kentucky for educational purposes, AND IS THE ONLY LOTTERY CO. EVER DECLARED LEGAL BY THE UNITED STATES COURT.

The United States Circuit Court on March 31 rendered the following decision:

1. THAT THE COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY IS LEGAL,
2. ITS DRAWINGS ARE FAIR,

The P. M. General at Washington, after careful investigation, has also declared the Company to be legal and its drawings fair, and entitled to the free use of the mails.

23d

Popular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY has always drawn in public at Macauley's Theatre, Louisville, Ky., on Tuesday, Aug. 31st.

1,900 prizes, $112,400, distributed; capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000; 10 of $1,000; 1,947 others, from $500 down to $10. Tickets, $2; halves, $1.

Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.

B. M. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky.; or same at 309 Broadway, New York; or W. PORTER, 1,127 Broadway, New York; or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S
Illustrated Newspaper
$1.50
FOR 22 WEEKS
OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN,
Beginning with No. 1,290.

Political subjects will be ably represented editorially, and fully illustrated, during this period.

Address,
FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53-55-57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

DR. BROWNING'S
TONIC AND ALTERATIVE

The Celebrated Prescription of
W. CHAMPION BROWNING, M. D.

FOR GENERAL DEBILITY AND PURIFYING THE BLOOD.

Perfectly purifies the Blood, enriches the Blood, reddens the Blood, makes new Blood, wonderfully improves the Appetite, and changes the Constitution suffering from General Debility into one of vigorous health.

The best proof of its wonderful efficacy is to be obtained by a trial, and that simple trial strongly establishes its reputation with all.

☞ It is most scientifically and elegantly compounded by its author and sole proprietor, W. CHAMPION BROWNING, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia,
A regular graduate of Jefferson Medical College, of Philadelphia, a thorough Chemist and skilful Pharmacist.

Price, 50c. and $1.00. For sale by the Proprietor and all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine.

$250,000
FRANKFORT SCHOOL FUND
OF KENTUCKY.

Only 50,000 Tickets and $250,000 in Prizes.

$50,000 FOR $10.
$10,000 FOR $2.

SEPT. 4.

5,000 PRIZES

LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Capital Prize		$50,000
1 Grand Prize		25,000
1 Grand Prize		15,000
1 Grand Prize		10,000
1 Grand Prize		5,000
10 Prizes, $1,000 each		10,000
30 Prizes,	500 each	15,000
40 Prizes,	400 each	16,000
50 Prizes,	300 each	15,000
75 Prizes,	200 each	15,000
200 Prizes,	100 each	20,000
4,500 Prizes,	10 each	45,000
5,000 Prizes, amounting to		$250,000

☞ Our idea of a square lottery is to have represented in the drawing only the said tickets, and to exclude therefrom every one that is not paid for before the drawing takes place.

Single Tickets, each	$10 00
Coupons, each	2 00
11 Whole Tickets	100 00
56 Whole Tickets	500 00
113 Whole Tickets	1,000 00
570 Whole Tickets	5,000 00
1,150 Whole Tickets	10,000 00

A. W. HARRIS & CO.,
240 Broadway, New York, or
R. G. WINTERSMITH, Supervisor,
Office, No. 3 Monart Building, Louisville, Ky.

Webster's Unabridged sells for $9.00.

SPECIAL OFFER!

Containing over 80,000 words, 700 Double column pages, and Illustrated with 110 Engravings.

ORTHOGRAPHY, PRONUNCIATION and DEFINITIONS according to the best English and American Lexicographers. Containing American geographical names, their derivations and pronunciations, Popular names of American States and Cities, Abbreviations in writing and printing, Foreign words and phrases. Special Inducements. In order to introduce this work, if you will return this advertisement with the names and addresses of 3 of your friends or acquaintances in different towns or cities, and 43 cts. to pay mailing, packing and other expenses, we will send you, by mail, post paid, the Diamond Dictionary. Two copies will be sent to one address for 80 cts. post paid. Send currency or postage stamps. This offer is good for 10 days only. We have put the price so low that it barely covers packing, postage and other expenses, in order to introduce them, as such a chance to secure a Bargain, will probably never occur again. A work superbly Bound in Cloth & Gilt.

FOR 43 CTS.

☞ I have received the Dictionary, and am well pleased with it. I think it the neatest publication of the kind I have ever seen, and well worth the money.—Prof. W. Foster, Secretary Yale Business College, New Haven, Conn. Address:
P. W. WILLIAMS, 194 Clark St., Chicago.

ELGIN WATCHES,
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $6 to $15. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. NEW ENGLAND MEDICAL INSTITUTE, 24 TREMONT ROW, BOSTON, MASS.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE
THE FAMILY WASH BLUE.
For Sale by Grocers.
D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop.
253 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 5c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

25 Hancock & English or Garfield & Arthur Cards, name printed, 10c. Samples free. Hill & Co., Lebanon, N.H.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 30c. Coes. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

H. W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. (L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

WITH $5 You can buy a whole
IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN
100 Florins Government Bond,
ISSUED IN 1864,

Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

FOUR TIMES ANNUALLY,

Until each and every bond is drawn with a larger or smaller premium. Every bond MUST draw a Prize, as there are NO BLANKS.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO
200,000 FLORINS,
20,000 FLORINS,
15,000 FLORINS,

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 200 Florins.

The next drawing takes place on the
1st of SEPTEMBER, 1880
And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of September is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that date.

Out-of-town orders sent in REGISTERED LETTERS, and containing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address
INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
150 Broadway, N. Y. City.
ESTABLISHED SINCE 1874.

☞ The above GOVERNMENT Bonds are not to be compared with any Lottery whatsoever, and do not conflict with any of the laws of the United States.

N. B.—In writing, please state that you saw this in the English FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF
By sending 35c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c. 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Fancy Cards, 10c., or 20 Gold and Silver Chromos, 10c. Stamps taken. J. B. HUSTED, Nassau, N. Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 335 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3096.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts. postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

Agents Wanted.

AGENTS WANTED for "The Life and Times of GEN. W. S. HANCOCK," by T. R. WILLIAMS, Editorial staff New York World, with facts and figures since the days of Washington. A Cyclopedia for voters. A book worth having. Over 500 pages, 60 illustrations, $2. The outfit for the business, 50 cents. Apply at once.
E. B. TREAT, Publisher,
757 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Campaign Goods

We are headquarters for Campaign Goods, such as Suits, Capes, Caps, Belts, Shirts, Torches, Pipes, Photographs, Banners, Badges, &c.

Agents Wanted! Clubs Supplied. Complete sample sent by express $1.50, sample Badge (by mail, two for 25c., one dozen by mail $1.00. Either ready-made. Portraits 12x18, 10 cents each; 4 for 25 cents.
E. G. RIDEOUT & CO.,
10 Barclay St., N. Y.

$950 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—To best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 189—205 East Fifty-ninth Street, Icehouse and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL
We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

20 Lovely Rosebud Chromo Cards, or 20 all Floral Motto with name, 10c. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's
Boys' & Girls' Weekly

Is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:

"Jim Jeffs: Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NYM RUGBY.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH-LOSE.
"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROBIN.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BRACKENRIDGE HEMYNG (Jack Harkaway).
"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."
"Cicero the Second; Or, Talked into Bad Luck." By JACK MANLY.

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Frank Leslie's
BUDGET,
A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,
Spicy and Entertaining.

Each Number contains 98 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

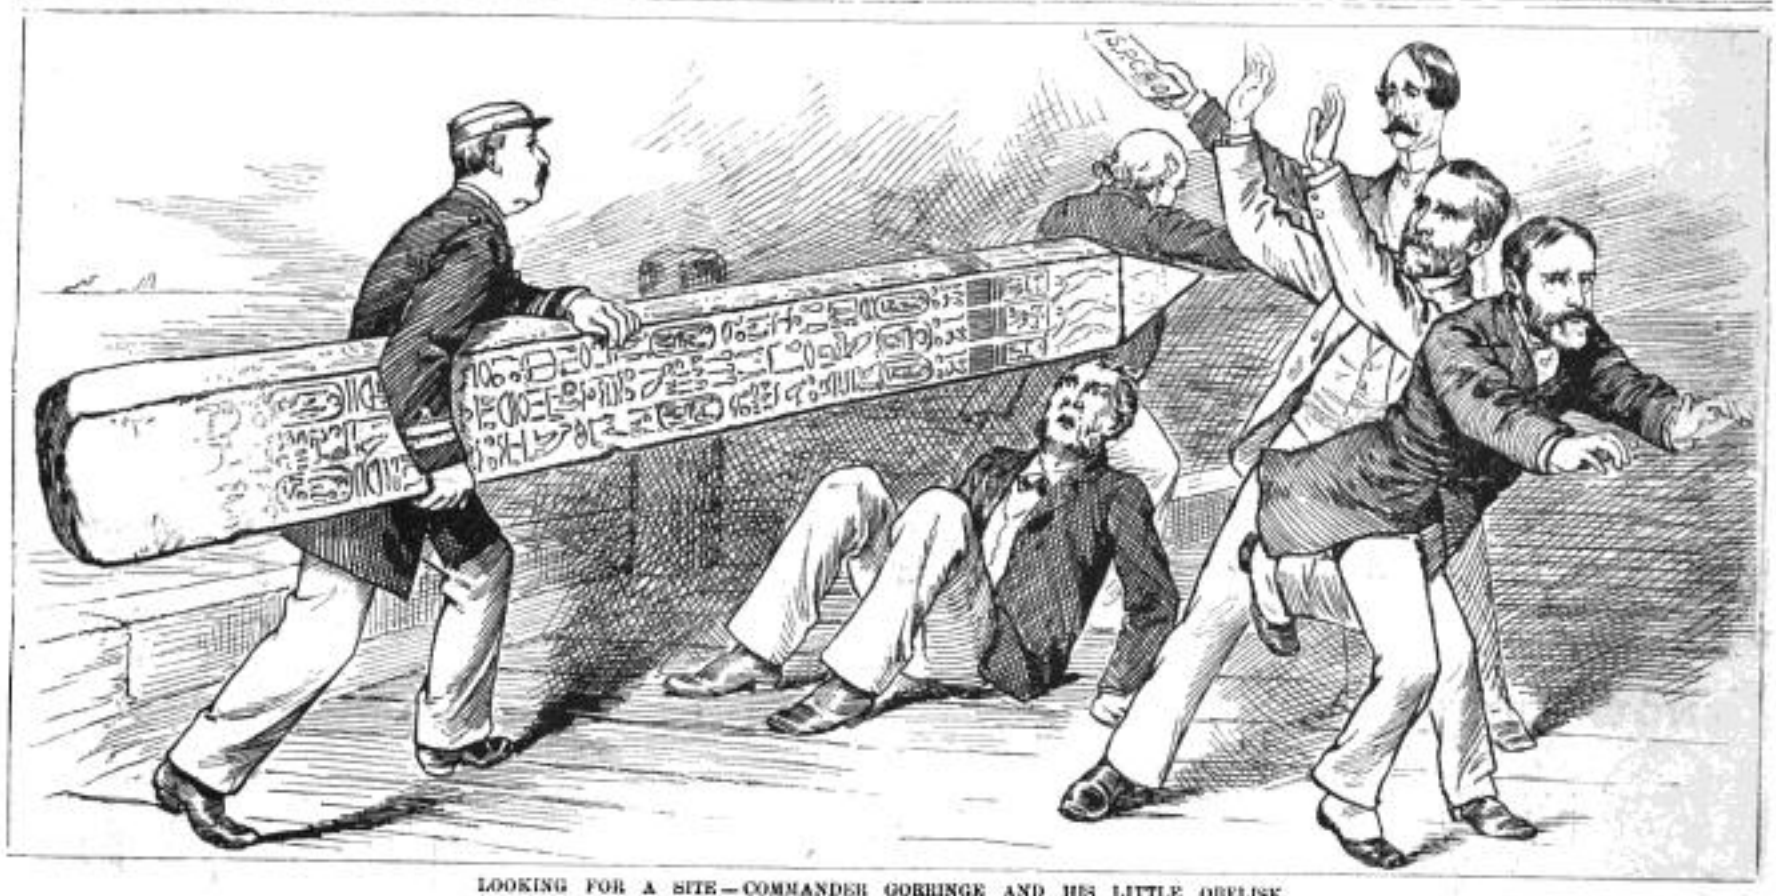
FOR SALE,
"INTERLAKEN,"
THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.



Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

LOOKING FOR A SITE—COMMANDER GORRINGE AND HIS LITTLE OBELISK.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!
MANUFACTURED BY
WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.
☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.
THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.
Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.
See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.
C. H. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

KIDNEY-WORT
Cures LIVER COMPLAINTS, KIDNEY DISEASES, Constipation and Piles.
Because it acts on the Liver, the Bowels and the Kidneys at the same time.
Because it cleanses the whole system of the poisonous humors that otherwise develope in Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Kidney and Urinary diseases, or Rheumatism, and which in women, disorder every function and bring on weakness and disease. If you want to be well use KIDNEY-WORT.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.
Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,
MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.
620 BROADWAY,
AND
130 to 134 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement
SENT BY MAIL.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.
Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS,
Furnished free.
GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 452, N. Y.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,
Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.
SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.
KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS
For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.
NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's large routes at all seasons of the year.
CITY OF CHESTER.....Saturday, August 7, 3 P.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS.....Thursday, August 12, 8.30 A.M.
CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, August 21, 6 A.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL.....Thursday, August 26, 9.30 A.M.
From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.
Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.
Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.
These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.
JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 33 and 35 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to
Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.]
Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.
"Gents.—I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.
"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cures have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 Goodwin St., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878.
"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,500,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"Rocks Lane Camp-Meeting Grounds, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.
"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years. REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Buxton, England, Feb., 1878.
"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH,
LASTING FOR YEARS.

Mention this Paper. SENT POSTPAID on RECEIPT of $3, Or by Express, C. O. D.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

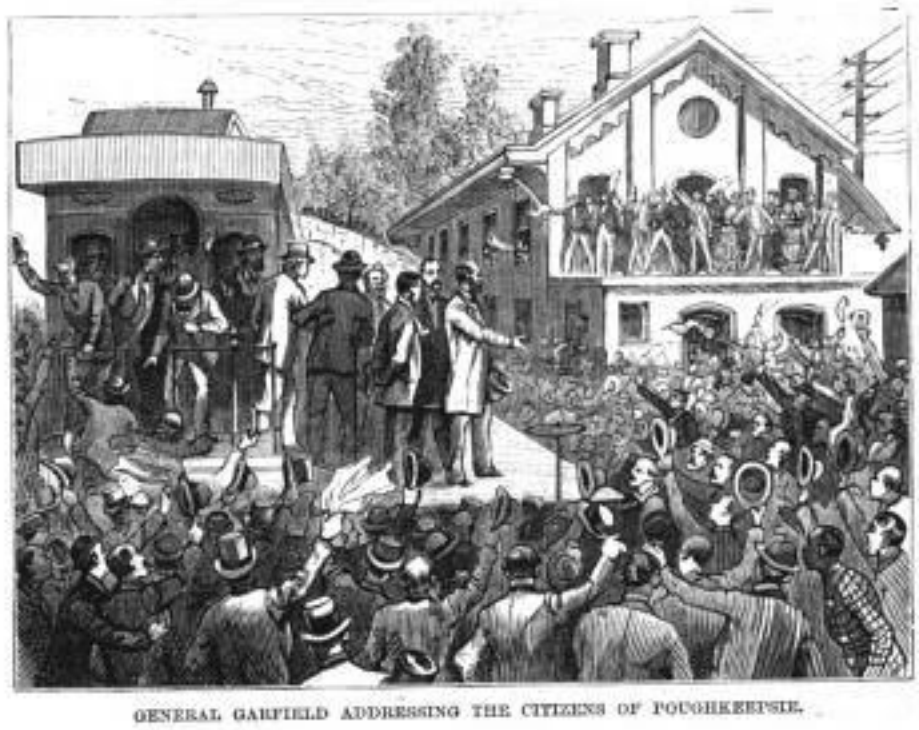
Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS for Cards, Labels, &c. (Self-Inker $4) Larger sizes for larger work, for old or young. Great money saved. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

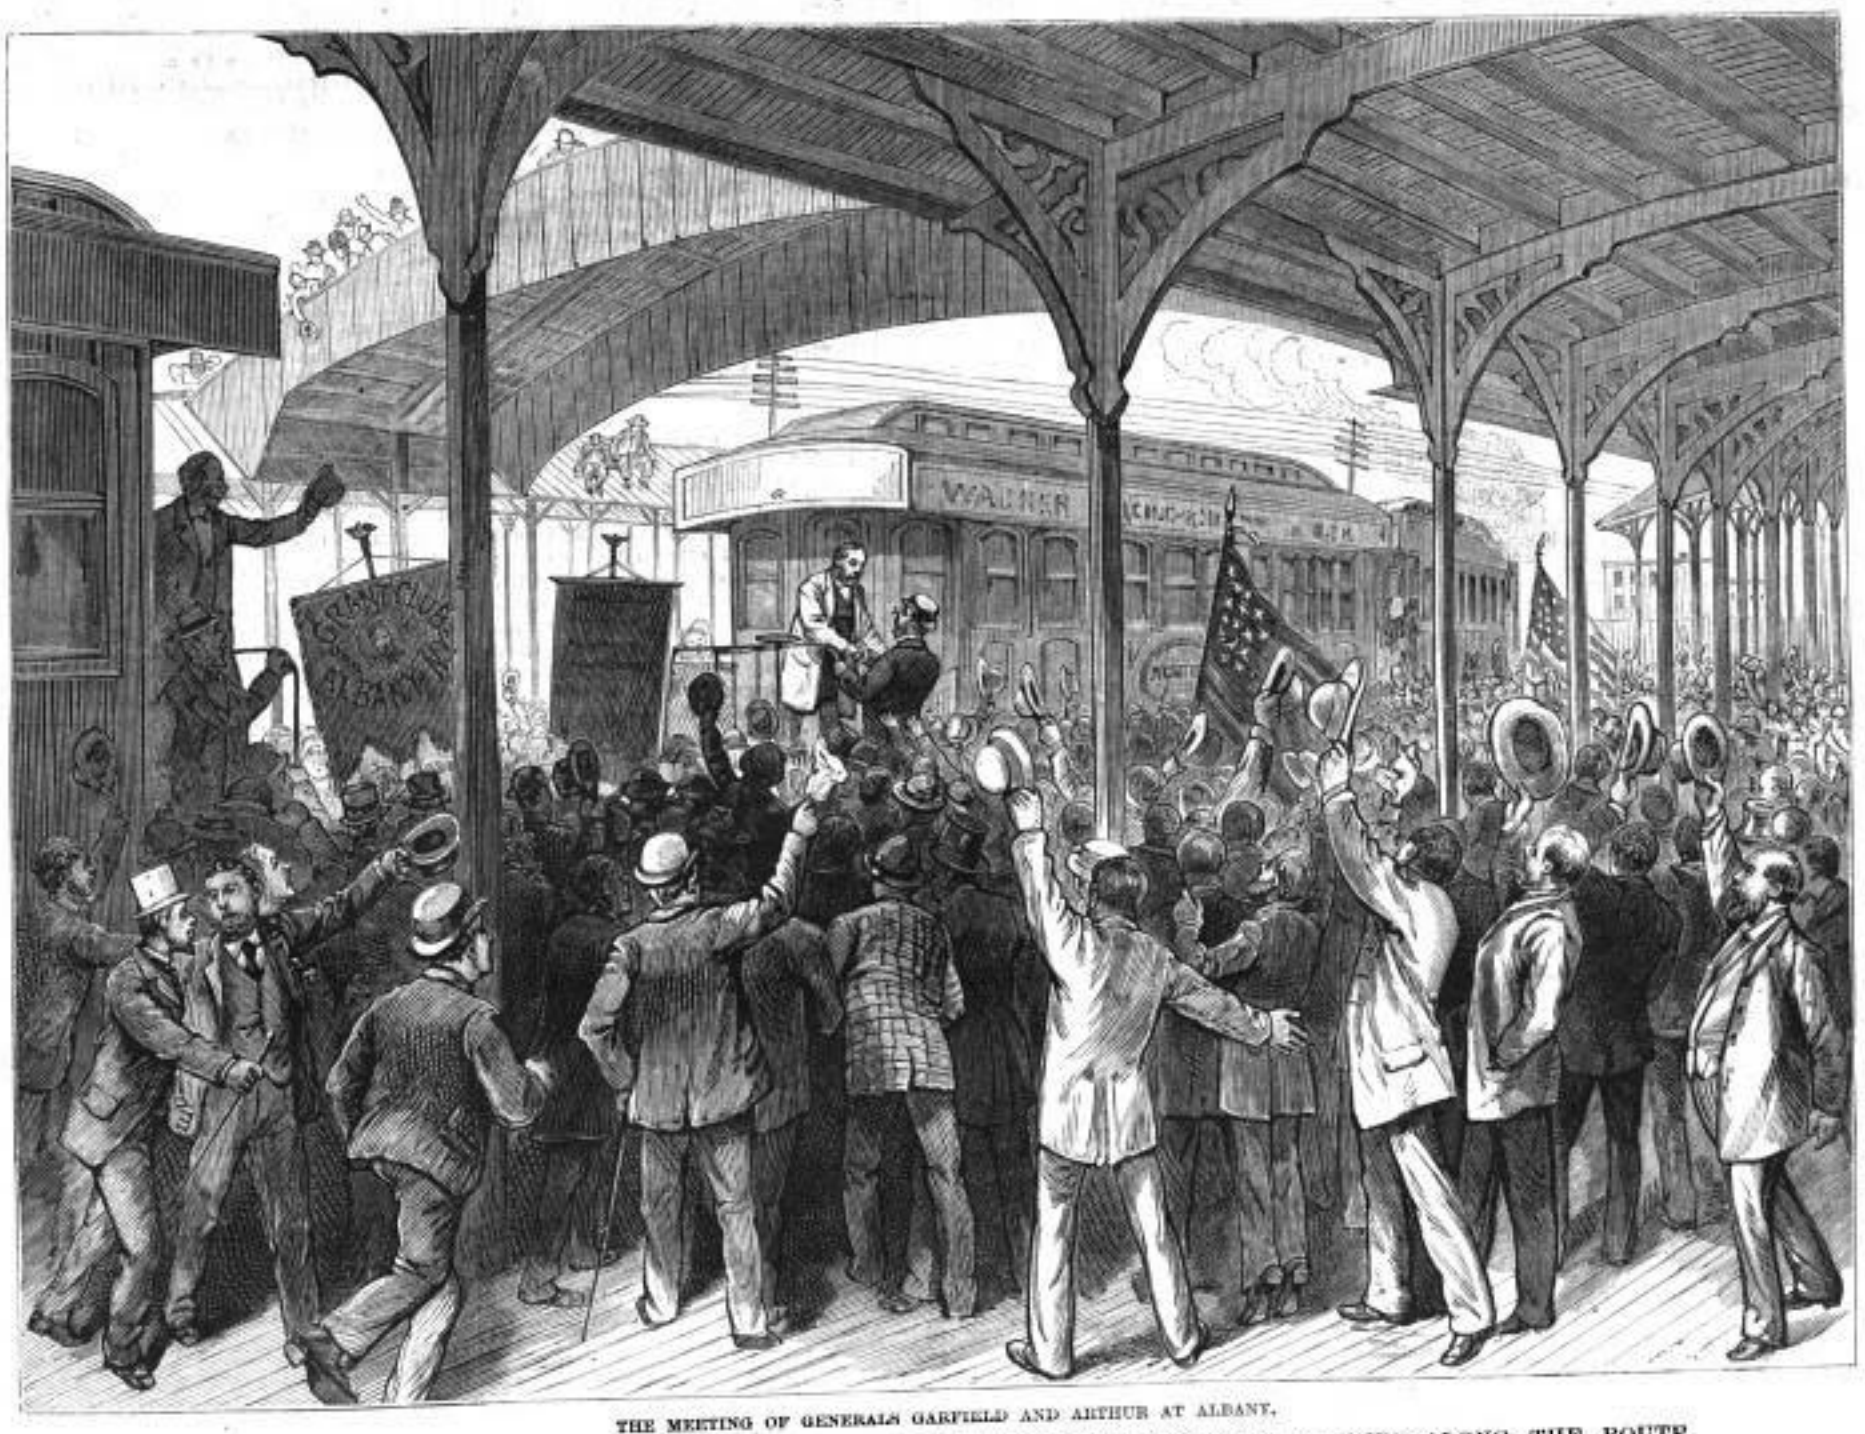
14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $66
Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

Digitized by Google



FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to act of Congress, in the year 1880, by J. W. England, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.



No. 1,299.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, AUGUST 21, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4 00 Yearly, 13 Weeks $1.00.

GENERAL GARFIELD AND FRIENDS IN THE DRAWING-ROOM CAR.

GENERAL GARFIELD ADDRESSING THE CITIZENS OF POUGHKEEPSIE.

THE MEETING OF GENERALS GARFIELD AND ARTHUR AT ALBANY.

VISIT OF THE REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENT TO NEW YORK CITY.—SCENES ALONG THE ROUTE.
From Sketches by W. Parker Boyfish.—See Page 415.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 21, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

GENERAL HANCOCK'S LETTER.

THE letter of General Hancock, accepting the Democratic nomination to the Presidency, is a neat and terse document, which reads so well, as far as it goes, that one can scarcely fail to wish that it had gone a little further. He places at the forefront of his paper the emphatic declaration that "the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, embodying the results of the war for the Union, are inviolable." He next proceeds to remark on the supremacy of the Constitution within the sphere of its rightful jurisdiction, and repeats the language of the Constitution to the effect that powers not delegated to the United States belong to the States respectively or to the people. The views of the General under this head are so just and true that they may be regarded as truisms.

From these observations on the structure of our Government, he proceeds to enforce the necessity of its faithful and efficient administration. The noblest constitution and the wisest laws, he holds, are useless when fraud, violence or incompetence hold sway. "It is only by a full vote, free ballot and fair count that the people can rule in fact, as required by the theory of our Government." And it is in the high standard of qualifications that should be fixed by the people in their choice of legislative and executive officers that the writer finds the best security for attaining a substantial and practical civil service reform in the subordinate departments of the Government. Here, too, the principles enunciated by General Hancock are suited to command universal approval. It is only in point of their precise application and of the practical methods by which his high aims and patriotic inspirations are to be reached that he leaves us without any information.

On the sectional issue, however, his voice has the clear ring of a clarion. The war for the Union having been successfully closed more than fifteen years ago, he holds that the time has fully come when "all classes of the people should share alike in the blessings of the Union." "The time has come," he adds, "to enjoy the substantial benefits of reconciliation." And in the restoration of civil harmony and in a generous rivalry among our own industries, he finds the presage of an impulse which shall "revive our languishing merchant marine, extend our commerce with foreign nations, assist our merchants, manufacturers and producers to develop our vast natural resources, and increase the prosperity and happiness of the people."

In the emphasis given to this part of his letter, and in the prominence given to the "war amendments" of the Constitution, we may, perhaps, find an explanation of General Hancock's reasons for omitting all reference to the "currency issue" and the "tariff issue," except as such latent reference may be vaguely implied in the general assent he formally gives to the principles enunciated by the Cincinnati Convention. We had hoped that, profiting by the failure of his Presidential competitor under each of these heads, he would breathe into both of these issues the breath of a new life; but instead of doing so, he leaves the tender foundlings where they were exposed on the Cincinnati Platform, liable to be claimed by hard-money nurses in New York and by soft-money nurses in Ohio; by high-tariff nurses in Pennsylvania, and revenue tariff nurses in South Carolina. This may be good military strategy, for the purpose of turning a position which it is dangerous to attack, but is it statesmanship in affairs of high civil administration?

It certainly is not statesmanship, if we have to-day reached that era of good feeling in which the passions engendered by the war are to be postponed to the discussion of business interests and administrative concerns. But if General Hancock is right in the assumption which lies at the basis of his letter, and which gives it form and color—if sentiments of animosity are still cherished against the whites of the South by the leaders of the Republican Party; if all classes of our people are not allowed to share alike in the blessings of the Union; if the time has come to enjoy the benefits of reconciliation, but those benefits are still withheld by reason of the hatreds and prejudices engendered in the late civil war—then it may be the part of statesmanship to postpone economical questions to the attainment of a solid and permanent pacification between the lately belligerent sections of the country.

In support of this sentiment, General Hancock may plead the opinion and conduct of President Hayes, who has stated, in a recent speech delivered at the last Yale College Commencement, that on succeeding to the Presidency in 1877 it then seemed to him that "the pacification of the country was the first duty," and that, desiring to give an earnest of this pacification "by some distinct, unmistakable and palpable fact," beyond and above "party platforms and letters of acceptance framed in high-sounding words and sentences," he determined to call into his Cabinet "some man of the South who had been against him in the long and bitter struggle of the war," and it was in pursuance of this purpose that General Key was made Postmaster-General. The step was taken, he adds, not at the suggestion of any great political leader in the Republican Party, but on the advice of a calm and contemplative patriot like ex-President Woolsey; and, while admitting that all had not followed and resulted as he could have wished, Mr. Hayes makes it clear that his judgment still approves the high and paramount aim he had then proposed to himself as the first necessity of a wise and comprehensive statesmanship.

But are we as far from the pacification of the country in the year 1880 as we were in the year 1876? The last Presidential campaign, we know, was mainly fought by the Republicans on the sectional line, and, conceiving that wager of battle as still offered by them on that line, General Hancock has determined to force the fighting at that point, where he knows himself to be strongest and believes the enemy to be weakest. It will be a great strategic blunder, in our opinion, as well as a great political anachronism, if the Republicans shall accept the order of battle prepared for them by some of their leaders in the present canvass. They are indebted to-day to the pacific policy of President Hayes for their best hopes of success in the pending Presidential struggle, and the sooner they accept the fruits of that policy and make it their own, the better it will be for their credit with the people. Indeed, until this is done, "the key of the situation," to use the language of President Hayes in his Yale College speech, is left in the hands of their adversary. If what is known in vulgar parlance as "the bloody shirt" is to be again the battle-flag of the Republican army—if frenzied appeals against the "Rebel South," if the historical atrocities of the Ku-Klux, if the political exploits of Mississippi, if panic cries about "Southern Claims," the "assumption of the Southern State debts," and the "payment for emancipated slaves," are to be again the stock in trade of the Republican managers—then, as we believe, they will play directly into the hands of the Democrats. But if, turning their backs on the smoke of a powder which has been thrice burned, they shall address themselves to the real and vital problems of public economy, of business and of administrative reform, they are likely to take their adversary at the points where he is weakest, and where, without being very strong themselves, they have at least the advantages of the position. It remains to be seen "what they will do with it."

GRAIN HARVESTS AND THE RAILROADS.

JUST now we are in the midst of unprecedentedly large harvests. The yield of wheat this year is expected to reach from 475,000,000 bushels to 490,000,000 bushels. Last year the crop of 449,000,000 bushels was the largest ever before known, and even the year before it was 420,000,000 bushels. The value of the crop of 1878 was officially estimated at $326,300,000; and the last yield easily exceeded $400,000,000. The corn crop has also steadily increased, and even the before-unprecedented yield of 1,600,000,000 bushels last year promises to be exceeded this year. The value of the crop of 1878—1,400,000,000 bushels—was estimated at $441,000,000, and at this rate last year's crop was worth considerably over $500,000,000. These two cereals alone are worth more to the country than all the gold and silver mines we have ever had, or probably ever will have; and yet, besides these we now raise large crops of oats, rye and barley. The income from one grain crop would make short work with the national debt as well as the debt of the different States and cities.

It is of interest to note the effect of the increased yield of cereals on those great grain-carriers known as the "Granger" roads. These are roads in Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Minnesota and other Western States, which, through the influence and power of the Granger societies, are now subject, to a greater or less extent, to the control of those States. There are a number of these roads—such as the Chicago and Northwestern; Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul; Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific; Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and Illinois Central—which depend for their freight earnings almost entirely on grain. The price of "Northwest" stock, as the Chicago and Northwestern is called on the Stock Exchange, is always very susceptible to the reports about the grain crop, because grain comprises the bulk of its freight. Of course, the legitimate effect of good or bad crop advices is greatly exaggerated by the manipulations of the contending "bulls" and "bears"; yet the steadily increasing harvests of the last few seasons, and the payment of dividends by roads that had not done so before for a number of years, have been reflected with substantial truthfulness in the rise of the "Granger" stocks. One of the largest grain roads is the Chicago and Northwestern. At this time in 1877 its common stock sold at 22 3-8 and the preferred at 51 5-8, whereas at this writing the common is at 98 and the preferred at 115 1-2. This great railroad is one of the most important institutions of the Northwest. It is 2,100 miles long, counting the roads it leases, owns 2,225,000 acres of valuable land, which is being steadily sold and improved, and has in a single year earned over $10,000,000 on freights, mostly wheat. The "St. Paul" is another great "wheat" road, 1,500 miles long. In a single year its freight earnings, mainly from wheat, have reached about $5,750,000. Hogs and grain have brought the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road no less than $11,000,000 in one year, and the earnings of the Rock Island, Illinois Central, Chicago and Alton, and their lateral roads, depend largely on the same fruitful source. The anecdote is recalled of old Commodore Vanderbilt, who, when he was upbraided by an acquaintance for maintaining such outrageously high passenger rates on the New York Central Road, replied to what was then a very just complaint, "Oh, I would rather carry pigs than men any day!"

All these roads are trunk lines to Chicago, the great distributing mart of the West, and thence the grain is forwarded to the seaboard by railroad, or else by way of the lakes and Erie Canal. The New York Central and the Erie roads bring about all that comes overland to New York, but an enormous quantity also comes through the Erie Canal.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad carries a large quantity of grain, especially corn, to Baltimore, and has hurt the trade of New York not a little through cheaper freight rates. The New York railroads charge thirty cents per hundred pounds for grain from Chicago to New York, whereas it can be sent to Baltimore for three cents a hundred pounds less, which is here a very important item. Why our railroads do not give New York the benefit of lower rates of freight is a conundrum; and there are able statisticians who maintain that if New York does not look more sharply after her interests, she will lose the bulk of her grain trade. Baltimore is contending valiantly for this great traffic, and there are projects to send the grain wanted for European markets down the Mississippi to New Orleans.

Our Erie Canal must not be left out of the calculations of those who would deprive New York of her grain trade, however; and if worse comes to worse, by making that free, we would neutralize in a large degree the effect of other adverse circumstances. Even now grain can be sent from Chicago to New York by way of the lakes and the canal for 12 cents per bushel; and, moreover, rates for ocean freight-room are apt to be cheaper here than at Baltimore, our main rival, and this tends to equalize the effect of more favorable railroad rates which that city enjoys.

Our exports of the coming harvest promise to be unusually large this year. In 1879 we exported 124,000,000 bushels, against only 73,000,000 bushels in 1878. Forty years ago we imported wheat from the Black Sea, while now we are gradually supplanting Russia, our only European rival, in the markets of both the United Kingdom and the Continent. We sent 86,000,000 bushels of corn abroad last year, and will send more this year. We have in this country 32,000,000 acres devoted to wheat, and 51,000,000 acres to corn, besides an acreage given up to other cereals, which makes, in round numbers, a total of 1,900,000,000 acres actually in use here for the culture of grain. And when we consider that this shows a marked increase within the last ten years, the predictions that this country will be the future granary of the world will appear by no means unreasonable.

THE VAGARIES OF LAW

OUR English, or, as a contemporary calls them, our "Old Country Cousins," must smile when they read that, a few days since, in that very State which threw all the tea overboard, a statute made in the days of Charles the First, who was beheaded in 1649, had power to override a Boston jury in a suit at law. It appears that a gentleman attended a funeral from Boston to Mount Auburn on a Sunday afternoon. He was accompanied by a lady, but instead of returning to Boston by the same road, he, unfortunately, was gallant enough to drive around by the way of Charlestown to enable his fair companion to call on a friend in that city. Going through Somerville, their wagon was overturned, owing to the defective condition of the road, and the leg of the gentleman was broken. He consequently sued the town for damages, and received a verdict in his favor. This verdict the Supreme Court of Massachusetts now sets aside, maintaining that the plaintiff was traveling in violation of an old colonial statute, passed in the reign of Charles the First, which declares "that whosoever travels on the Lord's Day, except from necessity or charity, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten pounds for every offense." They do not hold him guilty of breaking the law by going to the funeral by the direct road, and he would have been legally justified in returning by the same route; but going a mile out of his way for the wicked purpose of calling on a friend placed him, in the eye of the Puritanical law, as committing an offense which deprived him of his rights as a citizen. A Boston paper sarcastically adds, "that had the learned Judges of the Supreme Court been less merciful, they might have turned the tables upon him, and mulcted him in the heaviest fine prescribed by the statute."

Almost a parallel case happened in New Jersey not long ago. A man hired a carriage of a livery-stable keeper, and through his reckless driving broke the vehicle and injured the horse. When the livery-stable keeper brought an action for damages, he was ruled out of court on the strength of some antiquated statute, which declared that the transaction was "illegal, being on the Lord's Day," and that he was consequently not entitled to compensation.

This anomaly in law seems to exist to a wide extent in our neighbor State across the Hudson. Now and then some statute starts up to the confusion of the most experienced counsel, and sometimes to the astonishment of the most learned judges. General Wright, who was for many years the Prosecuting Attorney for Hudson County, in that State, affirmed on the authority of an eminent lawyer, whose favorite pursuit was the "excavation" of these obsolete laws and enactments, that they were so many, far-searching and minute, that in a country walk he could render himself liable to a goodly list of pains and penalties. He could not look over a fence, cut a stick, or throw a stone, without breaking some law still in existence, but only known to a few antiquarian lawyers.

In England, not ten years ago, a man was tried for some misdemeanor and found guilty. As it was the first conviction under the Act, when the judge turned to see what the penalty was, he found it to be a public whipping—one-half to the Queen and one-half to the informer. It appears that, as drafted originally, it provided a fine of ten pounds—one-half to the Queen and one-half to the informer. When the punishment was altered from a fine to a flogging, it was forgotten to alter the distribution of the penalty. As a man cannot be tried twice for the same offense, the criminal escaped scot-free.

Instances of careless legislation on obsolete laws are much more common in the United States and England than in France or Germany, although from the character of the nations we should think the reverse. The sooner the States of Massachusetts, New Jersey and Maryland revise their code the better for common sense and justice.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE illness of Mr. Gladstone, which last week occupied public attention, was undoubtedly brought on by the worry and chagrin caused by the numerous defeats of his Ministry since the return of the Liberals to power. Mr. Gladstone is no longer a young man, and it is evident, from his conduct during the present session, that he no longer possesses the even temper which is so necessary to a skillful debater in the House of Commons. Every new member who attacked some Government measure was almost certain to rouse the Premier into action, and, instead of allowing his subordinates to respond to the questions referring to their particular departments, he foolishly undertook to answer everything himself. This constant excitement and the annoyance which the defeat of his Irish policy has caused him, have been quite sufficient to plunge the Premier into his present feverish condition. At last accounts he was steadily improving. The rejection of the Irish Disturbance Bill in the House of Lords by an overwhelming majority is a sad blow to the Liberals, or, rather, to the radical wing of that party. The vote against the Government was 282, while only 51 members were found to support the measure. Of course, this enormous majority removes any possibility of passing a similar one, for the favorite plan of creating new peers in order to gain a Governmental majority would necessitate in the present case the creation of 231 new peerages! Meanwhile, troops have been sent to Ireland in order to anticipate any disturbances which may occur, but it is most unlikely that there will be any trouble, for the agitators who generally cause the rows in Ireland are opposed to the Government upon this measure.

Digitized by Google

Further particulars of the battle of Kushk-i-Nakud, as the engagement in which Ayoob Khan defeated the English forces is now called, have been received. It appears that the first news but slightly exaggerated the gravity of the defeat, and that British prestige has received a severe blow. The total Afghan force seems to have been about 12,000. From nine until one o'clock the fight was mainly an artillery duel, in which the excellent practice made by the Afghans and the greater number of their guns gave them a decided advantage over the British. The Afghan infantry then advanced, and the Ghazis, or irregular cavalry, skirmished along the British line. The native troops under the English command at once gave way and fell back upon the Sixty-sixth English regiment, the Afghans following up their advantage. The formation of the British was thus lost, and, although General Burrows did all he could to rally his men, the flight became general. In fact, it seems to have been a perfect route, for the whole body of fugitives could not be turned from the main road, along which there is no water and where most of the casualties occurred from the men falling from thirst and exhaustion. The enemy pursued the English almost up to the gates of Candahar, but apparently in a rather unenergetic manner, for had they done otherwise there would have been but few left to tell the tale. General Burrows seems to have been to blame in abandoning his defensive position, and in supposing that the native infantry under his command was any match for the hardy Afghan mountaineers. These native foot-soldiers seem to have caused the whole catastrophe, and their disorganized retreat upon the Sixty-sixth—a veteran line regiment—caused the destruction of that corps. Reinforcements are now going forward to India from England.

The result of the elections for the Councils-General in France is most satisfactory. The French people have acted with remarkable restraint and excellent common sense. They have not allowed themselves to be carried away by the red Radicals on the one side or by the reactionary Monarchists or Bonapartists upon the other. Before the Departmental elections, the Republicans had a majority in fifty-five councils. They have now the control of at least seventy councils, most of the gain being in favor of Gambetta. When Rochefort returned from Geneva, after the passing of the Amnesty Bill, he immediately attacked Gambetta—the very man who had done more than any one else for the exiled Communists—in the most unmeasured terms. There was a general fear among the moderate Republicans that the people might return the radical candidates, and thus shake the conservative tendency of the present French Ministry, which has fully shown that it holds the broadest liberal principles consistent with true liberty. Five members of the Cabinet, who were candidates, were re-elected, and the Republic has indirectly gained stability. The departmental councils and the municipal delegates elect the Senators according to the present system, and although the former bodies have comparatively little influence in the election, yet their composition is most important, and the present election must be considered as a victory for Gambetta and a defeat for Clemenceau, Blanqui, Rochefort and the red Radicals. Another result of the elections has been a complete indorsement of the policy of the Government in the Jesuit affair, and the attempt to attack the Cabinet for their anti-clerical measures has been a dismal failure.

There is a lull in the storm brooding over Turkey. The great Powers proposed a naval demonstration in Turkish waters unless the Porte at once acceded to the terms imposed by the Supplementary Conference at Berlin. Meanwhile an ultimatum has been handed to the Porte which allows the Sultan either to accept Count Corti's compromise or else to cede Dulcigno to Montenegro. There is a report, as yet unsubstantiated, that the Porte will accept the ultimatum even before the three weeks which are allowed have expired, and that no interference will be necessary. But France, Austria and Germany are lukewarm, and it is quite possible that the two latter Powers may support the Albanians against the Montenegrins. Greece had resolved to mobilize her army, but at the instigation of England postponed any action. According, however, to the last news, England has withdrawn her objection, and the little army of Greece will immediately be placed upon a war footing.

Rochefort designates the French Assemblies as "parliamentary seraglios," and adds: "The Senate is a hospital for the incurables of reaction, and the Chamber of Deputies a maison de santé which most persons leave far worse than when they enter it." Possibly there is as much truth as poetry in this last statement.

It is stated that the Pension Office has now about twelve years' work on hand, and unless the bureau shall be reorganized so as to dispose more rapidly of the accumulated applications, it will be impossible to afford relief for a long time to come to the thousands of needy pensioners who are waiting for their money. Applications are still coming in in considerable numbers.

That is a good example which the Democrats of an Iowa judicial district have set the politicians of Congress. They have formally notified the Republicans that they will make no nomination for a certain judical office to be filled this year, but will support the present incumbent, who is a Republican, because they desire to keep the judgeship out of politics. The judiciary should everywhere be kept free from partisan entanglements, and it is a question whether judicial offices should not in all cases be appointive instead of elective.

The semi-annual reports of seven local institutions indicate an increase in deposits in all the savings banks of the city, during the last six months, of about $9,000,000. It is estimated that the increase of deposits in the State during the same period will approximate $17,000,000. These figures are eminently gratifying, as showing the greatly improved condition of the industrial classes.

Edison's electric light has been tested on a trip of the new steamer Columbia from New York to Portland, Oregon, and is reported to have worked, in all kinds of weather, to the entire satisfaction of the officers of the vessel. The simple opening of a steam valve was sufficient to light the ship, and the ordinary skill of the engine-room was sufficient to keep the lights in order. The result is of interest as pointing the way to the illumination, by the new light, of all sea-going vessels, and the diminution thereby of the chances of collisions in dark and foggy weather.

The State Department has now before it all the papers in reference to the recent Spanish insults to our flag, and it is probable that an early demand for reparation will be made. The Spaniards claim that they have in each case acted within their two-leagues' jurisdiction; but the affidavit of the captain of the schooner George Washington, recently overhauled by a Spanish cruiser, states that he was more than fifteen miles distant from the shore at the time of the insult. With a view of preventing further outrages to American vessels on the Cuban coast, the Powhatan has been ordered into Cuban waters to perform patrol duty there.

The disaster to the British arms in Afghanistan has been turned to a curious account in Constantinople. By way of diminishing the prestige of the British, printed accounts of the disaster, charging the troops with cowardice and their leaders with incapacity, are being distributed in Turkish military circles. The Turks are greatly incensed at the action of the British Government in insisting upon their performance of treaty obligations, but if matters should come to an issue requiring them to face British soldiers or sailors, they would very soon abandon their contemptuous notions of Anglo-Saxon prowess.

The Utes have at length been constrained, by menace and intimidation, to sign the treaty ratified at the last session of Congress, under which they are to be removed from their reservation to agricultural lands in Colorado and Utah. They have objected to the removal because they are essentially a mountain tribe and abhor agricultural pursuits, and for the further reason, as they allege, that the lands to which they are to be sent are worthless. But greedy speculators covet the rich lands the tribe now occupies, and so the Government compels compliance with its demands. It may yet find it necessary to send troops to kill off a portion of the Utes who still hold out, in order to make way for the prospectors whose lustful eyes are fixed on the White River country.

Statistics gathered by the Railway Age as to the mileage of new railways now under construction or projected in the United States, exhibit very clearly the rapid progress of the country in material development. During the last six months railway enterprises to the number of 287, and covering a contemplated mileage of over 20,000 miles, have been announced as either in process of construction or projected, and the list does not include a number of lines concerning which the precise facts are not known. With a few exceptions all the new enterprises are entirely legitimate and probable of completion. Indeed, it is a characteristic feature of railway projects at present that they are, as a rule, intended to develop new regions in urgent need of transportation facilities, and, moreover, that a large number of the new lines are being built by strong companies as feeders to their existing systems. The mileage of new roads is greater in Ohio than in any other State.

The visit of General Garfield to this city last week for the purpose of attending a conference of the Republican leaders is significant only as indicating the purpose of that party to make the strongest possible fight for the maintenance of its supremacy. Generals do not come together on the eve of battle for mere holiday purposes, and political strategists, convening for consultation at the beginning of a great national campaign, may be presumed to "mean business" in the fullest and broadest sense. The Republican managers have so long enjoyed the sweets of power that they will not surrender them without a desperate struggle; and if the Democrats would win in the coming contest they must understand that it will be necessary to get down to hard, real work without the least delay. To rely upon the distinguished record of their candidate alone will not insure them success; that is simply one of many factors, all of which must be utilized to baffle and defeat the well-disciplined legions of the adversary.

An official communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue states that during the past fiscal year $123,981,916 of internal revenue taxes have been collected, and the entire sum has been paid into the Treasury. During the past four fiscal years the total amount of taxes received by Collectors of Internal Revenue was $467,080,885, and this sum, without a dollar's loss, has been paid into the Treasury. The total expense of collecting this amount of revenue during the four years, including the salaries and expenses of the bureau, will be about $19,920,000, or but little more than 8½ per cent. upon the amount collected. In the disbursement of said sum of money the Government has incurred no loss. During the period named, 3,874 illicit stills have been seized, 7,708 persons arrested for illicit distilling, and 25 officers and employés have been killed and 55 wounded while enforcing the laws. The Commissioner states that the frauds upon the revenue have been greatly reduced, and that violent resistance to law has practically ceased in all of the districts except the Second District of Georgia.

According to testimony given before a United States Senate Committee, recently in session here, 155,936 persons were naturalized in this city from 1856 to 1876, both inclusive. The highest number of citizens made in any one year was 15,486. In 1876, a Presidential year, the number was 10,832. In the Supreme Court, in 1868, the fraudulent naturalizations amounted to thousands. Judge Barnard alone granting 18,824 in October of that year, while Judge McCunn, in the Superior Court, issued during the same month 18,053 certificates of citizenship. Judge McCunn testified, in a certain instance, that he had naturalized 200 persons in an hour, and Judge Barnard, as appears by the files of his court, naturalized 2,543 in about five hours on October 12th, 1868. The naturalizations in 1868 appear to have been mainly of alien minors, that form of admission being chosen because it saved the necessity of producing any proof of declaration of intentions having been previously made by the applicants, which proof could not, of course, under the circumstances, have been produced. In many cases certificates of naturalization were sent to persons through the mails without any application ever having been made for them. Shall we never be able to put an end to such atrocities as these, perpetrated by one party or another, upon the sanctity and value of the suffrage?

The apparently complete fusion of the Democrats and Greenbackers in Maine insures a campaign of unusual interest and vigor in that State. If the fusion can be maintained, it may give the Republicans a good deal of trouble, and there are some who believe that it may actually capture the electoral ticket from the party so long dominant in the State. The fusion candidate for Governor is a former Republican, widely and favorably known, and possesses rare qualities as an organizer which he is already actively applying to the work of the canvass. The Republican campaign is managed, as usual, by Senator Blaine, and it will be even more thorough, it is said, than it was one year ago. The opposition, however, has one obvious element of weakness. The Democrats, who have only three of the seven electors, are already beginning to doubt whether the Greenbackers will keep faith with them in supporting the Democratic electoral ticket in November, after they have succeeded in the September contest. They understand full well that the Greenbackers are only interested in capturing the State, and have little interest in the electoral ticket, and unless they can have some more satisfactory assurances than they now possess, possibly the existing distrust may flower into open revolt among the better portion of the Democratic voters. The combination, to say the least of it, is not an honorable one, but then, unfortunately, political parties are not governed by considerations of principle, and the degeneracy is no greater in Maine, perhaps, than elsewhere.

The Labor Party is again taking a hand in politics. The other day a National Labor Convention nominated candidates for President and Vice-President; and in some Pennsylvania districts we notice that they have brought out nominees for Congress on distinct labor platforms. We do not know that there can be any objection to workingmen organizing for political action if they choose to do so, but it is quite certain that their real interests cannot be best promoted by a policy which separates them from the general community on a specific class basis. The experiment has been tried, and has always resulted in failure. In Michigan, in Kentucky, and other States in which the Labor Party was at one time formidable, every seeming victory has resulted in positive damage to that particular interest. The great trouble with the labor question as it affects the ballot is that the platform on which it is placed is indefinite, and the men who seek to thrive by its agitation are altogether untrustworthy. With all that is said and done in labor meetings and by labor advocates, the unprejudiced reader finds it difficult to discover just what the workingman desires to abolish and what he proposes to construct by way of reform in politics and legislation. The simple truth is, that if there is to be any practical and successful union of labor and the ballot, the workingmen must begin by banishing the ambitious politicians who aspire to leadership, and by learning the principles of public economy—the laws which govern trade in other nations as well as our own. No President or Governor, no Congress or Legislature, can overturn the law of supply and demand, except by such arbitrary measures as would be promptly rejected by those they were designed to benefit. Better times are coming, but not through the agency of politics. If the ballot be kept pure, and official integrity untainted, the quiet march of commerce, stimulated by a sound financial policy and expanding agriculture, will spread contentment and prosperity through the land as no quack specifics of labor reformers can ever possibly do.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

Turning Bear, one of Spotted Tail's chiefs, is reported on the warpath.

The statue of the poet Burns in Central Park will be unveiled in September.

The valuation by the Boston assessors shows an increase of $25,786,500 over last year.

The National Sunday-school Assembly began its sessions at Chautauqua, August 4th.

Over $70,000,000 has been disbursed in the Navy Department since 1873 without a dollar's loss.

Further arrests have been made in Philadelphia of persons engaged in selling spurious medical diplomas.

President Hayes, General Garfield and others will attend the National Soldiers' Reunion at Columbus, on August 26th.

The Republicans of Michigan have nominated David H. Jerome for Governor, and Morgan B. Crosby for Lieutenant-Governor.

Colonel J. B. Chambers, the candidate of the Greenback Party for Vice-President, announces that he intends remaining on the ticket.

John Benden, the Kansas butcher, who is charged with over a score of atrocious murders, has been arrested, with his wife, in Nebraska.

At the election of the State and county officers in Alabama, August 2d, the Democrats were successful, securing 60,000 majority for their State ticket.

The reduction of the public debt during the month of July amounted to $5,576,013. The total debt, less cash in the Treasury, is now $1,836,596,241.

The New York Board of Aldermen has passed an ordinance authorizing the Mayor to provide for the capture and destruction of all cats found at large.

General Weaver, the Presidential candidate of the Greenback Party, appeals for contributions of $1 and upwards to defray expenses of the campaign.

The 43-ton pedestal of the Egyptian obelisk was taken out of the Dressay last week. Ground was broken at the site of the obelisk in Central Park on August 4th.

Governor Connell has called the attention of Mayor Cooper to the violation of the law prohibiting lotteries, and asks his co-operation in securing their efficient execution.

The third annual reunion of the soldiers of the Northwest was held last week at Galesburg, Ill. About 3,500 soldiers were present, and celebrated the opening day by a sham battle.

Six hundred clerks are engaged in tabulating the census returns. Each list of returns is counted eight times by as many clerks, in order that the totals may be absolutely accurate.

The American Dental Association, in session at Boston last week, passed a resolution discountenancing the practice of members allowing their names to appear in advertisements of compounds for filling teeth.

Fears are entertained in Texas that a body of men known as the Grand Army of Occupation contemplate an invasion of Mexico. It is said that if the Government does not interfere serious trouble will result.

An International Congress is to be held at Milan, Italy, from the 29th of August to the 4th of September, and the United States, through the State Department, has been invited to send one or more representatives.

Representatives Butterworth and Young of the First and Second Ohio Districts have been nominated for re-election by the Republicans. In the Third Ohio District the Democrats have nominated Hon. J. Dearborn Ward.

General William O. Butler died at Carrollton, Ky., August 6th, at the age of eighty-nine years. He was an officer in the Regular Army in the war of 1812, and was at the battle of New Orleans. Afterwards he served in Congress for two terms, and was the candidate for Vice President on the ticket with General Lewis Cass in 1848.

Foreign.

Russia is negotiating for a settlement with China.

The Irish harvest promises well, also that in Southern Russia.

The British Parliament will be prorogued about the 27th or 28th instant.

Floods in Austria have done immense damage to crops and movable property.

Sir Hercules Robinson has been appointed Governor of Cape Colony in place of Sir Bartle Frere.

One hundred and ten amnestied Communists reached Paris August 3d, but their arrival occasioned no excitement.

Great Britain has withdrawn her request that Greece should remain neutral, and the troops there are being mobilized.

The French Republicans intend to repeal a law of 1850 which measurably protects the Jesuits who desire to open schools.

The French revenue receipts from taxation during the month of July were nearly 17,000,000 francs more than for July, 1879.

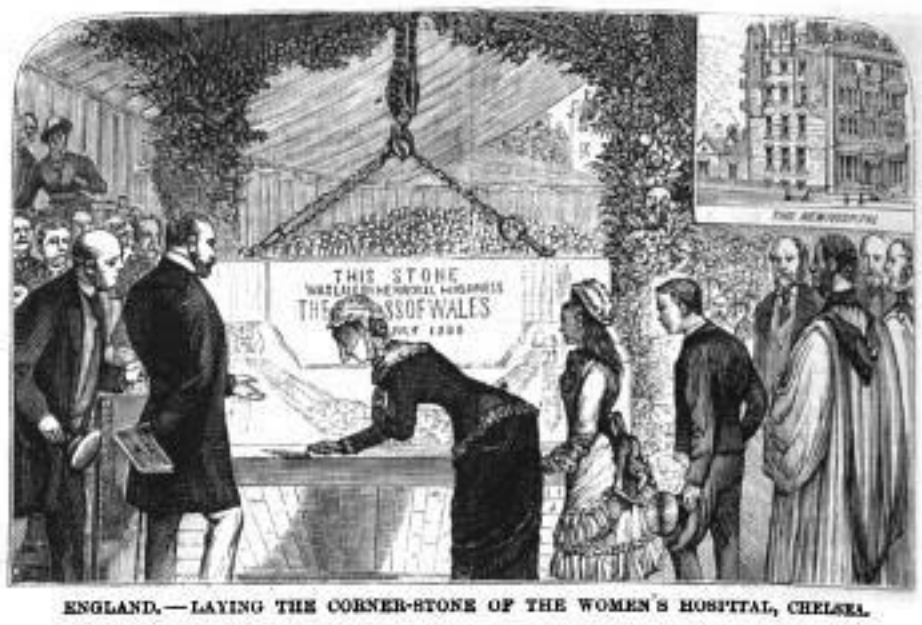
The British House of Commons has rejected a resolution removing the present restrictions on the sale of American cattle in England.

It is again stated that the Baroness Burdett-Coutts will marry her secretary, Ashmead Bartlett, a native American and a naturalized British subject.

During the late disorders at Mazatlan, in Mexico, a battle was fought at Villa Union in which 100 men were killed and the Government troops were victorious.

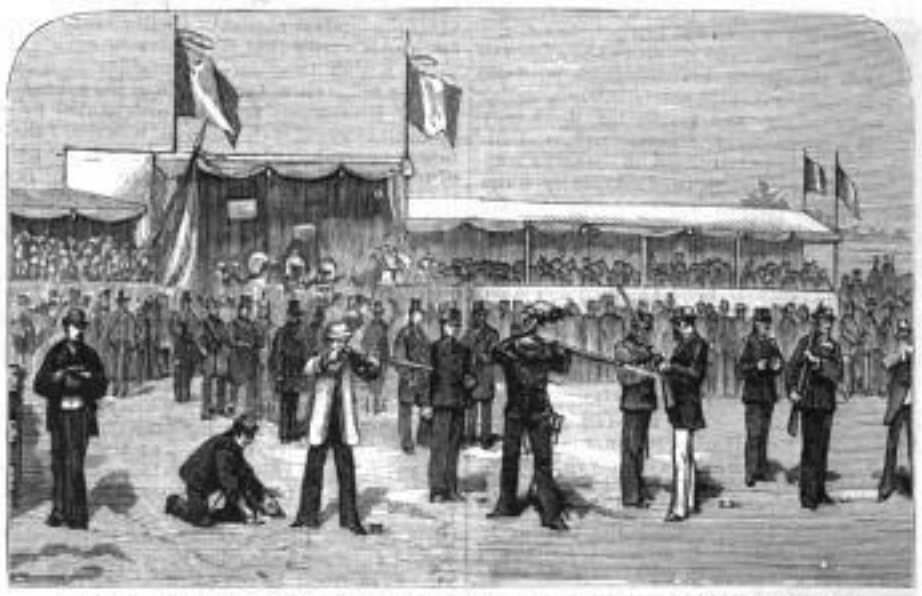
The London Times announces that Roumania is about to send Colonel Veterenco to Washington on a mission in connection with the recognition of Roumanian independence.

Insurrections are threatened in Mexico, owing to the election of General Gonzalez as President. The members of the last Mexican Congress who opposed the railroad Bills have all failed of re-election.

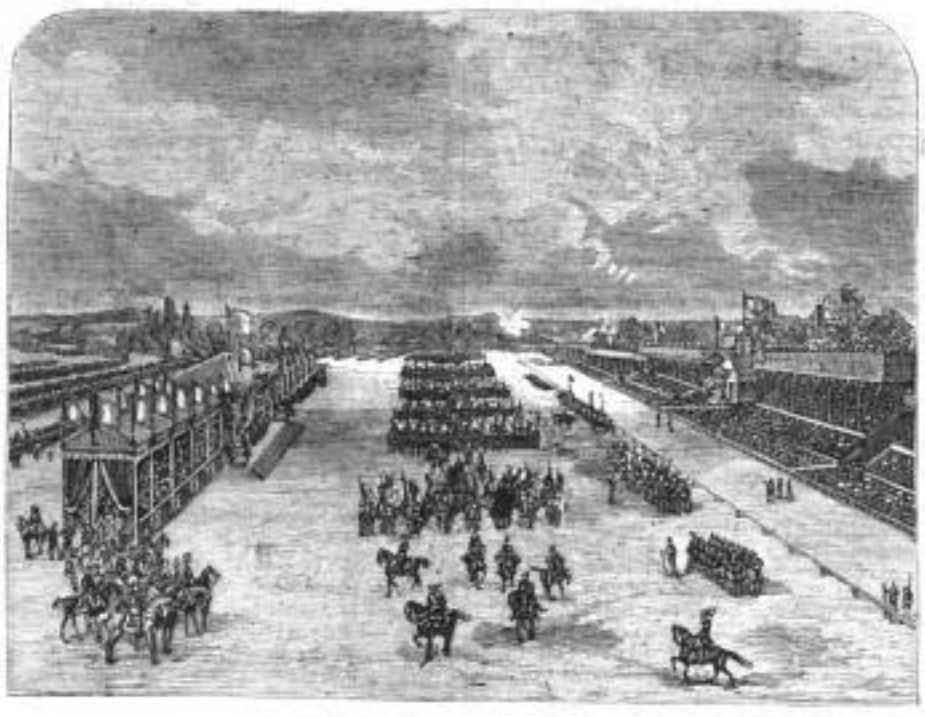


Ayoob Khan has retreated from the scene of his victory over General Burrows's troops in Southwestern Afghanistan. Both from England and India reinforcements are being energetically dispatched, and, besides, six battalions of infantry and three batteries of artillery will soon be passing through the Suez Canal. Without counting the recent additions, the total number of troops accepted by the Afghan war is 60,000, of whom 40,000 are within the frontier of Afghanistan.

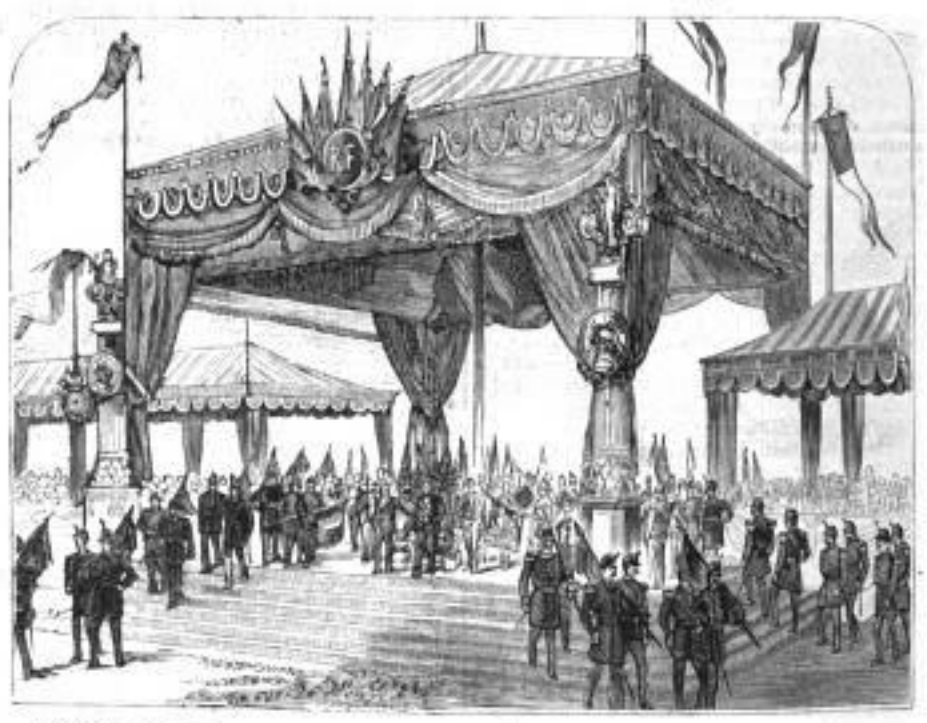
Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 415.



ENGLAND.—THE PRINCE OF WALES SALUTING THE QUEEN AT THE GRAND REVIEW.



ENGLAND.—LAYING THE CORNER-STONE OF THE WOMEN'S HOSPITAL, CHELSEA.

ITALY.—THE KING PARTICIPATING IN THE SHARPSHOOTING FESTIVAL, ROME.

FRANCE.—PRESENTATION OF THE NEW COLORS TO THE ARMY, JULY 14TH.

FRANCE.—THE COLOR-BEARERS PASSING THE PAVILION AFTER THE PRESENTATION.

FRANCE.—THE WEST AND SOUTH FRONTS OF THE NEW CITY HALL, PARIS.

Digitized by Google

TOURIST LIFE ON NANTUCKET.

IN previous notices of this Summer resort, growing more popular every day, we have contrasted the Nantucket of the old whaling days with the Nantucket on which fashion has set her imprint. While the island is overflowing with attractions, it may be that the contrasts of a few years really form the most delightful feature of a sojourn. With a few steps the tourist passes from the Summer hotels to little clusters of ancient-looking, weather-beaten buildings, where the typical fisherman passes to and fro. Though he will tell you sadly that he never expects a return of the grand whaling enterprises of 1844, he still indulges in little fishing speculations. Save a certain sharpness in bargaining with the pleasure-seeker in search of facilities for fishing, he appears to take little interest in the steady development of the new order of things.

At the village of Siasconset—if village it may be called, which consists merely of a dozen or more quaint and ancient cottages, set down haphazard on the very edge of a steep cliff overhanging a narrow, sandy beach—the native quickens into considerable excitement when the mail-deliverer makes his periodical appearance. But once satisfied with the market success of his last venture, he relaxes into the apparently listless creature, caring naught for the loyings and glitter and extravagance of fashionable life. A little hotel brings yearly a few visitors to this sleepiest and most ancient hamlet, which lies about seven miles from Nantucket, at the southest extremity of the island; and very delightful to lovers of antiquity are the queer cottages, with their one or two "low-studded" rooms, their little, grassy dooryards, and the old figureheads—relics of whaling-ships long since gone down—which stand conspicuously before nearly every door. If a stronger contrast of the past and present of Nantucket life is desired, let the visitor betake himself to the old mill, and witness the original method of getting the huge fans into the current of the wind. Everything here looks ancient, even to the horse which slowly drags the long pole until the wind begins to attain a purchase on the fans, and slowly sets the venerable mechanism in motion.

From such spectacles relief may be obtained in the fine bathing-places on the western shore, under what is called the Cliff; or on the south shore, where the dangers of the surf and the tremendous undertow forbid bathing even to the most daring. Then, too, the Squantum should receive attention—that curious picnic on the level prairie-like plain, near the shore, with suitable provisions from the hotels and stores, but also with fish just out of the pond or sea, and with clams dug from the clean, gravelly sand. In the Athenæum, besides a worthy library, will be found a large number of curiosities deposited by the owners or masters of whaling-vessels, and relics associated with the past history of the island.

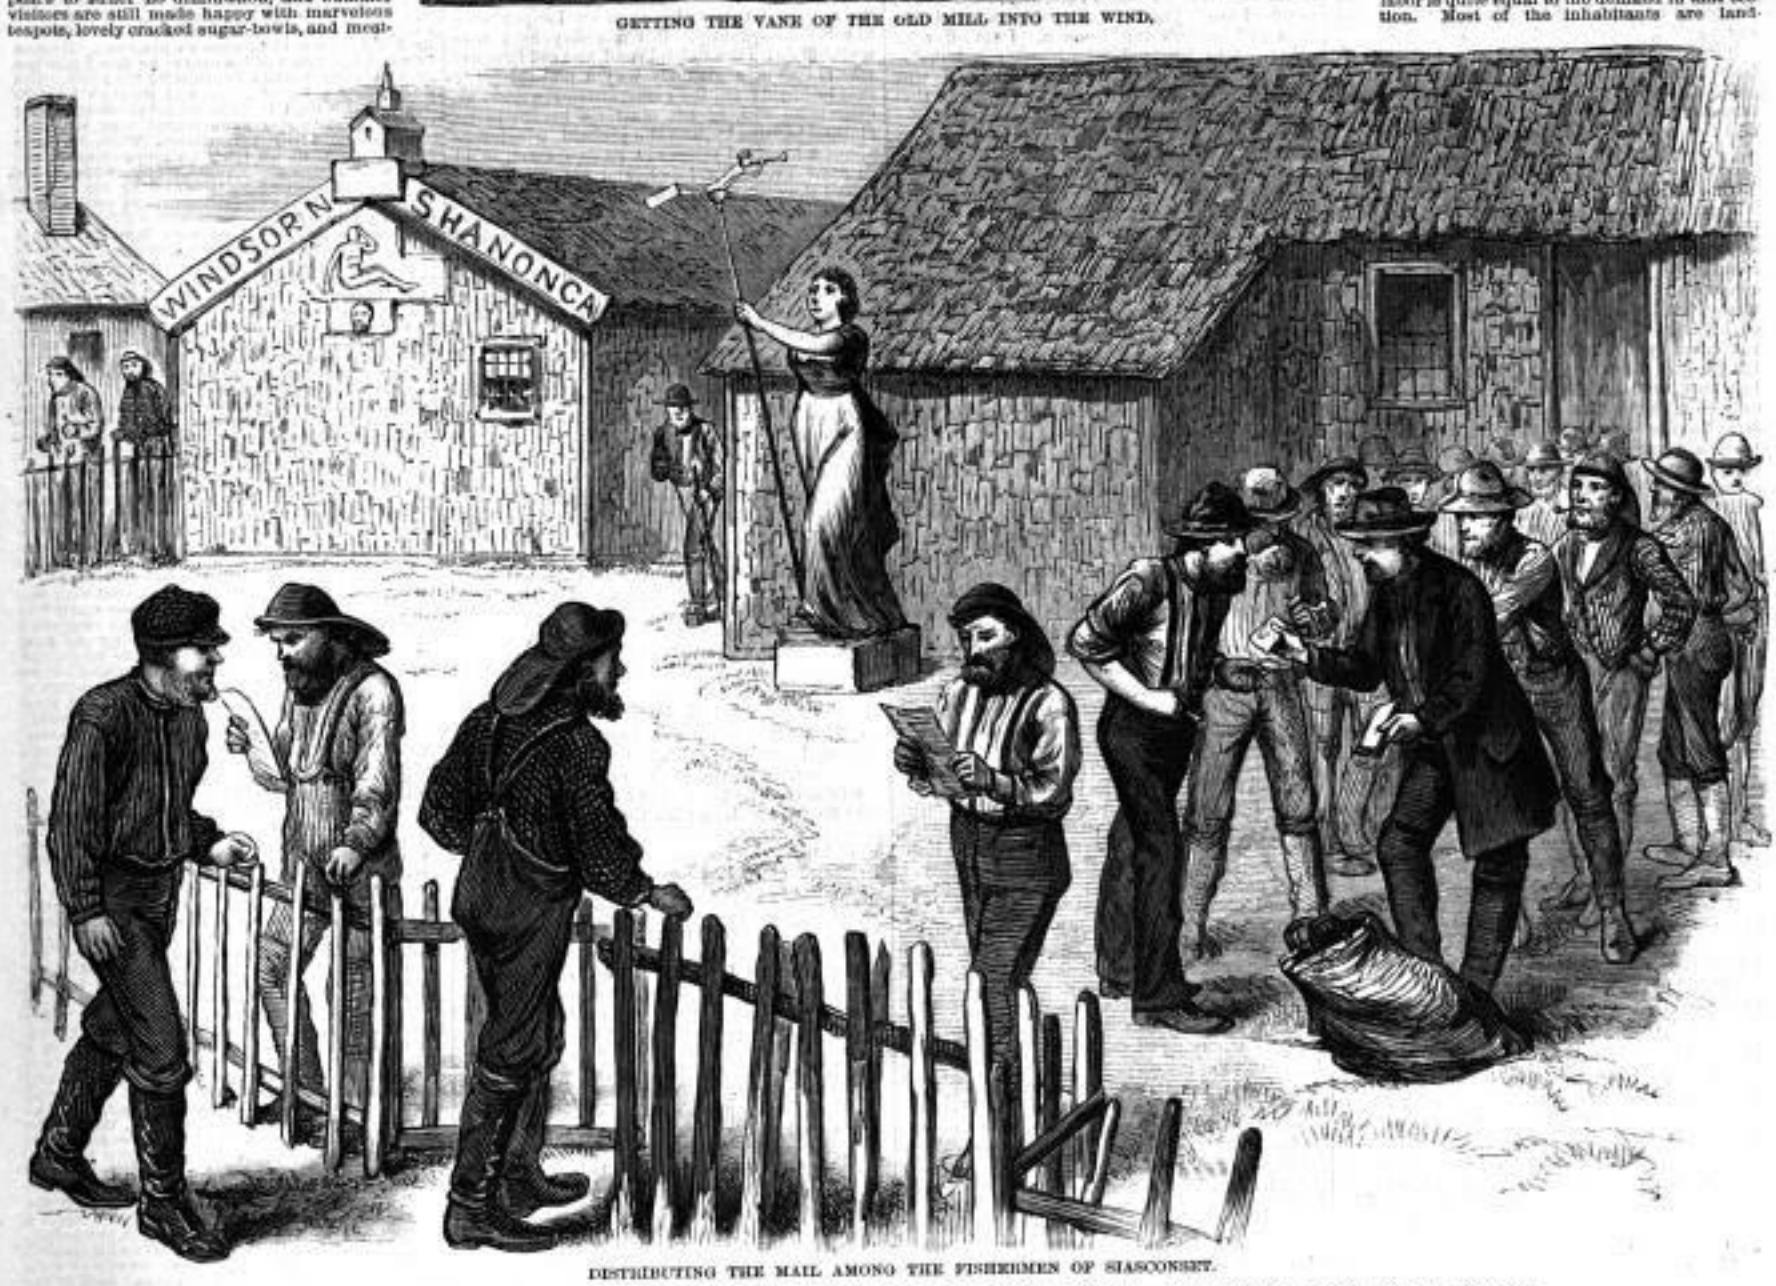
Whether in exploring the crooked, narrow streets of the town, or in straying over the pathless downs that lie beyond it, the days in Nantucket are only too quickly passed. Relic-hunters are made happy by such a surplus of old china and antique furniture as seldom meets the eye of dwellers on the mainland. Every shop has a corner of its window given up to "willow-pattern," wedgwood, and heaven knows what besides of the perishable, yet so lasting, ware; while almost every private house is open to callers with an eye to trade in brass candlesticks, old clocks, and the like. Unfortunately, the owners of these treasures are only too well "up" in their market value, and the delicious, trembling excitement of bagging a veritable bargain is not to be had. For the last four or five years this brisk yearly trade has been going on, yet the stock of china appears to suffer no diminution, and Summer visitors are still made happy with marvelous teapots, lovely cracked sugar-bowls, and mediæval dishes of gigantic size, which, in the strange revolution of things, may come from furnishing a Nantucket dinner-table to adorning the wall of a New York drawing-room.

GETTING THE VANE OF THE OLD MILL INTO THE WIND.

FARM LABOR AND WAGES.

THE annual report of the Agricultural Department gives the average of wages of farm-laborers, with and without board, as compared with the wages paid in several branches of skilled mechanical labor, and shows that in the Pacific and Mining States and Territories, the range of monthly wages for farm-laborers without board is between $30.75 in Montana and $22.50 in Washington Territory. Of the States east of the Mississippi, Minnesota pays her farm-laborers better than any other Northern State, the monthly wages with board being $16.33, while Vermont pays only $12.63. In the Southern States the prices paid range from $12.26 in Louisiana to $7.32 in South Carolina, the average being $9.60. The following are the most important portions of the report:

"The decline which had been steadily going on since 1873 till last year seems to have been arrested, and there is a decided advance in almost every section; the average wages of labor, engaged by the year or season, and which represents the steady and trustworthy force on the farms, was for the whole country last year $20.26 a month, without board. This year it is $21.75, being an increase of 7.35 per cent. . . . The cost of subsistence to the laborer for the average of the whole country in 1880 is $7.17 a month, against $7.54 in 1879.



"Heretofore, in the decline of wages, the cost of subsistence declined in quite the same ratio, but for this year the proportion is largely in favor of the laborer, as the cost of subsistence remains nearly at the lowest rate, while the wages has materially advanced. The average price for labor with board is $14.56.

"An analysis of the figures of wages paid without board shows only three States reporting less than last year, namely, Texas, Minnesota and California; but a glance at the report of the wages paid with board shows a marked increase. It must be borne in mind, however, that in all these States the sparseness of population and absence of the facilities of the older States render it both necessary and convenient to lodge and feed the hired help. The price paid, therefore, with board, is the safest indication of the value of labor. As was to be expected, the greatest increase has been in those States where agriculture has been the most remunerative since last year. Thus in the West and those States bordering on the Ohio River, which were the most favored, the increase has been the largest. The same applies to the Cotton States. With the higher price for cotton the advance has been universal, and is in some as high as 8 or 10 per cent.

"The demand for labor is good in all sections of the country. In the New England and Middle States there is a steady and good demand for trustworthy men, and prices for that class have advanced very materially. The larger number of reports from those sections state that the usual custom is to hire with board and for the season.

"In the South Atlantic and Gulf States there is an active demand for all kinds of steady labor. Many correspondents report that the share system, or a division of the product in lieu of wages, is growing more unpopular daily, and that the freedmen are becoming more and more landholders. In Mississippi and Louisiana there are a few reports of scarcity of labor owing to the exodus to Kansas and the North, but in the same localities there is reported a good demand for trustworthy labor of all kinds.

"In the Northwestern States the supply of labor is quite equal to the demand in that section. Most of the inhabitants are land-

DISTRIBUTING THE MAIL AMONG THE FISHERMEN OF SIASCONSET.

MASSACHUSETTS.—SUMMER LIFE ON THE ISLAND OF NANTUCKET.—FROM SKETCHES BY JOSEPH BECKER.

Digitized by Google

owners, and only hire help at harvest time, but skilled labor is in good demand.

"In the Territories and on the Pacific Slope the demand is reported as good, except in New Mexico and Montana, where a surplus is noticed. In the first-named Territory the surplus is attributed to the opening of the railway from Kansas, and in the latter to the large number of young and unskilled laborers arriving.

HARRY HARTBUSH'S COB.

IT was really too aggravating to be detained three hours at a miserable country town, in a chill December day, because the directors of the Squash and Mudville Railway could not agree with the directors of the Grittington. Therefore, it was arranged that their respective trains, which appeared on the map to run continuously, should always set out two minutes before the passengers from either could cross the bridge which divided the camps of these iron Guelphs and Ghibellines.

In an ill-omened hour I had consented to assist at my niece Jessie's wedding, and found myself detained three hours, with eighty miles to travel after eight o'clock at night by rail, and one hour in any vehicle it might please her bride-electahip to send to the station for me.

A frame house, with a stereotyped piazza and a board with the word "hotel" in brazen letters inscribed thereon, large enough for the Fifth Avenue or the Windsor, intimated the propinquity of shelter and the possibility of food, and in a few minutes, from my first introduction to the landlord, a lantern-jawed rogue, who charged me two dollars for a chicken as tough as glue and "fixin's" that would have put a tenth-rate boarding-house to very shame, I was installed in the private room of the hostelry, and enjoying the distant prospect of a meal that was destined to prove but a mockery, a delusion and a snare.

As I flattened my nose against the window-pane and endeavored to exhaust my mind in speculating on the possible breeds of pigs of all sizes and colors that were luxuriantly rooting up a manure heap in the vacant lot fronting the parlor where I was a prisoner, a high-wheeled and mud-stained wagon, drawn by a spanking, smoking team, and occupied by a damp pair of nondescripts, buried under a Mont Blanc of Macintosh capes and Lorne rugs, dashed up to the door.

Tap, tap, tap! at my parlor door, and the landlord entered in a flurry, followed by the landlady, sharp and vinegary.

"Excuse me. Guess yer won't make no objection — only private room. Mr. Hartbush and his lady—a clever gentleman, large landowner, much obligated." Such was the disjointed sentences of the joint-stock message.

I am rather a shy man naturally, but on this day I was only too much pleased to have civilized society on any terms, so I retreated to the adjacent bedroom to give my hair a touch with the comb and returned to find the late occupants of the wagon in possession of my room, the lady settling her hair at the zig-zaggy green glass over the mantelpiece; the man, a tall, stout, broad-backed farmer, bending inquisitively over my satchel, apparently studying the name engraved under the lock, for he was saying:

"It's the same name, anyhow, but it can't be old Fred. It's too ridiculous."

He drew himself up as I entered with some formal apology on his lips, stared, paused, and then we cried out together:

"Fred Dormer!"

"Harry Hartbush!"

"I should never have known you!"

It was not likely we should. We might have passed each other a hundred times, and have never recognized old chums and college fellows in the two men whom fifteen years had separated, though the laughing gray eyes still unclouded by crowsfeet, and the smiling mouth of brilliant teeth were witnesses in favor of the identity of Harry. My last reports of Harry had been anything but satisfactory; but now, without asking any questions, I had only to take one glance at him and another at Mrs. Hartbush to learn that he was thriving, while a stealthy survey of Mrs. Harry during the process of introduction half-explained the secret. She was one of those little compact bodies, with clearly defined features, grave, piercing eyes, broad forehead, and fine chin, relieved in this instance by a good-tempered mouth, who seem born to manage husbands.

The first movement was a key to her character. After a burst of explanations and inquiries, Harry was proceeding to refer in general terms to the inadvisability of electing Grant for the third term, when Mrs. Harry, drawing a memorandum book from her pocket, lady-like in binding but business-like in size, and turning slowly over the leaves, exclaimed:

"Is there anything you could do before dinner, Mr. Hartbush?"—the Mr. in compliment to me—"We have two hours and twenty minutes to wait here."

She looked at her watch, none of your French jimcracks, but a solid time-keeper—a regular pocket chronometer.

Something indefinable in Hartbush's expression seemed to say that he would much sooner have deferred all business in favor of a chat with his old friend, for, turning to me with a very pleasant smile, Mrs. Hartbush continued:

"You will excuse Harry, I am sure, Mr. Dormer, for you are a man of business and can understand how necessary it is on a large farm like ours to see that every wheel is oiled and in working order. Harry is going to New York, and will be away quite two weeks, and there are always odds and ends to be arranged even at the last moment. And now that we have had the pleasure of meeting you so unexpectedly, you must arrange with Mr. Hartbush to pay us an early visit at Swamscon, where we shall be very pleased indeed to see you.

Mrs. Harry put her liege lord through his facings, who went through the affair in a manner quite amazing to me, who at first forgot what fifteen years will do. In fact, he appeared to understand his business perfectly. And although Mrs. H. made the notes which were to serve for leases, agreements, and the Lord knows what, and to refresh her husband's memory when he came to fill up his diary, and, although he sometimes referred to her for a figure or a fact, such as, "What did we allow old Thrustbeck for the bones?" it was plain that the lady was not anxious to show the doeskins which she had undoubtedly appropriated from Hartbush's wardrobe.

When Harry and I had settled down into our places in the cars—two swivel chairs in a drawing-room car—I could not help congratulating my old friend on his improved condition, delicately hinting a desire to be informed as to its immediate cause.

"You shall have the whole story, Dormer, and it's a pretty long one. I may as well go back to the time when we saw so much of each other in the fashionable whirl of New York life after we had quitted Yale. I'll spare you a bit of unpleasant misery about the busting of my father; it busted me. I was ruined. I paid what debts I was pressed to pay. I sold my T cart, my stable fixins', my guns, dressing cases, and accepted an invitation from Stedman Hoylde, went yachting to the Mediterranean, where, although I was Hoylde's guest and he did not wish me to be at any expense, I could not help getting rid of a certain share of what I now know as petty cash, and the result was that after a six months' cruise, I found myself back and stranded in London without a shilling. I could not ask Hoylde for money, not if I had been starving, so there I was, Dormer, in a real tight place, and no mistake.

"What I did, or how I lived for the next two years would be difficult for me to tell. I was reduced to the lowest ebb. I wouldn't come to New York, where I had been a swell, so I hung about London, that refugium peccatorum. I fiddled in a dancing orchestra, disguised in hair and mustache. One day I met Jacob Fisher, my father's old coachman. You recollect him?—a horsey-looking Englishman, with a half-moon collar—to be sure you do. Well, sir, Jacob Fisher had returned to London and set up as a job master. He asked me to his house, and, when I had no home, I became one of his "turn men," and drove night flys for six months. Through poor old Jacob's management I went to Russia, with a string of thoroughbred horses under my charge and two grooms. Thence I traveled through Hungary and Bohemia, and staid there a year with Baron Bondelbein as huntsman to a pack of hounds he had brought over.

"I knew little enough about hunting except riding straight; but, as he knew less, with the help of an English feeder, who brought over the dogs, I did pretty well. A scrap of the Times, which came with the Cheshire cheese—for my baron was an Anglo-maniac to the extent of cheese and beer, as well as fox-hounds and blood horses—requesting information concerning Harry Hartbush, son of Jones Hartbush, formerly of 598 Broadway, New York, reached me. This was signed by a solicitor's firm in Lincoln's Inn, London. I set off with all speed to England, where, after a terrible dose of the formalities of the law, I was enabled to handle five thousand dollars that had come too late to my poor old dad, and then to me; and to make the acquaintance of an aunt whom I had never seen, or, I may say, heard of—a Mrs. Bell, my poor father's sister, who had married an Englishman. He was in the army and was killed in the Crimea before Sebastopol. My aunt resided at Bath. She invited me to visit her, and to Bath I accordingly repaired. She remembered me as a six months' babe, and had, for a wonder, heard a favorable account of me from her maid, a niece of my patron, Jacob Fisher.

"Of course I ought to have been very prudent, and to have hugged my five thousand, but, somehow, as long as I was single, prudence and I never traveled long together on the same road. Bath is a place of considerable fashion, and I resolved to be in the fashion, and my first step was to purchase a stout, workmanlike cob. Why I bought that cob I cannot tell. It was on the day before I left London, and I turned into Tattersall's merely to kill time. I staid the sale out because it was raining. The last lot was a cob, handsome enough for the Park, and strong enough to carry the late Boss Tweed, but with a sore back. I hate cobs. I think them useless. But an auction has always had on me the same exciting effect that a game of chance has on some of my friends. I am fascinated, like a squirrel by a rattlesnake. My wife never lets me go near a sale since I purchased, without seeing them, three dozen broilers in one lot. Well, there were no bidders for the cob. The dealers were full. The cob-riders, if any, had no taste for a sore back. I have a famous receipt that never fails, taught me by a Texan cowboy. When I heard the animal, that would have fetched five hundred dollars in the Spring, hanging at eighty, I could not resist, but went in, and soon found Aurora Borealis knocked down to me at twenty guineas, a little over a hundred dollars.

"I sent the cob by the road to Bath, and I took the rail. At the first station I was joined by a gentleman of middle age, sallow countenance and a nervous manner, accompanied by his daughter, whose elegance of dress, and especially the tying of the vail, bespoke a country-woman of my own.

"They had a tremendous quantity of baggage, two saddles, and a remarkably stupid servant. I felt as though I had encountered an old friend when my eyes dropped on a Saratoga trunk.

"I have always found the fathers of families rather shy of me when they had their daughters with them, and this case proved no exception. By a happy accident Mr. Bristow—you grin, Dormer, I see you guess the best half of the story—agitated himself continually about his baggage, condemning the English system and lauding our own up to the skies. At the next station he insisted upon seeing that the baggage was all right. Thank heaven, it was all wrong! The stupid servant had left at least a moiety behind. Trains do not wait for raving passengers, and while Mr. Bristow was consigning his servant to the infernal gods, I telegraphed back to the station-master. By the time we had struck the branch line I had an answer, 'Luggage all right; will be sent by the next train.' This lucky hit on my part thawed the old gentleman a bit, and he condescended to talk enough to let me know that he was Robert Bristow, of the firm of Bristow, Tolt & Fidlem, of Wall Street, and, having destroyed his digestion and his nerves by over-work, and having tried ever so many springs in the States, was now resolved to see what the English spas could do for him, and was on his way to Bath to drink the water, take a course of cold baths and horseback exercise.

"He winced rather at horseback exercise. 'My daughter, also rather an invalid, and I am traveling under the advice of Doctor Blythebold, of Fifth Avenue, and Sir William Gull.'

"You may laugh as you please, Dormer, but I fell in love with the daughter at first sight, when I saw her so quietly and gently manage the angry head of the firm of Bristow, Tolt & Fidlem, and so very calmly and decidedly give the stupid, sleepy servant his discharge. Some men like a wife they can manage. I found one who can manage me, so I fell in love over ears in three hours' traveling with my Louey, for, of course, you have guessed that Mrs. H. is my railway angel.

"Well, although the respectable papa got on famously about horseflesh—he dreaded the ordeal of horseback exercise, not having ridden for fifteen years—he parted from me at the end of our journey with many formal, polite speeches, and a half-apology that the state of his health would prevent his receiving any company, not even that of my Aunt Bell, whom I pressed into the service.

"I entirely won my aunt's heart by confiding to her in a moment of weakness my adventure on the cars, and my love at first sight. She entered warmly into my interests, and, to make a long story short, old man, Louey and I met at balls, parties and picnics. My aunt made old Bristow's acquaintance, and Miss Bristow's, too, and gave me hopes when I was in despair.

"'Go in, my dear Harry,' she would say, 'I am sure she likes you. You have a square chance, because you are such a random goose, and she is so very sensible. Now I have always observed that sensible women prefer a man who is rather a goose.'

"Still the broker was obstinate. Louey was his right hand, read all his letters, made minutes of their contents and made his hominy. Then he was continually telling my aunt that if his daughter married at all she would choose a man of business, a person of common sense, etc.

"I'll be drawn and quartered, Dormer, if I can tell you how I became inspired, how I got the notion that proved of such vital importance to me subsequently. But one day, as I was walking down the Bristol road, and old Bristow was riding in a gingerly way a piebald pony that he hired from the riding-master, a servant, exercising one of his master's horses in its clothes, hustled by, and the piebald, which was about a hundred years old, gave a start. Old Bristow uttered a howl, and his arms were round the piebald's neck in no time.

"The very next day, and the subsequent days, I was astride Aurora Borealis, packed tight, and city banked on a soft, stuffed saddle, with a pad before my legs and behind my thighs, with my arm in a sling. In this guise I followed the respectable broker, at a long distance, up the green lanes, where he rode tremblingly under the fierce orders of his tyrant and physician, who had said:

"'Mr. Bristow, if you don't ride ten miles a day you won't live five years. If you don't choose to follow my prescription, go back to the United States; don't come to me.'

"So he rode daily in fear of his life.

"My groom was a character, and to be depended on. I have him still. You'll see him when you come down to stay with us. One evening as Bristow commenced his usual ride on the riding-master's piebald, Evans, my man, appeared at the end of the lane, at a gallop, on a horse loaned for the occasion, and, watching the invalid broker, stopped short, shouting some indistinct words as if addressed to Dandy Jim, on which the obedient piebald halted and sat down on his hind legs like a dog, while poor Mr. Bristow rolled on the turf.

"To canter up and address Evans in the most violent language, and discharge him on the spot—to pick up the broker, as if he had been my father—was the work of a minute, and this was no sooner done than the piebald gathered himself together, and set off towards town on a mild trot.

"Mr. Bristow had sustained no damage except a crack in his black trousers, which rendered walking three miles neither convenient or dignified. With many asseverations and assertions I persuaded him to mount Aurora Borealis, while I walked by his side for the first mile. In that ride, where he felt the difference between his smooth, slippery saddle and the closely-packed one for which, without his knowledge, he had been carefully measured, and between the elastic, well-trained pace of the king of cobs and the severe canter of the riding master's hack or of the ill-broken brute he had bought for himself off a client, his countenance relaxed. He insisted on my mounting the horse that Evans had been riding, while the latter trudged behind, apparently weeping, with the horse's clothes. That day Mr. Bristow asked me to dinner.

"On the following day he rode Aurora Borealis. On the following he offered me a hundred guineas for him, and I refused to sell him at any price, although willing to lend him. Within three months I was engaged to Louey Bristow with the consent of her father, and, within six months we were married; within the year my father-in-law put me into his place—about five miles from the station we started from, and I can tell you it is a place, with some two thousand acres to farm. My dear Louey has made me what you see—never idle and the happiest of men."

"And the cob?"

"Has a paddock all to himself. You'll see him when you come down to us."

BULL-FIGHTING IN NEW YORK, AND IN MEXICO.

THE long-talked of bull-fight came off on Saturday afternoon, July 31st, in the new amphitheatre on Seventh Avenue, after an unexpected legal fight for possession of the entrance money at the box-office. At about 5:30 the band struck up a march, and eight Spanish toreros, dressed in gaudy costumes, and with their richly-colored capes hanging on their shoulders, advanced into the arena. None of them seemed to be under forty or forty-five years of age. They were led by Señor Angel Valdemoro, the chief, and took off their curiously-shaped black hats when the crowd cheered them. The toreros separated in the centre of the ring, after the manner of opening the "grand cavalcade" of a circus, and selected their cloaks, which had been hanging on the inner barrier. The crowd became uneasy, and awaited anxiously the appearance of some savage animal, which was going to make havoc with the valiant-looking Spaniards.

Mr. Henry Bergh was the virtual manager of the performance. His tall figure was conspicuous during the exhibition at the opening where the animals were turned into the arena. He was surrounded by Spaniards and Cubans, police officials and newspaper reporters. The manager, Mr. Fernandez, opened the gate ten feet distant, and between him and Mr. Bergh stood Mr. Hatfield, Superintendent of the S. P. C. A., who formed a direct communication between Mr. Fernandez and Mr. Bergh. When Mr. Bergh had seen enough of one of the capering animals he raised his forefinger and looked at Mr. Hatfield. Then he would say that that was "enough," or "Take him out," and the animal was removed.

Two fences divided the arena from the spectators, the inner barrier being five feet high, and over this the toreros had frequently to leap as the wild, long-horned Texan steers came charging at them. The third and seventh steers afforded the most sport.

At three minutes to six o'clock the third steer came in. He shot, as if discharged from a cannon, and bounded along the ground, snorting with noises like explosions at every bound. The Spanish doorkeeper on the upper tier, where the private boxes were, said loudly, "That's a good bull." The other Spaniards nodded approvingly. The brute stopped in the middle of the ring, flung his head up, bellowed, snorted and dug trenches in the earth with his hoofs.

Valdemoro, recovering from his astonishment, walked towards the ferocious beast and deftly wiped the animal's forehead with his pink cloak. There was a snort, a cloud of dust, a lunge, a humped mass of steer in the air, and Valdemoro leaped backwards ten feet. Another torero faced the danger. The bull dashed at the newcomer, and the newcomer shot over the fence. In less time than it can be written every torero engaged the steer, and all retreated rapidly. The animal seemed infuriated. He sent up the earth from beneath his hoofs in clouds. He snorted at every bound. Suddenly, finding the road clear, he followed the example of the toreros, and endeavored to leap the fence. He did not clear it, but hung across it like a half-filled bag across a clothes-line. An instant later he fell between the fences on his head. He was driven back into the inclosure; he dived into the group of toreros, and all sprang for the fence. The steer made a better jump, and stood on his fore legs with his hind hoofs in the air above the top of the fence. The spectators roared with laughter, and the toreros looked crestfallen. When the brute found himself on all fours he plunged along between the fences and caught Manager Fernandez napping. The little Spaniard flew for his life and scrambled on to the covered entrance to the ring, trembling, pale and speechless.

Again the people roared with laughter. This third and most ferocious steer sprang on the fence in the same place and in the same manner five times. The toreros nearly all distinguished themselves in their combats with him. Several of them ran at him with round sticks two feet in length, upon the ends of which sticky streamers of ribbon were fixed. Watching their opportunity, they leaped between the animal's horns, distracted his attention with their cloaks, and succeeded in leaving the streamers hanging from his shoulders. When at last the steer saw the open gate and ran from his tormentors, the Spanish gentlemen, who had fatigued themselves with alternate fits of cheering and of laughter, rewarded the toreros with showers of cigars, which they tossed into the arena.

Steer number seven was full of fire and action. One of the most notable combats was that between this beast and the torero in red. The torero taunted the steer for ten minutes. Advancing towards the beast's lowered horns, with his cloak rolled up, but held by two upper corners, the red-coated fighter suddenly launched the cloak into the air so that it floated before the steer's eyes and moved with the motion of the steer's head. If the steer started to the right the cloak floated there, but the torero had leaped to the other side. In a twinkling the bull was where the torero had been, and the torero was on the other side, but the cloak still floated before the bull's eyes. If the bull dashed at the centre of the floating cloud of cotton it was only to find himself blinded; if he retreated, the cloak followed; if by a lucky chance he lunged directly at the discreet torero, the torero was gone. Once during this encounter, while Valdemoro hung upon the fence, the steer quitted the man in red and dashed at the champion. His horns struck the fence, but Valdemoro's legs were between them, and they escaped.

According to Señor Fernandez's programme there were to be two more exhibitions, but, on August 3d, Mr Bergh notified him that he would not permit a repetition.

During the visit of the Industrial Deputation to Mexico last year a bull-fight was held at a little village called Tlanapantla, situated about twelve miles from the City of Mexico, as the corrida, or bull-fight, is forbidden by law within the cercuir of the capital. This is an enactment of recent date for the bull-ring still exists, while in all the leading cities and towns of the country the Plaza de Toros is an institution, notably at Puebla. Señor Riva Pallacio, then Minister of Public Works, got up this bull-fight at his own expense at a cost of some $6,000. The American party was conveyed by special train to Tlanapantla, and at four o'clock the fight commenced. The ring was very large and laid down with sand. Instead of one continued barrier, as in Spain, there were recesses or stout barricades of wood behind which the toreros or bull-fighters leaped when occasion demanded. In the ring was a Merry Andrew, or clown, whose rôle was to play fantastic tricks with the bull, and to indulge in political and popular allusions. At a given signal—the "call" upon a trumpet—the toreros entered the ring in procession, followed by the picadors or men armed with blunted lances, riding the leanest horses, one eye of each horse being blindfolded, the flanks and back of the animal protected by a suit of sheet-iron cuirass.

Digitized by Google

After the picadors marched the banderilleros, whose duty it is to plant darts in the shoulders of the bull; then came the chulos or men who flash their cloaks before the baited brute; then the espadas, out of whose ranks comes the matador, the man who slays the bull; then the muchachos, or attendants; and winding up the procession, the horses with the tiros, with showy trappings, destined to bear away the dead body of the slaughtered bull. Again the trumpet brayed forth, and the picadors, grasping lances, the chulos close to the barricades, prepared to receive the onslaught of the bull. There was a deathlike silence as the ponderous wooden gate was flung open and the bull darted forth, the divisa, or knot of ribbon denoting his breed, dangling from his shoulders. The glories of a Mexican sun shone down on 10,000 people seated in tiers, one above another, around this circular basin of yellow sand. The building had no roof.

Like an arrow from a bow darted the bull from the toril, excited to madness by the prick of the divisa dexterously plunged into his neck. The picador was at his post—that is, eight or nine yards from the door and two from the barrier. The bull bounded right into the centre of the arena, where he stood with head and tail erect, blinded by the sudden glare of the sun, and bewildered by the sight of the thousands of spectators; then, perceiving the picador, he lowered his head and charged at him full tilt. The lance, passing beneath the arm of the picador, arrested the furious animal for a second by striking him on the shoulder, from whence a bright stream of blood now began to trickle, but the iron, as was intended, had only entered skin-deep. The bull having made a movement to the right, the lance slipped upon him, and in an instant one of his long, sharp horns was deeply buried in the chest of the horse, from whence the blood commenced to spurt in great ghastly gouts. Again did the bull return to the charge, unmindful of the flashing cloaks of the chulos, and in the second rush the animal got beneath the picador's guard, hurling man and horse to the earth. Instantly the chulos flashed their capas before the bull and drew him off, while the picador was assisted from the ring. After two horses had been killed, the picadors quitted the ring, and the alcalde, or mayor, caused the trumpet to summon the banderilleros. The banderillas are little pieces of wood about half an inch in diameter and two feet long, ornamented for two-thirds of the length by gayly colored tissue-paper, till they resemble huge bonbons. At one end is a steel dart, shaped like a harpoon. They are used in pairs, and six pairs having been planted in the shoulders of the bull, the trumpet sounded for the espada. The matador stepped forth, bearing the muleta or blood-red cloak of office in his left, the long straight sword in his right hand. Flinging his montera or little hat in the air, he uttered el brindis, a short speech, declaring his intention of killing the bull or perishing in the attempt, and then stepped forth, and, after some preliminary skirmishing, plunged his sword through the shoulders of the bull right through its heart.

After this the mountebank played tricks with the slaughtered animal, which afforded the Mexicans the most exquisite delight. Then came the lassoing of the bull by caballeros on mustangs, the Merry Andrew riding the lassoed animal amid ten thousand runs, and, lastly, the sacrifice of another bull done to death as the first.

In Spain alone is bull-fighting to be seen. Everything else bearing the name is but a mockery, a delusion and a snare.

GENERAL GARFIELD'S TRIP TO NEW YORK CITY.

THE journey of General Garfield through New York State last week was made the occasion of enthusiastic demonstrations in favor of the Republican candidates for President and Vice-President. From the time he reached Buffalo until he reached New York he was warmly greeted at every station, and his return trip was equally agreeable. A special train was made up for him by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, and, through the admirable management of its authorities, halts were made at eighteen of the principal towns on the line of the road, to afford the people an opportunity for greeting the distinguished traveler.

The greater part of the evening and night of Tuesday, August 3d, was spent in receiving the citizens of Buffalo at the Palmer Hotel. Delegation followed delegation, serenade followed serenade, and the party had only three hours' sleep before being called up to take the special train. General Garfield was accompanied by a number of prominent citizens and Western friends. The party started at 6:30 o'clock, amid the cheers of a large crowd, who, despite the earliness of the hour, had gathered to bid them good-by.

Lieutenant-Governor Hoskins, acting for Governor Cornell, took charge of the party, and introduced General Garfield to the people of the State at the several cities where halts were made. He was accompanied by the following members of the Governor's staff: Adjutant-General Frederick Townsend, General Charles P. Easton and Colonel John T. Mott. The train reached Batavia, the first stopping-place, at 7:33, and steamed into the station amid the booming of cannon and the cheers of a crowd of thousands of persons, many of whom were evidently workingmen. General Garfield stepped from the rear platform, and was briefly introduced by Lieutenant-Governor Hoskins, both gentlemen making brief speeches. Cannon boomed, the bands played, the crowd cheered, and amid all this racket the train, with loud-clanging bell and piercing whistle, left Batavia. So good time was made between this and the next stop, Rochester, that the party arrived at the depot ahead of the bands and the members of the Lincoln Club, who, having obtained bright new uniforms for the occasion, had hoped to make quite an imposing appearance. The train was two minutes ahead of time. The first shot from the cannon, however, started the whole population for the station, and in a few seconds a crowd of over 8,000 people had collected around the rear of the car. As the second salute was fired, the Lincoln Club, with its band, came up, and owing to some little delay in the starting of the train, they had time to present General Garfield with an address.

The train arrived at Lyons at 9:32, punctually on time, and was received by a large crowd, a salute of cannon, and similar demonstrations of welcome to those which it had met with at the previous stopping-places.

At Syracuse, which was reached at 11 o'clock, there was a larger and more enthusiastic crowd awaiting General Garfield than had been met with anywhere on the line since leaving Buffalo. It began at the depot and extended as far as the Journal office, the balcony and windows of which were crowded with enthusiastic employés. It was evidently the belief that the train would stop at the station, instead of which it was slowly moved through the sea of upturned faces to the Central Square, as a place better suited to accommodate the multitude. It crossed Salina Street and came to a standstill opposite the Remington House, and was immediately surrounded by the cheering crowd. A drizzling rain was falling at the time. The Remington, Vanderbilt and the lesser hotels in the square were covered with flags and bunting, and a cannon placed in the centre of the square was fired repeatedly. The crowd, when compacted, filled up the whole square for more than a block, and when a portable platform came up, pushed by a locomotive, they with difficulty made way for it.

Short addresses were made at these places by General Garfield and the gentlemen of his company, and the same courtesies were observed at Rome, Utica, Little Falls, Palatine Bridge, Amsterdam and Schenectady. At Albany, General Arthur boarded the train, and a warm greeting took place between himself and General Garfield.

On the trip down the Hudson stoppages were made at Hudson, Fishkill, Garrison's, Peekskill and Yonkers.

At exactly 7:40 o'clock the train entered the Grand Union Depot in this city. Immediately loud explosions were heard sounding in the great building, like the firing of a battery of heavy artillery. Twenty-five signal torpedoes had been placed on the track, and as the cars moved towards the platform they were exploded in quick succession. This acted as a signal for the crowd, and a rush was made through the gate to the train. Before the train ceased moving the crowd had surrounded it, and cheers were given before General Garfield appeared. As he stepped from the platform the police order became completely broken, and he was surrounded and fairly besieged by the enthusiastic gathering. Hearty cheers filled the air, and hats were waved as he slowly made his way to the depot entrance. It was thought that over 2,000 persons were in the depot at this time. They crowded upon street-car platforms and car-steps, and pushed each other in all directions in order to get a sight at the Republican candidate for President.

General Garfield had a busy time on Thursday. From early morn to late at night his reception-room was a constant centre of interest to prominent members of the Republican Party, and the list of callers included some of the most distinguished names in that party. He received a committee from the Union League of America, and made some brief remarks in regard to the principles of that organization. In the evening General Fremont and the members of the Republican Central Campaign Club were received, but there were no speeches. On Friday evening there was a serenade on an extensive scale at the headquarters of the National Committee, and on Saturday the special train left Jersey City on the Erie Road. Stoppages were made at a number of cities, and the party stopped over Sunday at Chautauqua Lake.

The Distribution of Wealth in Paris.

THERE is little doubt that in a few years the City of New York will contain more wealthy people than any capital in the world. At present it is only exceeded in the number of its millionaires by London. Paris may glitter, but solid gold and substance is more plentifully distributed in the two capitals of commerce. A French writer has made an approximative calculation as to the incomes of the inhabitants of Paris. His conclusions are based on the house rents, and can scarcely be regarded as anything more than approximative. Making due allowance for the large rents, he finds that 421 individuals have incomes over $53,000; 1,413 possess incomes ranging from $53,000 to $26,600; 3,049 from $26,600 to $14,000; 9,985 from $14,000 to $6,400; 21,453 from $6,400 to $3,400; 16,198 from $3,400 to $2,000; 17,302 from $2,000 to $1,500; 21,147 from $1,500 to $1,200; 61,083 from $1,200 to $800; 74,360 from $800 to $480; and 468,841 individuals, judging from the house rents they pay, can have only incomes below the last figure.

And the calculation has been made based on the different styles of funerals. The Paris undertakers have accommodatingly classified funerals into nine sorts, and the Potter's Field interment comes in with a tenth division. Of 53,218 interments in 1879, 28,761 were of this tenth category—or 547 per thousand, taking the figures for four years. Thus, the annual number of Potters' Field interments in Paris is almost equal to the total number of funerals in our city. How can such a fact be reconciled with the reported prosperity and thrift of the Parisians? It might be said that the poorest families in the United States strain every nerve and often place an unnecessary amount of pride in providing for the last rites; but it also is proof that, despite the misery which undoubtedly exists in American cities, there is yet a wide difference between the condition of their working populations and those of European cities. They live better in one sense of the word; and when they die, they have infinitely more chances of a "decent" funeral.

Growth of Cities.

THE New England cities show large gains in population since 1870, as the following table indicates:

Names of Places.	1870.	1880.	Increase Per ct.
Boston	250,526	332,000	40
Cambridge	39,634	51,533	32
Fall River	26,766	47,883	80
Hartford	37,180	42,024	13
Lawrence	28,921	39,400	35
Lowell	40,928	61,200	50
Lynn	28,233	38,367	35
Manchester	23,536	32,473	37
New Haven	50,840	62,000	18
Portland	31,413	33,796	7
Providence	68,904	104,500	52
Springfield	26,703	33,149	18
Worcester	41,105	58,293	41

The highest percentage of municipal growth shown by the census is that of Denver, which has increased during the decade at the rate of 450 per cent. Minneapolis ranks second, with a rate of 400 per cent., and Oakland, Cal., third, with a rate of 223 per cent. St. Paul, Minn., and Camden, N. J., share the fourth place with a rate of 107 per cent. Grand Rapids, Mich., is credited with 93 per cent.; St. Joseph, Mo., with 87 per cent.; Omaha, Neb., with 72 per cent., and Atlanta, Ga., with 78 per cent.

The following table shows the growth in population of various cities of the Union outside of New England and the South, the great centres of population not being included:

Names of Places.	1870.	1880.	Increase Per ct.
Albany, N. Y.	69,422	90,713	30
Allegheny, Pa.	53,180	78 472	47
Buffalo, N. Y.	117,714	154,766	31
Cleveland, O.	92,829	159,464	72
Columbus, O.	31,274	51,337	64
Dayton, O.	30,473	39 000	28
Detroit, Mich.	79,577	116,027	46
Indianapolis, Ind.	48,244	75,031	55
Jersey City, N. J.	82,546	105,000	28
Kansas City, Mo.	32,260	56,946	77
Milwaukee, Wis.	71,440	115,480	61
Newark, N. J.	105,059	136 983	29
Paterson, N. J.	86,076	121,977	40
Pittsburgh, Pa.	38 930	43,239	14
Reading, Pa.	33,386	87,057	16
Rochester, N. Y.	35,093	48 756	39
Scranton, Pa.	43,051	52,210	21
Syracuse, N. Y.	33,584	53,635	59
Toledo, O.	66,465	56,594	23
Troy, N. Y.	28,804	38 925	35

Charms against Lightning.

SCIENCE, with all its confidence, has provided no safeguards against thunder-storms. It can warn, but it cannot protect. Conductors may happily carry off the electric current, but they cannot secure us from danger. The timid may be told emphatically to stand in the middle of the room, to avoid fireplaces and brass ornaments, or to roll themselves up in feather-beds or hearth-rugs; but these precautions will be of little avail if houses, as at Manchester, tumble down and bury all alike, the terrified and the bold, in a common ruin. There have been in all ages popular superstitions having for their object to avert the dangers of thunder and lightning. The Thracian soldiers took up their bows and arrows and fired into the clouds to drive away the storm, and it was considered necessary to erect a cross on St. Paul's steeple, in London, filled with the relics of saints, in order to free the city from all danger of destructive tempests. Constant on the belief that an evil spirit raged in the storm, it was a custom in old times, as well in England as in France and Germany, to ring church bells in order to protect the frightened inhabitants. When they rang out the great bell at the Abbey of St. Germain, in Paris, or chimes in the tower of St. Adelon, in Malmesbury Abbey, the faithful assisted the bell-ringers with their prayers, and helped to stay the storm. Many more homely charms against thunder and lightning exist to this day in some parts of England. The curious herb known as the house-leek, growing on the house-top of rustic cottages, is supposed to be as valuable a preservative as any scientific lightning-conductor of approved pattern. Peasants, true to the faith of their forefathers, still carry beneath their waistcoats scraps of bay leaf or laurel as an amulet—a custom as old as, if not older than, the days of Tiberius Cæsar. A London paper says: "We may have got beyond the superstition that allowed a dead man killed by a storm to lie where he fell, in order that the spot might be fenced about and a sheep promptly sacrificed on a rude altar; but it would be strange if country folk did not still place a cold iron bar on the beer barrels to prevent the liquor from turning sour during a thunder-storm; and that swans' eggs are only hatched during a loud peal of thunder is a belief yet cherished by those who watch this bird for signs of atmospherical electricity as closely and confidently as they listen for the scream of the peacock to betoken rain. Countless experiments have been tried to ascertain the scientific causes of a thunder-storm and to determine its proper meaning, from the time when Franklin sent up his silk kite attached to a dry hempen cord and narrowly escaped the danger of drawing fire from the heavens, until the days when electric researches were checked by the death of Professor Richmann, of St. Petersburg, who drew out so much electricity from the thunder-cloud that he was promptly killed on the spot. It is consolatory to reflect, however, that the chances of being personally injured by lightning are very much less than the risks involved in a thousand human inventions."

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The Review at Windsor.

On Wednesday, July 14th, Her Majesty reviewed in Windsor Great Park the Aldershot Army Corps, under the command of Sir Daniel Lysons, K.C.B. The troops numbered 10,000, and had marched over from Aldershot the previous day, having encamped for the night on Ascot Heath and Chobham. On Her Majesty's arrival a salute was fired, and the Queen, who was accompanied in her carriage by the Princess of Wales and the Princess Christian, the Princess Beatrice, the Duchess of Connaught and the two sons of the Prince of Wales being in a second carriage, drove up and down the line and took her station at the saluting point. Then the march-past commenced, the Royal Horse Artillery leading the way. Next came the Household Cavalry Brigade, led by the Prince of Wales as Colonel-in-Chief, and who, in this instance, wore both the helmet and cuirass of the Life Guards. After saluting Her Majesty, the Prince quitted his regiment and rode up by the side of the Royal carriage. Then followed in quick succession numerous cavalry and artillery regiments, the Grenadiers and Scots Guards, the Rifle Brigade, led by the Duke of Connaught, and subsequently the Light Cavalry, the Engineers, with telegraph apparatus and wagons, and the batteries of Field Artillery. The march past at an end, various manœuvres were executed by the different divisions.

The Princess of Wales and the Chelsea Hospital for Women.

The Chelsea Hospital for Women was founded in 1871 for the reception and treatment of gentlewomen in reduced circumstances and of respectable poor women, and was established in a building in the King's Road, Chelsea. The number of patients, however, increased so rapidly that it was felt necessary to secure further accommodation, and an appeal was sent forth for funds to build a new hospital. This being duly responded to, and a site having been obtained in the Fulham Road, the foundation-stone was laid by the Princess of Wales on July 16th. A large number of people were invited to witness the ceremony, and the Princess, who was accompanied by the Prince and two of her children, was received by the Bishop of London and the authorities of the hospital. A silver trowel was handed the Princess by the senior physician, with which she took mortar and plastered the stone. After it was lowered to its proper site, a number of ladies and children passed before the Princess, all bearing purses of money which they laid upon the stone, to the amount of $5,000.

King Humbert at the Shooting Festival.

Like his father, Victor Emmanuel, Humbert, the present King of Italy, is known throughout his kingdom as a Nimrod of considerable might. The late king usually sought relief from the cares of state in a hunting excursion or a rifle contest with his favorites, never disdaining to leave the pomp of his person and rank in his palace. Hut the present King and Queen have attained immense popularity by freely mingling with the people, and participating in their pleasures and sadnesses. It was not to be wondered at, then, that at the late festival of sharpshooters at Rome, King Humbert appeared with his rifle, and, begging the privilege of shooting with the marksmen, took his place on the range and fired away to his heart's content.

Distributing Flags to the French Army.

During the ceremony of presenting the new flags to the French army on July 14th, the four highest officers of state, M. Grevy, President of the Republic; M. Léon Say, President of the Senate; M. Gambetta, President of the Chamber of Deputies, and M. Freycinet, President of the Council of Ministers, occupied the centre of a grand pavilion, with the members of the Senate on one hand and those of the Chamber on the other. The troops, having first saluted the President, were inspected by the Minister of War and the military attachés of the foreign ambassadors. The President then distributed the flags, bowing as an aide-de-camp handed the flag to an ensign, who handed it to the colonel, who, after saluting the President, returned it to the ensign.

The New Hotel de Ville, Paris.

As cities in the Middle Age purchased charters from the kings, they set up their city halls. That of Paris was for centuries a very modest structure, but on the 1st of July, 1533, the corner-stone of an imposing edifice was laid by Peter Viole, and the erection began under the direction of Dominic Boccador, of Cortona, as architect. Civil wars checked the progress, and the Hotel de Ville, begun under Francis I., was not completed till the year 1628, in the reign of Louis XIII. It was a very handsome edifice, but in time became too small. Napoleon proposed to enlarge it, but this was not actually done till 1837, when the architect Godde superintended the additions which took seven years to complete, and were in perfect harmony with the original structure. All was destroyed by the Commune in 1871. Two years after the city selected, from sixty-six plans submitted, that of Messrs. Ballu and Deperthes. The new City Hall stands on the old site and is nearly completed; it reproduces in general effect the old Hotel de Ville, and will be a remarkable restoration of old Paris. Our illustration shows the west and south fronts, which are more imposing than in the preceding buildings.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—A NEW design for national bank notes is suggested, to make counterfeiting more difficult.

—A LARGE number of very rich silver mines have been discovered in the State of Guerrero, Mexico.

—THE Greek Government has abandoned the proposed mobilization of the army in deference to the advice of the Powers.

—THE Compensation for Disturbance in Ireland Bill was defeated in the House of Lords on August 2d, by a vote of 282 to 51.

—THE Chilian transport Loa was blown up by a torpedo in Callao Bay, July 2d. About 150 men, including most of the officers, perished.

—THE Government of Colombia has given permission to a company to lay a cable on the west coast of Panama, to connect with the United States.

—IT is estimated that the California wheat crop this year will amount to 47,500,000 bushels, the whole value of which will be close on $43,000,000.

—A BRITISH ship has sailed for TEXAS with 3,500 barrels of oil, made for the purpose of preserving railroad ties and bridge timbers under a new process.

—THE work of reconstruction upon the Washington Monument was commenced August 6th, and twenty feet will be added to the height before December.

—THE returns of the French elections for Conseils-Généraux show that 804 Republicans and 325 Conservatives were elected. The Republicans gain 189.

—BY a vote of 13 to 8 the Aldermen of New York have adopted a cat ordinance similar to that relating to dogs, and the Mayor is authorized to appoint official cat-catchers at once.

—DR. CHARLES H. KENNEDY and Rev. Thomas R. Miller, of Philadelphia, have been held for trial in connection with the issuing of spurious medical diplomas in that city.

—THE population of Maine, estimated from the returns already in, is 646,000, against 626,915 in 1870. The population of Vermont is 334,455, a gain of 3,904 over the census of 1870.

—THE railroad engineers, switchmen, gatemen, etc., in Connecticut, are protesting against the tests for the discovery of color blindness, which prevents their employment by the railroad companies.

—THE municipal governments of St. Petersburg and Moscow are on the eve of the verge of bankruptcy, trying to get off being compelled to contribute to the opera in those cities, but it is doubtful if they succeed.

—THE census returns from seventy-five counties in Missouri show an increase in the population of 225,449 since 1870, and if the other thirty-nine counties make as good a showing the population of the State will be over 2,200,000, an increase of half a million, or thirty per cent. in ten years.

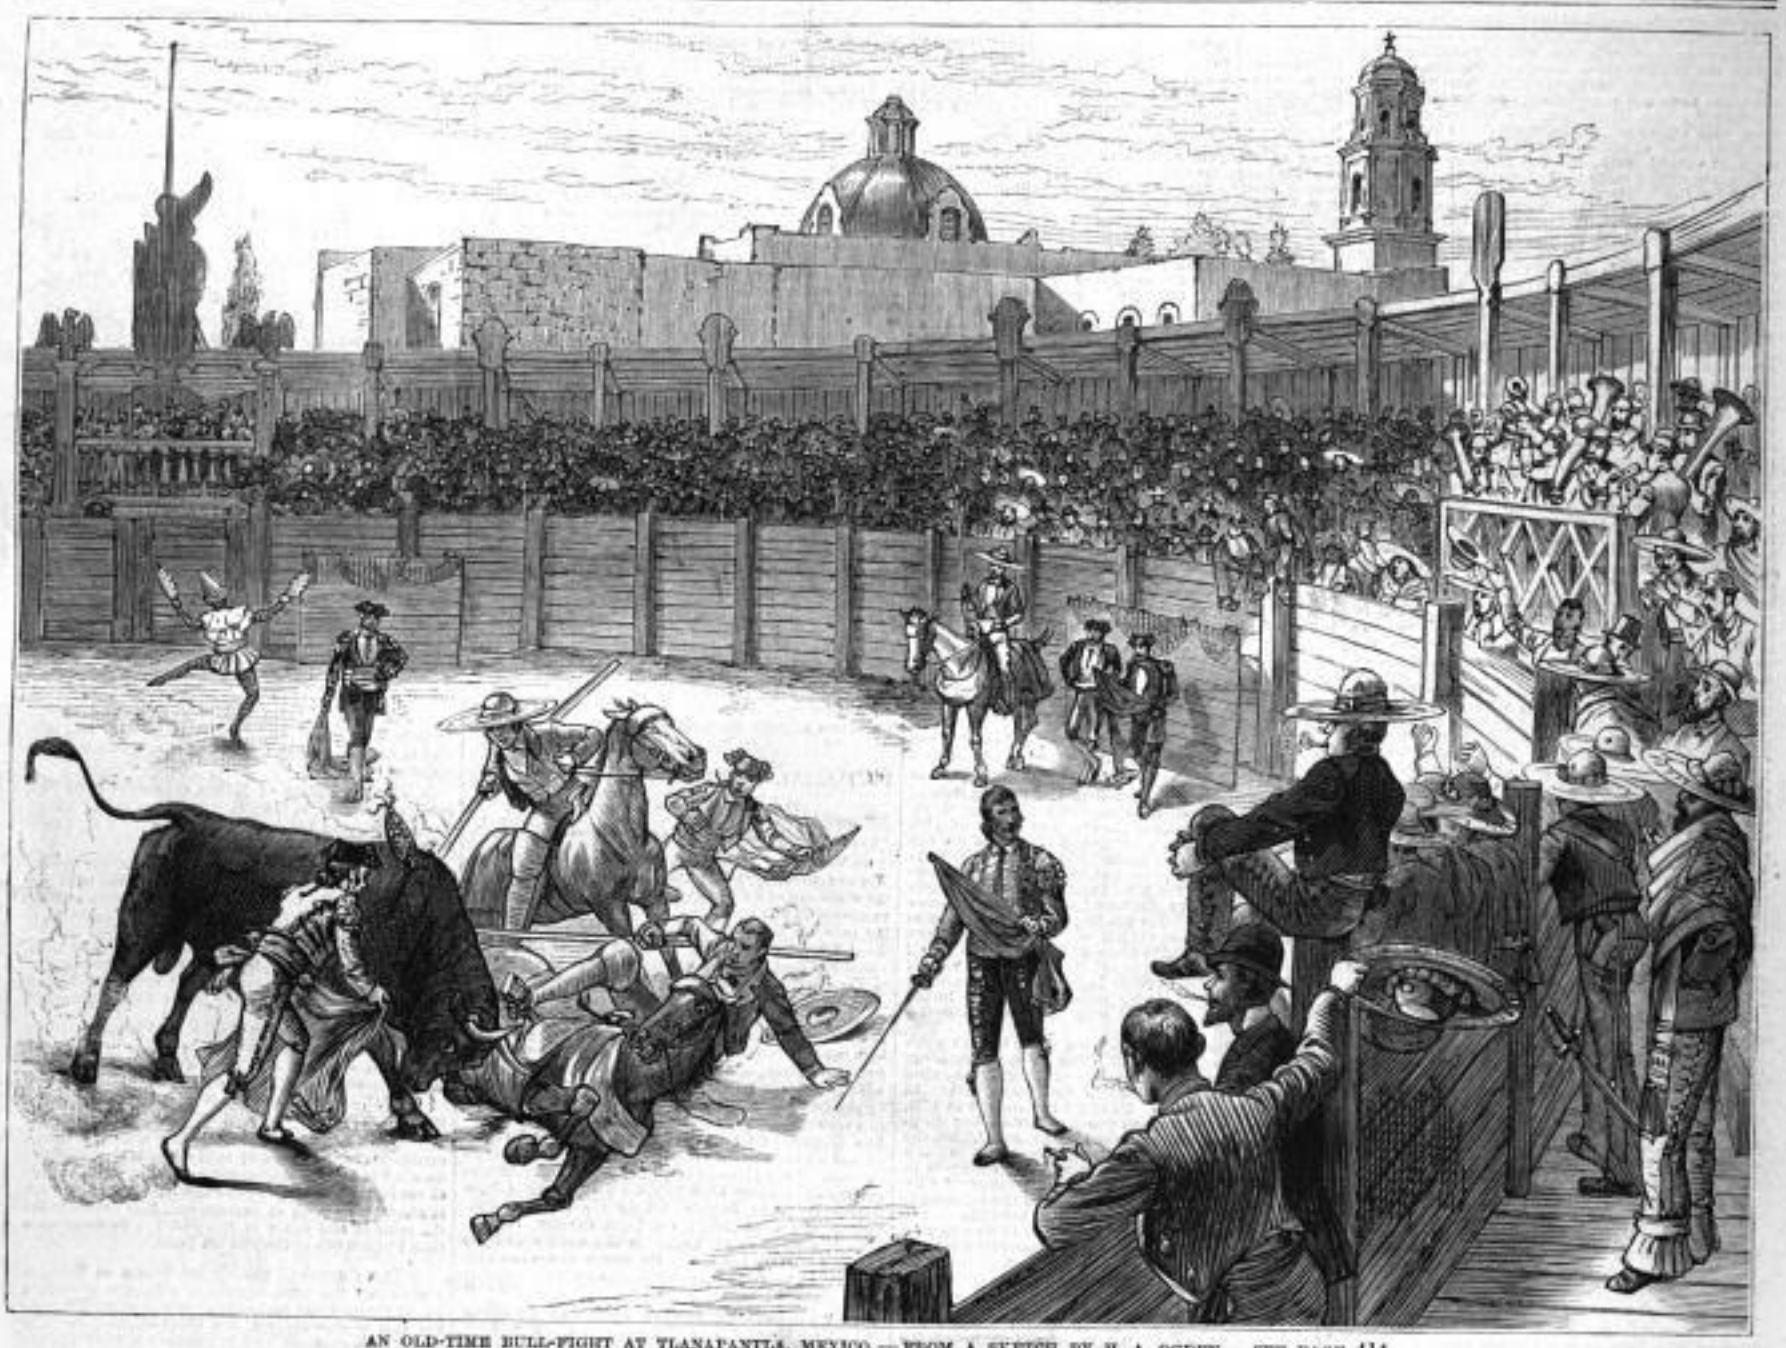
—THE enormous public indebtedness of Canada excites grave apprehension in the minds of thoughtful men. The system of decentralization has acted largely to the cost of government, and this has been greatly felt in the recent period of depression. It is believed that the value of real estate in Montreal has declined more than $10,000,000 in the past ten years.

—THE Consul of the United States at Bremen reports that the total number of emigrants who have passed through that port en route to this country during the past quarter reaches the unprecedented figure of 31,971, being greater by 5,721 than the total number during the whole of the year 1879, and an increase of 22,051 over the first quarter of the current year.

—A COMMITTEE, including some of the leading members of the Roman aristocracy, has been formed to promote the holding of an international exhibition in Rome in 1885. The advocates of the scheme have received encouraging letters from the Duke d'Aosta, ex-King of Spain; Premier Gladstone, of England; and M. Gambetta, President of the French Chamber of Deputies.

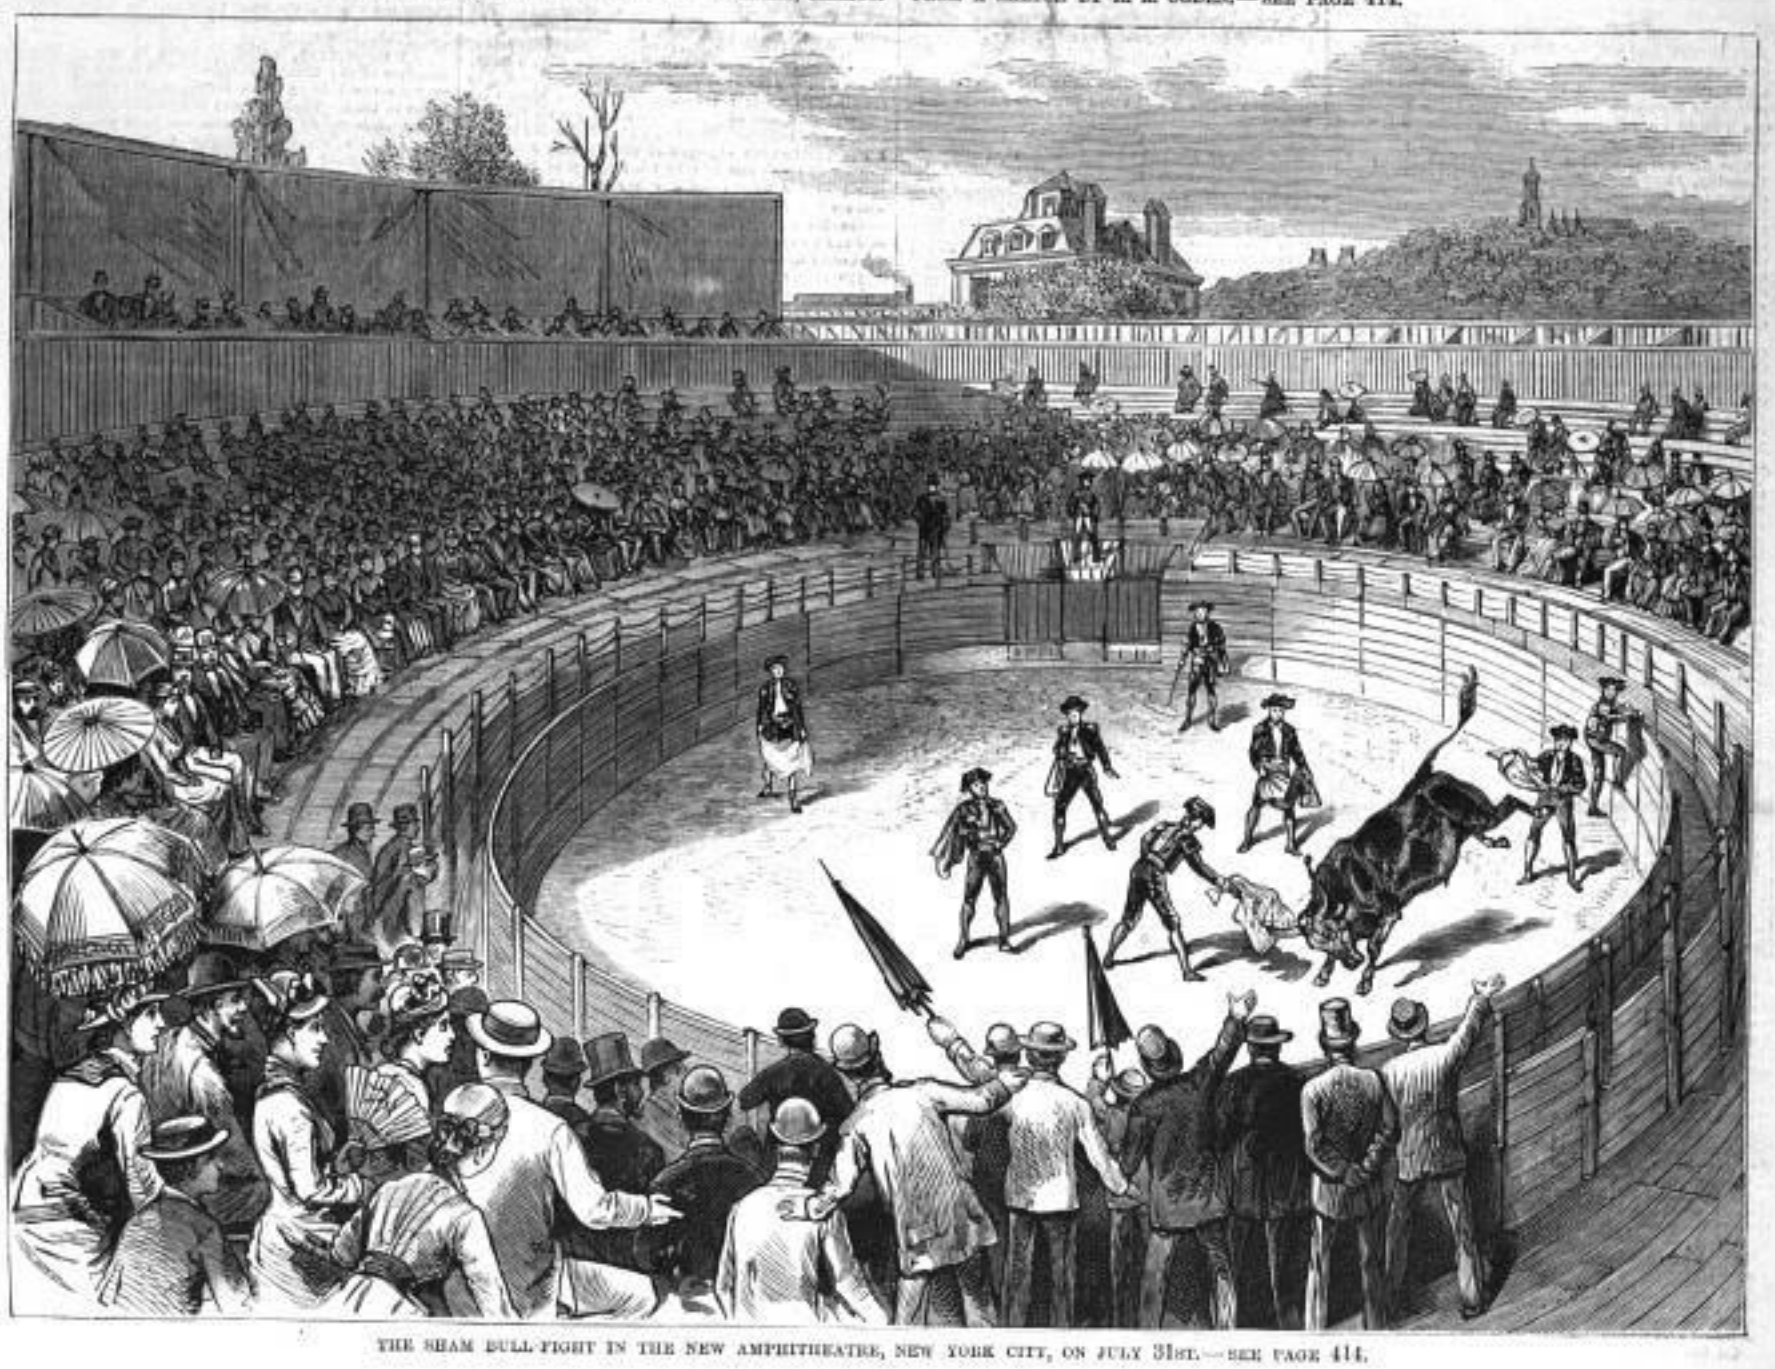
—JUSTICE COOKE, of the Supreme Court, in Brooklyn, rendered a decision in the contest between General James Jourdan and the old Commissioners of Police, John Tyburn and Oliver B. Leech, for the control of the Police Department, giving to General Jourdan the control of the department as Commissioner under the Single Head Bill passed by the Legislature last Winter.

—A STATUE to the memory of Rouget de L'Isle, the author of the "Marseillaise," is about to be erected in France. The committee having the matter in charge reminds the public how one general in command of the Republican armies wrote, after a battle, "We were one against ten, but the 'Marseillaise' was on our side"; and how another, asking for reinforcements, wrote, "Send me a thousand men and a copy of the 'Marseillaise,' and I will answer for the victory."



—IT is said that an Irish member intends to move a resolution in the House of Commons at the earliest opportunity declaring that the direct and indirect share of the peerage in legislation is far in excess of its legitimate interest in the government of the Empire, and that the time will come when, to redress this preponderance, the sons, brothers and heirs presumptive of members of the House of Lords will be declared incapable of sitting in the House of Commons.

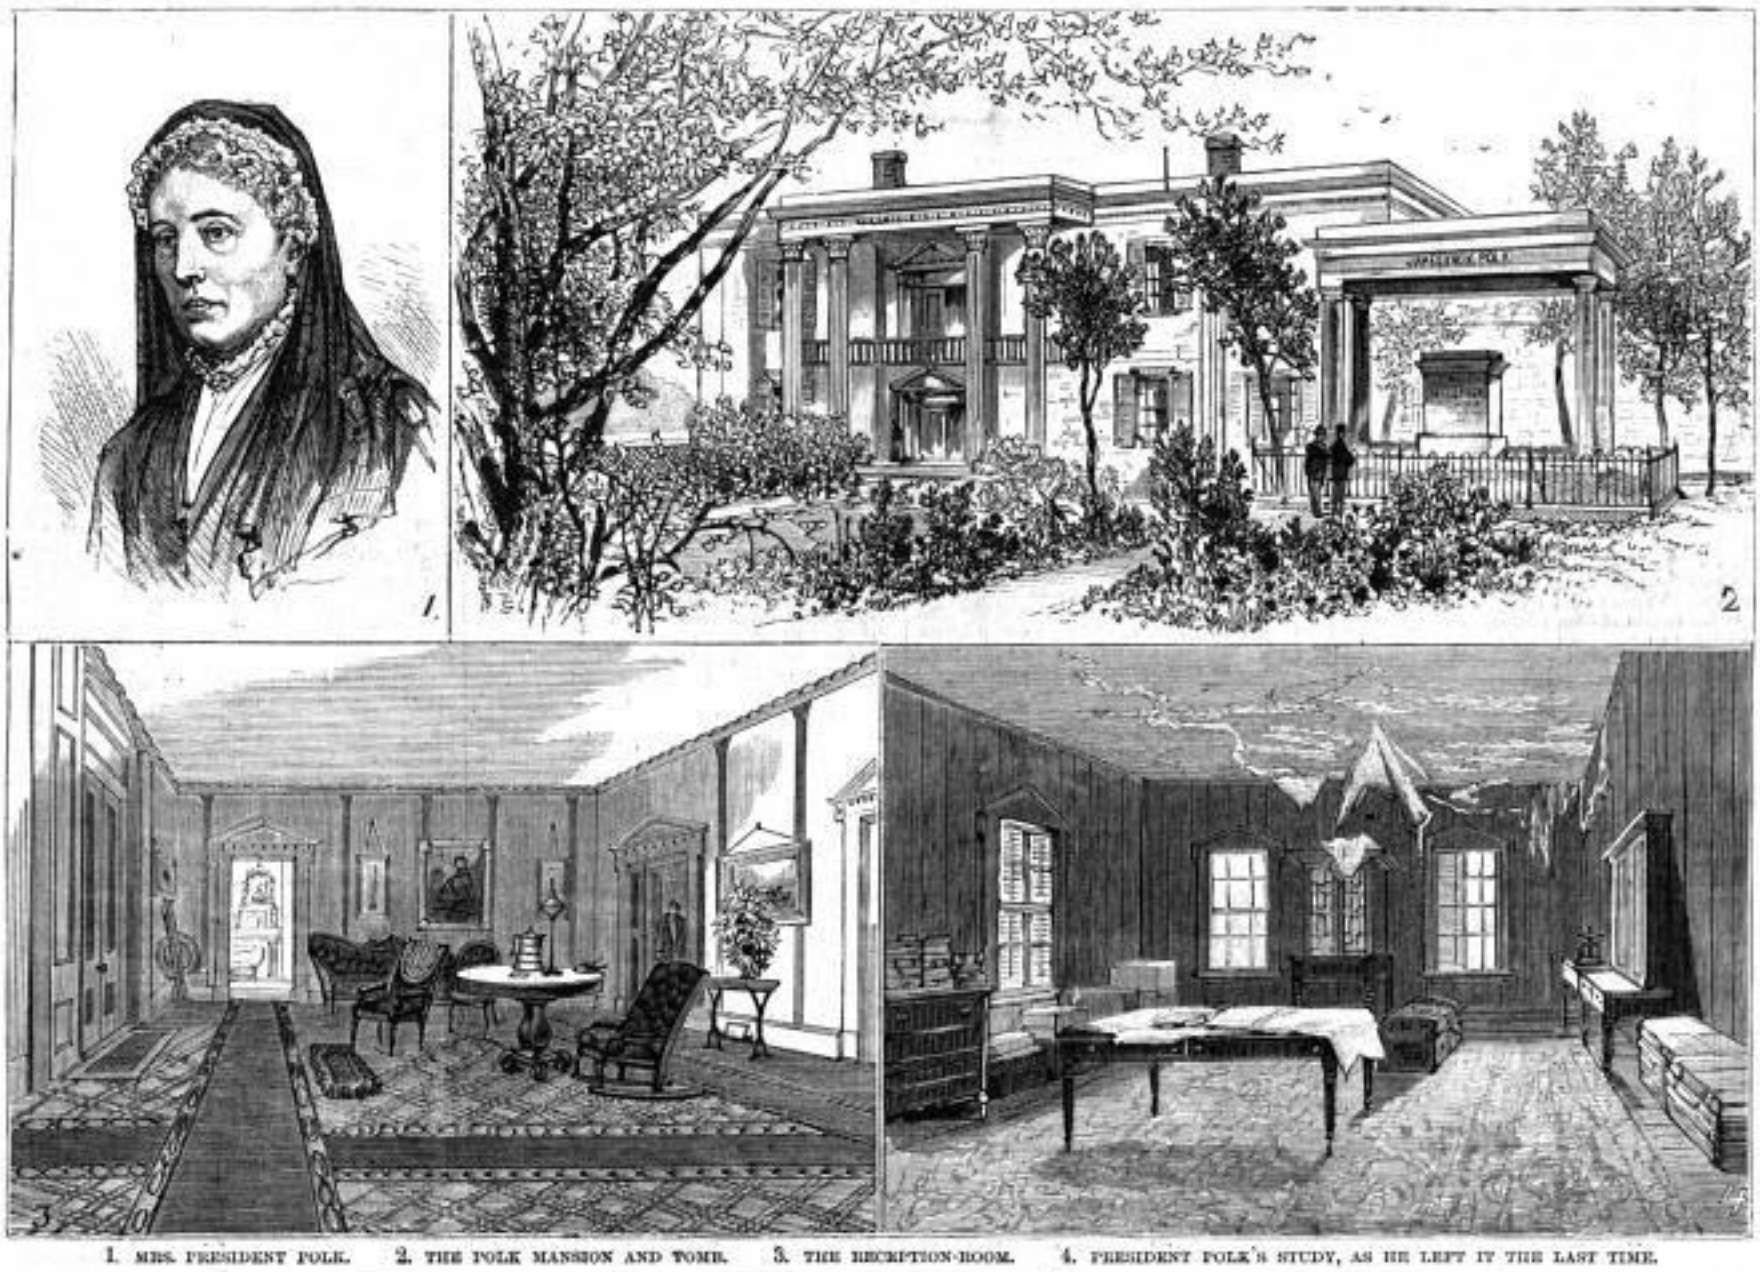
—ADVICES from the City of Mexico are to July 27th. The disorders and revolts reported recently from various parts of the Republic, though inspiring no serious fears, continue, notwithstanding the assertion that all was quiet. The opposition, enraged at General Gonzalez's success, calls President Diaz a bloody despot, and predicts that Gonzalez will be a worse one. The situation of the country is confused and undefined. President Diaz has called General Gonzalez to the capital.



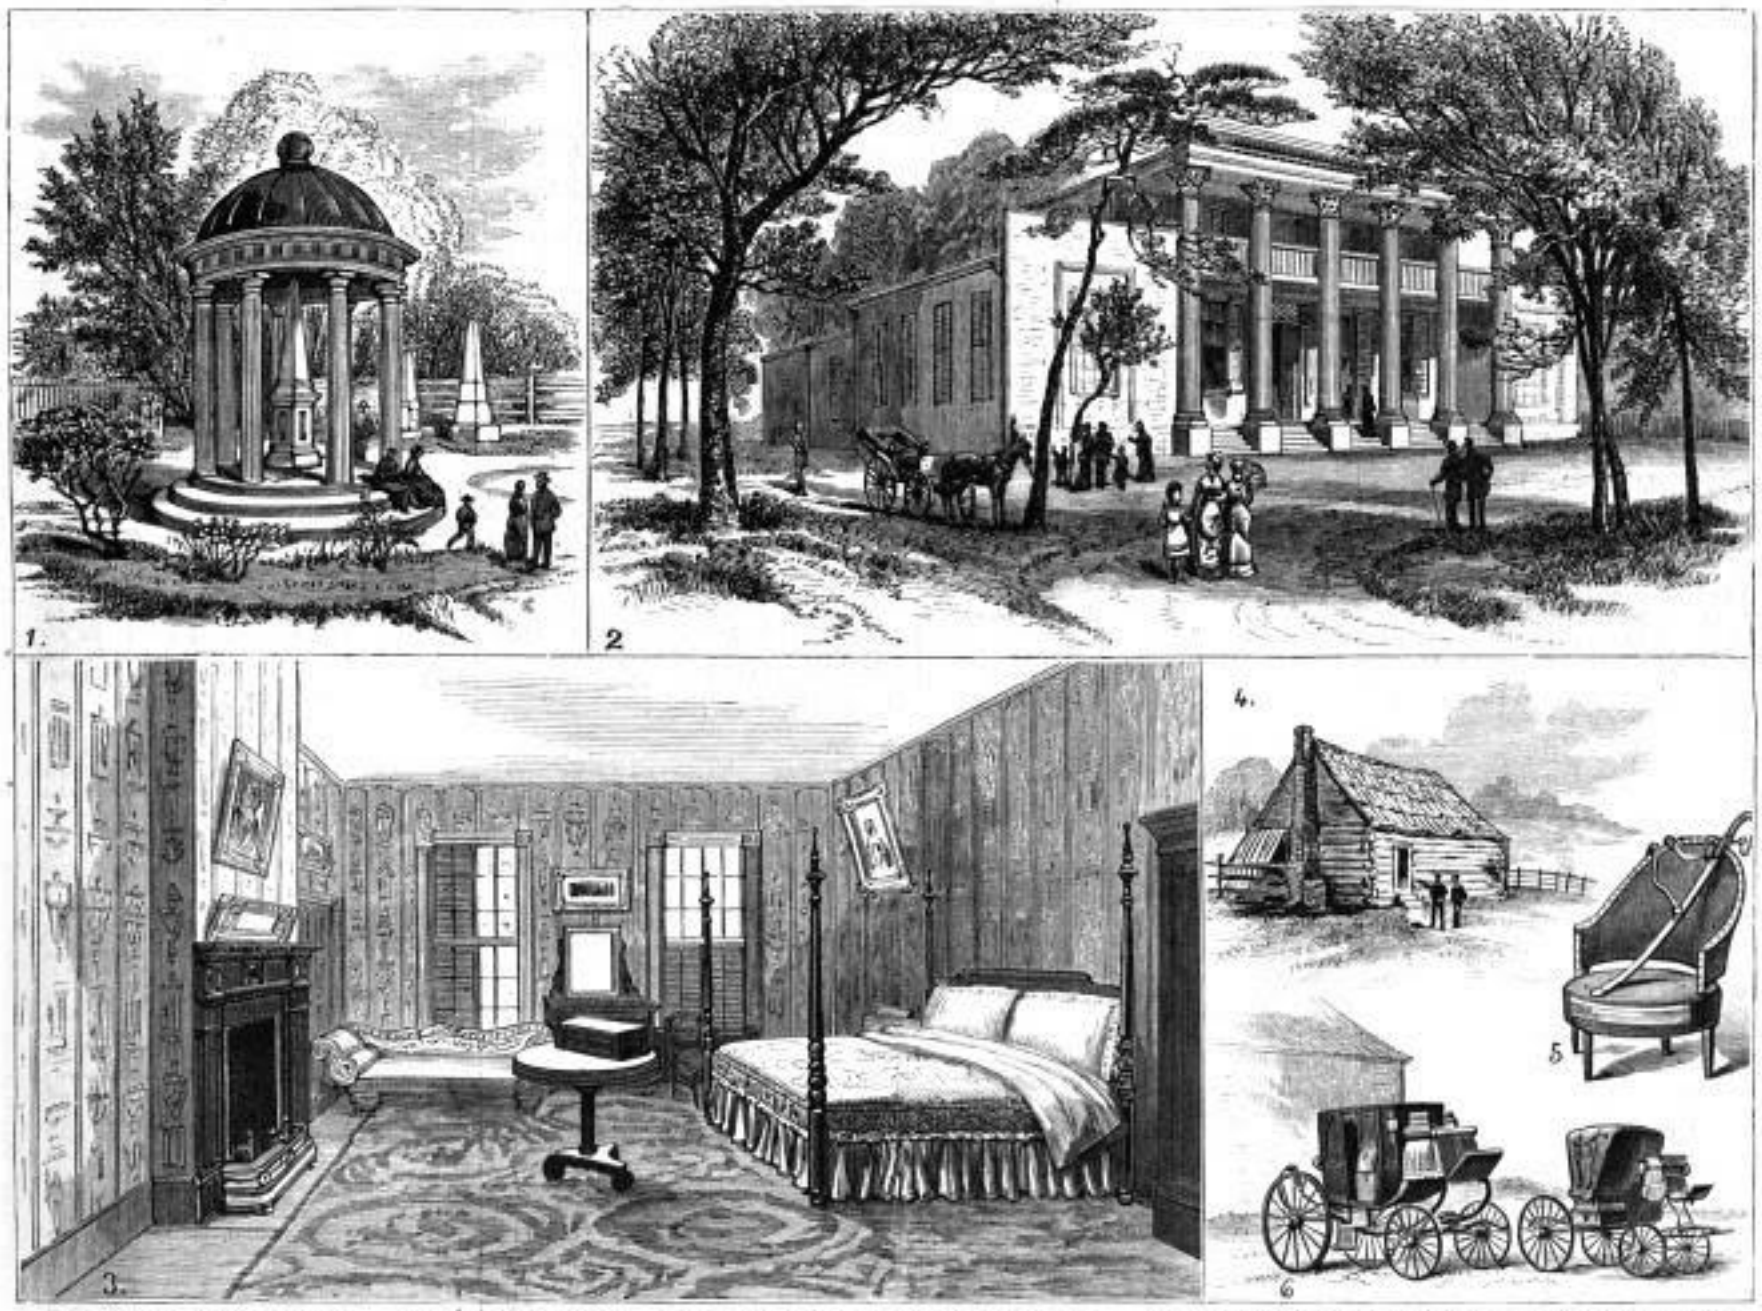
—A COMPANY, the capital stock of which is chiefly owned in Cincinnati, is negotiating with the cable companies for the lease of a line for eight days for the purpose of testing experiments for telephonic communication with Europe. It is believed that the new French line will be secured. The arrangements, it is thought, will be completed in a few days. The process upon which the proposed work is to be done is based upon the Orangbough invention of 1868, and the recent Klemm patents. Ample capital has already been raised for completing the plan. Several Eastern influential business men are associated with the enterprise. The tests will be made from New York City.

—JERUSALEM seems to be growing in favor as a place of residence for foreigners who find their native countries uncomfortable. The foreign Jewish population has, according to Consul Moore, increased considerably of late years. That community is now estimated at 15,000, including native Jews, against 10,000 in 1873. The desire to avoid compulsory military service now enforced in most European countries, and the right of holding real property in Turkey, probably account for the increased immigration. The German colony at Jerusalem now numbers nearly 400 persons, that at Jaffa about 300. There is a third German settlement at Caifa of about equal number with the last mentioned. The settlers are mechanics, artificers, carriers and agriculturists, and are fairly prosperous.

Digitized by Google



AN OLD-TIME BULL-FIGHT AT TLANAPANTLA, MEXICO.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. A. OGDEN.—SEE PAGE 414.



THE SHAM BULL-FIGHT IN THE NEW AMPHITHEATRE, NEW YORK CITY, ON JULY 31ST.—SEE PAGE 414.

Digitized by Google

1. MRS. PRESIDENT POLK. 2. THE POLK MANSION AND TOMB. 3. THE RECEPTION-ROOM. 4. PRESIDENT POLK'S STUDY, AS HE LEFT IT THE LAST TIME.

1. TOMB OF PRESIDENT JACKSON. 2. THE "HERMITAGE." 3. ROOM IN WHICH PRESIDENT JACKSON DIED. 4. HOME OF THE GENERAL BEFORE HE BECAME PRESIDENT. 5. SWORD GIVEN THE GENERAL BY THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, AND CHAIR PRESENTED BY WASHINGTON. 6. CARRIAGE MADE OF TIMBERS FROM THE "CONSTITUTION," AND FAMILY CARRIAGE USED DURING HIS PRESIDENCY.

TENNESSEE.—A VISIT TO THE HOMES OF THE LATE PRESIDENTS POLK AND JACKSON, AT NASHVILLE.

FROM SKETCHES BY WALTER GOATER.—SEE PAGE 419.

Digitized by Google

"THE WOOING O'T."

GIVE thrust, ye birds, with a fuller note!
Thrush, blackbird, robin, give songful throat,
For to you is the fairy credit
That my love—my love is in loaf at last;
Her soft consent to the air hath passed;
Her low, sweet tones have said it!
Coined by her lips was the golden "Yes"—
The wood and the winds all heard it!
Had it been aught other than just to-day,
With the birds at wooing on every spray,
She might have, perchance, deferred it.

For shy were we as we moved among
The budding trees, with our loves unsung,
And weary with over-waiting
For the hints that heaven at times lets fall
In the tongue-tied hush of a blissful thrall,
Till we marked some birds a-mating.
A blackbird-beau was a-tilt before
His flame in a bush adjacent;
Two robins billed at their plaited door,
While a thrush cock sang like a troubadour
To a mate not less complacent.

And feathered swains in all sorts of guise—
Red, brown and mottled—with dancing eyes,
Were wild at their Spring love-making,
When a sudden courage inspired my heart,
And I said, "Oh, love! shall we miss a part
Which the birds of the air are taking?
'Be mine, be mine! for I love but thee!'
Is the freight of each little confession.
Be mine, be mine! for I hold the dear,
My life, my love, and my queen!" And here
I took of her hand possession.

Throb, gush and warble, ye wildwood swarms!
She drooped, she blushed and she paled, as forms
A cloud in the sunrise burning;
Her low-breathed "Yes" to my ear stole up,
As the perfumed thrill from a lily-cup
In reply to a zephyr's yearning,
And then, as my arms she melted in,
The woods, with our bliss transported,
So pulsed with song that it seemed as though
All denizens of their depths, I trow,
Were courting or being courted.

Sing out, ye birds, till the wide air swoons!
At noon, at eve, in the deep, clear noons,
Be your voice like a rushing river!
For it all to ye I must ever owe
That my prayer was winged to her heart, as though
Fire-tipped from Love's own quiver.
She is mine, she is mine! She loves but me!
Her low, sweet tones have said it.
Coined by her lips was the golden "Yes"—
To you is owing that word's caress,
To you is the fairy credit!

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MEADES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.—(CONTINUED).

IT is Lady Jet, and surely she is the most beautiful object in all this bower of beauty. In stature she is small but exquisitely formed, and looks like a diminutive sovereign. She is dressed perfectly in a morning robe of amber satin, and the little foot that peeps from under her silken skirts is attired in a dainty sandal of the same hue. Her hair, of a rich, purple hue, is the color of an Italian night—soft, luxurious, lustrous; and looking at her, you would swear that her eyes are the most beautiful in all the world—large, dark, languid, with passionate depths that hold a suggestion of amber, that rare rich color that she loves.

Lady Jet is a wonder—so small, so dainty, so proud!

"What do you want, Phedora!" inquires this small sovereign of eighteen years.

"Your father sent for you, Lady Jet; breakfast is waiting."

The large, lustrous eyes of Lady Jet give a flash that is positively savage.

"Breakfast!" she cries, with a stamp of her tiny foot. "I don't want any breakfast. I won't have any! Nothing but eat and drink and sleep in this house! I am so sick of it. Tell the count to send my portion down to some one of those starving wretches in the mines."

"Won't you come down at all?" asks the gentle, patient voice of the companion.

"No! Tell my father so, and then come back. I can't bear to be alone."

Phedora retires, and this little brown berry of a peeress gives herself up to pacing the floor until her companion returns.

"Oh, Phedora!" she cries, "I am so sick, so tired of this life. My father had no right to doom me to it. He was selfish in his grief for mamma. He should have remembered her child—that this barren, hateful country is no place for a peeress of Russia. Look at me; here I am buried alive! Oh, if could only go to Petersburg! I think of that world that I am shut out from until I grow sick at heart. I have rank, youth, beauty, yet I had as well be dead! It is so hard—so hard!" The girl's eyes sparkle dangerously, and a feverish flush stains her usually colorless countenance.

"But you have also much to be thankful for, my dear. You——"

Lady Jet makes a moue, and shakes her small fist at her companion.

"If you go talking that way, Phedora," she says, "I will knock you down. What have I got to be thankful for? Nothing! I have not my rights! If I had I would be in the Russian capital, the belle of every ball. I would go to court, where I would be admired. I would go to the opera—I would be of the world. Instead of that—look at me! Was there ever such a dead, solitary existence as mine? For eighteen years I have been buried away here; no friends, no acquaintances, nothing in the world to kill the horrible monotony—nothing to do but to waste my time with Nick or over a novel, or spend it in trigging myself in this finery sent me from Petersburg. And I want something better, Phedora, I want something better! Do you suppose I have no mind? Do you think a little silk finery, a few jewels, will compensate for the loss of friends, society, the world? And, besides, it isn't so much the present, but the future; all my life has got to drag through this way; all my life I have got to be shut away from everything that I yearn for! I must stay here until I grow old and blow away. Oh! Phedora! I am so tired of it!"

She flings herself in the woman's arms, and, burying her face upon her breast, breaks into passionate sobs, which Phedora strives in vain to check.

"My darling," she says, at last, "it is no worse than it always has been."

"Yes, it is worse," replies Lady Jet, deluged in tears, "a thousand times worse! In the past I have been a child. I am a woman now, and know all that I miss, all that I want. And then, too, if I thought of the misery and woe down there in the mines I should go mad! Oh, Phedora! to think that our proudest, bravest nobles are doomed to it. To them, who come of the best of the land, life must be so horrible—to toil from dawn to nightfall, to be sunk lower than the brutes, to look ahead and see no rest, no light, nothing but this weary, endless torture—oh! my God! it drives me mad! And there is no help for it, is there, Phedora?—no rest, no succor for one doomed to exile?"

The piteous, tear-drenched eyes look eagerly at the sad, dark face of the woman.

"No," says Phedora, in that voice of inestimable sadness; "there is no help—no hope!"

A low cry breaks from the girl, and she again buries her face upon the breast that has stood to her in the stead of a mother's.

"Oh, it is so hard—so cruel," she cries. "The Czar is a dastard and a villain to permit such laws. It is unjust!"

Under the smooth, dark skin of Phedora's face, steals a pink flush, and her eyes, losing their mournfulness, flash with a righteous wrath.

"Unjust!" she repeats, and there is a rising inflection in her voice, showing that she is laboring under excitement. "Where is there justice in Russia? You say, look at you, when you think yours is the bitterest lot on earth; but I say, 'look at me,' if you would see a monument of tyranny and injustice. I was exiled for stealing a crust for my starving child—exiled by the man whose mistress I refused to be, who tried to steal me from my husband, and who, when I refused to go, hated me with a hatred bitterer than death. He persecuted me to death; he told lies of my husband, whom I loved as I loved my God; he put all labor out of his hands. And when we were starving and my husband sick, I stole a loaf of brown bread. He had his hounds watching me. I was seized, carried off, exiled after a farce of a hearing, and never from that day to this have seen or heard aught of my child or its father."

Lady Jet's tears had ceased to flow; she stands silent, appalled at this history of a broken heart, her eyes fastened upon the patient, weary face of this woman who has been more than a mother to her. Then her lips move slowly, and her eyes are dark with wrath.

"My God, if there is a God, how can He allow such wickedness!" Then she flings her arms around Phedora's neck and her sobs break out afresh, both in sympathy for herself and Phedora. "In the face of your broken, ruined life, I should be ashamed to mourn for my own lot; yet, Phedora, I am so wretched!"

"I know it, dear," says the woman, simply, but there is a great pity in her voice and manner as she smooths her hand across Lady Jet's rippling hair.

An intense silence reigns in the luxurious chamber; the costly trifle of a clock ticks softly upon the mantle; in front of the grate lies stretched a fierce Siberian blood-hound, the special favorite of his mistress. At last Lady Jet straightens herself.

"Phedora," she says, feverishly, "dress me, dear, quick." The great, wistful eyes of the woman look at her earnestly.

"Where are you going, Lady Jet?"

A faint flush mounts upwards to the dark, rich face of the girl, and into the tender, lustrous eyes flashes a look of defiance as she answers:

"To the mines!"

The wistful anxiety in the sad, eloquent face of Phedora deepens.

"I wish you would not go, dear," she says, lowly.

"Why do you wish I would not go?" inquires the girl, her eyes flashing.

"Because, dear, it is worse than madness. It may arouse remark among the officers; some suspicion may even float to your father's ears. Lady Jet, please, for my sake, don't go!" But this plea, usually all-powerful with the passionate nature of the girl, fails to touch her now. A determination that no mortal power can shake has fastened upon her and she only repeats her command to be dressed.

The naturally timid, shrinking nature of Phedora, increased by brutality and suffering, is no match to cope with the fiery impetuous temperament of her mistress. Without further comment, she proceeds to attire her in a suitable robe, but the fear and anxiety of her soul are painted upon her sensitive face. When she has accomplished her duty, she dons her own wraps, and mistress and companion leave the chamber, and are soon out in the air, chilled with the frigid breath of an eternal Winter.

CHAPTER XXVI.—THE EXILED NOBLE.

AND now, in this history of Lady Jet, the reader must permit a slight retrospection. In this monotonous life to which, through the selfish grief of the count, she has been consigned, it is her custom to take long walks through the forests, accompanied by Phedora and Sphinx, her hound. Upon one of these occasions, when the dog, from some unprecedented reason, was absent, the young peeress was attacked by a half-starved wolf, who, driven thither by the severity of the Winter, which was even greater than usual, had stag gered down from the mountains.

Lady Jet would surely have fallen victim to this rapacious brute had not, at this critical moment, a saving hand been stretched forth in her behalf.

Unnoticed by her, further down the forest, a small gang of exiles were employed in boring for a new mine. One of these, seeing the peril of the ladies, with that instinct that had not yet been killed in him, despite the years of labor and degradation, rushed to the rescue.

Although the terrified women would have been no match for the maddened beast, in the hands of this man, whose muscles were hardened and strengthened by toil until they were like iron, the half-starved, attenuated enemy was comparatively harmless, and soon lay strangled at their feet—though the hands of their deliverer bore several marks of the poor brute's fangs, and from which they were bleeding profusely.

Lady Jet, thus delivered, looked up. She saw a man with a face like Guido painted for his St. Michael—grand, king-like, saintly, and stamped with the sublimity of suffering, the grandeur of a mighty strength. In that moment her soul recognized its master, and her heart went out to him for all eternity. She did not see his convict's garb, or the marks of toil upon the hands that had delivered her; all she saw was that grand and saintly face, with its infinite pathos and patience, and she stood staring at him in silence.

At last Phedora, recovering from her panic, thanked him for his invaluable services.

"It is of no consequence," he replied. "I am glad that I could serve you." His manner was stately and composed, and, as he turned to leave them, Lady Jet sprang forward.

"But you are wounded!" she cried, hastily. "See how your hands are bleeding. I cannot let you go until I have endeavored to alleviate your pain, of which I am the cause."

A smile of infinite pathos and gentleness crossed the wan face of the rescuee.

"It does not matter," he said. "I am an exile."

She looked up at him in his stricken and shattered manhood, as he stood before her with the block and chain—this man, so like a god—then into the lustrous, languid eyes of Lady Jet rushed a flood of tears. He looked at her dazed and bewildered—this sympathy was so new; then around the firm, closely-shut lips of the exile came a brief spasm of pain, as he bent over, and, almost unconsciously, laid his hand upon the small, proud head of his sympathizer.

"It is very kind," he said, and his voice was a trifle unsteady—"this sympathy. I had almost forgotten that there was such a thing as humanity. I have, of late years, been thrown with brutes," he motioned with his head towards the gang of convicts, and a shudder convulsed him. "Yet it is also cruel, as it shows me what is lost to me for ever."

And then the guard, having control of that gang, reach them—a coarse, brutal man, that showed the beast in his face. He approached the exile, who stood before the women with uncovered head, and laid his massive hand upon his arm.

"What!" he thundered, "talking to these women? You have transgressed the rules. You shall be punished, my lord. Come, away with you, or——"

Lady Jet stepped forward, her small figure was drawn erect, her head thrown back, her eyes flashed fire.

"Villain!" she cried. "How dare you interfere with this gentleman. Leave this spot this instant, and when he sees fit he will join you. Go! I have enough power to hurl you from your position and take the bread from your mouth. Know that I am Count Zickwoff's daughter, and if you presume to disobey I will report you to my father, and you shall be made to suffer for your insolence."

With one scowling, malignant glance at the exile, the guard slunk off like a whipped cur, and Lady Jet turned to her deliverer.

"I must bind up your hand," she said, gently, and, taking out her handkerchief, began tearing it in strips.

"I assure you it is not at all necessary," replied the exile. "I am very happy to have served you, and now, if you will permit me, I will bid you good-morning." He turned and walked away to resume his toil, and Lady Jet went home, but from that hour a bitter discontent, a weary restlessness, settled upon her that is destined never again to be banished.

On this morning she walks on to the mines, followed by her companion, and is lowered into the shaft to the scene of miserable labor. Greeted with respectful salutations on all sides from the officers, she makes her way along the tunnel-like excavation which is lined with laborers, until she comes to the extreme end of the mines. Here the principle portion of the exiles are employed in unearthing the precious metal. Despite the hundreds at work, a strange, ghastly silence of human noises pervades the place. Nothing is heard but the ring of the pick-ax and the shovel, the convicts not being allowed to speak under severe penalty, and the occasional fierce oath of the guards as they urge on some tardy laborer half-fainting with toil.

Lady Jet and her companion stand beside a gang of women engaged in washing the metal, but the gaze of the peeress is fixed upon the men. Chained to a huge brute in the guise of a man, delving in the hard rock, with hands worn and bruised, she sees the man who saved her life.

He is a man of majestic mien despite his terrible surroundings. His hair, cut short, is prematurely gray; his face, stamped with its travail and its patience, wondrous in its strength and grandeur, though deeply marked with lines of pain and toil. He is a wreck! Once the proudest of his land, he was stricken down in the rich promise of his haughty manhood, his might shattered, his fame gone. Through the endless torture of weary years he has known no life but this horrid existence that now claims him, the toil and suffering and want of which have driven from him all memory of that other time when fame and plenty were his. He is ruined, mind and body; his health gone, his intellect shattered; but as he labors there, with the sweat of torture heavy upon his brow, as he drags through the endless travail of this living death, there is yet that in him that bespeaks the Russian noble.

And as she watches him, in Lady Jet's eyes shines the light of a great love for this man, sunk lower than the brutes, and for whom all life is killed for ever. Her whole soul has gone over into his keeping, and as she looks at him in his bitter bondage a resolution fastens upon her to burst his chains—to free him from this living death. She comes of a race of warriors, and, despite the circumstances of her peculiar rearing, there is in her nature a Spartan heroism, an indomitable resolution, inherited from her famous ancestors. And all this inherent determination will be henceforth consecrated to this purpose, as is also her life given over to his service.

For an hour she remains in the mines, and not once during this time does the eye of the exiled noble rest upon that small, motionless figure standing in the dark shadow of the overhanging rocks; yet she is content to be near him even though he is unconscious of her devotion. But at last she leaves the mines.

When they are once more under the clear, pure light of the sky, far away from the stifling, fetid atmosphere of that scene of wretchedness they have just left, Lady Jet turns to Phedora.

"We will go now to the office," she says.

And the woman, awed by the stern, set face of her young mistress, dare offer no objection. The "office" is a large, square building, close to the house of the count, and in which is transacted all the official business. Here, too, in ponderous ledgers, is kept an account of every exile, consisting of the name, age, station and offense of the condemned. In this building Count Zickwoff passes the greater portion of his time. This morning a trifling indisposition has occasioned his absence, and as Lady Jet and her companion enter the office, only one official is present; this is Rudolph Poloskie, assistant and confidential secretary to the count, to whom he comes next in command.

Poloskie is a man thirty years of age, with a calm, cold, handsome face, and a physique that denotes an unusually powerful intellect. His manner is quiet, courteous and self-contained; but, despite his calm and refined appearance, a keen observer of human nature would be impressed with the conviction that there is much of the animal in his nature—that beneath the icy exterior slumber instincts of fierce passion. In the dark, delicate face are unmistakable lines of sensuality, and around the lips indications of a powerful will, which, combined with a certain selfishness, would make this man a dangerous adversary. One could imagine a tiger foregoing his greed, but never this man any resolution, any desperate purpose upon which he had fastened his determination. Sooner or later all things must yield to his ceaseless persistency, his indomitable will. Passion, selfishness and revenge are latent features in his nature, combined with a delicacy and refinement that but increase their danger.

As Lady Jet appears, he rises and advances to meet her, his manner, courteous, dignified and attractive. After the customary salutations are got through with, the young lady says, carelessly:

"I come to look over the ledgers. Several of the convicts have interested me, and I want to see their history."

The gentleman bows politely, arranges a comfortable position for the young lady before the desk, sees her seated, hands a chair to Phedora with as much deference as he attended her mistress, then returns to his writing, apparently unconscious of the presence of a second person.

In the meantime Lady Jet is poring over the massive books before her. She has been fortunate enough to procure the number of the man she loves, and up one column and down another of the small and tiresome figures she searches, until her eyes grow blinded and her brain aches. Still she never falters in her resolution; minutes drags into hours, and at last, when she has almost despaired, her efforts are rewarded.

"3,671—Count Zeikel Smoloff, Tenth Count of the House of Smoloff. Condemned to exile in the year 18—, for speaking the Polish language in the palace of the Czar."

She shuts the book. It is enough.

Her eyes blaze with a grand wrath; her young face is stern and set. Yet in her soul is a madness of agony that drives her almost distracted. Ten years of shame and torture; ten weary, bitter, pain-filled years, shut off from all human companionship—sunk amidst criminals of the deepest dye, branded with the heaviest of earth's shame! She sets her teeth hard, and her breath breaks from her sharply—ten years in this living tomb, ten years in a bondage bitterer than death, while she——She thinks of the wealth and extravagance that have been hers—of every caprice gratified, and where she stands in the sunlight, her small jewel-flashing hand clutches the desk for support, as, with the most powerful effort in her life, she smothers a groan. Without a word to her companion, she hastens out of the office, followed by Phedora; in her eyes a wild, piteous misery too great for words.

Secretary Poloskie stares after her curi-

Digitized by Google

ously; then, with a shrug of his shoulders, returns to his duties, while Lady Jet and Phedora walk slowly back to the mansion.

CHAPTER XXVII.—A DOWNFALL.

AS may have been anticipated, the murder of Count Lagore is fastened upon Maize, and through St. Petersburg the wildest excitement runs riot. In the palaces of the noble, in the cottages of the people, in the hovels of the serf—everywhere reaches this wave of agitation. Calm and unprejudiced deliberation is impossible; the aristocracy, influenced by that Freemasonry existing between them, pronounce the accused innocent; actuated by that same clannish prejudice, the people declare her guilty; for years public excitement has not been so great, and at the expiration of three weeks it has not abated in the least.

It is well known that both the State and the defendant have secured able counsel. Lord Ashhurst and his friends at once solicited Counselor Dornsdoff as their lawyer, but this was promptly declined, in which case overtures were made to, and accepted by, Lawyer Dornsdoff's rival, a man of fame and unquestionable ability, and fully equal to the whilom gunsmith, who represents the State.

Upon one morning, nearly four weeks after the murder, a close carriage drives up to the city prison of St. Petersburg—a carriage bearing the haughty crest of the Ashhursts—and a gentleman gets out, and, walking hastily up the long flight of steps, disappears in the gloomy building. In a few moments the door of one of the largest cells is opened, and Jack and Maize are together. As must be expected, the horror and shame of the past weeks could not but leave their trace in the unfortunate girl; there is a waxen tint in her face that was not there before this terrible trial, but her eyes are brave and fearless as of old, though encompassed with dark circles.

But the ghastly alteration in Jack is appalling, as he stands viewing this child of his love and adoption; in his eyes is an anguish that it seems impossible for any human being to endure. In the past weeks he has aged more than in all his life put together; his face is bleached to an ashen pallor, his cheeks are sunken, his eyes tired and haggard, and his hair thickly strewn with gray.

He stands for a moment staring at the girl in an agonized regard, then with a step gains her side, and she is folded away in his arms, while he caresses her with all the fondness of his great, tender nature, and from his eyes streams a flood of bitter, uncontrollable tears, and his form quivers with his terrible emotion.

The girl is by far the stronger and more composed of the two. The shame and affliction that have swept over her have developed all the grand and heroic traits of her character; that inherent spirit of courage and martyrdom has risen and gone forth to meet the conflict, and she awaits the result with an intrepid heart.

And yet she is but human; and it is very dear to her, this deathless love—this unfaltering faith that encompasses her; and as she lies in his arms, close to that great, faithful heart, her mind goes back to the past, and she almost fancies that she is a child again, far removed from this miserable present, with its peril and menace. As her thoughts thus suddenly revert to the past—that happy past, sun-draped and cloudless, and from which she is separated by a gulf that can never be crossed—for the first time since her confinement tears, great and blinding, rush to her eyes. Never did a life open brighter than hers; never was one shut in with darker clouds or greater shame. But, hating herself for her weakness, she forces back the tears, and, raising her hand, pats Jack's cheek. It is her old, childish caress of other days, and a spasm of agony contracts the man's face at the mute caress.

(To be continued.)

HOMES OF THE LATE PRESIDENTS POLK AND JACKSON, NASHVILLE.

ONE of the points of interest in Nashville, Tenn., to strangers as well as citizens, is the residence of Mrs. President James K. Polk. It is a noble edifice, on a commanding eminence in the heart of the city. Spacious lawns stretch on either side—in one direction reaching to Vine and Union Streets, and on the other to Polk Avenue, which leads to Church Street. From the porticoes of the residence an extensive view is afforded of the whole city. Immediately in front of the Church Street entrance, rising in its lofty height above the intervening buildings, is the new Custom House. On the right and left church spires and college towers rise into view. The building is a square edifice, with the porticoes on the two entrances, supported by immense columns extending the full height of the building. It was purchased by President Polk on his return from Washington, before being elected President, and was remodeled to suit his taste. Within the building transverse hallways lead to the various apartments. The reception-room proper is in the southeast corner of the building, separated from the other apartments by two halls of spacious dimensions. It is an elegant room, recently decorated with Eastlake colors, and carpeted with Brussels. Upon the mantel, in handsome frames, are the inaugural address of Governor Polk, the first Message and inaugural address of President Polk, and other interesting papers, standing just as the deceased President left them thirty years ago. A handsome cabinet contains many rare curiosities, and above this is a portrait of Mrs. Polk as she appeared years ago. Just opposite is one of her husband; both were painted by Earle, the favorite artist of General Jackson. Last of the many excellent portraits adorning the walls of the reception-room, that which now attracts the attention, in the most marked manner, is a beautiful counterpart of the aged lady, Mrs. James K. Polk, painted by George Dury. The figure is appareled in a dress of rich black silk; the silvery-gray curls peep out from beneath a becoming widow's cap; the expression is that which Mrs. Polk's friends know so well when she is engaged in animated conversation. This portrait is, at Mrs. Polk's death, to be the property of Mrs. G. W. Fall, the beloved niece, whose presence now gives life and animation to the household.

Situated immediately above the reception-room on the second floor is the former office of President Polk. When he returned home from Washington, and had concluded the arduous duties incumbent upon the Chief Executive of the nation, he busied himself setting his house in order for a long term, as he thought, of quiet life. All his official and State papers, and public and private documents, he arranged with order and method in cases prepared for them, each bearing a label indicating its purport. In the centre of the apartment is a long table, having upon it pen, ink and paper, as President Polk left them when stricken with his fatal illness. For thirty years the office has remained unchanged. It is now just as it was left then. Mrs. Polk spends hours in this room, occasionally, and she knows the locality of any desired paper, and, it is said, can even lay her hand upon them in the dark.

The monument, or mausoleum, is situated in the eastern lawn. It may be seen and the inscriptions read from the street. The material of which it is made is the Tennessee marble, of a grayish color. The architecture is simple and elegant. Two steps lead to a main flooring from the ground. In the centre of this is an altar-like centre-piece. Upon it are the inscriptions:

On the east side—"The mortal remains of James Knox Polk are resting in the vault beneath. He was born in Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, and emigrated with his father, Samuel Polk, to Tennessee in 1806. The beauty of virtue was illustrated in his life. The excellence of Christianity was exemplified in his death."

On the south side—"By his public policy he defined, established and extended the boundaries of his country. He planted the laws of the American Union on the shores of the Pacific. His influence and his counsel tended to organize the National Treasury on the principles of the Constitution, and to apply the rule of freedom to navigation, trade and industry."

On the north side—"His life was devoted to the public service. He was elevated successively to the first places in the State and Federal Governments, a member of the General Assembly, a member of Congress, and Chairman of the most important Congressional Committees, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Governor of Tennessee and President of the United States."

Four columns support a canopy which surmounts the whole. Upon the cornice, fronting Vine Street, is the inscription:

"JAMES KNOX POLK,
Tenth President of the United States.
Born, November 2d, 1795;
Died, June 15th, 1849."

Visitors are frequent both at the residence and tomb, the latter being free to inspection at all times.

THE "HERMITAGE" AT NASHVILLE.

The "Hermitage" building is a large two-story brick edifice, containing seventeen rooms of ample dimensions and numerous hallways. A large two-story portico on the front entrance is supported by columns extending the full height of the house. Library or office rooms occupy opposite ends of the building, on the portico. The house was built for General Jackson previous to his return to private life. His friends superintended the work, and erected a mansion which they thought best suited to a retired President of the United States.

Within the building a large hall; frescoed with scenes from Telemachus, expands from the front to the rear door. Immediately opposite the parlor or reception-room is the chamber in which General Jackson breathed his last. Its appearance is but little changed, though it has been used for years by Colonel Andrew Jackson as a bedroom. The furniture is the same as when the General died. A massive, old-fashioned bedstead, bureau, wardrobe and washstand, with table, sofa and armchair, all of mahogany, comprise the furnishings. The large wood fireplace is unaltered. Two windows, facing the south on the front portico, give light and ventilation, and three doors give entrance, one of which leads to General Jackson's private library and office, where all books and papers were kept. The same portraits adorn the walls as in the General's day. One, of his wife, Mrs. Rachel Jackson, hangs over the mantelpiece, opposite the bed. Beneath it is a small one of General Jackson himself.

Located some two hundred yards from the present building is the log-cabin house in which General Jackson once lived. Seen as it is now, there appears to be two small log cabins. When the General occupied it the smaller formed the second story of the larger. For those days it was quite pretentious and roomy. After the erection of the new dwelling the upper story was torn off, and the timbers used in the manufacture of a separate cabin.

In the gardens near the dwelling is the tomb, surrounded by foliage from weeping-willows, magnolia and cedar-trees. It is circular in form, the dome, supported by six columns, rising to a majestic height. Two steps lead from the ground to the floor, upon which are the tablets bearing the inscriptions of General Jackson and his wife. Upon the former is simply "General Andrew Jackson. Born March 15th, 1767; died June 8th, 1845." Upon the other is the name of his wife, dates of birth and death, and a long eulogy, extolling her many virtues. Around the tomb are the graves of members of the family who have died at the Hermitage—the grave of his adopted son, Andrew Jackson, Jr., that of Mrs. Marian Adams, sister of his adopted son's wife, and several others.

The material used in the construction of the mausoleum is the Tennessee granite, and, after the years that have passed over, it still shows no signs of decay.

One of the most cherished relics at the Hermitage, preserved with a sacred care, is the old carriage, made in 1833 out of timbers of the old ship Constitution, for the especial use of General Jackson. The material used in the finishing is of the handsomest brocatelle, with brocaded velvet bordering. Time has changed the color, but it still shows for itself what it once was. Upon the panels is painted a ship in full sail.

The other carriage is one given by General Jackson to his adopted son's wife immediately after the marriage, and when she began her residence at the White House.

Another relic is the chair of General Washington, presented by him to General Jackson. It is cushioned with leather, which the relic-hunter has somewhat mutilated by snipping off pieces here and there. Along with the chair may be mentioned the magnificent sword presented by the City of Philadelphia to General Jackson. It is a splendid piece of workmanship, being ornamented from one end to the other of the scabbard with carved figures of men in battle, with cannon, guns, etc. On one side is a carved portrait of General Jackson and the words, "The Hero of New Orleans." The hilt is a horse's head inlaid with pearl.

Speaker Randall at Home.

MR. RANDALL'S habits and daily life are very simple. He is a great worker, and probably no man in either House of Congress works as many hours a day as he. He takes great care of himself, eats moderately and simply, uses no wines or liquors, retires early, sleeps long, and enjoys, as a consequence, perfect health. Mr. Randall goes little into society, and he entertains very little at home in consequence of his small house and limited means. He generally has two or three receptions during the Winter, and to these he invites a certain number of Congressmen, diplomats and other officials for one night and a different set for the next, until the list is exhausted. Mrs. Randall has her reception days every week, and is assisted by her daughter Anna, a well-balanced, accomplished girl, who has become a great favorite in society. The Speaker is not what may be called a bookish man. He is a man of affairs rather than books. But no man in Congress keeps a closer watch on its business. Mr. Randall masters every question that comes up, and when he became Chairman of the Appropriations Committee he surprised everybody with the business. He has few books in his house, but when a great question comes up he goes to the Congressional Library and has a great pile of books sent to his home, which he studies until he knows all about the subject. Every hour in the day is occupied, and his private correspondence is enormous. He writes most of his letters himself, and although he keeps a secretary, he is still the busiest man about the Capitol. The Speaker seems to prefer little rooms to work in. His workroom in his house is small and cramped, and in the Capitol he has the funniest little box down-stairs, which you could never find. When he is in this box nobody is supposed to know where he is. He goes there to work and he never leaves it two minutes before the hour for calling the House to order. Many, no doubt, suppose that the gilded, heavy, gaudy apartment called the "Speaker's Room," in the rear of the Speaker's lobby, is where he does his work. Nothing of the sort. The Speaker never goes into that room except by accident. It is his only in name, but the little room about the size of a squirrel's cage is his, sure enough, and in it he works like a squirrel—if a squirrel does work.

American Oysters Abroad.

NOT only is America supplying Europe with such sheer necessaries of life as beef and mutton, bread and cheese, hams and pickled pork, but her inexhaustible wealth in natural products enables her to furnish the tables of British and continental gourmets with certain luxuries, the sources of which in the Old World have been somewhat recklessly dealt with of late. Among these are oysters, an ever-increasing scarcity of which has made itself apparent on the English and German coasts for some years past, as is too significantly conveyed to the oyster lover by the melancholy fact that the price of natives has vastly increased within the last quarter of a century. It is worthy of notice that the Schleswig proprietors of oyster beds are laying down American oysters in immense numbers upon the coast of the Little Belt, from Gravenshoved to Holkhoved, as well as to the south of Faroe Island. A few days ago 1,250,000 small and 60,000 large oysters, fished in Newark, Cheapeake and Prince's Bays, were put down in the above-mentioned waters; and a company has been formed with the object of laying down from 14,000,000 to 15,000,000 more of American oysters upon the Schleswig and Holstein shores. The oysters just transferred to their new domicile will be taken up again in the Autumn of 1881, by which time their condition will demonstrate whether or not they are likely to thrive and multiply in German waters.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

It is Stated that Colonel Prjevalsky and his party are prisoners in the hands of the Chinese, who, it will be remembered, prevented him from proceeding to Lhassa.

The French Government has allotted M. Pasteur the sum of 50,000 francs for the purpose of enabling him to carry out his researches on the contagious diseases of animals.

The Chinese consider the use of cows' milk, as an article of human diet, unnatural and immoral. It does not appear that this opinion is based on the comparative indigestibility of the milk of ruminant animals.

The Death is Announced, at the age of fifty-seven years, of Dr. Karl Neumann, Professor of History and Geography in the University of Breslau; his name is well known to students of historical geography.

Wishing to devote himself exclusively to scientific pursuits, Admiral Mouchez, Director of the Paris Observatory, has asked to be placed on the retirement list, a request which has been granted by the Ministry.

The Well-known Mathematician, Professor C. W. Borchardt, died at Rüdersdorf, near Berlin, on June 27th. He was formerly Professor of Mathematics in the Military Academy, and of late years Professor in the University of Berlin. Since 1856 he was editor of the Journal for Pure and Applied Mathematics, the oldest of the existing mathematical periodicals.

Mr. J. W. Redhouse, in a communication to the Royal Society of Literature, combats the ordinary theory that the Aryan race of mankind originated in the Pamir highlands of Central Asia, spreading thence in a northwesterly direction into Europe, and southeasterly into India. He considers that the Polar regions, which at one time possessed a tropical temperature, were the original home of man.

The "Revue Internationale des Sciences Biologiques," gives an extensive memoir of Dr Carl Hoberland, on "Infanticide among Ancient and Modern Nations." He traces the origin of this custom to the difficulty of subsistence, the sacrifice being in the outset urged by the male parent, and opposed or reluctantly submitted to by the mother. (We observe a parallel case among certain of the lower animals, where the young are often destroyed by the father, and are defended against him and concealed by the mother).

Cultivation by Steam has been successfully accomplished in England with a steam-digger, a recent invention, which, worked by a single cylinder engine of eight horse-power, under seventy pounds pressure of steam, digs at the rate of ten acres per day long that takes three horses to plow an acre per day at the same depth. It is claimed, also, "that the digger, in penetrating the ground, case the weight of the engine to a considerable extent off the traveling wheels, and also by their back action drive the engine forward."

It Appears from the first report of the Central Sanitary Bureau of Japan, just issued, that they have established a public laboratory for the analysis of chemicals and patent medicines. The proprietors of patent medicines are bound to present a sample, with the name and proportion of the ingredients, directions for its use, and explanations of its supposed efficacy. During the year there were no fewer than 11,904 applicants for license to prepare and sell 148,091 patent and secret medicines. Permission for the preparation and sale of 58,638 different kinds was granted, 8,192 were prohibited, 2,913 were ordered to be discontinued, and 70,934 remained still to be reported on. If similar regulations were put in force in this country, it is probable that the sale of several patent medicines would be put a stop to.

The Several Improvements in the National Library of Paris have resulted in a large increase of the number of readers. In 1869, when the new hall was opened, the number of readers was 24,000, who used 71,000 volumes exclusive of the library of reference. In 1879 the number of readers was 63,000, and of volumes used 220,000. It must be added that other libraries are open to the public in Paris and largely frequented, such as the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers for mechanical science and physics, the Muséum d'Histoire Naturelle for natural history; the Mazarin St. Geneviève, for general purposes; the Sorbonne, Ecole de Droits, Ecole de Médecine, etc., for the general public, as well as for students. Readers are admitted to the National Library reading hall only by tickets; a special room has been opened to the public, and is also largely frequented. The present hall is only provisional, and a new one, on a larger scale, will be opened very shortly.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

THE King of Siam has lately assured Admiral Patterson, during a friendly call, that he still intended to visit this country.

F. CHARLES MOON, rector of the Jesuit College at Innsbruck, died recently. With him ends the race of the Cosmo Moor immortalized by Schiller.

MR. WEBB HAYES is to become a member of the law firm of Swayne & Swayne, in Toledo. These gentlemen are sons of Associate-Justice Swayne.

THE new Webster mansion at Marshfield, Mass., on the site of the old and historic Webster mansion which was burned, is now almost completed. It will cost about $10,000.

IT is freely reported in Mexico City that President Diaz has sent a passport to ex-President Lerdo, who is invited to take the portfolio of Minister of Foreign Relations.

MR. D. O. MILLS, it is rumored, has bought a handsome house in San Francisco as a wedding gift to his niece, Miss Easton, who is about to become Mrs. Frederick Crocker.

PARKER PILLSBURY, of Concord, N. H., who has outlived nearly all of his old anti-slavery associates, is now about seventy-one years of age, but does not appear to be over fifty.

SIR HENRY ALLSOPP'S employés have presented that great brewer with a splendid plate on his being created a baronet. Meanwhile Mr Bass is only a squire; but Mr. Gladstone can set this right.

THE late M. Pereire, the financier, left a fortune amounting to $10,400,000. Of this sum Madame Pereire inherits $6,500,000—half of this absolutely and the other half for life; while each of the three children receives $1,300,000.

THE family jewels of the Empress of Russia are left to the Royal family of Darmstadt; but her splendid collection of diamonds, which are of great value, have been divided between the Duchess of Edinburgh, the Czarevna and the Grand Duchess Vladimir.

THE Princess of Wales, when she takes her little daughters into society, has a quaint fashion of dressing them in toilets harmonizing with her own. For instance, at a garden-party the other day she wore a costume of light blue and celadon green, and the young princesses followed her about in gowns of the like.

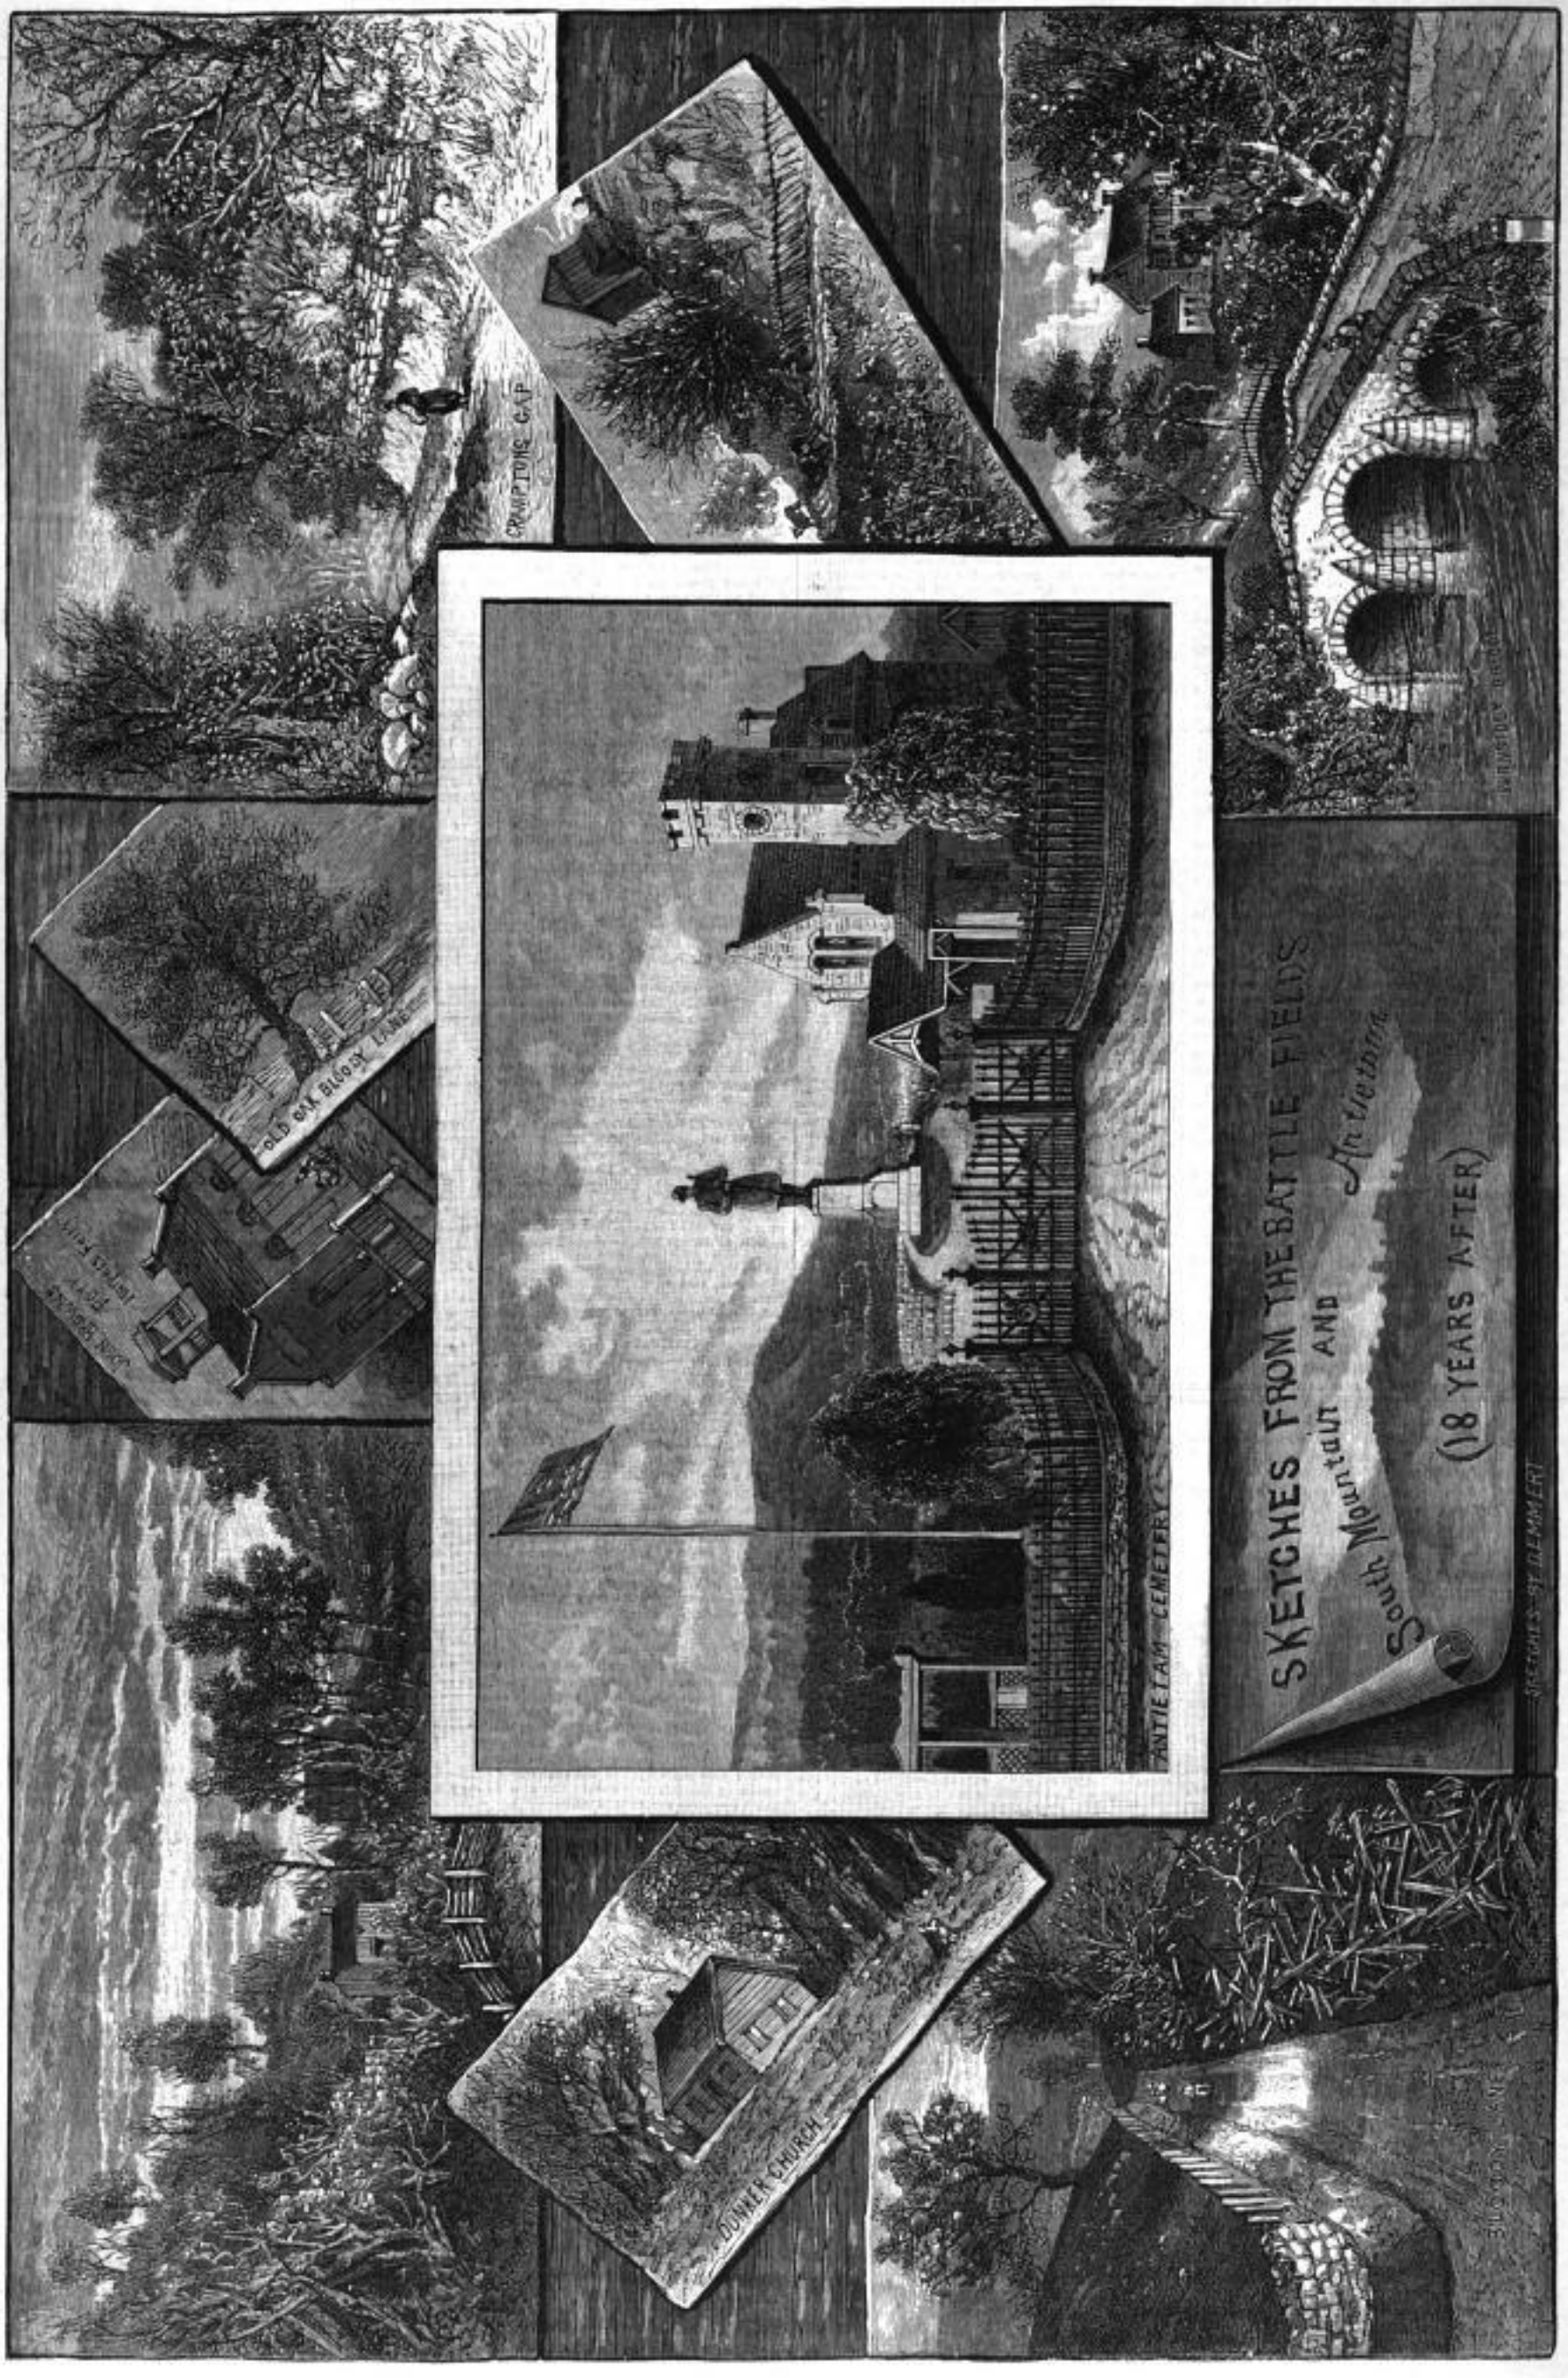
GENERAL BURNSIDE buries himself practically on his Rhode Island farm, and is growing sunburnt and hard-handed. The Boston Herald says that early in the morning he is to be seen in loose, easy dress and broad rustic hat, engaged in farm work and caring for the hundred and one details of agricultural life, and apparently enjoying the open air occupation to the fullest extent.

LONDON is wild over an American "professional beauty," Mrs. Cropper, who sells bouquets and things with immense success at royal fêtes, bazaars and fairs in company and in competition with Lady Waterford, Lady Hamilton, Lady Charles Beresford, Mrs. Wheeler, Mrs. Samson, Lady Musgrave, Mrs. Langtry, Lady Lonsdale, Mrs. Arthur Paget, Lady Beclive and all the stars of the firmament.

THE Judges of the Superior Court of New York have chosen John Sedgwick to be Chief-Justice. Chief-Justice Sedgwick was elected in 1872 on the Republican ticket, at the same time as his predecessor, Judge Curtis, and has consequently been eight years on the bench. He was formerly a partner of Francis N. Bangs, and for a long time was Assistant District-Attorney. He is about fifty years of age.

IT is no secret in Germany that the engagement of Prince William has caused a considerable difference of opinion between the Empress and her relatives. The Emperor has been most anxious to overcome his wife's objections, and has so far succeeded during his recent residence with her, that her Majesty has invited the fiancée and her sister to pay her a visit at Coblenz prior to her approaching removal to Baden.

IN the House of Commons, on August the 2d, Marquis of Hartington, Secretary for India, announced the recall of Sir Bartle Frere from the Governorship of the Cape of Good Hope. Both the Marquis of Hartington and the Earl of Kimberley, in making the announcement, concluded by saying that the Government took this step with regret, because, while Sir Bartle Frere's views differ from the views of the Ministers on important questions, they fully recognize his high personal qualities and distinguished services.



FRANK BUCKLAND, the naturalist, is suffering from dropsy and finds walking difficult. But notwithstanding these troubles, he is a delightful companion, and life is full of interest to him. At home he is surrounded by all his pets. He sits in John Hunter's chair, regardless of uncomfortable angles. They are convenient for the monkeys. They can sit aloft and pounce down on his proof-sheets at will. Mr. Jamrach, a retired organ monkey, is a great favorite, and shares with him the frugal meals to which physicians limit him, tasting everything in turn, even to the claret and water.

MR. GEO. W. CHILDS, of the Philadelphia Ledger, is erecting a handsome residence at Bryn Mawr, a suburb of that city, where he has purchased a tract of fifty-seven acres, which is handsomely ornamented by landscape views of the most beautiful designs, by artists specially engaged for the purpose. The residence will have one hundred and ten feet frontage, with a depth of seventy-two feet; will be two stories high, with Swiss cottage roof; the foundation will be capped with blue stone, and the building will be of fine pressed brick laid in black mortar. There will be a number of short curves, sharp angles and pointed gables; handsome trimmings and beautifully carved ornaments, and novel designs of cornices and pinnas surrounding the structure.

THE Savage Club of London gave a breakfast on Friday, July 30th, to American actors. The affair attracted great attention. Over 100 persons sat down to the dinner, which lasted from 2:30 to 6:30. Barry Sullivan presided, having Mr. Lowell on his right and Mr. McCullough on his left. Raymond, Rankin, Florence and Sheridan sat at the same table, guests of the occasion. Others present included General J. E. Hawley, Charles Dickens, Clement Scott, Hatton, Toole, Charles Warner, Hollingshead, Joseph Knight, Bronson Howard and Julian Hawthorne. Many other actors, dramatists, critics, journalists and musicians were present. Every American actor was warmly greeted, and every allusion to America promptly and heartily applauded. President Hayes's health was drunk with great enthusiasm. Edwin Booth was absent in Scotland.

JUDGE HENRY HILTON and Mrs. Stewart, in administering the estate of the late Alexander T. Stewart, have caused endowments to be made that will aggregate probably $3,000,000, to be devoted to building, equipping and furnishing a collegiate building, where it is intended to educate both sexes for a charge less than $100 per year. The cost for instruction and traveling expenses from New York or Brooklyn will not average that sum. One building for this purpose is now nearly completed, which is said to be the finest structure of the kind in America, and will accommodate 500 students. Two other buildings of equal dimensions will be erected beside it. Sixty acres of land have been set apart for the buildings and the grounds, walks, groves or parks that will surround them. A building for females, to accommodate 200, occupying twenty-five acres, with annexes and surrounding grounds, will also be completed very soon.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

GEORGE I., KING OF THE HELLENES.

SELDOM has a young King had so apparently difficult a task before him as young Prince William of Denmark when in 1863 he accepted the offer of the Crown of Greece. One foreign sovereign, Otho of Bavaria, had already been tried, and being found lamentably wanting, had been deposed by a revolution, of which the embers were still smouldering, when two European princes, Prince Alfred of England and the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, had successively declined the honor of succeeding him and undertaking the weighty task of restoring order to a kingdom disorganized by the miscule of courtiers and favorites, and by financial entanglement, an inevitable consequence of bad government. Moreover, from the earliest period of their history, the Greeks have never been an easy people to govern, and when outside influences, such as the continual bickerings and quarrels with the Turkish Government, were taken in consideration, the task was somewhat formidable for a lad of seventeen. This task has been well fulfilled, and we doubt whether any sovereign in Europe is more popular with his subjects than George, King of the Hellenes. The King is now thirty-four years of age, having been born on December 24th, 1845. He is the second son of the King and Queen of Denmark, but on his acceptance of the Crown of Greece, June 6th, 1863, he renounced any rights that he might have to the Danish throne in favor of his younger brother. On the 27th of the same month the Greek Assembly declared him to be of full age to reign, and on October 30th, 1863, King George arrived in Athens. From that day His Majesty has devoted himself heart and soul to the benefit of his adopted country.

In 1865 he gave up a third of his Civil List in order to relieve the Treasury, and next year Greece became involved in the Cretan insurrection, with which his subjects openly sympathized, affording material assistance to the insurgents, until in 1868 diplomatic relations were broken off with Turkey, only to be resumed through the intervention of the Paris Congress in the following year.

During the Russo-Turkish war, King George had no little trouble in keeping his subjects quiet, so anxious were they to join in the fray, pay off old scores, and regain a further portion of their former territory now under the dominion of the hated Mussulman. The war over, the negotiations with the Porte for the extension of the frontier caused intense popular excitement, which at one time could only be calmed by the King's personal intervention.

King George, in 1867, was married to the Grand Duchess Olga of Russia, the daughter of the Czar's brother, the Grand Duke Constantine, and has five children. The oldest boy, heir to the throne, is entitled the Duke of Sparta.

In June last he visited England, and designed paying his respects to the Czar in St. Petersburg, but the condition of affairs at home produced by results of the late Berlin Conference necessitated the curtailment of his combined business and pleasure trip.

GEORGE I., KING OF THE HELLENES.

THE BATTLE-FIELD OF ANTIETAM EIGHTEEN YEARS AFTER THE WAR.

WE give on the opposite page a group of combination views representing scenes and memorial incidents of the battle-field of Antietam, as pictured eighteen years after the occurrence of the terrible combat. The central picture shows the National Cemetery at Sharpsburg, Md., in which lie buried 4,900 Federal soldiers. This cemetery is situated on one of the most commanding points embraced in the battlefield of Antietam. Within this inclosure once stood a rock from which it was said General Lee viewed the battle. The rock is unfortunately removed. The cemetery is neatly kept, much time and money being spent in beautifying the grounds and keeping them in order. The general appearance was recently much improved by the erection of a colossal statue of a soldier standing sentinel over the grave of his fallen comrades. The monument cost $30,000. The figure is colossal in size, 22 feet high, surmounting a pedestal of about the same height. The whole is cut from gray granite. The pedestal bears the simple inscription:

"Not for themselves, but for their country.
September 17th, 1862."

The monument stands on an eminence in the centre of the cemetery, and can be seen from nearly every point of that hotly contested field.

It was to have been formally unveiled, May 30th, but by request of many, the ceremony has been deferred until September 17th, which will be the eighteenth anniversary of the battle.

Turner's Gap, through which passes the turnpike leading to Baltimore, was the most important point in the Battle of South Mountain. To secure it cost some of the most skilful manœuvring of the Federal forces. Prominently in the "gap" and on the pike stood, at that time, an old tavern which has since been converted into a Summer residence.

Crampton's Gap, a point somewhat similar in position and of scarcely less importance on that day, is situated further south on the same mountain. Through it passes the road leading from Burkettsville to Brownsville. Not much remains to mark the bloody combat which took place there save fragments of the rude breastworks of stone which extend along the crest of the mountain.

At Antietam the points that are referred to with most interest are the Dunker Church, Bloody Lane and Burnside's Bridge. Other places have preserved their freshness to some extent, but the gable over this field, whether professional or private, marks these places with double emphasis.

Less than two miles distant from Sharpsburg, on the Hagerstown pike, stands the little church which, to all who know anything of the field and the facts of the fight, is as familiar as the name Antietam. Under the destructive fire of that "bloodiest of bloody days," it was almost reduced to a heap of ruins. It has since been restored, but bears the scars of battle still.

Bloody Lane is appropriately so called from the fierce hand-to-hand fight which there ensued, in which the lane, simply a ditch from four to six feet in depth, and wide enough for a wagon road, was literally filled with dead, until the blood of friend and foe mingled and flowed in one common stream. Meeting the principal lane at right angles, is a shorter lane. Here stands the best way mark of the conflict—an "Old Oak Tree," bearing the scars of shot and shell on its rough, massive trunk, and in its shattered and broken limbs.

Burnside's Bridge is named from the general who, after several unsuccessful attempts, succeeded in effecting a passage and storming the heights commanding it. This bridge is the lower one of the three stone bridges spanning the Antietam within the limits of the battle, and in many ways was deemed the most essential crossing. Both parties were conscious of this fact, and this made the contest the more severe. The position held by the Confederates was strong and commanding. An old "quarry" immediately opposite the bridge, and high on the ridge, afforded them cover, from which they poured their fire with telling effect into the solid columns that advanced against them.

There is something impressive in the contemplation of places which, less than a score of years ago, were the scene of so much carnage and confusion. To the veterans who fought there, they have, of course, the greater interest. To many who survive the roll-call which has summoned their comrades to join the celestial ranks, there is still something sacred in the spot that has been consecrated by their own life-blood.

THE FAST OF FORTY DAYS.

AT noon on Saturday, August 7th, Dr. Tanner completed his feat of abstaining from food for a period of forty consecutive days. During the last week of his fast he took but little walking or carriage exercise, and experienced several severe attacks of sickness. Early on the thirty-eighth day he was taken violently ill, and declared that some unscrupulous person had tampered with his spring water. So strong was he in this belief that two of his watchers endeavored to prove his suspicions groundless by drinking of the water themselves. The result was that they, too, were taken similarly ill. One of them, Dr. Miller, gave it as his opinion that the water had been impregnated with tartar emetic. Besides exhibiting much irritability, Dr. Tanner at times acknowledged a feeling of extreme weakness, and yet at no time did he lose confidence in his ability to hold out to the last minute of the fortieth day. Music was his favorite diversion from the beginning of the fast. By it he seemed to become excited and animated. But on the thirty-ninth day he would allow no music, with one exception. Then the watchers began to realize how weak and worn the doctor was. Everything irritated him. If his attendants conversed in a whisper at the distance of the length of the gallery, he peevishly requested

NEW YORK CITY.—DR. TANNER'S FORTY DAYS' FAST—A SCENE IN THE HALL ON THE AFTERNOON OF THE THIRTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Digitized by Google

them to stop. Any noise or movement jarred upon his overstrained nerves. Visitors were almost unbearable. Nothing went right. Suffering terribly himself, he communicated his feelings of discomfort to those around him. His face revealed his condition more plainly than ever. It was pale and haggard, and seamed with deep lines. His fits of sickness have told upon him severely.

Additional interest was created in his case on Friday morning when a letter from Dr. William H. Hammond was published. This eminent physician expressed his belief that the watching had been honestly done, that the faster had faithfully abstained from all food but water, and that he had succeeded far better than the writer had thought he would. He thought that Dr. Tanner had not succeeded in showing that his organism is differently constituted from any other, for he has suffered as others would have suffered under like deprivations; and that he had shown that these alleged instances of fasting a month or more without symptoms of inanition being produced are fraudulent or otherwise deceptive. He concluded with the belief that the investigations made of Dr. Tanner during his fast have been superficial and restricted. The amount and character of the exhalations from the skin and lungs ought especially to have been analyzed. The weighing seems to have been very imperfectly performed. That, therefore, the scientific results are not what they should have been, but that, nevertheless, enough had been shown to cause us to modify our views in regard to the effects of inanition on the human body.

The fast attracted much interest in Paris and London, and bulletins of the doctor's condition were posted daily. The Saturday Review treats Dr Tanner with much severity. It condemns unsparingly an experiment conducted with circumstances of ridiculous vulgarity. It considers that Dr. Tanner is either practicing a coarse imposture in the midst of a crowd of silly busybodies, or he is being permitted to commit public suicide amidst the gabble of competitive quacks. It apprehends that it may be found necessary to pass a law which will check the suicidal mania which first showed itself in long-distance walking races, and which has now assumed an even more repulsive aspect. To lynch a few irregular and eclectic physicians, it argues, would be illegal, but natural.

MADAME GERSTER.

Madame Etelka Gerster, whom we shall have the pleasure of re-welcoming to this city in October, has been adding to her laurels. The London Queen of the 19th of July thus speaks of her impersonation of Linda:

"We have little room to speak of other performances, but reference must not be omitted to the production of "I Puritani" on Tuesday last, when Mme. Etelka Gerster undertook the rôle of Elvira. In no opera is Mme. Gerster heard to greater advantage. She displays in this assumption not only perfection and brilliancy of vocalization, but a high dramatic power not often met with on the operatic stage. The transitions from reason to madness were portrayed on Tuesday with a subtlety of art betraying much careful thought, and the impression the Hungarian vocalist made on her audience was of the most favorable character. Mme. Gerster is a true artiste, and as Elvira is unapproachable; we have no other singer, who, in this part, could hope to compete with her. The admiration she evoked on Tuesday amounted to enthusiasm, and Mme. Gerster was called again and again before the curtain to receive the applause of her delighted hearers."

Chinese Court Procedure.

At Shanghai, where certain European nations and the United States have establishments, native criminals are dealt with by what is called a "mixed court." It is so called, no doubt, because a European or American Consul or other resident sits with the Chinese judge; but in all other respects it has little pretension to its title, for its course of procedure and its punishments appear to be of Chinese barbarism, unmixed with the faintest trace of European sense of humanity. Thus, a prisoner who refuses to divulge the names of his accomplices is ordered to receive fifty blows on the face; and if these, administered apparently on the spot, fail to overcome his contumacy, another fifty may be ordered. Beating the ankles with hammers, and kneeling on chains with the feet braced up, are other methods of persuasion which are employed by this mixed tribunal, graced as it is by the countenance and sanction of an officer of some great Christian power. According to a tabulated report prepared by Mr. F. Farry for the Supreme Court and Consular Gazette, the punishments consist of terrible floggings, or else of the cangue, or heavy table, in which the wearer's neck is inclosed, and which prevents him from lying down or from feeding himself. That such practices should go on from year's end to year's end with the placid acquiescence of influential European communities seems scarcely credible. It is to be hoped, at all events, that they will not long survive the publicity which Mr. Farry has given them. If the European Assessor is to sit on the judgment seat simply to give the countenance of civilization and Christianity to the stupid and horrible barbarities of the Chinese—to concur with a Mandarin in administering blows on the mouth or hammering the ankles of prisoners who refuse to confess or to "peach"—the sooner he is removed from so shameful a post the better for himself and the civilized power which he represents.

The Sultan of Turkey.

A correspondent who has just returned from Turkey, and who had occasion to be brought in contact with the Sultan and many of his Ministers, states that the Commander of the Faithful is, without exception, the most utterly faithless scamp in his dominions. Whenever he appoints a Minister, he says to him: "You must find means to resist all demands for reform, and your tenure of office will depend upon the length of time that you can do this without compromising me. Eventually, the Ambassadors will complain of you, when I shall pretend to be most indignant at your not having carried out my policy, and shall sacrifice you for having deceived me." The Sultan is the son of an Armenian mother, and it is generally supposed that his real father was also an Armenian. He is neither a drunkard nor a voluptuary, and although by no means an able man, he has a considerable amount of low cunning. He is believed to be accumulating a considerable fund, for, although the finances of his country are in a desperate condition, taxes do come in, and yet neither the army nor the civil employés are paid. The sole hold of the Sultan over his subjects is that he is the head of their religion. The only man who can compete with him for this position is the Shereef of Mecca. The last Shereef was an ambitious man, and it is believed that he was assassinated in consequence of orders received from Constantinople. The present Shereef is a young man, and the assassination of his predecessor has aroused much feeling in his behalf. Throughout Arabia, and in Syria the Turks of Constantinople are detested, and it would be a sound policy to encourage the separation of Arabia and Syria from Turkey. Were these two countries independent of the Turks, the Eastern Question would be solved, the inhabitants of Asia Minor would join the Arab kingdom, which would become England's firmest ally, while in Europe the Empire of the Sultan would collapse.

FUN.

Tanner is a great deal faster man on water than Hanlan.

Presidential candidates have as many lives as a cat, or will have before all their biographers get through.

He was from the mountain side, and was buying his first glass of soda. "I wish you'd skim off that scum, boss; I ain't payin' for no froth, you bet."

White neckties are so cheap this season that many a sad-faced man has secured a railroad ticket at half price on the strength of his throat gear.

"Does the cistern ever give out?" asked the gentleman who wanted to rent the house. "Never but once, and that was before they kept beer for sale in the corner grocery."

A Nice Distinction.—(Scene—French Restaurant.—Customer: "I see by the rules of the restaurant you are not permitted to take anything." Waiter: "Take. Oh, no, m'sieu. It is, seulement, what you shall please to give me!"

A droll fellow fished a rich old gentleman out of a mill-pond, and refused the offer of 25 cents from the rescued miser. "Oh, that's too much!" exclaimed he, "tain't worth it!" and he handed back 21 cents, saying calmly, as he pocketed four cents, "That's about right."

"I'll teach you to lie, and steal, and smoke, and use profane language," said an irate Galveston parent to his eldest offspring, at the same time swinging a good-sized sapling. "I'll teach you, you young scamp." "Never mind, father, I know all them branches already."

Simple Faith.—Exceedingly evangelical young lady: "Poor old Jones seems to suffer very much from rheumatism. Though rather late, I think if he were confirmed it might do him good; don't you, Mr. Trotter?" (But even the worthy little curate couldn't subscribe to this.)

The Latest Gush.—(Conversation on piazza, West End Hotel, Long Branch)—Fashionable Young Man to Another Young Man not Fashionable: "Is this chair taken?" Ordinary Young Man: "No, you can have it." F. Y. M.: "Thank you, awfully." O. Y. M.: "You're dreadfully welcome."

A Sheffield manufacturer is reported to have told his workmen to vote just as they pleased—"In fact, I shan't tell you how I am going to vote," he said. "After it is over I shall have a barrel of beer brought into the yard." ("Hear, hear," shouted the men.) "But I shan't tap it unless Mr. Wortley, the Tory candidate, gets in."

Said Angelina, suddenly breaking the oppressive silence. "Don't you feel afraid of the army worms, Theodore, that are coming so rapidly this way?" The question was such a strange one that Theodore's surprise caused him to look right at Angelina for the first time in his life. Why did she ask that, he wanted to know. "Oh, nothing," she replied, as she toyed with her fan; "only the papers say they eat every green thing wherever they go."

While Bishop Ames was presiding over a conference in the West a member began a tirade against universities, education, etc., thanking God that he had never been corrupted by contact with a college. After proceeding thus for a few minutes the bishop interrupted him with the question: "Do I understand that the brother thanks God for his ignorance?" "Well, yes," was the answer; "you can put it in that way if you want to." "Well, all I have to say," said the bishop, in his sweet, musical tones, "is, that the brother has a great deal to thank God for."

THE GREATEST IN THE WORLD.

Without a question Buffalo, N. Y., can boast of the largest and most complete private Sanitarium in the world. The Invalids' Hotel was founded by Dr. R. V. Pierce, who has represented his district as State Senator and in Congress, and is known throughout the United States as the originator of Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines, and who has also become widely celebrated in the treatment of chronic diseases. The erection of this mammoth home for invalids was made necessary by the large number of afflicted who flock to Buffalo from all parts of the United States to consult Dr. Pierce and the eminent medical gentlemen associated with him as the faculty of this celebrated institution. The establishment is said to have cost nearly a half million of dollars, and is furnished with every appliance and facility for the care of chronic ailments. A correspondingly large branch institution is located in London, England. The whole concern is owned and operated by the World's Dispensary Medical Association, of which the original Dr. Pierce is President—his brother and uncle, and other eminent medical gentlemen, taking part in the treatment of cases. In treating cases they are not at all confined to the narrow limits of prescribing the justly celebrated remedies, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, Pleasant Purgative Pellets, or any other set remedies, however good, but have resort to the whole range of the Materia Medica, as well as to Turkish and other baths, Swedish movements and other approved remedies and methods of cure.

One of the greatest charms of Dr. Brownell's Tonic and Alterative is the small size of the dose. The various delicate combinations of drugs are concentrated in the most careful manner, and finally brought together by a series of original processes; consequently the dose is only one teaspoonful for an adult and smaller in proportion for children. It is taken once before each meal. Last but not least, a 50 cent bottle lasts ten days, while a $1 bottle lasts twenty four days. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists.

Burnett's Cologne is of the best quality, and is filled in elegant bottles of superior finish and beauty. It is offered to popular sizes and at popular prices. This refreshing perfume is thus brought within the reach of every one. It is prepared from the purest and best materials, and with the utmost care.

In Quarter and Half Pints, Pints, and Quarts. In Basket style, cork and glass stoppers.

In vacation look out for all sorts of accidents to keep up your policy in The Travelers.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate used habitually renders the system less liable to the attacks of sunstroke.

The palm of superiority is awarded to Mrs. H. A. Allen for her World's Hair Restorer, and a grateful public appreciates. Every Druggist sells it.

The St. Nicholas Hotel.—To many people who are not enforced residents of this city for the greater part of the year, New York offers many attractions as a Summer resort. Not to speak of the cool sea breeze which it enjoys almost every Summer afternoon, not to speak of its parks, etc., it may be chosen as a central point from which to make many delightful excursions. And in New York no more central house may be selected than the well-known St. Nicholas, in Broadway. It is not so many years ago that the St. Nicholas was visited by all strangers as illustrating the highest level of hotel luxury. It still holds its own in comparison with its later rivals. The rooms, single and en suite, are comfortable and elegant. The house is famous, too, for its excellent cookery.

Fisk & Hatch,
Bankers,
And dealers in Government Bonds,
And other desirable Investment Securities,
No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

Fisk & Hatch.

Stuttering cured by Bates's Appliances. Send for description to Bates & Co., Box 2330, New York.

To New York.
BOUND BROOK ROUTE
The Pioneer 2-hour Route.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 7.30, 8.30, 9.30, 10.15 A.M.; 12.10, 2, 3.30, 3.45, 5.40, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 9.30, 11, 11.50 A.M.; 1, 2.45, 4.25, 6.10, 6.17, 8.20, 10.20 P.M., and 4.30 A.M.

LEAVE NEW YORK, foot of Liberty St.: 6.45, 7.45, 9, 11.15 A.M.; 1.30, 4, 4.30, 4.45, 5.30, 7.15 P.M.; and 12 midnight.

ARRIVE at PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.25, 10.10, 11.30 A.M.; 1.40, 4, 6.10, 6.56, 7.50, 9.30, 10.05 P.M.; and 4.50 A.M.

To Long Branch, Ocean Grove, etc.

LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, Ninth and Green Sts.: 9.30, 10.15 A.M.; 2, 3.30 and 5.40 P.M.

LEAVE OCEAN GROVE: 6.12, 6.27 and 7.28 A.M.; 3.57, 4.13 and 6.07 P.M.

Trains connect at Jersey City by Annex Boat for Brooklyn, where a connection in addition to that from New York is made with steamers for Rockaway, Brighton and Manhattan Beaches.

H. P. BALDWIN, G. P. A., New York. C. G. HANCOCK, G. P. & T. A., Phila.

CHAMPLIN'S
LIQUID PEARL

An unequaled toilet preparation. Restores, preserves and beautifies the complexion. Used and indorsed by Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Clara Louise Kellogg, Lotta, Janauschek, and hundreds of others. Contains nothing that will injure the most delicate skin. Sold by all druggists. 50 cents per bottle. Beware of imitations.
CHAMPLIN & Co., Prop'rs, Buffalo, N.Y.

[From Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, March 20th, 1880.]

The Philadelphia Packet Book Co., No. 610 Chestnut St., Philad'a, Pa., is advertising new and standard books at the lowest retail prices, presenting a gift with each. Its managers are some of the best business gentlemen of Philadelphia, and as list of premiums embraces many handsome and costly articles. The enterprise has thus far met with great success by reason of the prompt and generous manner in which it has fulfilled its promises.
Send for their Catalogue of Choice Reading for 1880.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

By addressing Geo. P. Rowell & Co., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100 page pamphlet, 10c.

Royal
HAVANA LOTTERY
A Grand
Extraordinary Drawing
At Havana, Cuba. Has always drawn
SEPTEMBER 4th.
Only 18,000 Tickets Issued.
Capital Prize, 500,000 Spanish Dollars.
532 Prizes, amounting to 1,350,000 Pesos.
Tickets have always been $75; halves, $37.50; quarters, $18.75; fifths, $15; tenths, $7.50; twentieths, $4.
Louisiana State Lottery—Has always drawn Aug 10th and Sept. 14th. Tickets have always been $2; half tickets, $1.
Kentucky State Lottery—Has always drawn Aug. 16th and 31st. Tickets, $1.
Commonwealth of Kentucky—Has always drawn Aug. 31st. Tickets have always been $2; halves, $1. Prizes cashed. Full information sent free. Address, J. Duff & Co., Bankers, 42 Nassau St., (corner Liberty), New York.

Frank Leslie's
BUDGET,
A MONTHLY VARIETY MAGAZINE,
Spicy and Entertaining.
Each Number contains 96 pages quarto, and over 100 beautiful illustrations.

Published on the 1st of every month, and for sale by all Newsdealers. Annual subscription, $1.50; single copies, 15 cents. Sent postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Starin's Glen Island.
New Rochelle Harbor, Long Island Sound.
The Elegant Steamers
Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,
Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty third Street, E. R. For time-tables see daily papers.
Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.
A Rhode Island Clam-Bake served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of
Hiram D. Maxfield,
The celebrated caterer.
Mammoth Dancing Pavilion, Billiards, Bowling Alleys, Rifle Ranges, Boating and Bathing.
Excursion Tickets (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.
Shelter Island.
Steamer J. H. Starin leaves Pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, Mondays and Fridays, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single $1.25; excursion, $2.25.
Starin's Excursions.

MANHATTAN BEACH.
Via Greenpoint.
Steamer Sylvan Grove, from foot of Twenty third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half-hourly to 8.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.35, 10, 11.05 A.M., 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.
Via Bay Ridge.
Steamers Thos. Collyer and Mattawan from 22d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.
Leaving Leroy Street ten minutes and Pier No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 22d St. The boats leaving 22d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.
The steamer D. R. Martin leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 9.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 22d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 9.55 and 10.40 P.M.
Gilmore's Full Band and Levy every afternoon and evening.

THE COST OF ADVERTISING

For any responsible advertiser, making application in good faith, we prepare and furnish a written estimate, showing the cost of any proposed advertising in the leading American newspapers.
We prepare and exhibit printed proofs of any proposed advertisement.
For preparing estimates no charge is made, and the applicant is placed under no obligation to transact his advertising business through us unless it appears to him that by doing so he will best advance his own interests.
A copy of the advertisement, a list of the papers, the space the advertisement is to occupy and the time it is to appear, should be given with the application for an estimate of the cost.
When an advertiser does not know what he wants, or what he ought to do, he can designate some sum of money within which he wishes to limit his expenditure; this will enable us to prepare for him such a list of papers as will be the best for his purpose, within the limits which he prescribes.
Send 10c. for 100-page pamphlet.
GEO. P. ROWELL & CO.
Newspaper Advertising Bureau,
10 Spruce St. (Printing House Square),
New York.

CANDY Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.
C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago

THE LATEST SUMMER FASHIONS
Received from Paris,
IMPORTED EXCLUSIVELY FOR
Frank Leslie's
LADY'S JOURNAL,
THE
Acknowledged Fashion Periodical of the Country.

"Frank Leslie's Lady's Journal," says the Philadelphia Covenant, "is, without doubt, the most attractive fashion journal published. It is the acknowledged authority in European and American fashions, the fashion plates being imported monthly. It gives the latest styles of Parisian indoor toilets, promenade and carriage costumes, children's dresses, etc.; also elaborate articles illustrative of what New Yorkers are wearing. Each number contains serial novels and short stories, sketches, etc.; illustrations of home and foreign subjects, poetry, fashionable intelligence, social gossip, useful information on family topics, etc., etc."

This popular periodical has now entered on its Eighteenth Volume; it will be especially notable for the completeness of its fashion reports, always earlier and more reliable than those of any similar publication; the beauty of its art illustrations; the excellence and variety of its serial and short stories, and the comprehensiveness and interest of its miscellaneous articles.
Every effort will be made to surpass, if possible, the high standard of merit which the paper long since attained, and to render the Lady's Journal not only indispensable to every household, but the recognized arbiter of Fashion throughout the Western World.
Accurate Reports and Illustrations of the Prevailing Fashions at Home and Abroad.
16 PAGES, WITH BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.
The literary contents comprise Brilliant Serials, attractive Short Stories, Sketches of Life, Character and Scenery, Fashion and Society Gossip, etc., etc. Its art and other miscellaneous engravings are selected with a view to variety, interest and beauty.
Published every Friday. Price 10 cents, at all newsdealers'. Annual subscription, $4, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES.

HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth St., New York.
HARRY MANN, Ass't Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r & Mgr.
THE STEWARTS in MIRTH, MUSIC AND MIMICRY.
HAVERLY'S BROOKLYN THEATRE,
CHAS. L. ANDREWS, Mgr. J. H. HAVERLY, Prop'r.
HAVERLY'S THEATRE,
Corner Dearborn and Monroe Streets, Chicago, Ill.,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S CHICAGO CHURCH CHOIR PINAFORE COMPANY, J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S JUVENILE PINAFORE COMPANY,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS,
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor.

Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera, Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 43, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.

FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.

Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

ESPECIAL NOTICE.

Judge Brown, of the United States Circuit Court, on March 31st, made the following decisions:

1. That the Commonwealth Distribution Company is legal.
2. That its drawings are fair.

The Postmaster-General has, therefore, rescinded his order against the delivery of mails to this company.

Registered letters will be delivered and postal-orders paid as formerly.

23d

Popular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY has always drawn in public at Macauley's Theatre, Louisville, Ky., on a Saturday.

AUGUST 31.

Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.

1,960 prizes, $112,400; Capitals, $30,000, $10,000, $5,000; 10 of $1,000; 1,947 others, from $500 down.

Tickets always sold at $2; halves, $1.

Address R. M. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky., or same at 309 Broadway, New York, or W. PORTER, 1,227 Broadway, New York, or T. J. COMMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 189—195 East Fifty-ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Streets, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.

BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.

The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL

We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

WITH $5 You can buy a whole

IMPERIAL AUSTRIAN
100 Florins Government Bond,
ISSUED IN 1864,

Which bonds are issued and secured by the Government, and are redeemed in drawings

FOUR TIMES ANNUALLY,

Until each and every bond is drawn with a larger or smaller premium. Every bond must draw a Prize, as there are NO BLANKS.

THE THREE HIGHEST PRIZES AMOUNT TO
200,000 FLORINS,
20,000 FLORINS,
15,000 FLORINS,

And bonds not drawing one of the above prizes must draw a Premium of not less than 200 Florins.

The next drawing takes place on the
1st of SEPTEMBER, 1880

And every bond bought of us on or before the 1st of September is entitled to the whole premium that may be drawn thereon on that date.

Out-of-town orders sent in REGISTERED LETTERS, and inclosing $5, will secure one of these bonds for the next drawing.

For orders, circulars, or any other information, address
INTERNATIONAL BANKING CO.,
150 Broadway, N. Y. City.
ESTABLISHED SINCE 1874.

☞ The above Government Bonds are not to be compared with any Lottery whatsoever, and do not conflict with any of the laws of the United States.

N. B.—In writing, please state that you saw this in the English FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

GENUINE  REMEDIES

PIMPLES Freckles and Blackheads. Dr. G. N. SWEENEY, 1226 Niagara St., Buffalo, N. Y., for 30 cents in stamps, mails "Medicated Cream," an absolutely sure and harmless cure. It removes every one in four days, leaving face spotless, or money refunded. We know it to be reliable.—Surgr.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc. with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS

LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM

GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebrated French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet. Thousands of references.

$250,000

FRANKFORT SCHOOL FUND

LOTTERY
OF KENTUCKY.

Only 50,000 Tickets and $250,000 in Prizes.

$50,000 FOR $10.
$10,000 FOR $2.

THE DRAWING TAKES PLACE
SEPT. 4.

5,000 PRIZES THAT WILL BE DRAWN AND PAID.

LIST OF PRIZES:

1 Capital Prize		$50,000
1 Grand Prize		25,000
1 Grand Prize		15,000
1 Grand Prize		10,000
1 Grand Prize		5,000
10 Prizes,	$1,000 each	10,000
30 Prizes,	500 each	15,000
40 Prizes,	400 each	16,000
50 Prizes,	300 each	15,000
75 Prizes,	200 each	15,000
200 Prizes,	100 each	20,000
4,500 Prizes,	10 each	45,000
5,000 Prizes, amounting to		$250,000

☞ The management will hold no tickets at the drawing. If any tickets remain unsold, they will be delivered to a disinterested committee of respectable gentlemen, who will exclude them from the drawing. It is not the purpose to conduct this Lottery after the fashion of others, who sell a few hundred tickets and draw the unsold thousands for their own benefit. Our idea of a square lottery is to have represented in the drawing only the sold tickets, and to exclude therefrom every one that is not paid for before the drawing takes place.

PRICE OF TICKETS.

Single Tickets, each	$10 00
Coupons, each	2 00
11 Whole Tickets	100 00
56 Whole Tickets	500 00
113 Whole Tickets	1,000 00
570 Whole Tickets	5,000 00
1,150 Whole Tickets	10,000 00

For tickets, circulars giving full particulars, and further information, apply to
A. W. HARRIS & CO., Gen'l Agents,
240 Broadway, New York, or
B. NATHAN, 189 and 838 Broadway, New York, or R. C. WINTERSMITH, Superintendent,
3 M. Ex. Building, Louisville, Ky.

All letters should be addressed to A. W. HARRIS & Co., 240 Broadway, New York.

25 Hancock & English or Garfield & Arthur Cards, name printed, 10c. Samples free. Hill & Co., Lebanon, N. H.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.

Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

The September Number Now Ready

CONTENTS.

"THE BENEDICTINES." Four Illustrations.
"FLORENCE THE BEAUTIFUL: AN HISTORICAL AND ARTISTIC SKETCH." Eight Illustrations.
"PETER PAUL RUBENS." Three Illustrations.
"THE PHARAOHS." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"THE IDOLATRY OF ANCIENT EGYPT." Illustrated.
"THE CHILDREN OF THE BIBLE—No. VIII, TIMOTHY." Illustrated.
"THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER." Illustrated.
"THE BISHOP AND CATHEDRAL OF TRURO." Three Illustrations.
"THE ORIGIN OF THE PASSION PLAY."
"MOHAMMEDANISM."
"FOLK LORE OF PALESTINE." Etc., etc.
ESSAYS.—"Go Preaching the Word," by Rishon Perry. "The Roman Brewery." "A Buddhist Tract." "Noah's Ark." "Christianity and Children." "The Cry of Need, in the Book of Psalms." Etc., etc.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Belle, the Nail-maker's Daughter," by the author of "Gideon's Rock," etc.; continued. "Hester Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade; Chapters I.-VIII.; Illustrated. "A Modern Cinderella," by M. T. Caldor; Illustrated. "The Nurse's Story"; Illustrated. "A Girl's Ambition," by Annot F. Watson; Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the author of "Louie Rieger"; Chap. V.-IX.; Illustrated. Etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Bahama;" Illustrated. "The Crusades"; Illustrated. "A Contented Farmer"; Illustrated. "Lost in Sahara," by Alfred R. Guernsey; Illustrated. "The Monkeys and the Boy"; Illustrated. "The Story of an Illustrious Patriot"; Illustrated. "Marriage in Japan," by the Rev. Rosa C. Houghton, M.A. Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"September"; Illustrated. "The Church Mouse," by Frances Bolley Havergal. "Three Angels." "A Rest." "The Marquis of the Months," by Austin Dobson. "The Vacant Chair," by Augusta Browne Garrett. "Children's Laughter," by Edwin Charles Wrenford. "The Orchard Well"; Illustrated. "Does it Rain?"; Illustrated.
MISCELLANY.—"The Goddess Kali"; Illustrated. "Interesting Incident." "Cover of the Book of Gospels of Archbishop Aribert"; Illustrated. "St. Gervase and St. Protase"; Illustrated. "The Donkey's Protector"; Illustrated. "Nebo, Author of Writing." "Sackcloth." "Show Him the Apple." "The Prayer of Childhood." "Cromwell Prevented from Sailing"; Illustrated. "The Gutenberg Monument at Frankfort"; Illustrated. "David's Wanderings." "The Mother of the Virgin." Etc., etc. "Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Master my God to Thee." Etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Single copy, 25 cents; or $3 a year; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.

SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

JUDGE FOR YOURSELF By sending 25c. Money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$5, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $1 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 238 Broadway, N. Y. Box, 3696.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. VICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. S. WILTBERGER, Prop., 223 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

MAMMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. New England Medical Institute, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

Agents Wanted.

AGENTS WANTED for "The Life and Times of GEN. W. S. HANCOCK," by T. E. Williams, Editorial Staff New York World, with facts and figures since the days of Washington. A Cyclopedia for voters. A book worth having. Over 500 pages, 60 illustrations, $2. The outfit for the business, 50 cents. Apply at once.
E. B. TREAT, Publisher,
757 BROADWAY, New York.

THE BONANZA FOR BOOK-AGENTS
is selling our two splendidly illustrated books, Lives of HANCOCK and GARFIELD
the first written by his lifelong friend, Hon. J. W. FORNEY, an author of national fame, and an ardent admirer of the "superb soldier"; the second written by his comrade-in-arms and personal friend, Gen. JAS. S. BRISBIN, an author of wide celebrity. Both official, low-priced, immensely popular, selling beyond precedent. Agents double profits by selling both. Outfits 50c. each. Are you in? and coin money. Hubbard Bros., 723 Chestnut St., Phila.

$250 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

BIG PAY to sell our Rubber Printing Stamps. Samples free. Taylor Bros. & Co., Cleveland, O.

IT PAYS to sell our Rubber Hand-Printing Stamps. Circulars free. G. A. HARVEY & BRO., Cleveland, O.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 New Style Cards. Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agents Samples 10c. Comb. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

50 Chromo, Glass, Scroll, Wreath, and Lace Cards, 10c. Try us. CHROMO CARD CO., Northford, Ct.

SHORTHAND Writing thoroughly taught by mail or personally. Situations procured for pupils when competent. Send for circular. W. G. CHAFFEE, Oswego, N.Y.

20 new style Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, name printed, 10c. Samples free. HILL & CO., Lebanon, N. H.

THE GREAT FAMILY JOURNAL

Frank Leslie's
CHIMNEY CORNER,
THE
Leading Literary Family Journal.

New Literary and Artistic Attractions appear in Rapid Succession.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is the only weekly that publishes healthy and unsensational Fiction; the Novels and Stories are attractive and interesting, and are contributed by the most popular writers. The contents embrace also Biography, Travels, Incidents of all Times and Countries, Foreign Manners and Customs, Essays, Well-chosen Matter for Young Readers, Examples for the Aspiring Youth of Both Sexes, Natural History in a popular form, the Wonders of Nature, Science, Art, and Human Ingenuity, Adventures with Wild Men and Beasts, Narratives of Daring and Peril, Social Hints, etc., etc.

Each Number contains sixteen pages, eight of which are embellished with beautiful engravings.

Published every Monday. For sale by all newsdealers. Price, single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

THE CHEAPEST MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD!

Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
THE
August Number Now Ready.

CONTENTS:

"Oberammergau and its Attractions—The Passion Play in 1880." By N. Robinson. Twelve Illustrations.
"Some Remarkable American Women—At the Bar, in the Pulpit, and on the Dramatic and Operatic Stages." By George J. Hagar. Seventeen Illustrations and portraits.
"What the Japanese Eat." By Edward Greey. Twelve Illustrations.
"An Anglo-French Watering-place—Granville." Six Illustrations.
"The Massacre at Chicago." Illustrated.
"Colbert—Minister and Favorite of Louis XIV." Illustrated.
"Cameo-cutting." Illustrated.
"Mont Blanc and the Matterhorn." Illustrated.
"A Soap Bubble." By John A. Bewet. Nine Illustrations.
Short and Serial Stories.—"Not Guilty," by Rita W. Pierce (Chaps. XXIII.-XXV.); Illustrated. "In the Wrong Box"; Illustrated. "How May Flirk Became the Richest Girl in Chester," by Richard B. Kimball, Author of "St. Leger." "Fergus Blake's Wife," by John Morse; Illustrated. "Was it Better?" by S. Anne Frost; Illustrated. "The Dead Hand," by Walter Edgar McCann; Illustrated. "The Revenge of Gerald Geraghty"; Illustrated. "Flick et Flack"; Illustrated. "The Ban of Blood"; Illustrated—etc.
Sketches.—"A Wild Beast Shop"; Illustrated. "An Adventure in a Forest," by James Payn. "A Robber Saved"; Illustrated. "A Scratched Camel"; Illustrated. "The Boy who did not Know what Fear was"; Illustrated. "Letters Oddly Lost and Found—Some Cases which should Teach Caution in making Charges of Theft"; etc., etc.
Poems.—"That Dream of Ours." "A Dilettante." "Summer Playtime"; Illustrated. "Captain Otis's Boots," a Ballad, by A. Mary F. Robinson; Illustrated. "Flowers"; Illustrated.
Miscellany.—"An Invalid's Experience," with comic Illustrations. "Clocks in China." "Who First Drew Down the Lightning?" "The History of Writing." "Violin Makers." "Dyak's Trade." "The Prairie Dog's Home, and its Unwelcome Visitors"; Illustrated. "How Kings Traveled in the Fourteenth Century." "Goobers." "Recent Progress in Science," "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.

128 QUARTO PAGES, over 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.

COLORED FRONTISPIECE:

"An Ancient Egyptian Lady's Toilet—Painting the Eyes with Kohl."

Single copies, 25 cents. Annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; and four months, $1. Sent postpaid.

Send 25 Cents for a Specimen Copy.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.

A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE,
INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.
PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.50, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

A POSSIBLE PHASE OF THE FASTING BUSINESS.

Grand Central Hotel,

667 to 677 Broadway, New York.

NEW MANAGEMENT.

The Grand Central Hotel, the most centrally located Hotel for both business and pleasure-seekers, has recently changed hands, and is now under the management of Messrs. KEEFER, McKINNIE & Co., of the famous Manhattan Beach Hotel, and has been thoroughly renovated and refurnished, making it one of the most desirable hotels in the city, with its large airy rooms and wide halls. The house is kept on the American plan, at the low price of $3 per day, with a small charge for parlor and baths extra. A liberal arrangement can be made with persons remaining permanently.

KEEFER, McKINNIE & CO., of the Manhattan Beach Hotel, Proprietors.

THE Admiration OF THE WORLD.

Mrs. S. A. Allen's WORLD'S Hair Restorer

IS PERFECTION!

FOR its wonderful life-giving properties to faded or falling hair, and QUICKLY CHANGING GRAY OR WHITE HAIR to its natural youthful COLOR and BEAUTY.

IT IS NOT A DYE.

It requires only a few applications to restore gray hair to its youthful color and lustrous beauty, and induce luxuriant growth, and its occasional use in all that is needed to preserve it in its highest perfection and beauty. DANDRUFF is quickly and permanently removed. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

COLUMBIA BICYCLE

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent practical road vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in recommending it as desirable. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with prices and full information.

THE POPE MFG. CO., 59 Summer St., Boston, Mass.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT!

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.

Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS, Furnished free.

GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 482, N. Y.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.

Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,

MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,

AND

139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement SENT BY MAIL.

KEEP'S SHIRTS,

Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.

SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.

KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

A KEY THAT WILL WIND ANY WATCH AND NOT WEAR OUT

SOLD by Watchmakers. By mail, 50 cents. Circulars free. J. BIRCH & Co., 39 Dey St., N.Y.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

FISHERMEN! TWINES AND NETTING!

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

KIDNEY-WORT

PERMANENTLY CURES KIDNEY DISEASES, LIVER COMPLAINTS, Constipation and Piles.

Dr. R. H. Clark, South Hero, Vt., says, "In cases of Kidney Troubles it has acted like a charm. It has cured many very bad cases of Piles, and has never failed to act efficiently."

Nelson Fairchild, of St. Albans, Vt., says, "It is of priceless value. After sixteen years of great suffering from Piles and Costiveness it completely cured me."

C. S. Hogabon, of Berkshire, says, "One package has done wonders for me in completely curing a severe Liver and Kidney Complaint."

IT HAS WONDERFUL POWER. WHY?

Because it Acts on the LIVER, the BOWELS and the KIDNEYS at the same time.

Because it cleanses the system of the poisonous humors that develope in Kidney and Urinary diseases, Biliousness, Jaundice, Constipation, Piles, or in Rheumatism, Neuralgia and nervous disorders.

KIDNEY-WORT is a dry vegetable compound and can be sent by mail prepaid.

One package will make six qts of medicine.

TRY IT NOW!

Buy it at the Druggists. Price, $1.00.

WELLS, RICHARDSON & CO., Proprietors,

12 (Will send post paid.) Burlington, Vt.

SPECTACLES, Eye, Field and Opera Glasses, Microscopes, Barometers, Thermometers, Compasses, at reduced prices. R. & J. BECK, 1016 Chestnut Street, Phila. Send 3 stamps for illustrated Catalogue of 146 pages. Mention this paper.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF BRUSSELS . . . Thursday, August 12, 8.30 A.M.
CITY OF BERLIN . . . . . Saturday, August 21, 6 A.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL . . Thursday, August 26, 9.30 A.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND . . . Saturday, September 4, 3 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 51 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
I. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

14 STOP ORGANS SUB BASS

& Oct. Coupler, 4 Set Reeds, $65

Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints Cards, Labels, &c. (Self-Inker $4) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money saver. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

FIRM'S Can for Explosive Fluids.

PATENTED JAN. 21st, 1879.

P. O. Box 4273, New York.

FRANK LESLIE'S

Illustrated Newspaper

$1.50

FOR 22 WEEKS

OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

Beginning with No. 1,220.

Political subjects will be ably represented editorially, and fully illustrated, during this period.

Address,

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE, 53-55-57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's

Boys' & Girls' Weekly

is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:

"Jim Jeffs: Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NYM RUGBY.
"Left to Himself." By COMMODORE AH LOOK.
"The Pearl of the Sahara: Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By COMMODORE ROSES.
"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BRACEBRIDGE HEMYNG (Jack Harkaway).
"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."
"Cicero the Second: Or, Talked into Bad Luck." By JACK MANLY.

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

FOR SALE, "INTERLAKEN,"

THE COUNTRY HOME OF THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.

The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.

The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.

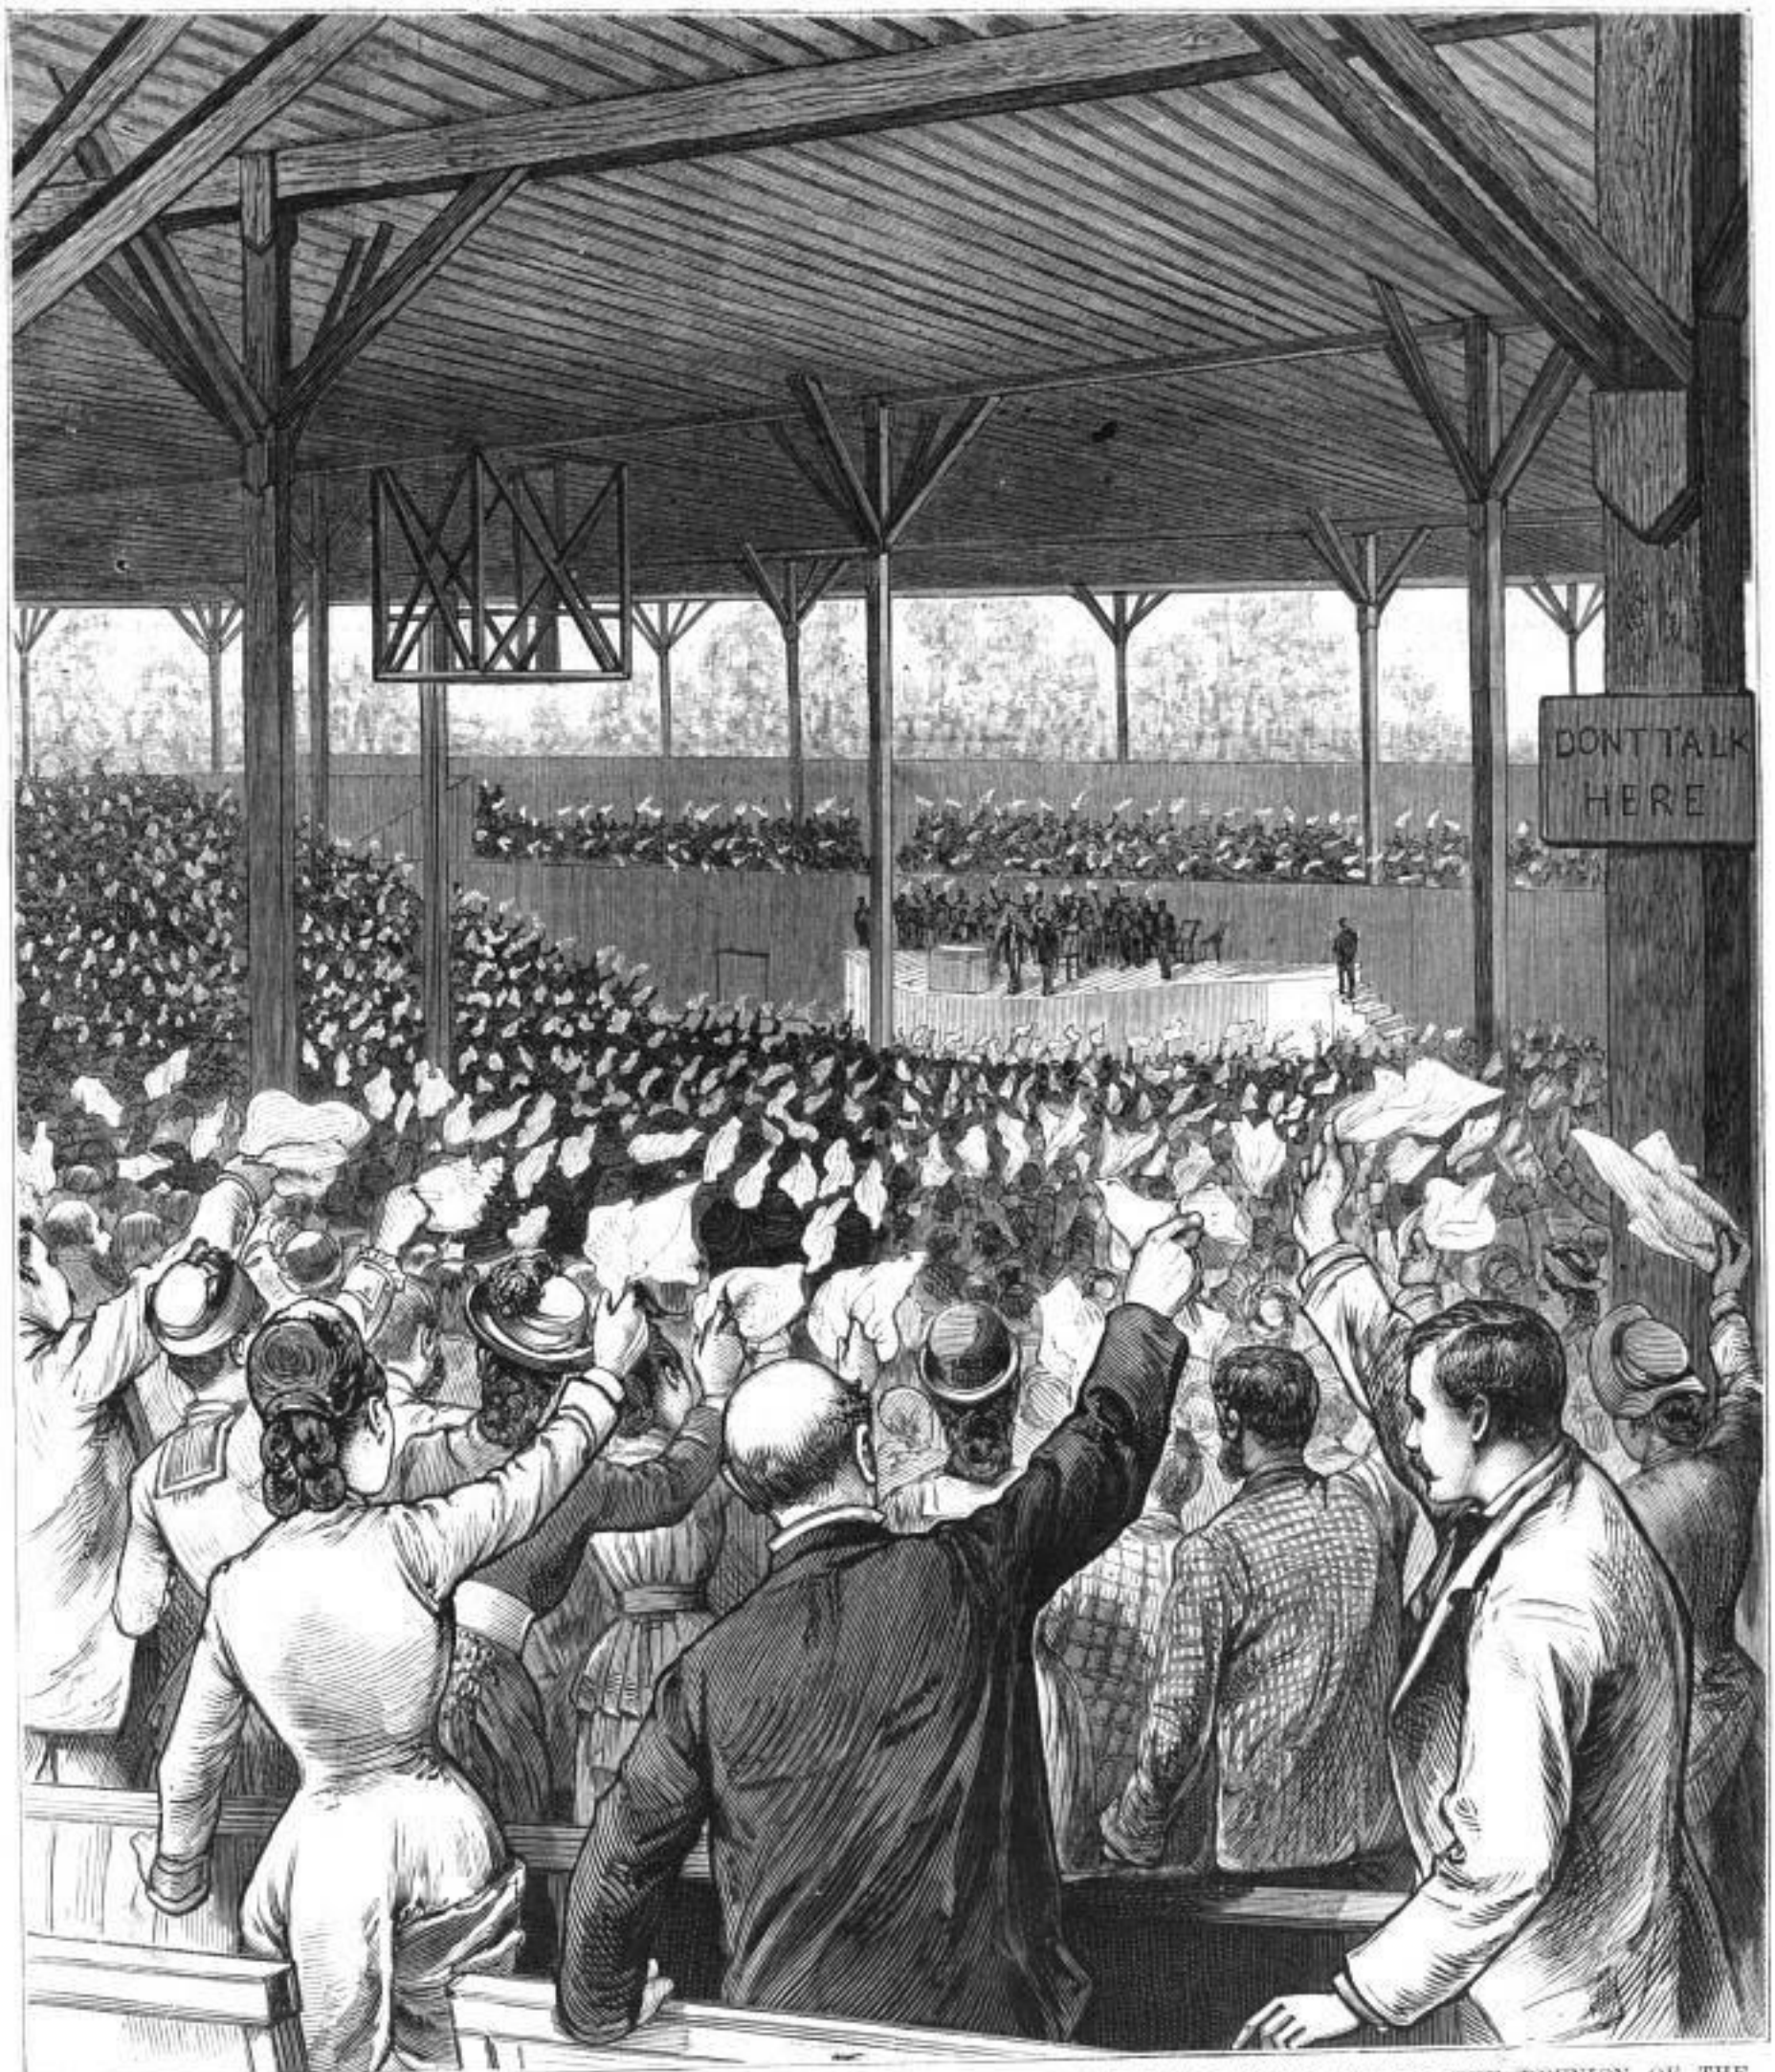
Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.

Gardener's cottage.

Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.

The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.

Apply to



HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Leslie, Jr., in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,300.—Vol. L. NEW YORK, AUGUST 28, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly, 13 Weeks $1.00

NEW YORK.—THE SUMMER ENCAMPMENT AT CHAUTAUQUA LAKE—THE "CHAUTAUQUA SALUTE" DURING THE REUNION OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS, AUGUST 8TH.—From a Sketch by Joseph Becker.—See Page 435.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 28, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4125.

NEW YORK, January 12th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F. Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4125, New York City, N. Y.

J. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

CAUTION.

Subscribers, in sending subscriptions for any of our publications, should be careful, in order to insure the safe delivery of their letters, to direct them plainly to the street numbers of the Frank Leslie Publishing House, Nos. 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York.

THE REPUBLICAN CONFERENCE.

THAT independent journal, the Springfield Republican, in analyzing, a few days ago, the elements of the present political situation, took occasion to remark that the Republicans at Chicago had ignored "their one great argument for a new lease of power" by deliberately ignoring, in their programme of future action, "the high aims and partial, but substantial, successes of the Hayes administration." It was in precise accordance with this same sentiment that we expressed the opinion, last week, that it is the record of the Hayes administration which to-day affords to the Republican Party its best hope of success in the pending Presidential election, by furnishing to the country some evidence of the party's power to work a reformation within itself.

In a case where, as our Springfield contemporary observes, the two historical parties of the country "enter the canvass with no matured plans for lifting any burdens from the people, literally promising nothing of relief or advance," it is inevitable that "the contest should be left to shape itself"—in the minds of those voters who hold the balance of power—"around the character and capacity of the candidates, qualified and illuminated by the drift and tendencies behind them." In another part of the article already quoted, the Republican remarks:

"Almost in spite of himself, the Republican candidate stands for a continuance of the present administration. He has its cordial support, and is expected to call about him the influences which have inspired its success—to seek advice of the Woolseys, the Seelyes and the Schurzes, rather than become subservient to the "senatorial syndicate" which was overthrown by his triumph at Chicago. In the association with General Garfield of the most trusted reform elements of the country lies his hope of success. To alienate in any degree this backing by truckling to the managers and bosses at New York on Thursday will be a sad move for General Garfield."

That the managers of the Republican canvass are disposed to "alienate" the very support here referred to, scarcely admits of doubt. At the recent Fifth Avenue conference, embracing many of the leading men of the party, with whom General Garfield consulted freely as to the details of the campaign, these managers took special pains, in "illuminating" the drift and tendencies which they conceive to be behind their party at the present time, to break away from what President Hayes, at the very threshold of his administration, conceived to be the first and highest duty of American statesmanship—the pacification of the country. Not only were "the Woolseys, the Seelyes and the Schurzes," upon whom General Garfield was expected to lean for counsel and support in the present canvass, conspicuous by their absence, but the deliberations of the conference, instead of sympathizing with the spirit and aims of these men, were at the furthest possible remove from the pacific temper of ex-President Woolsey and from the enlightened statesmanship of Secretary Schurz. For, instead of holding with Doctor Woolsey that the pacification of the country is the first duty of the hour, the foremost speakers in this conference kindled the flame of their eloquence by fanning afresh the fires of the late civil war, and, instead of borrowing inspiration from the high themes discussed by Mr. Schurz at Indianapolis, the only participant in this discussion who made the slightest reference to the "currency issue" was Mr. Thurlow Weed, and he is known to favor the retention of the greenback circulation and the unlimited coinage of the depreciated silver dollar.

According to Mr. Blaine, the issue now presented to the country by the competing parties is "whether the men who fought the civil war shall surrender to the men who fought against the Union." According to General Logan, it is a question "whether the old Republican Party, which has honored the flag and carried it everywhere," should surrender to "General Hancock, whose forces, as they march past him in review, are led by the old Rebel army, and at the rear are guarded by the Copperheads of the North." According to Secretary Sherman (and he, too, a member of the Hayes administration!) the pending issue is not one of administrative or civil reform, but "whether the Republican Party shall resign to the solid South, headed by Wade Hampton and the Ku-klux-klan, and a little segment in the Northern States calling itself the Democratic Party." According to General Harrison, of Indiana, it is to-day, as during the war, a question "how we will defend Washington against the enemy that once opposed it in arms."

Now, without recalling again to the recollection of our readers the fact that, in so pitching the pending canvass, these managers are compelling General Garfield to accomplish the Irish feat of turning his back on himself (for did he not say that "the man who attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issue will find himself without a party and without support"?), we beg leave mildly to suggest that if the present campaign is to be conducted on historical issues, dating from the outbreak of the late war, then the Republicans, while saddling their rivals with the blunders and crimes committed by the Democrats during the last fifteen or twenty years, must also be content to see General Garfield saddled with the blunders and corruptions of the Republican Party during the administrations of President Johnson and President Grant. If the Democrats are to be reproached for the "these ballots" they are, it is said, "going to use" in the coming election, the Republicans must bear the reproach of being their inventors. If the charge of "false counts" is to be made a watchword of party against the Democrats of the South, it would be well for the Stalwarts to remember that they carried the last Presidental election by a "count" in Florida which the Supreme Court of that State pronounced to be false, and by a "count" in Louisiana of which the less that is said the better it will be for the Republican Party. In a word, if the Hayes administration is to be treated as a mere interregnum in the Republican dynasty; if the evil spirit of sectional hate, after being temporarily exorcised, is to return and torment the country with fresh displays of virulence and new paroxysms of violence, then there are many who, in standing by General Garfield, the conservative Republican Representative who spoke for peace in 1878, will stand aloof from General Garfield, the Republican standard-bearer of a sectional crusade in 1880.

For General Garfield, as much as his better nature may revolt against the Stalwart tactics, cannot escape responsibility for the spirit in which his canvass shall be conducted. The order of battle just concerted in New York was drawn up under his eyes. Whether the dispositions taken are of his suggestion or not, they must stand as his until he countermands them. If there be something unseemly in the sight of a Presidential candidate helping to lay the plans and concert the policies which, it is hoped, will promote his election, it is at the same time just to say that the frankness of the method has, as one of its compensations, the advantage of making the candidate publicly responsible for the plans and policies which his supporters are seen to adopt with his approval.

Meanwhile, candor compels us to add that, if the Stalwarts are saying and doing much to show General Garfield should not be elected if they are to control his administration, the Democratic leaders are neither saying nor doing anything to show why General Hancock should be elected, except that his election would possibly put a truce to sectionalism. Beyond this they seem to have no matured plans for helping themselves or helping the country. As to all the great economic and industrial questions which concern the public interest, they are absolutely silent, and their success, as the case now stands, would afford no guarantee of stability in finance or permanence in existing business conditions.

A NEW PACIFIC RAILWAY.

THE annual report of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, just submitted to the shareholders, possesses an extraordinary interest in the disclosure which it presents of one of the greatest railway schemes of the age. The facts it embodies are briefly these: The business of the Texas-Pacific last year shows a gain of $500,787 in net revenue, an increase of ninety per cent. over the year previous. The company has no floating debt, and not a note outstanding. It now operates 443 miles of road, well constructed and equipped, extending from Shreveport to Forth Worth, and has contracted for the completion of the line from the latter point to El Paso, seventy miles of which have already been constructed. Beyond El Paso, connection will ultimately be made with a road which is coming eastward from California. Meanwhile the New Orleans Pacific Railway Company have contracted for the completion of a road from Shreveport to New Orleans, the work upon which is expected to be finished so as to give the Texas-Pacific Company an all-rail connection from Shreveport via Alexandria to Baton Rouge, on the Mississippi River, and to New Orleans, within the next fifteen or eighteen months. The completion of this New Orleans-Pacific Railway will not only furnish a good connection to the Mississippi River and to New Orleans, but will make, via the Texas and Pacific and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas and Missouri-Pacific lines, the shortest all-rail connection between Kansas City and points west from there and New Orleans, and, what is yet more important, a new Pacific railway, extending from the Gulf of California and the metropolis of the Pacific to St. Louis and the mouth of the Mississippi.

The importance of these great enterprises in a commercial sense cannot be over-estimated. A line of railway stretching across Texas into Mexico and beyond will open new markets to the trade and commerce of the United States, and enable American merchants to compete for the trade and commerce of 10,000,000 people who are now almost entirely supplied by foreign merchants by way of the coast. The lines extending northward from the trunk railway will also bring a vast area of territory now isolated into direct business relations. The system of roads contemplated will, in fact, cover the whole territory east of the Rocky Mountains from Santa Fé to Denver, St. Louis and southward through Indian Territory, Arkansas, Texas and Louisiana to New Orleans. Indeed, the scheme has a still wider scope. The men who direct the new consolidation of interests already control and operate east of St. Louis the Wabash and the Pennsylvania, and are likely to obtain possession of the Erie and its connections, if not of the New York Central. This practically covers all the ground worth covering in the United States. The probability that all the great trans-continental lines will be thus brought under one management, and that this management will enjoy a practical monopoly of the immense carrying business between the Atlantic and the Pacific, is, no doubt, calculated to excite some apprehension in the public mind; but the advantages that must result to the country at large will be so enormous as to outweigh any mere local or temporary mischief. We can afford, in view of all the facts, to contemplate their prosecution with real satisfaction and pride.

EDUCATION AT THE SOUTH.

IN his address at the great soldiers' reunion at Columbus, Ohio, last week, President Hayes set the partisan orators an excellent example by discussing questions of present and immediate interest instead of appealing to old animosities and prejudices by debating issues which the country has long ago finally determined. The theme of his address was the importance of the education of the masses, and his treatment of the subject was characteristically candid and moderate. We give a single extract as illustrating the spirit of the whole:

"To perpetuate the Union and to abolish slavery were the work of the war. To educate the uneducated is the appropriate work of peace. As long as any considerable number of our countrymen are uneducated, the citizenship of every American in every State is impaired in value, and is constantly imperilled. It is plain that at the end of the war the tremendous change in the labor and social systems of the Southern States, and the ravages and impoverishment of the conflict, added to the burden of their debts and the loss of their whole circulating medium, which died in their hands, left the people of those States in no condition to provide for universal popular education. In a recent memorial to Congress on this subject in behalf of the Trustees of the Peabody Educational Fund, the Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, of Virginia, shows that '2,000,000 of children in the Southern States are without the means of instruction,' and adds, with great force: 'Where millions of citizens are growing up in the grossest ignorance, it is obvious that neither individual charity nor the resources of impoverished States will be sufficient to meet the emergency. Nothing short of the wealth and power of the Federal Government will suffice to overcome the evil.'

"The principle applied by general consent to works of public improvement is in point. That principle is, that wherever a public improvement is of national importance, and local and private enterprise are inadequate to its prosecution, the General Government should undertake it. On this principle I would deal with the question of education by the aid of the National Government. Wherever in the United States the local systems of popular education are inadequate, they should be supplemented by the General Government by devoting to the purpose, by suitable legislation and with proper safeguards, the public lands, or, if necessary, appropriations from the Treasury of the United States. The soldier of the Union has done his work, and has done it well. The work of the schoolmaster is now in order. Wherever his work shall be well done in all our borders, it will be found that there, also, the principles of the Declaration of Independence will be cherished, the sentiment of nationality will prevail, the equal rights amendments will be cheerfully obeyed, and there will be 'the home of freedom and the refuge of the oppressed of every race and of every clime.'"

The breadth of the President's statesmanship is very clearly exhibited in the suggestions here made. That the policy proposed by him is the true one there can be no question, and it is to be hoped that its adoption may not be long postponed. The South has already done a good deal in the direction of establishing a sound educational system; but there is still a great work to do, and that work can be successfully accomplished if our public men will only address themselves to its consideration and performance in the spirit and by the methods indicated by the President.

A TIMELY PRESENTMENT.

THE United States Grand Jury, after a thorough investigation into the Seawanhaka disaster, has made a presentment indicting for manslaughter the captain, engineer and owners of the boat as well as the United States inspectors of steamboats and boilers in this district, and setting forth, with startling clearness, the defects of the existing system for the protection of life on passenger steamers. The indictment against the Federal inspectors charges felonious carelessness and negligence in their annual inspection and examination of the boilers of the Seawanhaka on the 10th of May last, in that they did not ascertain that the boilers of the steamboat and the tubes and flues were in a bad condition and unsafe; that the steamer had failed to provide lifeboats, floats and life-preservers, and that no adequate provision had been made to prevent sparks from being driven back from the fire-doors of the boiler into the vessel. The engineer is charged with a want of care in the management of the boilers and machinery. Negligence to provide the means of preserving life required by law is made the basis of indictment against the captain and the owners and directors of the steamer. To these respective causes the jury attribute the great loss of life. As the United States is fully prepared for the trial of the indictments, they will be called at the next term of the Circuit Court, which opens on the second Wednesday of October, and will take precedence of all other bailable cases on the calendar. The case will undoubtedly attract wide attention, since it will help to determine definitely the question of the precise measure of responsibility for steamboat accidents, and possibly beget prompt and needed amendments of the present defective system of management.

It is certainly high time that something decisive should be done for the diminution of the perils of steam navigation. The recklessness of some of the pilots employed on river and harbor vessels is habitually deliberate and criminal. This was strikingly illustrated in one of the latest of the many "accidents." An excursion steamer spins down the North River, past the Battery, into the Bay. A sprinkle of rain is falling, but the morning is not a specially dark one. There is not the usual crowd of passengers on board; but of those who are, one is sitting on deck. Suddenly he finds himself sprawling, with a bruised leg. The steamboat has run into an anchored schooner, it appears, and it has been his ill luck to get a rap from the bowsprit. The pilot is "reticent," as the reporters duly note when the steamboat returns to her landing; but he says the accident was unavoidable. It is the peculiarity of these occurrences that they always are unavoidable, save in cases where it is clearly the other pilot's fault. Landsmen, however, who know nothing of the mysteries of navigation, may be pardoned for their failure to see the necessity of an excursion steamboat's running into a three-masted schooner lying at anchor. Such an event could never occur if vigilance and caution presided at the wheel, and that such events do occur shows conclusively the need of increased vigor in the enforcement of the law.

It is true that New York's bay and rivers are crowded with sailing craft of all sorts and sizes, as befits one of the great trading ports of the world. It is true, also, that the tides are strong, and the currents, especially in the East River, swift and heavy. But what are pilots for, if not to know all the ins and outs of these waters, and to take care of the lives and limbs of the rest of us who do not know? The very fact that these conditions exist constitutes an added reason for the utmost possible care in navigation.

It is not new laws or a new code of rules that is needed, though doubtless the present system of Federal inspection and the modes of signaling are susceptible of improvement. The rules, so far as they go, are well enough; they are the product of experience and common sense. What is really needed is intelligence, vigilance, prudence and conscience, among inspectors and owners, and at the wheel. But these qualities, as to pilots and officers generally, have a market value, and they cannot be had without paying for them. So long as boats are equipped, manned and run in the interests of the owners without any fear of or regard for the law and its officers, and with but little regard for the comfort and safety of the passengers—so long as human lives are intrusted to cheap, ignorant, careless, reckless pilots who like to see how near they can come to the other vessel without a crash and a smash, so long will these "unavoidable accidents" continue to enliven the columns of the newspapers—unless, indeed, in the trial of the persons just indicted such verdicts shall be given as will compel owners and managers of vessels to pursue some other policy than that so strongly condemned by the Grand Jury—a policy which, as it says, commits the passenger "to the care and protection of incompetent, thoughtless officers and a cowardly and worse than incompetent crew, employed because they are unfit for other work, and without regard to their character or qualifications."

Digitized by Google

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE rejection of the Bill for Compensation in case of eviction in Ireland by the House of Lords has been followed by a series of gross outrages in that country. The Government, fearing that the Fenian and other agitators might attempt to incite the peasantry to some active proceedings in order to show their indignation against the landlords, at once largely reinforced the military establishment in Ireland. How necessary such a step was is now proved by the cowardly attack upon Mr. Boyd, the Crown Solicitor for the County Tipperary, and his two sons, who, while quietly driving along the high road, were shot at, one of the sons being fatally wounded. From other parts of the country reports come of various agrarian outrages which are so utterly senseless that one wonders whether the perpetrators are sane or not. These outrages add neither to the prosperity nor the happiness of the Irish peasantry, and the persons who are attacked are, as a rule, not Englishmen, but resident Irish landlords.

There has been a very amusing complication in French politics. It was generally felt that the military review and the presentation of flags to the army upon the 14th of July, the new national holiday, was somewhat unkind to the navy, which was in no way represented upon that occasion. The first proposition was that M. Gambetta, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, should go to Cherbourg and there be present at a grand naval review. M. Grévy, the President of the Republic, upon whom the duty should have devolved, is a man of remarkably slothful habits, and spends the whole day in smoking and playing billiards. Consequently he refused to go. Arrangements were made for Gambetta's visit, but Henri Rochefort attacked the President of the Deputies so fiercely in his new journal l'Intransigeante, that Gambetta also declined to go alone, and Grévy was awakened to the danger of Gambetta's growing power. A compromise was accordingly made. Grévy, the President of the Republic, Léon Say, the President of the Senate, and Gambetta, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, went together, witnessed the review and took part in the fêtes. Admiral Ribourt, the Maritime Prefect at Cherbourg, who, being a fierce Bonapartist, had refused to take any part in the festivities upon the national holiday, had been expected to give further trouble at the naval review, but fortunately he behaved with more self-restraint, and, with the exception of snubbing the Mayor of the town, who is a Republican, did not show his proclivities in any objectionable manner.

The Royal Belgian Exploring Expedition has met with a sad loss in the death of Captain Carter and Mr. Cadenhead. Some time ago the King of the Belgians, who takes a great deal of interest in Central African exploration, fitted out an expedition under the leadership of Stanley, the famous explorer. This expedition was to proceed up the Congo from the west coast of Africa, thence up the Lualaba, which is the northern Congo, and thus settle definitely the questions still left undecided by Stanley and Cameron in their former travels. At the same time another expedition was to start from Zanzibar, on the east coast, and proceed to Unyanyembe, when a junction with Stanley would be made. It was this latter expedition that Captain Carter and Mr. Cadenhead were in charge of when they met their deaths. It appears that the robber chief Mercambo had already attacked the caravan, and that the leaders had refused to pay the blackmail usually extorted. The reason advanced by the Belgian Expedition was that several of their men had been robbed and killed, and it is now thought that the massacre was perpetrated as a revenge for this refusal. The caravan consisted of over 700 men.

The position of the Eastern Question remains unchanged. There are wild reports that Albania has determined to throw off the Turkish yoke, but they are more than doubtful. The Porte seems to be persuaded that the Great Powers will not make any interposition, and that even should England and France send their fleets into Turkish waters there would be no interference beyond the moral support of their presence to the Greeks and Montenegrins. It seems to be certain that Austria and Germany are not in accord with the other Powers, and that any Slav movement against the Porte would not be supported by those two Powers. The Sultan has apparently made up his mind that Dulcigno must be ceded to the Montenegrins, but if the last news be true—that Albania has thrown off the suzerainty of the Porte—there will be a serious difficulty in carrying out the terms of the Berlin Congress. As regards Greece, the boundary question is as far away from any settlement as ever, and the support of France, which was reckoned upon by the Hellenes after the visit of King George to Paris, has been withdrawn. England is so busy with her home affairs, with Ireland, Afghanistan and the Cape of Good Hope and other South African colonies, that it is highly improbable that Mr. Gladstone's Ministry will take any active part in the present complication. Greece is actively preparing for war, and all along the Greek frontier Turkey has massed large bodies of troops, and made every preparation for defense. A fresh encounter between Albanians and Montenegrins has occurred near Podgoritza, in which the Catrati tribe lost considerably. Servia has been officially informed that her explanation of the mobilization of the militia is unsatisfactory to the Porte. Meanwhile Russia is giving a quiet support to the Pan-Bulgarian movement, and Russian rifles are being sent into Bulgaria. Many young Bulgarians, who have been studying in the Russian military schools, are returning home. The Emperors of Germany and Austria met last week at Ischel upon the most friendly terms, each wearing the uniform of the other's service. At the present crisis the meeting is considered to be of great political significance, as possibly foreshadowing a new consolidation of the Austro-German alliance. There are strong reasons for believing that Ayoob Khan contemplates a speedy attack on Candahar, and that large numbers of tribesmen continue to flock to his standard.

THE amount of national bank notes presented for redemption during the past fiscal year was less than at any time since the passage of that Act, amounting to $61,000,000. Three years ago the redemption amounted to $240,000,000. This marked reduction is due to the fact that the growth of business activity has brought the great bulk of the notes into active circulation.

THE Greenbackers are discouraged by the result of the election in Alabama. They had expected to carry everything before them in that State, and behold, now that the contest is over, there isn't a fragment of the party left. The experience is likely to be repeated in other States. The people have had enough of the Greenback delusion, and the ranks of its followers will never again be as respectable in numbers as they were two years ago.

A PHYSICIAN at a seaside town in New Jersey, who, in making up a prescription, furnished a large dose of morphine in place of Epsom salts as directed, resulting in the death of the patient, has been held on a charge of manslaughter preferred against him by the coroner's jury. The fatal mistake appears to have been the result of haste and negligence, and the action of the authorities in the case, severe as it may seem, will be generally approved, especially if it shall beget greater caution among druggists whose business it is to compound prescriptions.

GENERAL BUTLER is just now afloat politically, and there are a good many Democrats in Massachusetts who would give a great deal to know where he will finally make a landing. They have no desire to launch their craft for the Autumn cruise while so desperate a buccaneer is roving the seas; and, unless he shall cast anchor in some port or other pretty speedily, possibly they may find it inexpedient to do anything more than to furl their sails and to invite him just to come in and take possession of their vessel, cargo and crew, to be disposed of in any way he may elect.

THE Mormons have adopted the political methods of Louisiana and Alabama. Their returning board in Beaver County have just thrown out the vote of four Gentile precincts, thereby defeating the sheriff-elect on the Gentile ticket. It is announced that the Gentile voters will refuse to pay their taxes because of this disfranchisement, but they will scarcely be able to maintain this position. Two wrongs do not make a right. The cure for Mormon intolerance lies in the introduction of a system of laws, in place of the present Territorial code, which shall not depend for their enforcement upon officials controlled by the Church of Latter-day Saints.

BOTH parties are claiming Indiana in the October election, but neither is, perhaps, as confident as it would like to be. It is well for all to remember that the State is close fighting ground, and that it has not been carried by either party by any considerable majority for several years past. The odds are slightly in favor of the Democrats, but they have some embarrassments in the present canvass which may operate seriously to their prejudice in the final voting. Should the State go Republican in October, the chances of General Hancock will be seriously endangered, while if it should go Democratic, the defeat of General Garfield in November will be practically assured.

OF 592 steamships engaged in the foreign trade of the United States on the 16th of June last, only sixty-one were American, and of these less than fifteen were employed in navigating the great oceans. The rest were little more than coasters. Of the whole number of vessels, 424 were English, and Belgium, a country but a little larger than New Jersey, had more steamers in our ocean trade than we had ourselves. Austria, with only one seaport, and that an obscure one, had 179 large-class sailing vessels in our trade. Surely it is time that something should be done, by legislation or otherwise, to build up an American merchant marine, and to secure in our own hands the control of the foreign trade now swelling to such vast proportions.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM has received another stab under the fifth rib. Some time ago certain internal revenue officials in Virginia were removed for participating conspicuously in partisan manipulations, in direct violation of civil service orders. Their offense was flagrant, and the action of the President in the case was in every way commendable. But now the services of the deposed officials are needed for the party machine, and they are accordingly restored to the places which they had dishonored. It is simply impossible to view a proceeding of this sort with any other feeling than contempt. President Hayes has been generally regarded as sincere in his purpose to reform the civil service, but the popular confidence cannot long withstand such shocks as it has received in this and some other recent instances.

SENATOR WADE HAMPTON has not helped the Democratic cause by his recent speech in Virginia, in which he "waved the bloody shirt" and recalled the memories of the time when the people of that State plunged into revolt in defense of slavery and an "independent Confederacy." His statement that the principles now at stake "are the same principles for which Lee and Jackson fought," has already been seized upon by every Republican journal at the North as a proof that the "old rebellious spirit" still dominates the South, and it will be used to the serious damage of that section and of the Democracy. Senator Hampton has exhibited such moderation of feeling as to many matters before the Senate that this late ebullition is as unexpected as it is unwise. It is to be hoped—and we are glad to believe—that he does not reflect the sentiments of any considerable body of Southern men.

A FEW nights since a bark, loaded with naphtha and blazing fiercely, was towed out into the East River, anchored, and left to its own devices. It burned away for thirty hours or so. Then it went to pieces, as burning ships usually do sooner or later, and the blazing naphtha started for the shore. It is scarcely necessary to say that it got there. The result was a fire that licked up a quarter of a million dollars' worth of property. Had a strong wind been blowing, Long Island City and half of Brooklyn might have been in ashes to-day. Who are responsible for the criminal folly of leaving that fireship for all those hours in a river crowded with shipping and lined with docks and warehouses, crammed with inflammable materials? It would be interesting to hear from the Harbor Commissioners on this point. Another question: This fire has naturally directed public attention, or at any rate the attention of the daily papers, anew to the fact that the oil factories are too near these very inflammable cities for either comfort or safety; and there is another spasm of talk on the subject of their removal. The question is, whether they shall be removed before they treat us to a blaze that will throw those of Chicago and Boston into the shade, or after.

THE campaign in Maine is already at white heat. The Republicans have many of their strongest men on the stump, and the Fusionists are everywhere active and enthusiastic. The Temperance party, who are dissatisfied with the Republican candidate, propose to set up another Republican who more nearly represents their views, and it is probable that 4,000 or 5,000 votes will in this way be drawn away from the regular ticket. Maine elections have always been noted for their warmth and intensity of feeling, almost the whole population usually abandoning ordinary pursuits to give attention to politics; and it is just as well, perhaps, that the present is the last annual election that is likely to set the State aflame for many years to come. Next year, in consequence of the adoption of a constitutional amendment, which was presented to the people in 1879, there will be no election at all, and the Governor and members of the Legislature chosen next month will hold their office for two years from the 1st of January, 1881. The first State election after next September will be in 1882, and the Legislature then to be chosen will meet in January, 1883. All county offices which become vacant next January will be filled by election in September—county commissioners to hold for six years from January; clerks of courts, judges and registers of probate and registers of deeds for four years, and sheriffs, county treasurers and county attorneys for two years.

THE annual report of the State Department on the commercial relations of the United States for the year 1879 affords a most encouraging exhibit of our agricultural and manufacturing condition. Summing up the statement of our enormous exportation of native products, Mr. Evarts declares that, upon the severest review, the "American agriculturist seems to hold the principal markets of the world under control, and that neither taxation of foreign breadstuffs, abatement of rents, lowering of taxes, etc., can enable Europe to raise food products as cheaply or of as good quality as can be done in the United States." The only danger to which the American producer is exposed is over-confidence and the carelessness to which it tends. As to our export of manufactures, the report says:

"Thus far, taking all things into account, our export trade in manufactures has been eminently successful. We have secured a firm footing in almost every market, and secured it not by any increase in the general volume of trade, but the displacement of so much of the established trade of other countries. It is but reasonable to assume that when the good times which we experience, and which are yet experienced nowhere else only so far as our purchases from other countries have contributed to their relief, shall radiate to all lands and enable the peoples to purchase their usual supplies of manufactures—for there has not been so much over-production, as some have assumed, as under-consumption through inability to purchase—we will find it easier to develop that foreign trade of which we have made the sure foundation in the darkest days of the world's commercial experience. It is, therefore, most satisfactory to be able to state that marked success has attended every determined and sensible effort which has been made for the development of our export trade, and that even under the many disadvantages against which this trade has to contend we may count upon a continued increase thereof in the various countries."

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

THERE were 2,134 new post-offices established during the last fiscal year.

THE official revision of the census returns of this city show a population of 1,208,823.

A REVISION of the St. Louis census returns makes the population of the city 333,517.

THE Democratic campaign in Indiana was opened on August 13th by 102 meetings, covering nearly the entire State.

THE Cincinnati Board of Commerce has appointed a committee to inquire into the census returns and demand a new count if necessary.

THE persons recently captured in Nebraska and taken to Kansas as the Bender murderers, have been discharged, not proving to be the guilty parties.

SENATOR CONKLIN is said to have come out of the cellar, and announced to make speeches in Indiana, Ohio and this State, in behalf of the Republican ticket.

CHINA has officially informed the United States Government of the removal of foreign trade restrictions upon her own subjects, and of her intention to push her enterprise to America.

THE President has commuted the sentences of the two American sailors, Ross and Diskella, convicted in an American Consular Court of Japan of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death.

THE annual session of the American Bankers' Association at Saratoga, last week, was attended by 300 persons representing the financial institutions of the country. A number of interesting papers were read by eminent financiers.

A WHITE juror in Henrico County, Va., who refused to serve on a jury with a negro, was fined $250 and sentenced to ten days' imprisonment, the punishment being remitted, however, after the recreant had purged himself of his contempt of court.

AT the meeting of the American Dental Association in this city, last week, a large delegation of members of the Southern Dental Association were present, and with a view of more perfectly uniting the professions a new national association was organized.

ON August 12th, on the New York and New Jersey Railroad, near Spring Valley, the axle of a tender broke, and two cars rolled down an embankment a distance of thirty feet. Twelve persons received dislocations or bruises, but no one was killed.

THE reports of the condition of the cotton crop from the States of Virginia, Florida, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas and Alabama are generally favorable, and show the plants to be up to the average of last year, and no serious damage is reported.

THE Tennessee Democrats have nominated General Luke E. Wright for Governor, and passed resolutions denouncing repudiation and favoring the development of the public school system. Two hundred bolting delegates withdrew and nominated Hon. S. F. Wilson for Governor.

A TERRIBLE catastrophe occurred on the West Jersey and Atlantic City Railway, on August 11th. A train bearing 1,200 excursionists was divided into two sections. The first section stopped upon a siding and the second came crashing into it. Some of the passengers in the rear car were crushed to death, some were killed by the escaping steam from the locomotive, and others, scarcely as fortunate as those who were instantly killed, were reduced to terrible agony from scalds and bruises. The total casualties were fifteen dead and fifty-five wounded, and three are missing.

SECRETARY SCHURZ last week visited Fort Hall Agency, Idaho, to consult with the Lemhi tribe of Indians relative to their removal to a new reservation. He will make a tour of inspection through the Yellowstone Park, visiting the Crow Reservation on its northern border. He will hold a council with the Crow Indians on the 28th inst., for the purpose of securing their consent to the ceding to the United States of that portion of their reservation which contains mineral lands. He will also go to Forts Custer and Keogh, and hold a conference with regard to the disposition of the 600 Sitting Bull prisoners at the latter place.

THE Soldiers' Reunion at Columbus, Ohio, last week, was an immense affair. On one day as many as 60,000 persons were on the camp-grounds and in the city. President Hayes, General Sherman, and many other notables were present. The President made a speech, taking immigration and education as his texts, and arguing that in sections where education is general the Constitutional Amendments and all the results of the war are respected, and second, that the great tide of immigration flows to those sections of the country, and to no others. On the last day of the reunion there was a procession of 15,000 men, viewed by 75,000 spectators.

Foreign.

THE British Parliament will not rise before September 11th.

MR. GOSCHEN has informed the Porte that the Powers will insist upon the Greek frontier as fixed by the Berlin Conference.

THE Mexican States Zacatecas, Leon, Jalisco, Sinaloa and Sonora have revolted against General Gonzales, the new Mexican President.

THE situation in Afghanistan is substantially unchanged. General Roberts is marching as rapidly as possible to the relief of Candahar.

VOLUNTEERS are enrolling and recruits are being enlisted everywhere for the Greek army. Greece has purchased 1,450 artillery horses in Hungary.

SPANISH Liberals complain of the impunity granted to the Carlists and Ultramontanes. Carlist candidates are for the first time in thirty years canvassing for election to the Spanish Councils-General.

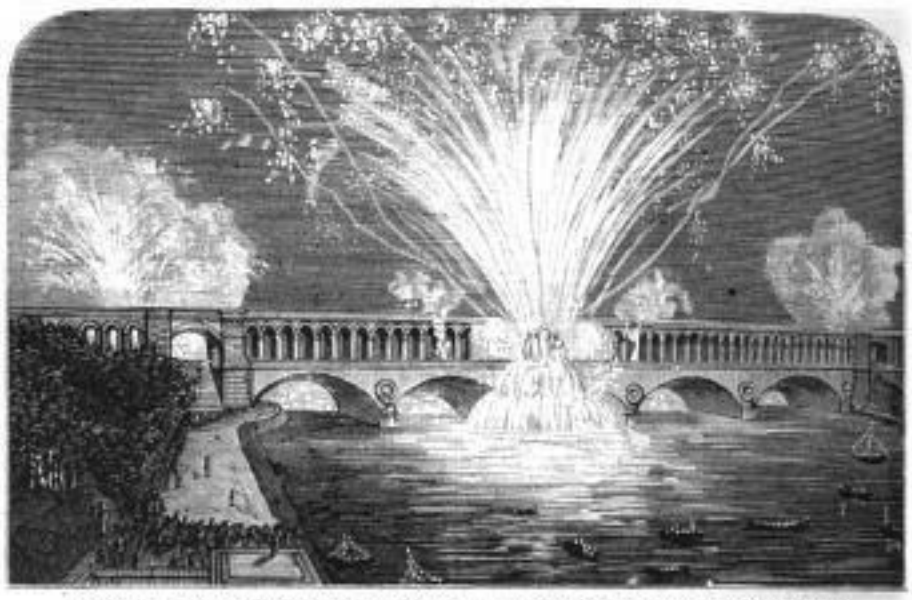
THE Mexican Government has replied to the proposal of the Vatican for the re-establishment of diplomatic relations, and conciliatory instructions have been sent by the Vatican to the Mexican bishops.

THE citizens of Lima, Peru, now besieged by the Chilians, are all enrolled in the guards. The business places are closed every day to allow them to drill, the churches are filled and daily religious processions take place.

A CORK newspaper says Fenianism is again feeling its way in Limerick and illegal drillings are going on. Mysterious strangers from America are reported to be flitting to and fro. The Archbishop of Cashel has denounced the House of Lords for rejecting the Compensation Bill.

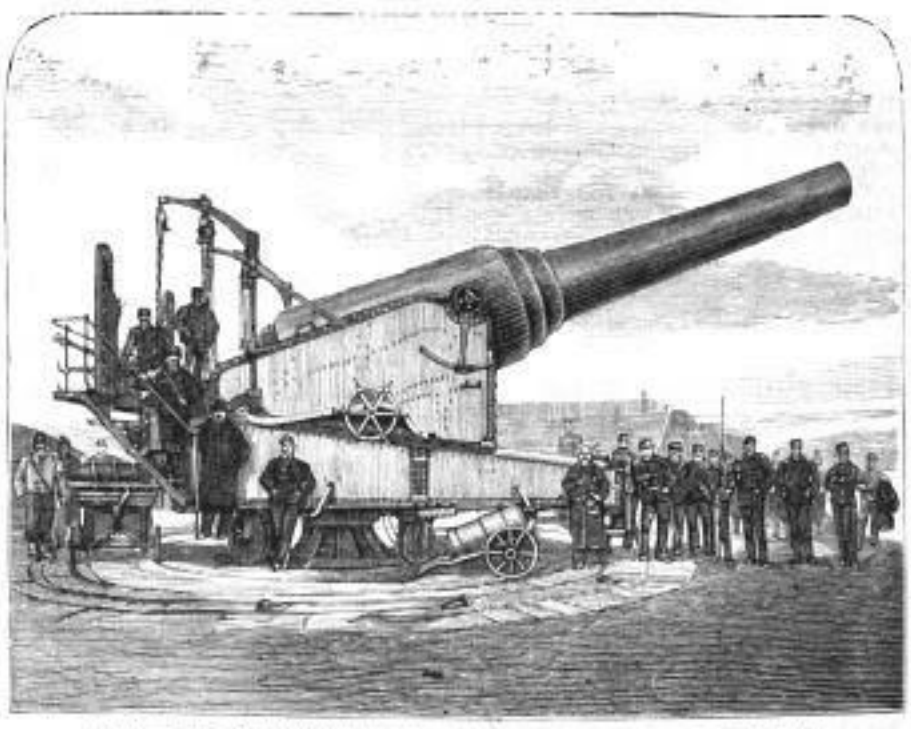
THE Norwegian ship Juno, en route for New York, undergoing repairs at Cork Harbor, was boarded on the night of August 12th by sixty men, and three cases of rifles were stolen. The crew of the vessel was driven into the forecastle, and kept there while the ruffians remained the ship.

Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 431.

BELGIUM.—INAUGURATION OF THE MONUMENT TO LEOPOLD I. AT LAEKEN.

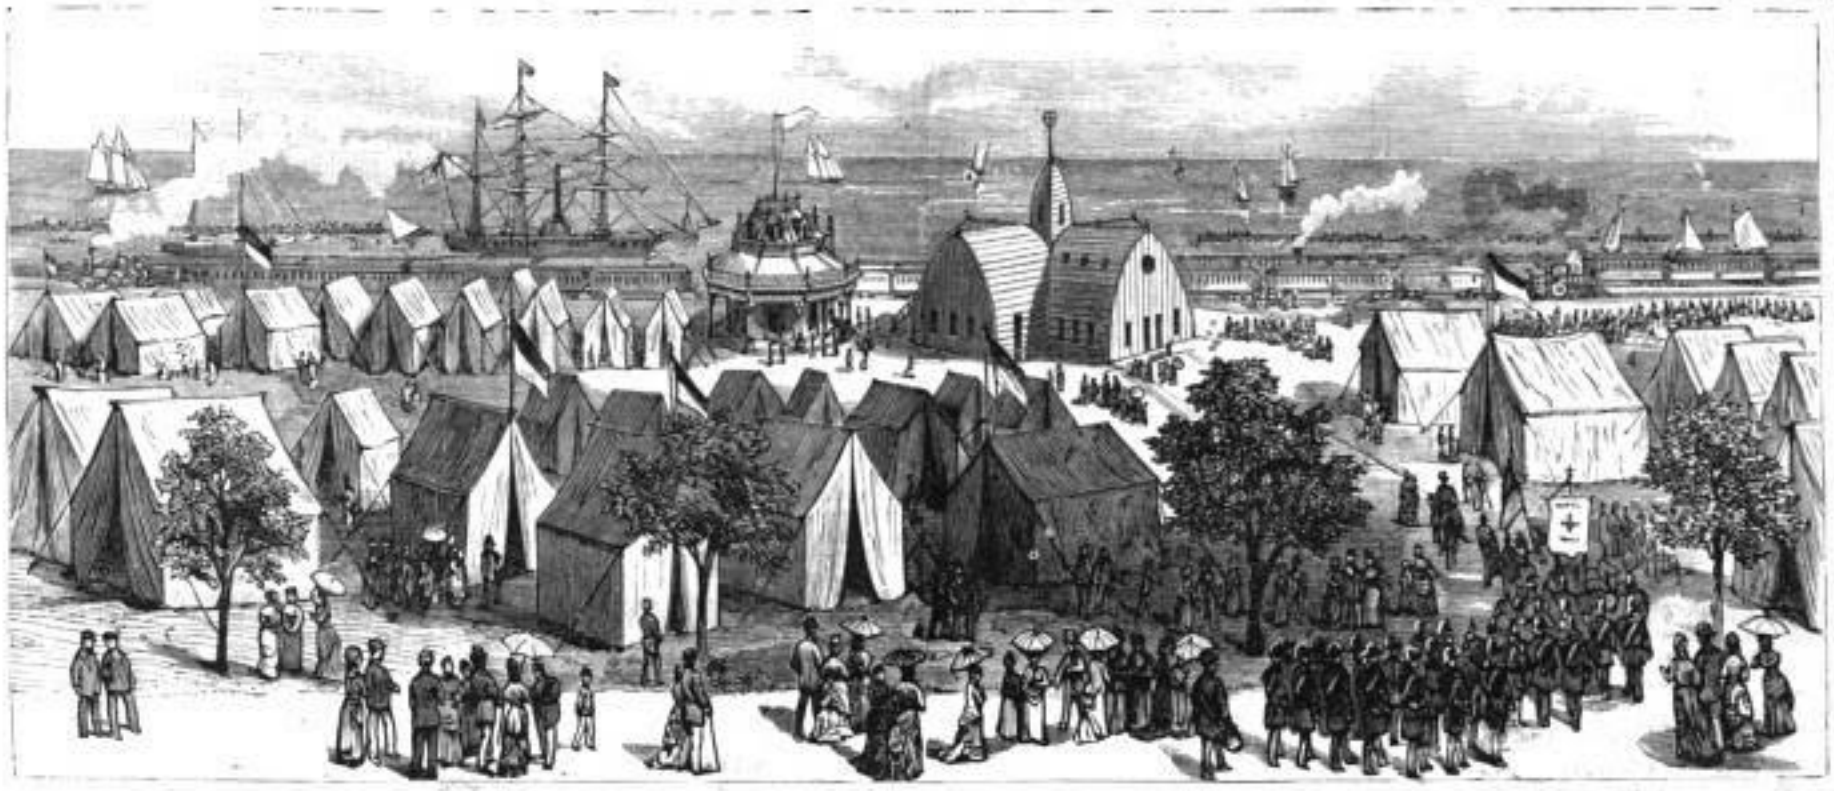


FRANCE.—THE FÊTE OF JULY 14TH—DEMONSTRATION OF STUDENTS.

FRANCE.—THE FÊTE OF JULY 14TH—FIREWORKS AT THE POINT-DU-JOUR.

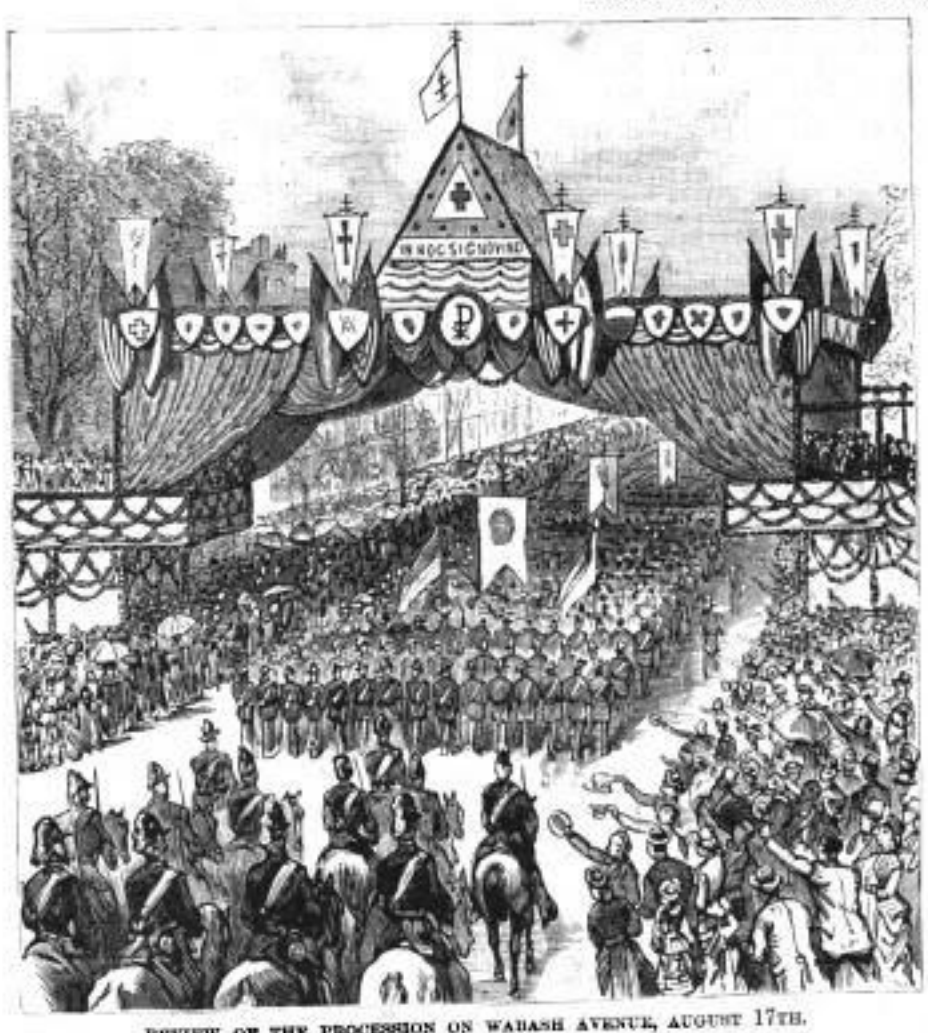
SARDINIA.—OPENING OF THE RAILROAD CONNECTING CAGLIARI WITH SASSARI.

ITALY.—THE ONE HUNDRED-TON GUN JUST CAST FOR THE ROYAL NAVY.

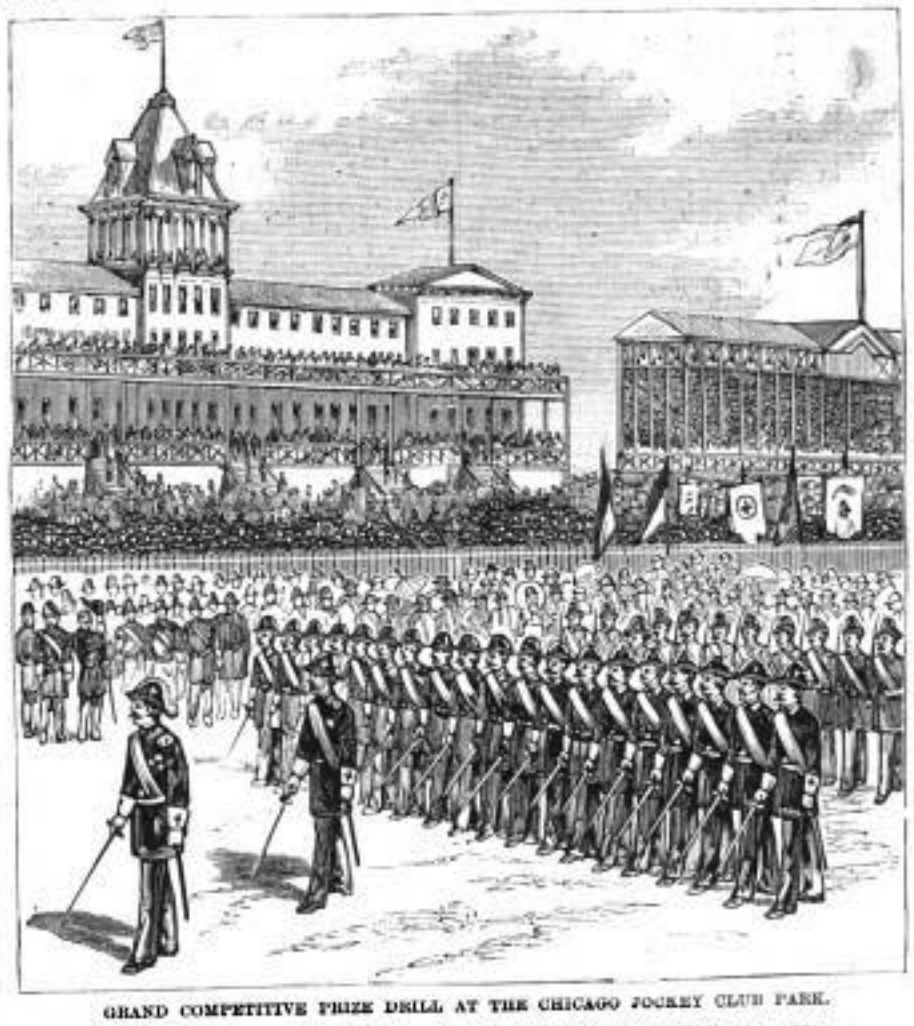


PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.—BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF MANILA BEFORE THE LATE EARTHQUAKE.

ITALY.—A SCENE IN A PEARL-BEAD MANUFACTORY AT VENICE.



Digitized by Google



THE ASYLUM AND ENCAMPMENT ON LAKE FRONT PARK.

DINING THE KNIGHTS AND GUESTS IN THE EXPOSITION BUILDING.

REVIEW OF THE PROCESSION ON WABASH AVENUE, AUGUST 17TH.

GRAND COMPETITIVE PRIZE DRILL AT THE CHICAGO JOCKEY CLUB PARK.

ILLINOIS.—THE TWENTY-FIRST TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE OF THE GRAND ENCAMPMENT, K. T., AT CHICAGO, AUGUST 16TH–19TH.
From Sketches by W. L. Chessey.—See Page 435.

Digitized by Google

THE BRAHMIN'S "SONG OF NATURE."

'TIS I who formed the cosmic sphere—
All essences in me inhere—
Far as the starry orbs revolve,
I worlds create and worlds dissolve.

You shall find me in all moods,
I pass through strange vicissitudes;
Water that falls and light that shines,
Stream from me through endless lines.

I give the exhaustless seed and spore,
To sensual, super-sensual lore;
Freedom and bonds belong to me,
Existence and nonentity.

To every race and every name
Always I appear the same;
I animate all winds that blow—
I flame in flowers, I come in snow.

I tune the ocean's symphony,
The tiniest bird's song tells of me;
And, if my power the earthquake shows,
With no less force I paint the rose.

Though suns pass and faiths be brief,
All gods are props to my belief,
And wisely or unknowingly
Saints and the worshiped worship me.

In centre and circumference found,
Beyond my realm there is no bound;
Who serve me well need not repine,
For death and endless life are mine.

JOEL BENTON.

COUNT KRONSTEIN'S CHAMOIS HUNT.

COUNT CARYL KRONSTEIN could truthfully boast that he was a mighty hunter upon the face of the earth, for, having inherited from his father a large fortune and a natural love of sport, he had spent the greater part of his manhood in many different countries in the enjoyment of every variety of hunt or chase that could be offered to eager adventure. He had joined the red-coated followers of the fox in England, had chased the red deer in the Scotch Highlands, had hunted ferocious wolves in Russia, had gained more than one tiger skin in the jungles of India, had wandered all over the immense area of North America, and shot there all kinds of native game from elk to grizzly bear, and in his early youth had roamed the Tyrolese Mountains with expert chamois hunters, and in the difficult and dangerous pursuit of that keenest and fleetest of all animals amid the solitudes of great peaks, he had first acquired the strong sight, the sure aim, the hardy powers of endurance which had made his name celebrated and won him numberless tokens of his skill and prowess.

He had been indulging in quite a long respite of civilized life in Paris after one of his expeditions, and was beginning to debate in his own mind the choice of several new adventurous fields in which to pass the Summer, when a letter from his father's old friend, and who had been the guardian of his youth, Count Thüler, vividly recalled the ancient schloss, perched upon the giddy Alpine height, with a swift stream flowing below its massive walls, and the white glaciers glistening in the distance. It recalled to him also the playmate of his boyhood, pretty little Bertha, the count's only daughter, and at whose girlish feet he had proudly laid the richest prize of fearless and daring energy, his first chamois. He remembered too, with an ardor that made the blood tingle in his veins, the wild excitement of that lonely chase, the search in almost inaccessible ravines of the mighty mountains, the tremendous leaps from rock to rock, the cold nights passed amid fields of snow, the venturesome wadings through icy torrents, all the perils, the fatigues, the unflinching interest of this most fascinating pursuit. And in consequence of these youthful recollections he put aside the thought of all other enticements to his skill, and concluded to answer Count Thüler's epistle by accepting his invitation in person.

When Count Kronstein once more entered the long, narrow, up-hill street which composed the entire village of Thülerstan, it seemed that nothing had changed in the ten years since he had left it. The solid stone houses, with their quaint overhanging eaves and balconies, still stretched along the roughly paved space that had once been a Roman road, and were to be seen climbing the bare slopes, till those highest up had to be secured on their steep foundations by heavy chains passed around them and then fastened to a firm rock. The portly "wirth," or innkeeper of the village, with his tall figure and rosy but resolute face, still lounged in his doorway as of old; the fat priest, with the same shovel hat, was just entering the modest little Gothic church upon which time had made no mark; and far up, crawling slowly down the precipitous side of the mountain, with iron crampons on his feet, and an immense bundle on his back, the grass-gatherer was returning from his dizzy labor among the highest eminences. The schloss, too, when he reached it, was as gray, as massive, as imposing in its lofty position as when it loomed upon ancient enemies as the guardian fortress of the pass; and his old friend, Count Thüler himself, with his magnificent physique, his kindly face and white hair, had taken on no extra sign of age, while his jovial, hearty welcome made Kronstein feel as if he had come back to his real home; for though he had half a dozen castles of his own, he rarely inhabited any of them for more than a few occasional days. But when Bertha also came forward to greet him, no longer a slender, childish little maiden, but a stately and beautiful woman, with her grand head crowned with great plaits of shining golden hair, with large, clear blue eyes that were at once grave and glad, and her manner calm and gentle, but full of sweetness and grace, then he felt indeed that ten years had truly passed away while he had been going to and fro upon the earth, and this glorious creature had been growing up in the unaltered simplicity of her mountain life. In all his wanderings, and Count Kronstein had not missed his opportunities, he thought he had never seen a being so superbly handsome; she appeared to him more like a goddess than the Venus of Milo, and more queenly than any who bore a sceptre in Europe, and he could not realize that this was indeed the youthful playmate who had remained in his memory always as a child, or in the first stage of girlhood.

When they were seated round the immense carved terra cotta stove, for the air is chilly in these high regions even in Summer, the hours slipped swiftly by, with many a tale on both sides of forest and field, precipice and ravine, to which Bertha also listened with the calm eagerness of one used to hearing stories of daring and danger. Naturally the talk fell at length upon the national sport, and the young count expressed his desire to try his skill against the chamois once more on the familiar mountains.

"Ah!" replied Count Thüler, "the game is not so plenty now as it was ten years ago, and, if anything, is even more wary. It has been so thinned out by poachers that it takes a harder and longer chase than ever to bring down a fine buck. There has been actual war on the mountains between my keepers and these fellows, and more than one bloody scene: and the worst of it is the new men on the estate are not as expert as the old ones in your time—you remember Wagner?—and these rascals often give them the slip.

"And what has become of Wagner?" asked Count Kronstein, "and Johan, who had the deetest foot and sharpest eye in the country—many a good jaunt I had with them both."

"Wagner died," answered Count Thüler, "about two years ago, and the head-keeper in his place is not half his match. Johan long ago turned out the worst poacher of them all. After his old mother died, the young scamp could not be kept from the mountains. He got caught two or three times, and sold off his small patrimony from time to time to get himself out of prison, and immediately went back to his old haunts. If he killed for actual want, or entirely for food, we would not be so wroth about it; but he just follows his poaching for love of it, and many a fine chamois he has shot that has fallen where none can get at it. Now and then he will bring a buck down in the night, when he is sure of not being watched, and leave it at the priest's door. He has over and over again hung them on the outside of the keepers' huts, and so roused them to fresh fury and search for him, and he even left one once on the threshold of the schloss. There was a report that he had been seen a day or two ago, and the men are all out after him now."

"He was a fearless boy and a wonderful shot, I remember," said Kronstein, "and he seems to have kept the promise of his youth. And after all, count, to such sportsmen as you and I, it ought to seem hard that a man should be hunted down like a thief because he has the same tastes as ourselves; and it appears to me that one can well understand how such a one should come to think the custom of owning preserves was one to be honored more in the breach than the observance."

"Ah, my boy!" replied Count Thüler, "those are the notions you have brought across the sea. For much independence in that class leads to license; and I have no idea of letting my game be cleared off by any peasant that may take a fancy to the chase, and I would give something handsome to have this Johan disposed of."

This was rather a sore subject with the old count, and Bertha hastened to interpose.

"Father," she said, "you must give Count Caryl a written pass when he goes to hunt, for you know they are all new keepers since he was here, and none of them either have ever seen Johan close, and if he should meet them they might take him for the poacher, and involuntarily bring him to grief."

Kronstein's vanity was just a little touched at the idea of being mistaken for a peasant.

"Do I resemble Johan, then?" he asked, with the least inflexion of sarcasm in his voice; and Bertha answered, quite simply:

"He is just about your height and build, and"—here she blushed and looked down—"you might be taken for him, because he is very handsome for a peasant."

"Why, Bertha," exclaimed Count Thüler, "where have you seen Johan since he grew up?"

Bertha paused a minute before she answered; then she raised her eyes and looked her father fearlessly in the face.

"I happened not to be able to sleep, and was looking from my window the night he laid the chamois on the castle steps. It was bright moonlight, and I could see and recognize him plainly."

"You saw him—that poaching wretch!" cried her father, "and never gave warning. I would have given a hundred dollars to have caught him!"

"And I, father," frankly replied Bertha, "would not, for a hundred thousand, have had his blood on my head. A man's life is worth more than all the bucks he can kill."

A heavy frown gathered on Count Thüler's brow.

"You young people are all heretical," he said, "to the opinions of your seniors. Perhaps, Caryl, you may meet this Johan yourself and help to bring him in."

Kronstein thought in his inmost heart that he would be much more likely to fraternize with him as in the old days when they were boys together on the mountains; but he only asked:

"Suppose that instead of the poacher I meet your men, will not simply telling them who I am save all trouble?"

"Ah," returned his friend, "if it was Wagner now, that would be well enough, for Wagner would doubtless have remembered you; but these fellows, just as likely as not, would not believe you; and if they took it into their heads that you were Johan, they would make short work of ill-treating, or even shooting, you if you gave them the chance. Bertha is right about it; you must have a pass, though only two or three of them can read."

* * * * * *

A day or two after, equipped in full Tyrolese costume—short leather breeches, displaying the bare knees, a gray frieze jacket, and broad brimmed hat, adorned with the feather of the blackcock—Count Kronstein started for his chamois-stalking, carrying his heavy kit against the small of his back, containing bread, hard-boiled eggs, bacon, tea, sugar, iron crampons for the feet in slippery places, a small telescope and an iron pan; for, in ranging over the mountains the hunter finds an occasional empty hut, in whose substantial fireplace he can cook himself a comfortable meal; or, lacking such accommodation, he will know how to kindle a flame from bits of wood upon the bare rock. Two or three hours of hard climbing carried him to the top of an enormous crag, in the midst of snow-clad peaks, so lofty that it had almost seemed from the village below as if no human foot could gain them. Here, reconnoitring with his glass the neighboring precipitous slopes, he soon discovered a herd of chamois; but as the wind blew in their direction, in order to avoid their keen scent, he had to make a considerable round so as to get within range of the wary animals. He only could do this by creeping along a narrow ledge of rock, about two feet in width, that ran horizontally across the steep wall, at the other end of which the herd were browsing, and along which it was necessary to proceed slowly and carefully, as a slip would have been certain death. He had gone about half-way, when the accidental displacement of a small stone startled the sharp-eared creatures, that in another instant had bounded down the sides of the ravine with an unsurpassed agility. Thus disappointed at his first chance at the game, the count followed their traces with unwearied energy till night began to fall before he perceived that he had allowed the excitement of the chase to lead him into a very wilderness of peaks and gorges, amid which was no sign of shelter. Looking around for some spot in which to pass the night, for, with the darkness coming on, it would have been impossible for him to have continued his way in safety, he found at last a small cave in which he had barely room to turn, but which served to shield him from the icy cold winds that swept from vast and near snowfields. Gathering a few chips and cones scattered by the stunted and occasional trees, he managed to raise enough fire to prepare food, and, with the help of his cigars, and with his knapsack for a pillow, he contrived to get through the long hours till dawn. The next morning, while still in eager pursuit, he suddenly came upon a dangerous chasm, in whose midst fell in cascades over projecting rocks a bright stream, that then flowed swiftly down the deep ravine, the almost perpendicular sides of which were made doubly difficult of descent by a coating of snow; but there, about one hundred yards below him, he caught sight of a magnificent, tawny buck. But before he could raise his rifle, the graceful creature, always alert, with its wonderful blending of strength and agility, and its remarkable ability of balancing its body, had made a clear leap of twenty-five feet down a sheer precipice, lighting with its four hoofs close together upon a small pinnacle not broader than a man's hand, where it stood for an instant as if watching and gathering itself up for another jump. This was the count's opportunity, and he instantly fired. But simultaneously with the crack of his own rifle, another shot sounded in the ravine, and Kronstein, waiting only to see the chamois rise on his hind legs and fall over backwards into the gorge, glanced around for his rival sportsman; and on a projecting peak hanging over the abyss beheld a stalwart hunter leaning on his discharged rifle and evidently seeking eagerly also to discover who had fired the other shot. There was something familiar in the upturned face, bronzed by exposure, and in the piercing blue eyes that instantly caught his own: he knew that some of the keepers would be likely to shoot while on the hunt for the poacher, and he divined that this must be the veritable sinner himself. The man braced his back against a rock, sharply scanning what he could see of this newcomer as he leaned over the stony wall, and loading his rifle quickly without looking at it. "Johan, my boy," shouted the count, heartily, "is that buck yours or mine?"

"Who are you?" came back for answer from one always suspicious of his own kind to be met in the mountains.

"Kronstein, boy!" replied the count; "don't you remember your old comrade? Come up here, if you can. I swear no harm shall come to you through me."

In an instant, with the fleetness and sure-footedness only to be equaled by the chamois itself, he was clambering up the precipitous and glazed rocks; the count fairly held his breath till he saw him safely at his side, and with a cordial hand-shake had welcomed the hunted outlaw. They had stood leaning against the rocks talking together for some time, recalling boyish scrapes and exploits, when suddenly Johan asked the count if he was not, of course, staying at Schloss Thüler.

"Surely," replied Kronstein; "where else should I stay in this part of the world?"

The other clutched his rifle. The count had thrown his at his feet, and made no movement towards it at this action of his companion.

"See, here, Sir Count," said the poacher, his eyes gleaming like fire, "I live a hunted life, and am suspicious of every man not of my own class and ways. It may be that you are stanch and true as the boy whose sports I once shared in these same heights; but Count Thüler and his men hate me, and have sworn to take my life or liberty. Now, sir, swear to me that you are not leagued with these to betray me, or I will defend myself from you to the death."

Kronstein looked him steadily in the face. "Johan," he said, "when we were lads together did you ever know me to show any meanness of spirit, to take credit for shots not my own, to leave a comrade in a scrape, or do any sort of dirty work?"

"No, count, I will admit that you were always all right then; but men change in ten years—as I have done."

The count gave the rifle at his foot a lazy kick. "Look at that, my friend," he said, "and tell me what chance you would have had against it with that clumsy old stock of yours?"

Johan picked up the weapon and examined it, his eyes fairly dancing at handling so splendid an arm, for it was a fine seven shooting repeater, fully charged except for the shot fired at the chamois, and which had done good service over half the world.

"Carry it for me," said the count, carelessly, "till we come to another bit of game."

"No, count, you are the same old boy, and I will trust you," said Johan, with some feeling, offering the rifle to his comrade with one hand, and extending the other for a friendly grasp.

The count shook it warmly, and then quietly drawing the charges from his weapon, threw the empty gun over his shoulder. "Is there not a chalet somewhere about here?" he asked, as if nothing unusual had happened, "where we can prepare a breakfast?"

"There is one," was the answer, "some distance off, but we would earn an appetite getting to it." And they started for a long tramp over the rocks.

Johan walked for a while with his head hung down, like a man ashamed or depressed; the count was thinking, "If he had not such an honest eye, and if I did not know that the poachers of the Tyrol never kill for plunder, but only in self-defense, I might deem it foolhardy to take chances along with this powerful fellow," when his companion suddenly stopped.

"I must hear you say it, count," he broke out, "that you pardon my mistrust; but see, what would you? When a man is hunted down like an animal just because he cannot clear his blood of the chamois fever and the love of nature, and believe that God created the free wild creatures for a few rich noblemen, and feels that game sought at the risk of life should be his who has the courage and hardihood to win it, one grows bitter against the people that makes us outcasts and naturally suspicious of strangers."

"Well," replied the count, "in the same circumstances, I suppose I should feel as you do; but, after all, for the killing of a few chamois, do you think it worth while to live your whole life in this way, with so many men's hands against you, and yours against so many others?"

"Ah, count, you are a sportsman yourself—you must understand how it is. Have you not known times when you hunt in your very sleep—when even with your eyes open you have visions of rushing, leaping creatures, and your knees tremble and your feet dance for the chase—when such restlessness possesses you for the forest and the mountain that the days drag like years till you have your rifle in your hand, and the lightness of your heart comes back in the solitude and eagerness of the hunt?"

The count did know how it was himself, and could sympathize perfectly with such a state of mind; still he felt there should be a better fate for such a fine, stalwart, intelligent fellow as this than a poacher's death.

"What would induce you to change this sort of life?" he said.

"Well, I don't know of anything just now," replied Johan, and then added, with a shout of laughter at the humor of his own idea, "unless Count Thüler would make me his head-keeper."

Kronstein stopped short. "Look here, my boy, if the count would do that, will you promise me to give up poaching for the rest of your days?"

Johan laughed louder than ever. "Oh, it is about as likely that the count would set me over his preserves as that I should never shoot another chamois!"

"Will you promise, then?" persisted Kronstein.

"Surely, yes, count," answered Johan, still laughing, "I will promise that, without any trouble of mind."

They had now reached the chalet, which was a familiar haunt of Johan's. It was situated upon an elevated plateau, and commanded a clear view for a long distance round. Here they speedily cooked a comfortable breakfast from the count's kit, and when they had lighted the cigars which Kronstein produced, the latter remarked:

"Johan, I thought I would wait till you had a good meal before telling you, but you are in a bad fix just now. All Count Thüler's men are out after you, and I am surprised that you have hitherto escaped them, as they are in full force and determined to take you this time, dead or alive."

Johan dropped his cigar and seized his rifle.

"Sir Count, if I had not brought you here myself, I should suspect you had led me into this trap, after all. The smoke from this chimney can be seen for miles. If one of those chaps catch sight of it they will think I am here. I must be off while there is time."

"Wait a moment, my boy," said Kronstein, leisurely. "I reckon, as they say in America, it will take them some time to find you yet, and I have a scheme in my head to outwit them if they do—just such a prank as you would have delighted in a dozen years ago."

Digitized by Google

Johan quietly resumed his seat.

"I will trust you, count," he said.

Kronstein took his telescope and stepped to the door of the hut, and turned the glass first upon the scenes directly in front and below it.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, suddenly, and retreated a step; he then reconnoitred on the right. "Ah! ah!" he cried, and turned to the left. "Ah! ah! ah!" and drew a long breath.

"They are coming, then?" asked Johan, as he stepped to his side.

"We are surrounded," replied the count; "look for yourself."

Johan took the glass, and there, upon either hand, far down, but steadily creeping up like flies upon the sides of the mountain, were two men in each direction; he went round to the back of the hut and took a glance; there also were two approaching upwards.

"It is a small army," he said. "They must believe me to be rather formidable; but if they have the advantage of numbers, here is the advantage of situation. Count, lend me your repeater, and I will pick each pair off as they come within distance!"

"No," answered the count; "let us have no bloodshed. I told you I had a scheme to get you out of this; sit down here and listen. It will take those chaps nearly an hour to reach here yet, which will give us plenty of time to make our arrangements."

Johan sat calmly down.

"Comrade," he said, "you may know I trust you, since it is a matter of my life. I will never be again taken alive!"

"Now, my boy," said the count, "do you remember when, as a youngster, you took the Archangel's part in the Paradise Play at the wirth's in the village, you were well praised for your natural acting? Do you think you could do that sort of thing now, in order to circumvent your would-be captors?"

"What!" exclaimed the other, "do you think they will ever take me for an archangel up here?" and, in spite of the situation, Johan burst into a hearty peal of laughter. "A pretty cherub, with leather breeches and a rifle for a trumpet!"

"No," answered the count, echoing the laugh, "I do not think they would mistake you for an archangel, but they might, for me."

The count really enjoyed Johan's bewilderment, and then explained; the other, with the natural dramatic instinct of the Tyrolese peasant, seized and entered into the idea with the same zest as he would have taken a new part for the Christmas representation in the village. In a little while the count and he had entirely changed clothes, the former generously repressing an involuntary shudder as he got into the soiled and worn attire of the poacher, to which were ingeniously added a few more slashes and rents to give the appearance of struggle; the kit was slung upon Johan's back, and the repeater held in his hand. Then they sat down to wait. Suddenly the poacher exclaimed: "Count, your knees!" and for the first time Kronstein observed how fair and smooth were his exposed limbs beside the other's, which were a rich brown from exposure, and full of scars. The count ran quickly to a crevice in the rocks and scraped up some clay, which he rubbed well into his skin, and a little artistic manipulation added a good imitation of scars.

When the keepers arrived upon the scene, stealthily approaching the chalet with rifles ready to discharge in case of a rush by the poacher, they expected to find the heavy door securely closed and fastened with the massive iron bar with which these solitary mountain huts are always provided, and they anticipated not only great difficulty in obtaining an entrance, but a dangerous fight, in spite of their numbers, with one who had the reputation of being the most courageous desperado of the neighborhood. Therefore, great was their surprise to find the entrance open, and two men within in attitudes indicative of their different rôles—one, seated, sullen in expression, with hat pulled down over his eyes and an empty weapon at his feet; the other, standing, with a proud and contemptuous air, but with superb rifle presented at the apparent prisoner.

"Aha!" said this one, as the men entered the hut. "Here are enough to stir your obstinacy. You are Count Thüler's men, are you not?" loftily to the wondering keepers, who gave assent. "Well, you are just in time—here is a prize for you, your master will be glad to get. Do you not know that this is that rascal of a poacher he was telling me about a few nights ago? Wait. He said I would probably meet you in quest of this Johan, and I have a line from him somewhere to tell you who I am. Just take my gun, will you?" to the head keeper, "and keep an eye on that rogue till I look it up," and, fumbling in the knapsack, Count Thüler's pass was directly produced, and had its due effect in causing them to believe that this was Count Kronstein before them, who had been expected at the schloss when they left.

"May I ask you, sir," said the head keeper, as he handed back the weapon, "how you came to take this man alone?" and there was just a tinge of suspicion in his tone.

"This was what did it," answered the assumed count, patting his rifle. "You see, the count told me well enough about him, so I was on the lookout for him as well as for you. Last night, tired with the chase, I slept in a sort of cave in a gorge over there, and early this morning was wakened by a shot. I looked cautiously out and saw a chamois tumble over into the ravine, and this fellow, who had had the audacity to shoot it for sport and not for food, did not even take the trouble to go down after it, but after watching where it fell, clambered up the rocks. I followed some distance behind upon his tracks, and hid round here till he had cooked his meat and felt secure, then I rushed on him—you see he had discharged his rifle—and, though he tried to wrest my gun away from me without success, he soon saw he had no chance against my repeater, and had to surrender. It was all very simple, after all. But I have not been able to make him take up his march. All he has said since he gave up is, that I may kill him if I choose, but that one man shall never take him alive to prison."

"We will relieve you of that, count," said the head keeper.

The prisoner by this time had risen to his feet, and appeared as if he meant to take a flying leap through the collected forms that blocked up the door. He stooped and picked up his rifle, and, holding it club-fashion, made a sudden rush, but his foot caught, not quite accidentally perhaps, against the block of wood on which he had been sitting, and he pitched clumsily forward into the head keeper's arms. His rifle was quickly wrenched away from him, and he was placed in the midst of the whole company, who then took up their line of march, their well-watched captive having perforce to keep step with them. As they passed out of the hut the supposed count said, quietly:

"As I have caught other game than I came out for, and would like to take a fat buck back with me to the schloss, it is scarcely worth while for me, my men, to go on with you. I will finish up my hunt, and you will find me at Count Thüler's when you want me! By-the-way, as I have not been on these mountains for ten years, I am not quite sure of my way. In which direction is the Grontlan Gorge?"

The head keeper gave him minute directions—quite opposite to their own route—and, bidding them keep a careful lookout on their prisoner, the other turned carelessly off with his rifle over his shoulder, and began to descend the rocks, as they also, pressing close upon their captive as the nature of the ground would permit, commenced their downward climb; and on their way to the castle the count was regaled, much to his amusement, though he retained his surly air, with admiring remarks upon the appearance and bearing of the presumed nobleman, in uncomplimentary comparison with his own looks and manners.

When Kronstein was taken into Count Thüler's presence in the great hall of the castle, preparatory to being conveyed to jail in the next large town, the head keeper exultingly exclaimed:

"We have got him at last, count. Here is Johan, the poacher!" and as they pushed him forward, Kronstein tossed off his hat and laughed in his friend's face.

"Why, and—what, Caryl! What does this mean?" asked the astonished count.

"Only," replied Kronstein, "that your daughter was right when she said that these men of yours would not be able to distinguish a count from a poacher!"

"What do you mean, you rascals!" thundered Count Thüler, "by treating my friend and guest in this fashion?"

The keepers had shrunk back astounded and bewildered.

"Oh, don't blame them," interposed Kronstein, "for it was really my trick, after all! And see here, boys," continued the count, turning towards them, "you must not think too hard of me for it, when I tell you that Johan and I were comrades in our boyhood, and I could not see him taken while I could give him a helping hand. I will make it all right to you in another way."

"Do you mean to say," exclaimed Count Thüler, "that you have cheated my men out of catching that villain of a poacher?"

"Well, my friend," answered the count, quietly, "it was part of a bargain I had made with him, which I thought would be to your advantage, and which I will tell you presently." Count Thüler ordered the men to leave the hall, and they went out with hanging heads, and yet, too, with some sense of humor amid their anger and mortification at the cleverness with which they had been deceived.

"To think," said the head keeper, "of the rascal asking me the road to the Grontlan Gorge when he knows every crack and cranny of the mountains!"

"And I," groaned another, "told the young count that he looked like a jail-bird alongside of a noble like that other!"

"Now," said Count Thüler, severely, when they were alone, "explain this matter to me, Kronstein."

"Well, my dear old friend," answered the other, "it was only this. I met Johan quite accidentally, recognized him, found in talking with him that he had a reasonable comprehension of the perils of his career, and out of kindly feeling and the memories of our boyhood—for, believe me, there is much good in the fellow—promised him if he would give up his poaching that I would save him from capture—and—that you would make him your head keeper."

Count Thüler looked at his guest a moment in amazed silence.

"My head keeper!" he gasped at length, "that poacher. Caryl, you are mad!"

"Well, now," coolly replied Kronstein, "it struck me that it would be better to have such a capable, intelligent fellow keeping your preserves for you than robbing them, and I give you my word for it, in such a post he would be invaluable."

Here Bertha, who had heard something of the affair outside, came in. Kronstein blushed at being seen by her in such a plight; but her rather immediately cried out:

"What do you think of it, daughter? Caryl, here, has made Johan promise to give up poaching if I make him head keeper."

"Well," laughed Bertha, "if you can catch Johan, it might be a good thing, for you know, father, except for taking a chamois occasionally, we have always heard that Johan was honest."

But Count Thüler shook his head.

"There is my man here that suits me very well, though he has been so stupid as to be imposed on by a couple of youngsters. What is to be done with him? Turn him off into Johan's place, I suppose?"

"Oh, I will attend to him," said Kronstein, "He can have the head situation at Kronsteinheim."

But still the count shook his head.

When, however, the count had related all the particulars of the escapade, embellishing his account with inimitable wit and mimicry which made his old friend laugh himself into a good humor, Count Thüler returned to the subject of making Johan keeper.

"Daughter," he observed, "you have said that Johan is honest. Now a rifle like Caryl's is a great temptation and treasure to a fellow like this. If he returns the count's rifle I will give him the place."

"He will return it," replies Kronstein, confidently, though never a word had passed between Johan and himself on the subject.

"We will see," answered Count Thüler, still shaking his head dubiously.

And the next morning, as the old count stepped out of his castle gate, he found Kronstein's rifle leaning against the post, and all his clothes folded in a neat packet beside it. So that in a few months, when Count Kronstein returned to Schloss Thüler for his beautiful bride, no one gave him a more hearty greeting than the head keeper, who had been Johan, the poacher.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

Belgium's Tribute to Leopold I.

The unveiling of the monument of Leopold I. in the new public park at Laeken, Belgium, took place on July 21st last. The monument is the result of a national subscription which was opened after the death of Leopold I. It is situated in the centre of the park, which was prepared specially for its reception, and is approached by an avenue from the monumental church at Laeken. Situated on a plateau eighty metres in diameter, at a considerable elevation, it commands a view over the capital and its neighborhood. The statue is of white marble, 5·50 metres in height, and is the work of the sculptor M. Geefs. The late King is represented in the uniform of a Belgian General, over which is worn the Royal mantle, which reaches to the ground. In rear of the monument is an open gallery, above the columns of which allegorical statues of the nine provinces are placed, under canopies surmounted by lions holding the armorial escutcheons of the nine provinces. The relief is surmounted by an open story, from which arises the pyramidal spire, 20·60 metres in height. The spire is surmounted by a metal globe, on which is placed a wrought copper statue, representing the Genius of Belgium, holding in one hand a civic crown and in the other the flag of Belgium. The architecture of the monument is in the fourteenth century style, while the statues are of modern character. On the pedestal of the statue are the inscriptions, in French and in Flemish, "To Leopold I. Grateful Belgium," and "Monument erected by national subscription."

The French Fete of July 14th.

The illuminations and fireworks at Paris on the occasion of the fête of the 14th of July were of the most gorgeous and startling splendor. Pyrotechnic skill and pyrotechnic daring would seem to have exhausted themselves on this memorable occasion, and never, in the history of "red fire" did such a display dazzle the eyes of expectant and enthusiastic beholders. The "piece" which was exhibited opposite the Observatoire was of surpassing magnificence. It represented the Bastille, and behind the fortress rose the column of July surmounted by the statue of Liberty. The marvelous beauty of the river display at Point du-Jour, where ten thousand rockets burst in the air, while a cascade of living fire flowed for upwards of half an hour, the statues of the Muses in blue flame standing forth in wondrous relief. The great feature of the day, after the presentation of the colors, was the delivery of the address from the base of the statue of Liberty at Chateau d'Eau. In the evening the statue was lighted by 6,000 jets of gas.

The Opening of the Sassari-Cagliari Railroad in the Island of Sardinia.

Railroads and modern improvements invade even the islands of the Mediterranean. On the 1st of July a railroad was solemnly inaugurated in the island of Sardinia. The people turned out as for a grand holiday—women in their richest costumes, with their traditional veil, their yellow cross on a blue ground; men in the queer white, baggy trousers or trunks. At Cagliari, the chief town of the island, the train, after felicitations all along the route, was received with all the honors of a triumph. The streets were a flood of light, the joy immense, the chorus incessant. Sassari, at the other extremity on the sea, is the progressive city, and rivals some of her sisters on the mainland.

Stringing Pearls in Venice.

Ever since the latter end of the fifteenth century the manufacture of pearl beads has been a favorite industry of the Venetians, and though the present form of bead owes its discovery to a Frenchman named Jacquin, Venice still holds her own in the production of these pretty bubbles. Formed of a thin kind of glass, so easily blown that a workman can turn out six thousand in his day's work, these beads are coated with a composition obtained from the scales of fish, and this gives them their glossy pearl-like appearance. They are then strung on long strings ready for the market by women, and it is this portion of industry, as the most picturesque, that has been chosen for our illustration. In this the artist has represented a group of laughing, black-eyed, lithe-lipped, scandal-loving Venetian damsels—all chattering vigorously over their work as Italian maidens only can laugh and chatter. The ungainly figure of the foreman, the padrone, sets off the graceful forms of her workgirls to perfection.

An Italian 100-Ton Gun.

For some years past the Italians have been experimenting with monster guns, and several 100 ton pieces have been cast in England for the Italian Government, who, moreover, have built two vessels, the Duilio and the Dandolo, for the express purpose of carrying them. Now the Italians have succeeded in producing a 100-ton gun themselves, and one of these giants of modern war fare has just been cast at Turin. The gun is the invention of General Rossat, the Director General of Artillery, and is of cast-iron, the interior being lined with steel rings. The charge of powder is 450 pounds, and the manufacture of this is kept a secret by the Government. The total cost of the gun was $35,000; the projectiles cost $200 each.

Fatal Earthquake at Manila, Philippine Islands.

The Philippine Islands have of late been greatly disturbed by earthquakes and unusual volcanic action. An official dispatch from Manila, on the Island of Luzon, of July 20th, giving some additional particulars of the earthquake, states that the first shock lasted seventy seconds, and that nine of the native inhabitants were killed and eleven others injured. A second shock, lasting forty seconds, occurred at four o'clock in the afternoon. At Legazpi and Sabaran some of the public buildings were also thrown down. The earth opened in several places, and jets of boiling water and showers of ashes were ejected from the fissures. Another shock is stated to have occurred on the evening of the 24th. Other accounts received state that the period of seismic disturbance commenced on the 13th, and that repeated shocks have occurred since then, those of the 15th and 20th being the most violent. The cathedral and the barracks at Manila have fallen in, and the troops are encamped outside the city. Almost all the volcanoes of the Island of Luzon are in full activity.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—OWING to the increased trade relations, the German mission to Japan is to be made a regular embassy.

—HEAVY rains near Wilmington, N. C., are reported to have damaged the cotton crop in that region nearly 50 per cent.

—THREE-FOURTHS of the Parisians are poor. There are in the city 654,932 lodgings, of which 403,641 are let for less than $80.

—IT is reported that 10,000 negroes will leave Louisiana and Mississippi the next two months for Kansas and other Northern States.

—CALIXTO GARCIA AND MODESTA FONSECA, the captive Cuban chiefs, with three of their companions, have arrived at Havana en route to Spain.

—REPORTS from different parts of the Northwest represent many of the Indians as growing restless, and one or two small bands in open rebellion.

—THE Serbian Commissioners have been recalled from Vienna because of Austria's delay in proceeding with the treaty of commerce, and much anxiety is felt as to the result.

—HERE'S a hint for heirship seekers: The property standing in the name of the Accountant-General of the English Court of Chancery amounted in 1750 to £1,666,000, in 1840 to £41,000,000, and now reaches a far greater sum.

—CARDINAL MANNING has decided that the English pilgrims to Lourdes shall leave England in the first or second week in September, so as to arrive at the shrine on the Feast of the Nativity of the Virgin, which falls on the 8th of September or within its octave.

—THE Rev. Father Ouiel wears the shield of a police-sergeant when he officiates as priest in a St. Louis Catholic Church. His neighborhood is disreputable, and formerly his services were interrupted by roughs. So he obtained the police appointment in order to be qualified to make arrests.

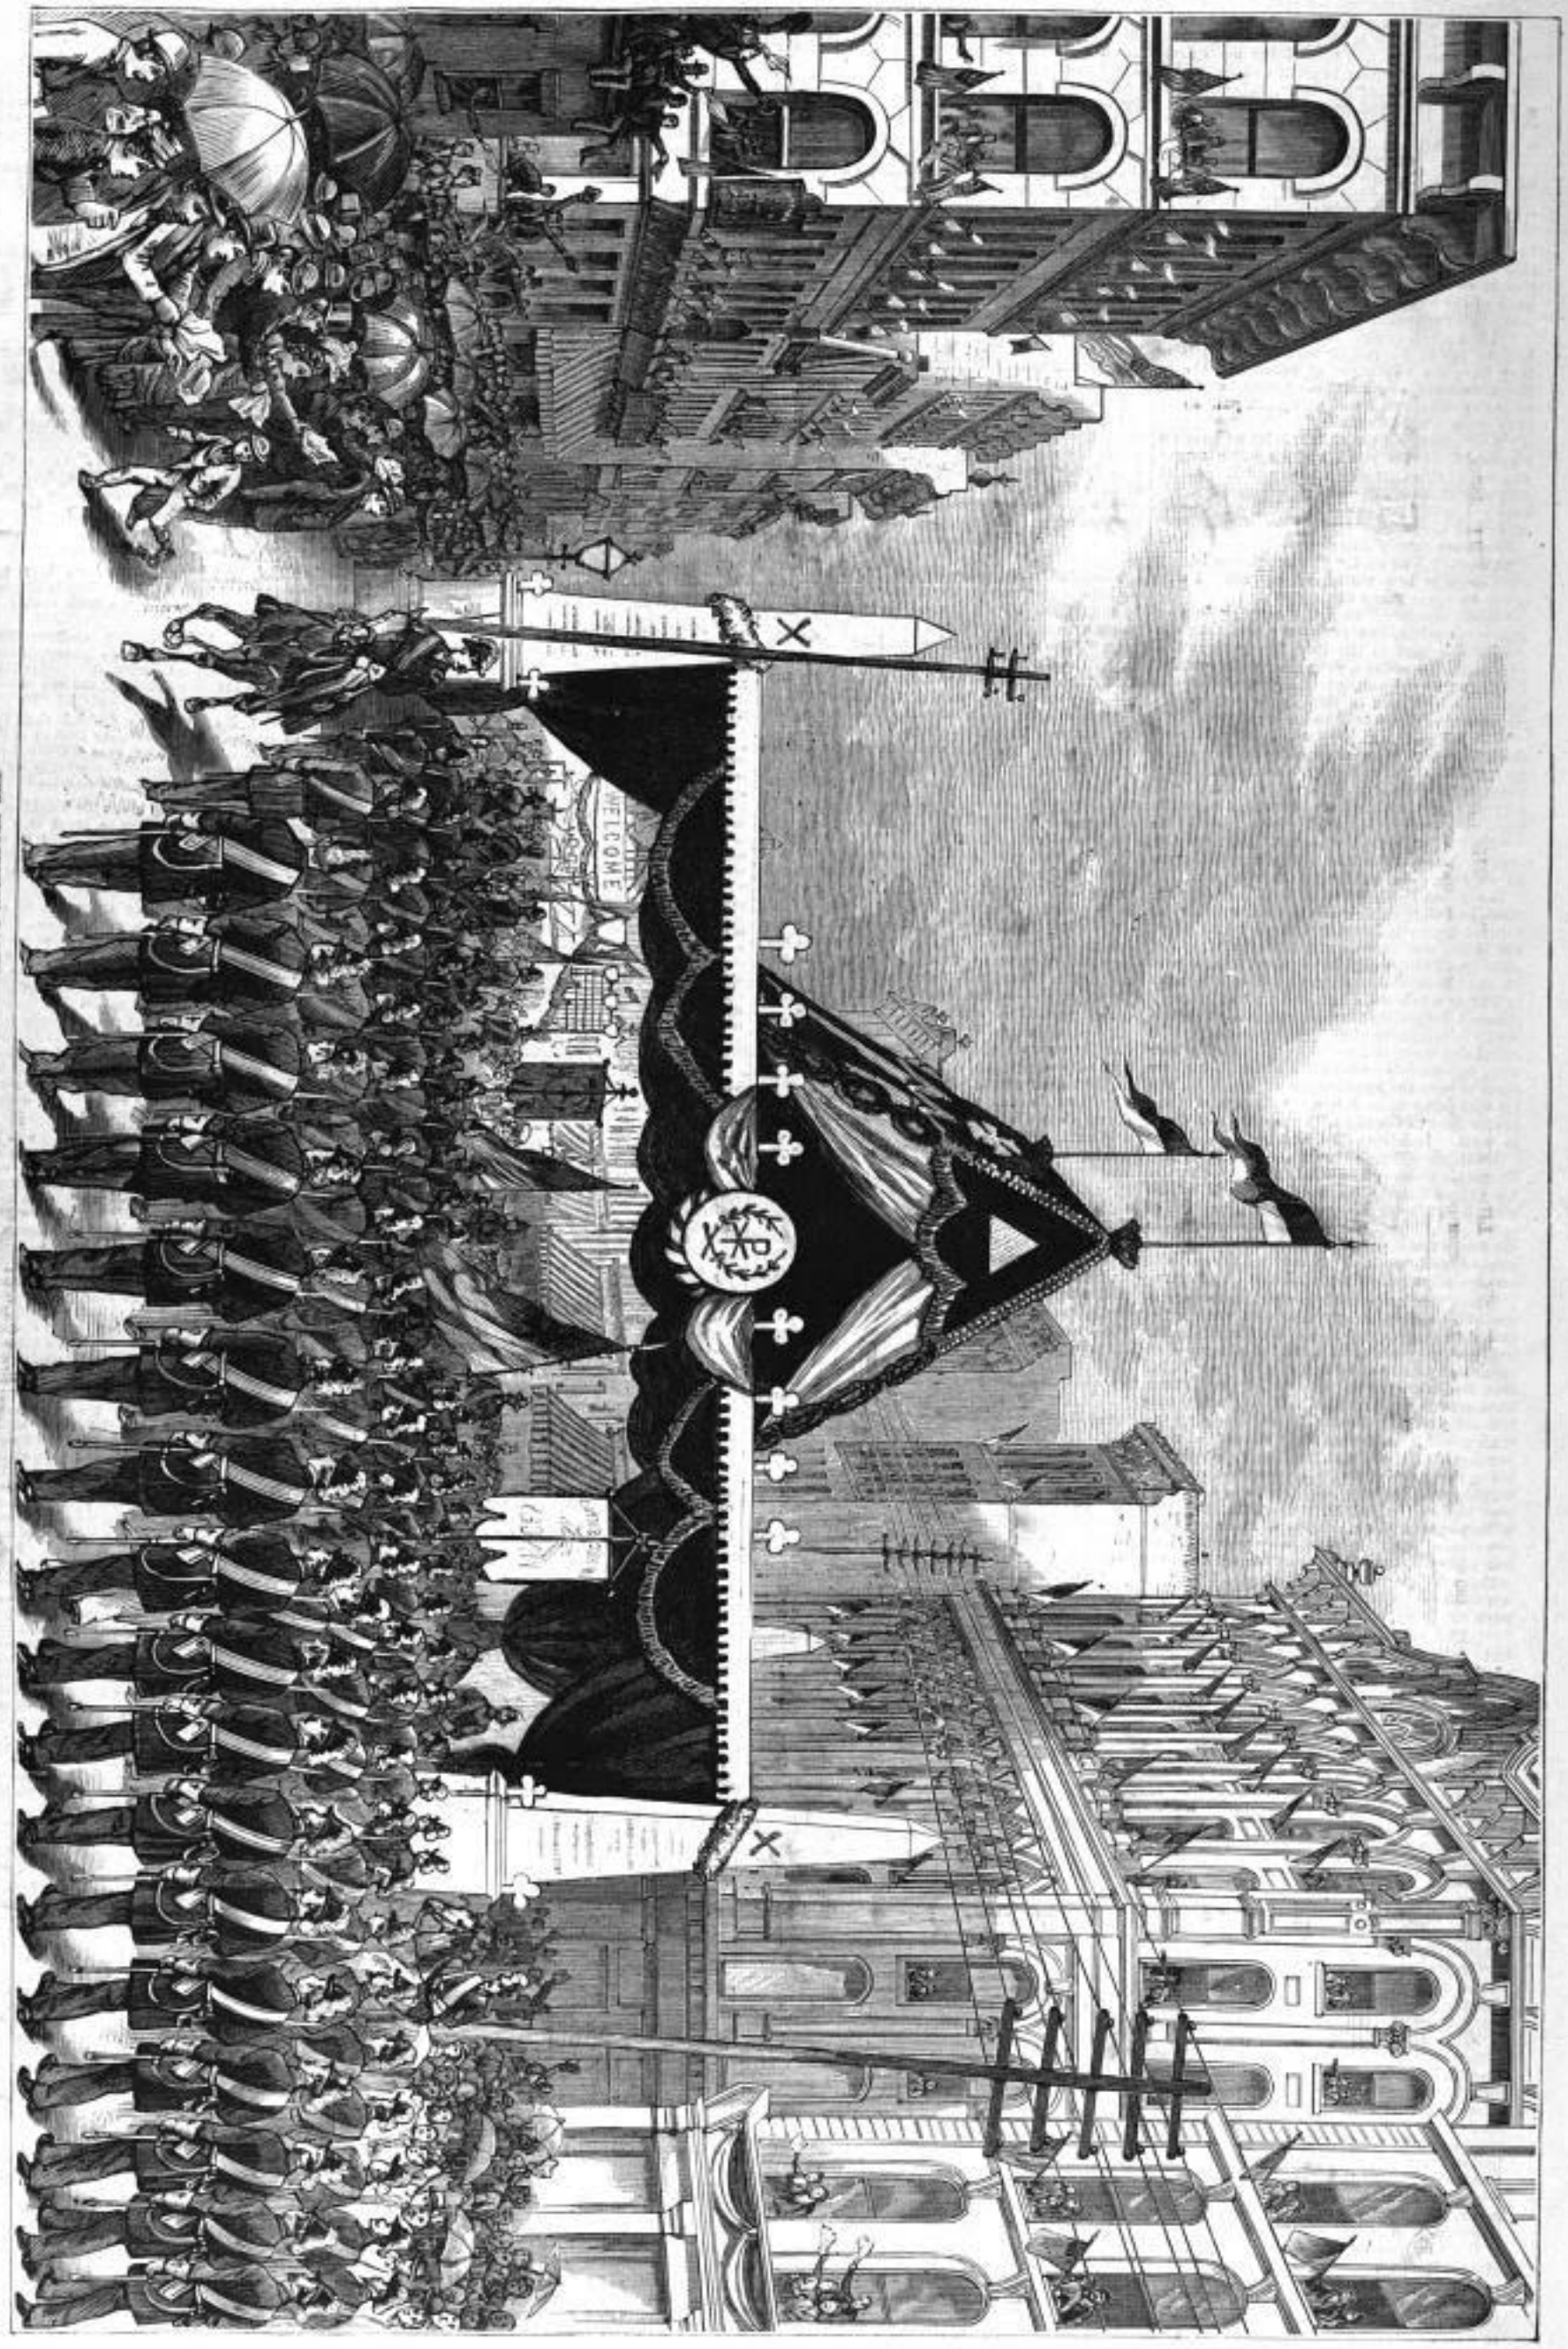
—A RECENT London paper announces in one column the sale of some land in Nothing Lane, Tower Street, at the rate of £211,992 per acre, and of ten lots in Ely Place, Holborn, at the rate of £112,147 per acre, while in the next column is an announcement that the number of paupers in the metropolis, exclusive of lunatics in asylums and vagrants, was 83,219.

—A NOCTURNAL sham sea-fight is shortly to be executed by the German navy off the coast at Rugen on a grand scale. It will be in the presence of the Crown Prince, who attends by a special command of his father, the Emperor. Electric lights are to be put in use, lighting up the sea for many miles round. The ironclad squadron will take part in the manœuvre.

—THE speculative builder is destroying another place of historic interest. The Manor House, Stoke Newington, where Edgar Poe and other celebrities went to school, and which tradition connects with the times of Queen Elizabeth and the Commonwealth, is being pulled down to make way for a row of shops. Of late years it has been a place of much interest for American travelers.

—FROM returns received at the Census Office it is learned positively that no State in the Union shows a decrease in population. Three counties in Vermont show a decrease, which gave rise to the report that the State had fallen behind; but full returns show the population to be 334,455, an increase of about 4,000 since 1870. This is the smallest per cent. of increase reported from any State.

—ATHENS, in Greece, which in 1870 had a population of 48,107, now has 48,077. The Piræus in the same time has increased from 11,047 to 21,418, and not many American cities have done better. Patras increased from 26,190 to 34,227; Corinth from 6,047 to 7,585; Sparta from 10,696 to 12,097; Thebes from 5,273 to 6,022; Laurium, or Ergasteria, the site of a mine somewhat famous in diplomatic history, had but a single hut in 1866; in 1876 it had a population of 3,800, which has now grown to 6,560. Greece is looking up in the world.

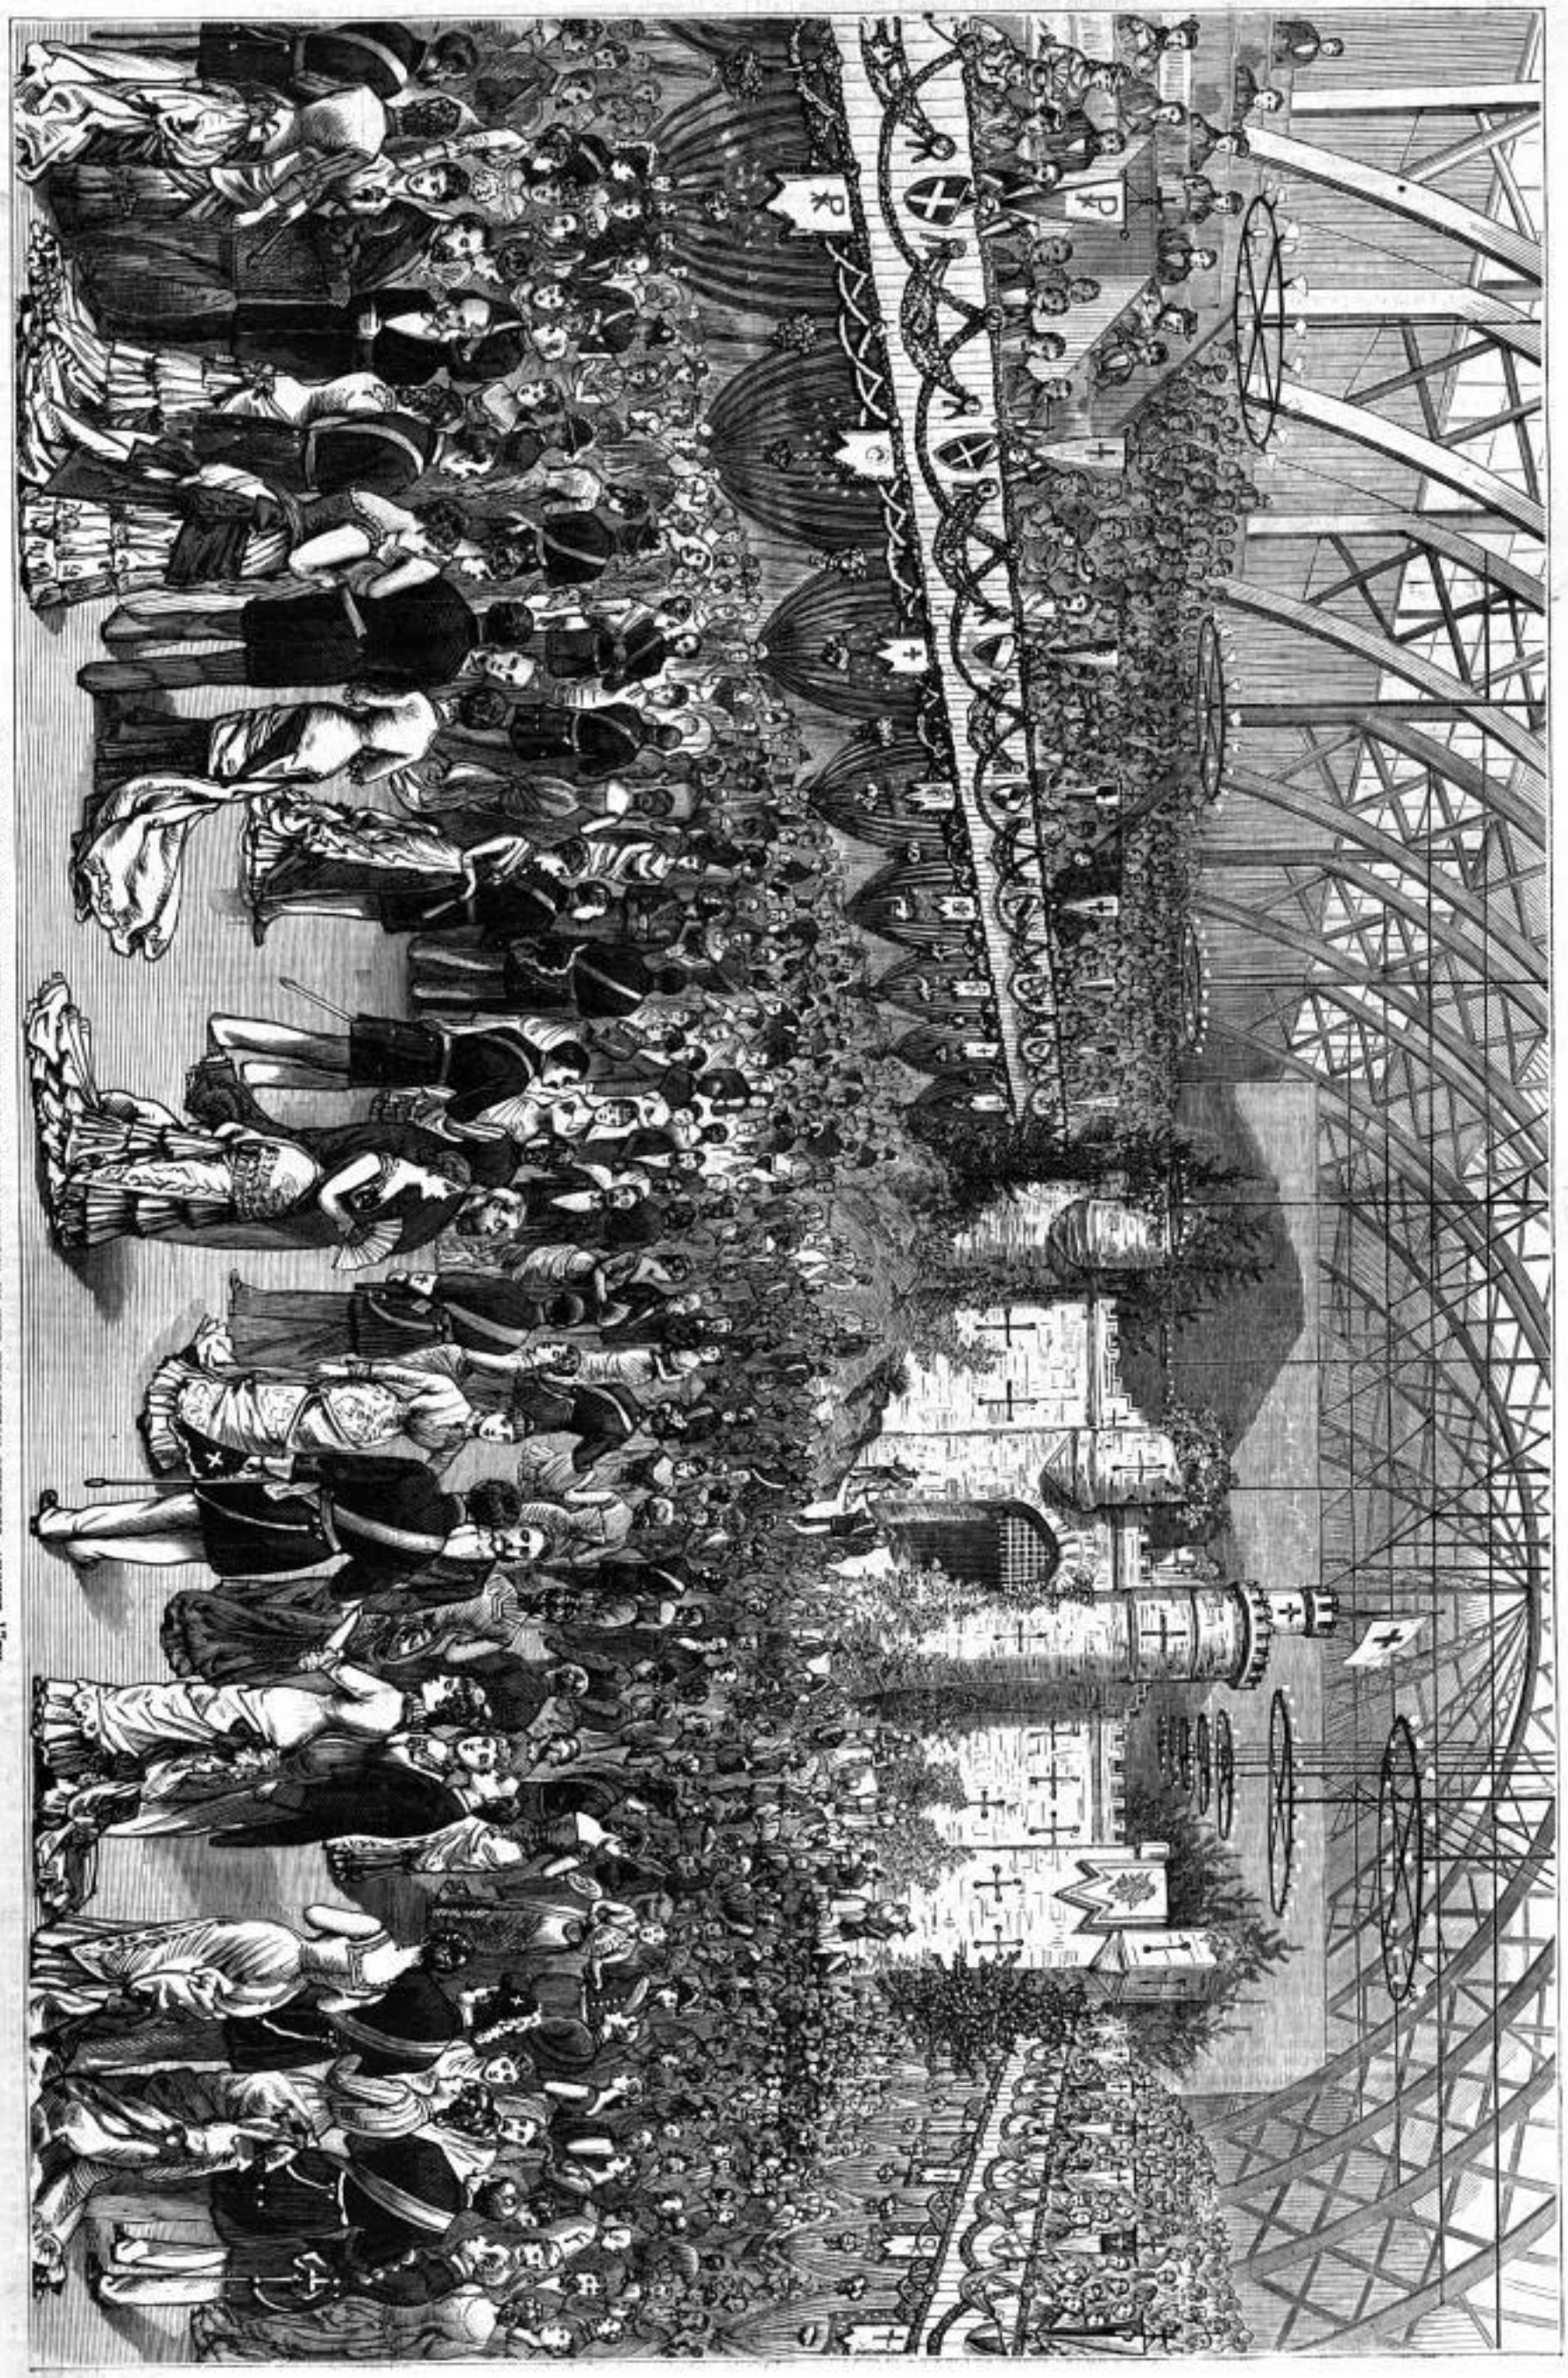


—THE last sewer explosion in London has shaken people's nerves considerably. "London has discovered," says the Daily Telegraph, "that it is undermined in every direction by a network of pipes filled with a gas which, when mixed in a certain well-known proportion with air, becomes at once terribly explosive; that this network is divided off according to the districts served by the different gas companies into special sections, and that each section is liable, from a single act of carelessness at any point within its area, to be suddenly involved in a common ruin.

—A NEW religious sect, known as the Kolikovskaya, has made its appearance in Russia. Its members hold that the Holy Church of Russia was taken to heaven three centuries ago, when the Patriarch Nikon made corrections in the Bible and other church books. Since then there have been only false priests and a false church. These secularists perform what is called "tearful purification" over infants instead of baptism; that is, the parents and friends shed tears over it for six weeks, and so purify it from original sin. They never assemble for common prayer, but everybody prays at home.

—A COMPANY has been formed recently for the purpose of building a line of railroad from New York to Albany and Schenectady. Beginning at the Harlem River at the terminus of the Second Avenue Elevated Railroad, the line of the projected railroad extends to Danbury, Conn., then up the Housatonic Valley, along the line of the Housatonic Road to Lebanon Springs, and from there west to Albany and Schenectady, connecting there with the Delaware and Hudson Canal, the Erie and the New York Central systems. The road will cross the river at Albany by a new bridge which was projected several years ago and the piers of which are already built. The entire line between New York and Schenectady will be new.

—THE returns made up to the end of June show that during that month 88 ships left the Mersey, with 29,757 emigrants. Of these 7,840 were English, 220 Scotch, 3,679 Irish, 8,852 foreign, and the nationalities of 146 were not known. Of the whole, 17,505 were bound for the United States, while 3,022 sailed for British North America, 100 for South America, 62 for the East Indies, 3 for West Indies, 6 for China, and 31 for the west coast of Africa. There is a decrease of 8,515 as compared with the previous month, but the emigrants were 9,206 more than in June last year. During the last three months the number of emigrants who left Liverpool was 70,540, being 40,600 more than left Liverpool in the second quarter of last year.



Digitized by Google

THE PROCESSION PASSING BENEATH THE FUNERAL ARCH ON WABASH AVENUE, AUGUST 17TH.

ILLINOIS.—THE TWENTY-FIRST TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE OF THE GRAND ENCAMPMENT, KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, AT CHICAGO, AUGUST 16TH-19TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. B. BEALE.—SEE PAGE 433

Digitized by Google

THE RECEPTION AND BALL TENDERED BY LOCAL COMMANDERIES IN THE EXPOSITION BUILDING, AUGUST 17TH.

ILLINOIS.—THE TWENTY-FIRST TRIENNIAL CONCLAVE OF THE GRAND ENCAMPMENT, KNIGHTS TEMPLAR, AT CHICAGO, AUGUST 16TH-19TH.—FROM A SKETCH BY W. L. CRISSEY.—SEE PAGE 435.

Digitized by Google

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.—(CONTINUED).

THERE is a brief silence, during which Jack holds Maize off at arm's-length and scans her countenance in sharp, anxious, tender scrutiny, searching with all a mother's solicitude for the slightest trace of change or weakness.

"I look better than you do," says the girl, with a smile that is a trifle sad. "If you do not take better care of yourself and cease this trembling, I will stop your visiting me so often. It is too great a tax upon you, anyway, to spend so much of your time here. Why, you had as well be imprisoned yourself!"

"I wish I were. Oh, I wish to God it was me was here!"

"You promised me yesterday," she continues, taking no notice of his passionate outburst, though her eyes grow softer and more lustrously beautiful—"you promised me yesterday that you would try to brighten, and, above all, that you would take some exercise in the open air; yet here you are the first thing in the morning."

The murmur of her sweet, chiding voice fills the cell, and Jack sinks down upon the bed and looks up at her piteously.

"I couldn't help it, Maize," he says, and his tones are hoarse. "I must be with you. Even if my body were absent, my mind would be here, so where is the difference? I can't rest, and how could I with you here—you whom I have loved and cherished as the apple of my eye. How little I thought that I was rearing you for this. Oh, my God! if we had never come to this horrible land! Better had we staid in England and starved! Maize, do you know, sometimes I think I am going mad! Night or day I can find no rest; I am thinking thinking, thinking—always thinking. Sometimes it is of you when you were a little baby. I see you now, all yellow hair and satin skin, and soft, white limbs. And then again I behold such horrible sights, such dreadful possibilities! I see you stricken down in your beautiful womanhood, the helpless victim of a terrible fate. I see you dragged before the public; your beauty gloated over by the lowest of the people, yourself a feast for every wicked eye! I hear you tried, condemned, sentenced! I see you mount the scaffold, and hear the shouts of the populace as your throat is bared to the——"

Jack's broken, delirious utterance suddenly ceases, for the girl's proud face has blanched to the hue of marble, and her eyes are filled with a wild terror.

In Jack's throat breaks a great curse at his madness, as he leaps forward and catches her reeling figure.

"Maize! my love, my love! For God's sake don't think of it! I was mad, raving mad! Oh, what a fool, what a fiend I am! Can you ever forgive me? Have I killed you?"

But Maize's weakness lasts only a moment; in the next she straightens herself, and a faint shade of color steals back to her face.

"We are both very foolish, Jack," she says.

"Foolish? We are dolts, blockheads, fools!" cries poor Jack, eagerly, though his manner is still a trifle wild. "Why, heavens! everybody says this whole thing is a mad farce. Of course, there must necessarily be a trial, but it will be merely a form to which there can be but one result. The entire public, except, perhaps, the vilest of the rabble, sympathize with you. Both the English Consul and the Ambassador waited on the Czar yesterday, and with the most gratifying results. But even more powerful than the Emperor is Toboskie; his voice governs the Senate and the court, the nobles and the people; with all this influence even guilt would have no cause for fear, much less has innocence."

"Then, if this is all true, why is it that you trouble so, and are growing so thin and aged? Believe me, the greatest cross to me of this miserable affair is the shame and pain it occasions my family and friends."

"Don't think of that, my poor martyr." And there is the suspicion of a sob in Jack's voice. "What hurts me so is to have you here in this horrible den. If I could only take your place—if I could only put the shame and suspicion upon me!"

"Why, I am splendidly fixed in comparison to what it might be. True, I am not allowed to see my friends, but I daily, almost hourly, receive tokens of their sympathy and friendship. My cell"—her proud mouth twitches slightly as she speaks the word—"might be a conservatory, so filled is it with flowers. And never in any day of my life were there so many cards left at our door as were sent in to me in the last twenty-four hours."

"That may all be true," says Jack, mournfully, "but the flowers cannot hide the prison wall any more than your friends can restore your liberty." A brief silence follows, then his face brightens with that dogged, persistent hopefulness that has sustained him. It is seldom that he gives way to the gloomy forebodings to which he has recently given expression. Without sense or reason or knowledge, he affirms that Maize will be acquitted, and will listen to no other argument. "But you will soon be released, love. The trial commences to-morrow if it is not postponed, and as soon as it is over we will go away from this land. We will convert all our property into money and give ourselves up to the pleasures of a life of travel. We will make no country our home, but will visit all alike; unless, indeed, we should stay longer in Greece, that dear, sunny land where first we found you. Oh, the future will be bright yet as soon as these few clouds are brushed away."

Maize smiles but says nothing. She has not the courage to dash this poor, faithful soul from its pinnacle of hope and imagination; yet for her she knows that there is no hope, accused as she is under such powerful evidence. It does not matter that it is circumstantial. Owing to the efforts and advice of her lawyer but little is known of the murder, and absolutely nothing upon what grounds her accusation is based. But she knows that it only requires examination of the evidence and accusers to establish her guilt as a murderess before the public. She is hemmed in with a network of fate and evil, and from which there is no escape.

And it is all for Gypsy's sake—Gypsy, weak, erring, senseless. She would be more than human not to realize through whom her misery comes; and in her breast is a great and secret bitterness for this woman whose sin made necessary her sacrifice. Both their thoughts rest upon the same person, for Jack says, after a pause:

"Have you never thought it strange that Gypsy has not been to see you?"

"I thought it strange at first, but have grown accustomed to it now. I suppose her delicate constitution could not endure the gloom of a prison cell!

For the first time there is a ring of inestimable bitterness in the young voice; she cannot take with composure the desertion of this woman for whose sake she has been branded with the crime of Cain.

In Jack's worn face there comes a look of pain; the slightest approach to difference between these two women of his boundless love is always a source of suffering to him.

"Don't be hard on her, dear," he says, softly. "I see now what a mistake I have made, but I thought you had enough to bear; though I see it would have been better to have known the truth than to suffer from neglect. Maize, our poor Gypsy is at this moment prostrate with brain-fever, from which we have no assurance that she will ever recover."

Maize shrinks back shocked and appalled, and Jack continues:

"The first idea we had of her illness was that morning." Even yet he shudders as he recalls the horror and agony of that hour when the accusation of murder was fastened upon this child of his love. "After we went away she remained as if stunned, and nothing could rouse her. Finally she broke into wild shrieks and moans, and exhibited such dangerous symptoms that a doctor was summoned. He pronounced her in a very dangerous condition; the shock and grief occasioned by your misfortune had unsettled her reason, and towards night she sank into a stupor from which she awakened in raving delirium. For not a moment since has she been conscious. Oh, Maize! it is heart-breaking to hear her. Her mind constantly dwells upon you. At first she shrieked aloud for you, and demanded that you should be sent to her. 'She is innocent! she is innocent!' was all her cry. Now she has become so weakened and reduced that she can only whisper your name, and in her eyes is always a great, piteous prayer. This morning she was nearer rational than I have seen her at all. I was standing by her bed, when she took my hand, and, laying her poor, wasted cheek upon it, looked up in my eyes with that mute, eloquent look of a dog's. 'Oh, Jack!' she whispered, 'send her to me; she is innocent! Oh, Maize! my poor little baby! And she was so soft and white and pretty!'"

A great, dry sob breaks chokingly in Jack's throat, and he shades his eyes with his hands.

Maize sits stricken with sorrow and remorse. How heavy and severe she has been upon Gypsy. In her ignorance and unjust anger she has censured and condemned this poor, erring though faithful life, even while it hovered ready for flight upon the narrow confines of eternity. While that spirit, sinful through weakness and smitten by the agony of her misfortune, has been fighting that great conflict with death, she has been treasuring angry and bitter feelings against her.

Without a word she creeps close up to Jack, and, putting her arm around his neck, lays her head close to his. It is a simple, mute sympathy, yet very powerful, telling him that they are one in sorrow. She does not speak, for she knows that this man's trouble is too great for words—that this double blow that has fallen upon him through the two women of his great love has wounded him beyond all power of healing—that he is crushed, shattered, wrecked.

"How little we can read the future," says Jack, at last. "I used to think I had trouble, but looking back now I see no clouds at all. And once I nearly went mad over a horse—my God, a dead horse!" He lifts his haggard face as he wonders how even a pang could have touched him in that past that looks so bright and glorious compared with the horror and wretchedness of the present.

And thus the hours pass: true to his custom, he spends the principal part of the day with Maize. If no greater demand claimed him, every moment of his time would be passed with poor Gypsy, languishing on the bed of suffering. His love is equally divided between these two women; but he knows that for her hers is the more merciful fate. It is to this victim of fate or the devil that he turns—to this girl, smitten in her proud supremacy and haughty distinction—while he leaves to willing and capable hands the fate of his wife.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—MR. DORNSDOFF'S THEORY.

IT is the third week of the trial. The immense court-house is thronged, and not by the usual spectators of such scenes, but by princes of the blood and all the nobles of the land. Through the vast assemblage can be traced the proud, delicate faces of royal peeresses who have never before brought their haughty presence anywhere save in castles and cathedrals, but now sit side by side with the rabble and the people. And over the house is murmur of expectancy like the chant of a far-off sea.

And over in the darkest corner, but close to the stand, where he can hear every word that is spoken, sits a man apparently unconscious of his surroundings, with his gaze fixed upon the door through which the prisoners are conducted to the court. It is Count Toboskie; he sits like a block of stone, his face colder and haughtier than ever, his eyes stern and repelling as fate. Whatever be the secret agony and bitterness of this man, he shows no tokens of weakness in his icy, immovable exterior.

At last the lawyers, the jurors and the witnesses arrange themselves; the door opens and the prisoner suddenly appears before them. Through the vast concourse runs a wave of wild excitement, and it is with difficulty that order can be maintained. Since the development of the trial, public opinion has undergone a thorough revulsion; suspicion is upon every face, while from the rabble come fierce hisses, indicative of their hatred and condemnation.

But that majestic figure stands as immovable as stone; her careless, imperial glance sweeping the throng; and under the fire of that scathing look a dead silence falls upon the court-room. For the moment her superior splendor, her radiant truth and honor, have subdued her enemies. She stands in their midst like a dethroned queen; her majestic figure simply clad in a rich dress of black velvet, whose long, straight folds show every perfect curve of her full and voluptuous form. Her face, stamped with its fearless truth and courage, is unearthly beautiful, and all the dim light that struggles in through the dingy, distant window centres upon the rich, burnished gold of her tresses.

For an instant that supreme silence rests over the assembly, then upon the hush breaks the deep, discordant voice of one of the people.

"She is a sorceress, a murderess! Must she be saved for her angel face? If she were one of us she had been condemned long ago; but she is an aristocrat. Give us justice!"

Electrified by this, the voice of their leader again from the rabble breaks that angry murmur like the cry of a pack of half-starved wolves. Still that majestic figure stands mute and composed, only the flashing of her glorious eyes showing that she is human. And where she stands in her dauntless womanhood, her matchless heroism, the hungry, bitter eyes of Count Toboskie study her every feature. He sees that the blood of her race is lashed into a wild, brave, untamable fury, though she controls it with that matchless self-government. He sees her proud purity as she faces the enemies thirsting for her blood, while a grandeur scarcely mortal sets upon her brow. Great God! and this is the woman of his worship—for he loves her yet with all that fierce, pagan passion that is characteristic of the men of his race—this woman, hunted and suspected, and for whose life the people cry as their rights. His soul is crushed and embittered; yet as he looks at this stricken woman whom he has loved with so great a love, for whom yet he would barter his soul's salvation, all the weakness, the tenderness of that love fastens upon him, and a fierce impulse possesses him to seize her and carry her far away from this misery, to rescue her from these human hounds who are thirsting for her blood.

Suddenly she turns, and where he sits in the shadow and darkness her glance searches him out, this man who has known her in the days of her glory and triumphs, and who has turned against her in her hour of deadly trial. She marks this agony of doubt and indecision, this struggle between loyalty and suspicion, and upon her lips sets the haughty grace of her imperial smile—a smile which tells him she flings back an allegiance so flattering and reluctant. For an instant a shame sweeps over him that has never before touched him—a shame that his love is so faithless and wavering—then it dies away and that old suspicion runs rife in his being; his face hardens, his eyes grow chill and wrathful. In his heart is a fierce rage both for himself and this woman. He curses the love that can live under the shame and guilt of its object; he hates himself for his madness even as in this moment he hates the woman for enthralling him with the spell of her sorceress beauty.

And looking at him in that brief, keen regard, she sees the instant when this brutal rage and suspicion re-fastens upon him, and into her eyes come an unutterable scorn, a speechless amaze that maddens him.

Stationed there, stricken with shame, hissed at by the mob—standing there, being tried for her life, she is yet above and beyond him, yet defiant of his power, indifferent to his opinion. She flings him back hatred for hatred, scorn for scorn, and tells him with her eyes that no position into which she could ever come would bend her proud spirit or give him aught of power over her.

The halter may be awaiting her; she has already drank to the dregs the bitter cup of shame and humiliation. Yet, standing there, confronting him with the shadow of the dungeon still upon her brow, he feels that she is the conqueror, that he is her slave and victim, since he loves her with all the madness of ripe passion, and for which, in his savage wrath, he could tear out his heart root and branch, for he firmly believes her guilty. His head sinks upon his breast, and he does not again look up until the first witness of the day is called, then motionless as stone and with bated breath he listens to the testimony. The witness is Peter, worn and changed and gray—Peter who, through the weeks of this long and weary trial, has been subject to the strain and languor of the witness-box.

The most powerful brains have been employed both by the state and the defendant, and the counselors have done nobly; but while the amount of material that Henry Dornsdoff has had to work upon is unusual and makes the ease of his inevitable victory a source of regret to him, the faint ground-work and the brilliant work of the opposing attorney is a wonder and an admiration. The shrewd and masterly manner in which he has conducted this case has gained for him a distinction even greater than his former fame.

On this particular morning, Peter, the principal witness, is up for a rigorous cross-examination; but he has but one story to tell. Through it all Peter has not varied one jot or tittle. His testimony is simple and straightforward.

"On the evening prior to the morning of the discovery of the murder, my master informed me that he expected a lady visitor, and commanded me to take particular care that no one should discover her. Later in the night the bell rang and I admitted the prisoner. She went directly to Count Lagors's chamber, and remained there, I should judge, an hour and a half. Once during the time I passed the door, and heard the sound of loud and angry voices. When the young lady joined me below in the hall her manner was wild and excited, and she seemed almost fainting with pain. She said that she had broken her arm, and requested me to bind it up, which I did. I did not go to my master's chamber that night, as, in the fore part of the evening, he had told me not to disturb him when he was alone. When I went in the morning I found him dead upon the floor."

Then followed hours of tiresome and rigorous questioning, after which the learned counsel for the state summed up the case. After a long and eloquent presentation of the subject in question, he said:

"After days of patient labor and examination; after the case has been laid so thoroughly, yet plainly, before the public, without desiring to damage the pathetic fiction of my learned and noble opponent, I must say that there is but one verdict on this subject even for a child. Let us view the case: On the night of —18-, Count Nicholas Lagors was foully murdered in the bedchamber of his own castle. Nearly two hours of that fatal night were spent by the prisoner in this chamber in the society of the count. The prisoner herself does not deny this fact, but fails to account for her presence. We will pass over the startling fact of a young lady paying midnight visits to a nobleman. While it is our desire to speak in terms of the utmost respect of the distinguished and lamented Count Lagors, justice demands truth and stops at no limit; therefore, to this end I am compelled to refer this learned and noble audience to the private character the deceased sustained. He was, I believe, what is styled a sensualist, putting it in its mildest form.

"Do not be weary. I beg your indulgence, and in a little while you will see to what end I am speaking. Therefore, when this young lady left the chamber of horror, her manner was very much agitated, her face flushed, her breath heavy with the fumes of liquor"—(weakened with the anguish of her fractured limb that fatal night, Maize had drunk one glass of wine which Peter detected upon her breath)—"and her arm broken! Now follow me, my learned hearers. First: On the next morning the count is found murdered: it is positively known that not a soul was with him upon that night save the prisoner. The witness, who was the only one in this portion of the castle, retired to his room immediately after the departure of the prisoner. Without his assistance entrance to the castle would be impossible.

"Secondly: The body of the lamented count was examined by competent and famous members of the medical profession, and they were all unanimous in their announcement that the wounds were of such shape and position as to at once prohibit any possibility of suicide. The lamented noble received two stabs in the left breast. The first and upper one was but a flesh wound, and was evidently dealt by a weak and timorous hand. But the second was a desperate wound; having gained a savage courage by the sight of the blood and the enormity of her sin, the murderess nerved herself, and, gathering all her strength, again plunged the fatal knife into the breast of the unfortunate nobleman. It is a fearful blow—a blow that pierces the heart and almost severs it in twain—a blow that could not but have broken an arm already weakened by a fracture! So say the doctors—you heard for yourself their evidence. Well, this young lady's arm was broken upon that night, in that chamber, and during that interview. How was it broken? There is but one answer.

"Now, then, I will endeavor to show a reason for this crime, the absence of which my distinguished opponent affirms to be the weak point in our evidence." All this while the girl has remained motionless in her chair, with a face set and stern like a Greek martyr's. "In the first place, without desiring to delve into private affairs, justice demands that I shall call attention to the embarrassed condition of Lord Ashhurst's financial affairs. It is well known that this English nobleman is comparatively a poor man, and possessed of little beyond his proud name and empty titles. From good authority I have ascertained that Lord Ashhurst's style of living has always been noted for its mad extravagance. The money that has been earned with the sweat of toil and the pangs of torture—that is, the price of some poor man's bread—that money has been squandered by these aristocrats like so much sand. Now, then, note these people since their stay in Russia; in no way has there been a semblance of retrenchment. The grandest castle in the land is their home. Still it is not of them that I would speak, but of this individual young lady. It is a conceded fact that Miss Ashhurst, since her arrival in St. Petersburg, has been noted for her elegant toilets—jewels, silks, velvets, lace and satin. Why, the price of one night's costume would have kept a poor man in bread for a lifetime. My honored lords and gentlemen, it takes money to sustain this magnificence, and I ask you, Where did the money come from?"

Digitized by Google

An intense silence reigns over that vast assembly. Every eye is fixed upon the prisoner and the speaker, while, for the first time, up over the cold stern face of the former sweeps a crimson tide, as her quick instincts apprise her of the shameful blow in store for her. But she makes a desperate effort to maintain her composure, though her teeth are set and her hands clinch.

"I will submit to you my theory," continues Dornsdoff, "and see if it is not a probable one. It is well known that the late Count Lagore was a frequent, nay, I might almost say, a constant visitor in Lord Ashhurst's family, and the great wealth of the deceased is too well known to require comment. Therefore I do affirm that, under the guise of friendship, and protected by the proud order of the aristocrat, there has existed that intimacy between the parties in question that results in pecuniary benefit to impoverished females—that the prisoner has been secretly carrying on a course——"

There is a buzz, a whirl, and a figure darts forward, and an iron hand clutches the throat of Henry Dornsdoff, attorney. It is Jack, who, with a face distorted with passion and eyes gleaming like a mad brute's, tightens his grip and shakes the lawyer until both are purple in the face. He is literally blinded with passion, and not a peer present but sympathizes with the maddened and outraged noble. For, whatever his daughter may become, Jack Ashhurst himself has endeared himself too closely to the high-bred world by his royal generosity, his stately courtesy and his intrinsic worth, to be repudiated now by his fellow nobles.

Probably there is not a soul present save himself but believes guilty this child of his adoption; also not a man in the room, thinking of his wife and his daughter, but sympathizes with this passionate vengeance that he would sweep upon the traducer of the helpless, however guilty she may be. In a trice there ensues a scene of wildest excitement. From the rabble come hoarse growls of rage and menace, interspersed with the shrill cry of women's voices. A dozen highbred gentlemen leap forward to the side of the maddened nobleman, reasoning and expostulating, but he is deaf. And not until Maize lays her hand upon his arm does his composure return. She stands before them with her haughty face the color of marble, but in her glorious eyes a lion's wrath and a fiery scorn.

"Do not soil yourself with him," she says, and there is a grand contempt in her manner, while Jack's vise-like grip falls from the bell-like throat of the choking attorney. "Let the creature be, Jack; such vileness is not for you nor me to resent."

Lord Ashhurst stands panting, wild-eyed, almost delirious in his wrath, while Henry Dornsdoff, Esquire, in a very collapsed and damaged condition, sinks into a chair.

"Go, Jack," whispers Maize; "go, dear; you can do no good."

Still Jack hesitates; then, obeying the gesture of his child, he turns, and, accompanied by the noblemen, allows himself to be mechanically led out by Tobaskie.

It is some time before the speaker resumes his address; but when he does, his manner is thoroughly composed, and himself apparently uninjured by Lord Ashhurst's fierce punishment.

"Little remains to be said," he continues. "I was merely about to remark that, under the protection of her proud order, the prisoner has availed herself of opportunities peculiar to herself, and that during one of her nightly visits to the count, and inflamed by wine, she gave way to the fit of passion that resulted so fatally. There are many causes that can be assigned for this outburst, two of which are jealousy or a threat of withdrawal of the generous recompense for her shame."

With a profound bow, Mr. Dornsdoff takes his seat, while an intense silence reigns over the court room.

(To be continued.)

SUMMER LIFE AT CHAUTAUQUA LAKE.

"THIS is the highest navigable lake in the United States, sir. We are seventeen hundred feet above the level of the sea, sir. We are seven hundred and twenty feet above Lake Erie, and, ha! ha! Lake Erie is only six miles from us."

This is how the visitor to Chautauqua Lake is greeted upon his arrival, and if he remains more than a day the lake will have reached an altitude of 2,000 feet above sea level, 1,000 above Erie, while the distance between the inland ocean and the twenty-two-mile lake will have decreased in proportion.

Chautauqua Lake, the happy hunting-ground of Christian organizations of every conceivable denomination, is situated in Western New York. It is twenty miles long, and in its widest part four miles broad. In some portions it resembles the lordly Hudson. It lies 450 miles from New York City and 830 from Chicago. The waters of Chautauqua are plowed by a fleet of propellers, one of which, a three-decker, is registered to carry 2,500 people. The city known as Fair Point is not of marble, or granite, or brown-stone, or of bricks, it is of canvas, with here and there a pretentious-looking villa in wood, and not a few "Centennials," tiny frame dwellings composed of four pieces, cleated together in about thirty minutes. It boasts a large hotel—a portion of the dining-room being under canvas; a New England kitchen and many restaurants; an amphitheatre capable of seating 4,000 persons; a grove auditorium, with seat accommodation for 5,000; an imitation Jewish tabernacle, built in the exact style of the old Jewish house of worship, as described in Holy Writ; a pyramid—a children's temple, with a seating capacity of 1,500; a hall of philosophy after the dreck; an ark, a rustic building at which lecturers and speakers are entertained; a model Sea of Galilee and Mount Hermon with the Dead Sea; the River Jordan, Mount Tabor and the cities of Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethany, Capernaum, Bethlehem; and, above all, it boasts of Lewis Miller, the President of the Sunday-school Assembly, and of the Rev. H. J. Vincent, the organizer and adviser of the assembly.

Fair Point, one vast grove of immense and very high trees, is inclosed by a palisade on the land side, while the lake renders it inaccessible save by boat. No person, under any pretext whatever, is allowed to enter or leave on the Sabbath. This kills the ungodly Sunday excursion parties. No drink stronger than root-beer is permitted to be sold on the grounds, and everybody is expected to be canvassed by 10:30 P. M. Saturday night sees 10,000 people within the inclosure. Monday morning witnesses the departure of 8,000. From rosy morn to dewy eve the grove resounds with sacred melody, while its leafy labyrinths are trodden by grave men and earnest women, all bent upon obtaining knowledge based upon the Word. The Chautauqua literary circle is the best exponent of the Chautauqua idea. Its aim is to promote habits of reading and study in nature, art, science, and in secular and sacred literature, in connection with the routine of daily life, especially among those whose educational advantages have been limited, so as to secure to them the college student's general outlook upon the world and life, and to develop the habit of close, connected, persistent thinking. Its methods are to encourage individual study in lines and text-books by local circles for mutual help and encouragement, and by Summer courses of lectures and students' sessions at Chautauqua. The course of study covers a period of four years, and for the books required, it is estimated that forty minutes' reading and study each week-day will be sufficient to complete it. The best preachers come here to expound the Word, the best lecturers to deliver lectures, the best thinkers to lead others to think in the right way. The institution is unique, and at once an achievement and a promise.

"I brought eight hundred Ohio schoolteachers here for a three-day trip," said a well-known, practical philanthropist to the writer. "They made some bones about quitting their own State, so I wrote to Governor Cornell to let me locate Chautauqua in Ohio for three days. They were amply repaid by their visit." General Garfield attended service in the amphitheatre on Sunday the 8th, and was received with what is known as the "Chautauqua salute." At a given signal, every man, woman and child of the 6,000 start to their feet, and like a flash 6,000 pocket-handkerchiefs are waved at the platform. The effect is both strange and startling.

THE KNIGHTS TEMPLAR CONCLAVE.

AS preparations had been in progress for more than a year, the twenty-first triennial conclave of the Grand Encampment, Knights Templar of the United States, which opened at Chicago on Monday, August 16th, was the occasion for demonstrations which have never been equaled in the history of secret societies in this country.

A synopsis of the programme for the week, together with our illustrations, will afford those of our readers who were unable to participate in the reviews, receptions and entertainments, a clear idea of their brilliancy and heartiness.

The encampment was located on Lake Park, and was seven-eighths of a mile long—extending from the Exposition building on the north to Park Place on the south—by three hundred and fifty feet wide, from Michigan Avenue to the railroad line. This entire space was occupied by a city of tents, erected at comfortable distance to admit free circulation of air and comfortable movements. There were 715 tents, 14x14 feet in dimensions, and capable each of accommodating seven persons; 360 tents, 9x9 feet each, designed to accommodate three persons; 10 headquarter tents, each 20 feet in diameter; 50 tents, 16x20 feet each, divided into four apartments, 26 tents, 9x18 feet, divided into two rooms each; 4 tents 16x45 feet, and various others of lesser dimensions, and designed for various purposes. These were arranged as far as practicable in the shape of crosses, triangles, hollow squares and circles, designed to represent knightly forms.

Monday, August 16th, was devoted to receiving and escorting of the visiting commanderies.

Three receptions were given at 8 o'clock in the evening, at each of which the Templar guests were welcomed. One took place at New Central Music Hall, another at McCormick Hall, and the third at Farwell Hall. At each of these receptions an interesting speaking and musical programme was observed.

At 8 o'clock on Tuesday morning, August 17th, a salute was fired, and two hours later, 10 o'clock sharp, the grand parade and review by Most Eminent Grand Master Hurlbut and the officers of the Grand Encampment took place, followed by the escort of the Grand Encampment to the Asylum on Lake Front.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and hourly thereafter until 6 o'clock, there were boat excursions on the lake. At 8 o'clock in the evening a grand reception en masque et dansante was given under the auspices of Apollo, Chicago and St. Bernard Commanderies of Chicago, in the Exposition building.

On Wednesday, August 18th, in the morning at 9:30 o'clock, the grand competitive prize drill took place at the Chicago Jockey Club Park, located some five miles westward from the grand Asylum. Preceding the drill exercises there was a fraternal park reception at the same place, conducted by the three commanderies of the city—Apollo, Chicago and St. Bernard.

At 8 o'clock in the evening performances were provided at McVicker's, Haverly's, and Hooley's Theatres, and at other places of amusement for the gratuitous and complimentary entertainment of Templar guests and their ladies, under the direction of Apollo, Chicago and St. Bernard Commanderies.

Thursday, August 19th, the last day proper of the conclave is to be devoted to such entertainment as the exigencies of the occasion may require.

Friday and Saturday, the remaining days of the week, although not included in the programme, will be gala days, and will be so observed as the dictate of the remaining guests and the citizens may suggest.

The effect of the fifteen arches on Wabash Avenue, together with the Grand Encampment Asylum and the Lake Park arch, were simply superb, the former presenting a vista of gorgeous ornamentations and embellishments almost as far as the eye can reach. The business houses and residences were decorated with corresponding taste and liberality, and presented a magnificent combination of color and display never before equaled in that or any other city. The Lake Park arch fronting the west of the Grand Encampment Asylum is 35 x 67 feet and some 60 feet high, built around a tree, whose green clad top and drooping branches are a fitting apex of the structure. On the east and west sides are balconies each with capacity for thirty musicians, who will give afternoon and evening concerts during the entire week. The roof is decked with flags and pennants while the four sides of the arch are beautifully ornamented with shields bearing the arms of the Grand Commandery of Illinois, the banners of the three Chicago Commanderies, and other knightly emblems.

The business proper of the conclave is being transacted in the Asylum, to which only those entitled by rank will be allowed admittance. The length of the nave is 102 feet and the width 35 feet, while the transepts are the same width and about 60 feet from end to end. The decorations of this important centering point are simple and confined to emblematical designs. Over the main entrance and encircled by a wreath of evergreens is a handsomely worked "C. H. R.," a design peculiarly emblematic of this exalted Order of Templarism. Immediately above the doorway is the motto "Rex Regum et Dominus Dominorum," in letters of black on a white ground, edged with garlands of red. The angle stones are figuratively decorated, on the right being the date "1880," and on the left "782," the latter block of figures representing the year of the Order's installation, having been founded, according to Masonic history, in 1118. Directly above the rostrum in the chancel are hung the banners of the Grand Encampment, the Grand Beauseant, and the banner of the Paschal lamb, concealed the three most august and directly appropriate emblems of the Templar Order. The Asylum has a seating capacity of about 250.

The work of decorating the interior of the Exposition Building for the ball was quite a stupendous affair. The whole centre portion of the vast floor surface was given up to terpsichorean enjoyment, while the entire space surrounding and under the galleries was used for promenading purposes. The vestibules, staircases, and promenades were elaborately decorated with shields, banners, evergreens, and floral displays, the latter in generous profusion.

The face of the galleries were covered first with red cloth, upon which, as a background, the decorations are worked. Surrounding this immense amphitheatre are suspended the armorial bearings of the various commanderies draped and festooned with garlands, the prevailing colors of which—red, black, white and green—are the colors of the Order. Raised aloft above the balcony rail are long banners bearing emblematic devices in colors, and edged with garlands in colors complimentary. At the base of each banner banks of flags are displayed, with garland festoons artistically looped back with Maltese crosses of variegated colors. From the lower edge of the gallery are suspended banners bearing the devices of the various grand commanderies of the States, edged with garlands and festooned with the same. At regular intervals around the entire face of the gallery are placed hanging-baskets filled with choicest flowers and trailing plants. Directly opposite the main entrance, and inclosing the band stand, a garlanded arcade is provided for, the arches carrying Templar mottoes, and supported by red and white pasteon crosses six feet high. On the crown of the central arch an immense "Chi rho," eight feet high, in blue and white, with red grices or base, is affixed. Emblematical devices crown the remaining arches, in the centre of each being large banks of beauseants and Templar flags. The gallery face has a background of green, and the rich and varied emblems wrought thereon will emphasize this portion, and fill it with a blaze of glory. Opposite this, and immediately over the main entrance, hiding the un-seemly dark corners and passage ways, are suspended six banners, each twelve feet square, edged with garlands and flanked with festoons. On these banners are painted three stalwart crusaders in heroic size.

The large fountain in the centre of the hall is bordered with ferns and lycopodiums, while the base of the statue, or foundation work, is a framed cruciform, with Templar emblems in immortelles. At the angles are placed baskets filled with flowers. Eight vases, filled with choice exotics surmount the balustrading at regular and effective intervals. The basin is filled with water, on which floats the beautiful pond lily, while the graceful swan disports and gives life to the ensemble. A fountain of cologne-water exhales its fragrance at the south end of the promenade. It is encircled in a bower of flowers, decorated with garlands and festoons. Fu-a-eu with this, at the north end, a magnificent decoration was unveiled during the evening. It was an immense representation of a castle half in ruins, and proved a most brilliant surprise to the participants.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE Texas Democratic State Convention has renominated O. M. Roberts for Governor on the first ballot, and L. J. Story for Lieutenant-Governor by acclamation.

THE Connecticut Republicans have nominated H. B. Bigelow for Governor, and William H. Bulkeley for Lieutenant-Governor.

THE New Hampshire Democrats will meet in State Convention at Concord, September 16th.

THE Fourth Annual Convention of the National Liberal League will be held at Chicago, September 17th, 18th and 19th, for the purpose of selecting a Presidential candidate.

GENERAL H. B. BANNING, Democrat, has been nominated for Congress in the Second Ohio District. Representative O. D. Conger has been renominated by the Republicans of the Seventh Michigan District. The Michigan Democrats have nominated Hon. F. M. Holliday for Governor.

THE Georgian Democratic State Convention last week recommended to the people A. H. Colquitt for Governor, but did not regularly nominate him, owing to his inability to command a two-thirds vote. The minority subsequently organized and determined to nominate an independent candidate. The Republicans will hold a convention September 7th, and hope to make something out of the Democratic split.

SCIENTIFIC INTELLIGENCE.

We Regret to announce the death of Mr. W. A. Lloyd, who has done so much for the improvement of marine aquaria. Mr. Lloyd, it will be remembered, was for a long time connected with the London Crystal Palace Aquarium.

The Legislative Assembly of the Transvaal has before it a measure providing for a trigonometrical and geological survey of the country, in the course of which it is expected that abundant mineral wealth will be proved to exist in the colony.

A Violent shock of earthquake occurred at Manila and throughout the Island of Luzon on July 18th, which did immense damage, totally destroying several Government buildings and other houses. Some of the native inhabitants were killed, but no Europeans suffered injury.

A Committee, comprising some of the leading botanists and horticulturists of Berlin, has set on foot a project to erect a memorial stone on the grave of the late Karl Koch, and appeals through the press to his friends and admirers for subscriptions wherewith to carry out the project in a manner worthy of him whose memory it is desired to perpetuate.

At the Request of Professor Wild, of St. Petersburg, the date fixed by General Meyer for the time of taking the International Simultaneous Meteorological Observations is changed from September 1st, 1880, to January 1st, 1881, a change which the numerous observers over the world who make the observations from which the United States Weather Maps are constructed will doubtless concur.

The New Matriculation List of the London University bears ample evidence to the success of the step recently taken by the Council in admitting women to its degrees. In the Honors Division the third place is occupied by Edith Sophia Calliet, from the North London Collegiate School. Altogether about one sixth of the names on this division are those of girls, and the proportion on the other divisions is quite as great.

On July 14th the French Chamber of Deputies adopted a proposition of M. Lockroy, that a sum of 2,700,000 francs, originally intended to rebuild the Palace of the Tuileries, should be devoted to enlarge the national library, which will be quite isolated from other houses. The sanction of the Senate will be asked next session, but not a single representative having objected, the result is not dubious, and preparatory steps will be taken very shortly to execute this great measure of preservation and improvement.

The New South Wales Government have done a creditable thing in erecting an obelisk on the spot occupied by the transit instrument in the old observatory at Parramatta, established by Sir Thomas Mak Dougall Brisbane in 1822. The building has long been swept away; many valuable observations were made in it by Mr. Charles Rümker and Mr. James Dunlop, and it was only right that the exact position of the transit instrument should be permanently marked, so that, if necessary, future verification might be made.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. HORACE MAYNARD, late United States Minister Resident at Constantinople, sailed from Liverpool for Boston, August 11th.

BY the death of the Dowager Lady Cowper, Lord Cowper, the present Viceroy of Ireland, becomes one of the wealthiest men in England.

SENATOR WITHERS of Virginia is to be invited to take the Presidency of the Clarksburg College, Virginia, at the expiration of his term of office next month.

IT is believed that the Marquis Tseng, Chinese Envoy, went to St. Petersburg to assure Russia of the peaceful intentions of China, and to ask for the appointment of an Ambassador Extraordinary to Pekin.

A STATUE in white Westerly granite of Alexander Hamilton is to be given by his son, John C., to the City of New York for Central Park. It is eight feet high, and the first portrait ever made in granite.

LEXINGTON, Ky., has the oldest living graduate of West Point Military Academy in Wright Merrick, of the Class of 1822. He is a native of Massachusetts, is eighty-three years of age, and is the only survivor of his class.

CHARLOTTE'S CUSHMAN'S monument, about to be placed in Mount Auburn, is an obelisk of beautiful Hallowell granite—a copy in form of Cleopatra's Needle. The only inscription the monument will bear is the name, "Charlotte Cushman."

ERNEST RENAN'S promotion to the grade of officer of the Legion of Honor recalls to the Parisian the fact that Marshal MacMahon refused, in 1878, to sign the decree authorizing this distinction, which the author of the "Life of Jesus" had awaited for twenty years. The Marshal, it is said, also took care to see that M. Emile Zola did not get a cross.

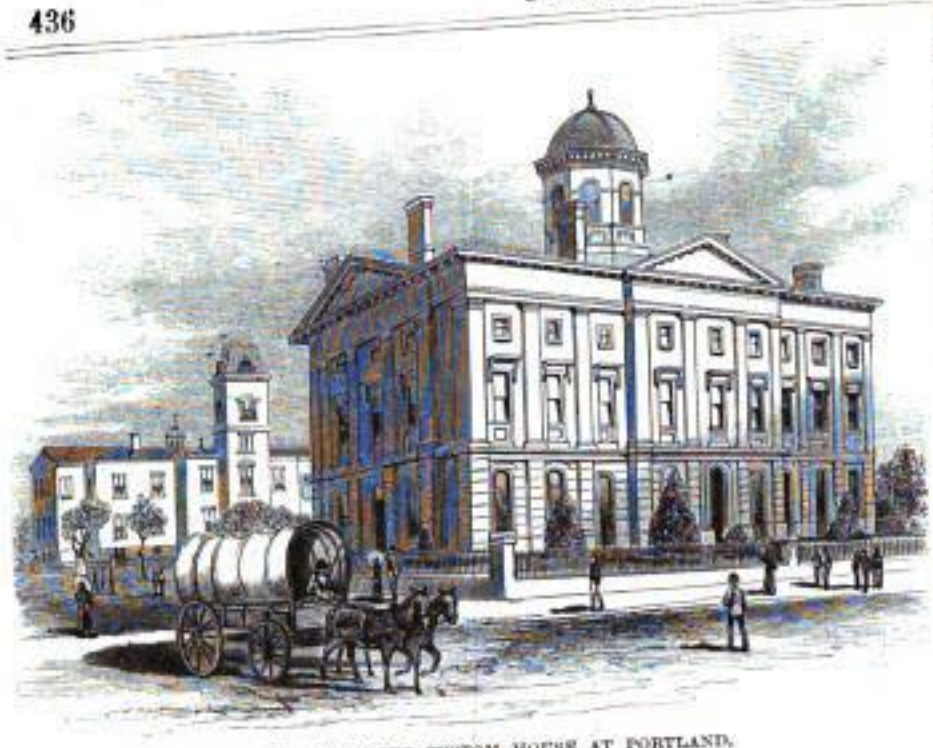
MADAME PATTI'S recent arrival at Craigynos Castle, her new Welch home, was greeted with fireworks and popular rejoicings, which smacked somewhat of the taste of some carnival operatic manager. Crowds of people cheered the Roman candles, and about the castle, in conspicuous places, appeared the name of Patti's favorite operas, quantities of flags, and the inscription: "God bless Adelina Patti."

THE death is announced at Bologna of Nicola Ivanoff, the rival of Rubini, and one of the most celebrated tenors of his age. Ivanoff was born in 1810 at Pultowa, in lower Russia, and in 1830 he arrived at Milan to study singing under the celebrated master, Eliodora Bianchi. In 1834 he went to England, where he took part in the Handel Commemoration at Westminster Abbey, but about forty years ago his voice failed him.

KAISER WILHELM deserves well of all citizens of Berlin who long to see the German capital made more attractive. He took occasion recently to express his wish that the project of prolonging the street Unter den Linden should be carried out, and forthwith a long-standing and factious opposition on the part of the State disappeared as if by magic. The work is to be pushed rapidly forward, and the new thoroughfare is to be called Kaiser Wilhelm Strasse.

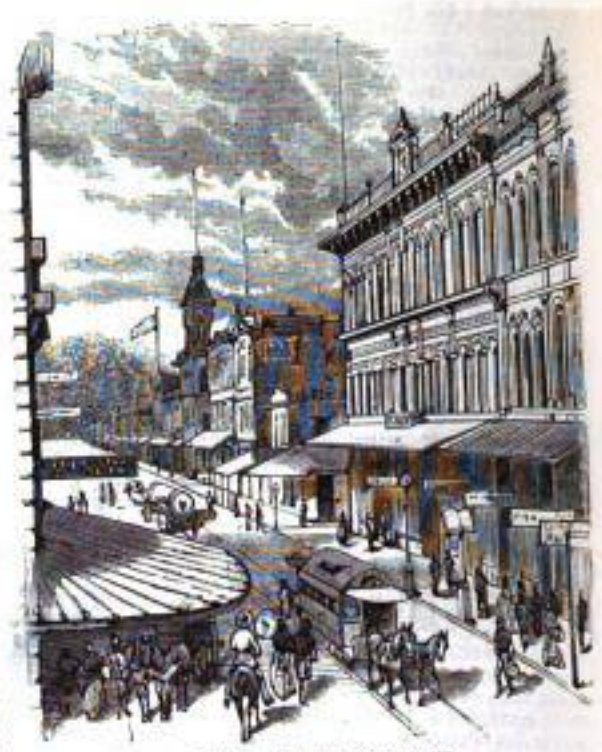
MISS GRISWOLD, the young American who is studying singing in the Paris Conservatoire, and who, feeling last year that she deserved a first prize, refused to take the inferior honor awarded her, has just received that coveted first prize. The quarrel was smoothed over, as the Conservatoire, it is hinted, did not care to lose so promising a pupil. Miss Griswold is said to be a niece of Bret Harte, and her voice and her face are described as beautiful. She is said, too, to have an elegant and noble presence, matching the dramatic expression of her tones.

PROFESSOR MOMMSEN was, at last accounts, busily searching the débris of his burned library, hoping to find some books and MSS. not entirely destroyed. The ancient manuscripts from foreign libraries which were in his hands are partly damaged, no doubt; but it would seem that they may be regarded as having as a body been practically saved. Many steps are being taken to restore his library. The Berlin Academy of Sciences has decided to re-present him with the books which he received as a member. It has further been suggested that workers in his department should send him such of their writings as deal with subjects that interest the professor.



IN commemoration of the silver wedding of the Emperor of Austria, the Austrian Alpine Club is about to erect on the summit of the Gross Glockner a cross three and one half metres (nearly eleven feet six inches) high. For facility of transport, the pieces of which the cross is composed were not allowed to exceed twenty-five kilogrammes in weight (55lb. five pounds). The weight of the whole cross is three hundred kilogrammes (six hundred and sixty pounds). On two opposite sides of the pedestal, facing north and south, there will be two large reflectors, very solidly gilt, so that, it is expected, they will reflect the sun's rays to a great distance. A thermometer will also be attached to the cross.

A DISPATCH from Madrid to the Times says the Opposition press comment strongly upon a royal decree in the Official Gazette, stating that if a son is born to the Queen he will take the title of "Prince of Asturias," but if the expected heir be a girl, she will take the title of "Infanta of Spain." Before the birth of the present Princess of Asturias, a royal decree ordained that all direct successors to the crown should be denominated Princes or Princesses of Asturias. A similar decree, issued by King Alfonso shortly before his accession, declared that, there being no immediate successor to the throne, the eldest sister should bear the title and dignity of Princess of Asturias. This, if the heir be a female, will cause various complications, and reference is made to the old war of the succession.



THE late Madame Skobeleff, whose death was so tragical, was well known and heartily liked in Paris, where she was one of the leaders of the Russian colony. Her house in the Rue Jean-Goujon was the rendezvous of the French and foreign aristocracy, and the hostess was renowned for her hospitality as well as for the talent she displayed in entertaining her guests. She superintended the education of her son, the general, and of her three daughters, all of whom made brilliant marriages. One of the young ladies became Princess Cheremeteff, wedding that soldier-artist whose oil-paintings have been so much admired at each succeeding Salon. Another is now known in society as Princess Belosselski; and the third, who was the belle of every party for many years, is now the Countess de Beauharnais.

ACCORDING to private advices received in St. Petersburg, from Pekin, Chung-How has not only been reapted but released from prison, though restored several grades in Mandarin dignity. There are still fears, however, that the dispute with China will not be arranged without war; for it is declared that the war party are still in the ascendant in Pekin, and bent upon reviving the military glory of China. It, however, Chung-How be really liberated, though degraded, the war party cannot yet be ruling unchecked, for had they had their will the ambassador who negotiated the Kuldja Treaty would certainly not have been liberated—more probably he would have been beheaded. It was the peace party who were favorable to his release, and, if he has been liberated, it must be regarded, in so far, as a triumph for them.

Digitized by Google

THE UNITED STATES CUSTOM HOUSE AT PORTLAND.

FIRST STREET, PORTLAND.

OREGON AND ITS ATTRACTIONS.

THE Columbia River of the Northwest, flowing down from British America through Washington Territory and Oregon, into the Pacific, is in every sense one of the most majestic water ways of the continent. In passing up from its mouth, one of the first towns of importance encountered by the voyager is Astoria, where are located the most extensive fish canneries in the world, more than 8,000 men being employed in the industry. Astoria has forty-two canning establishments, each packing about 30,000 cases of salmon during the season (from April to August). As each case contains forty-eight pounds of fish, and sells for about $5 in market, it will be seen that the business is of enormous extent. The salmon are all caught at the mouth of the river, sometimes being so numerous that a boatload is obtained at each casting of the net.

With a view of keeping up the supply of fish, artificial means of propagation have been resorted to, some of the hatching-houses having 10,000,000 salmon eggs.

Between Astoria and Portland the scenery throughout is most beautiful, at times approaching the grand and sublime. High bluffs, spurs of the Coast or Cascade ranges, line the banks of the river, broken here and there by fine stretches of farming and grazing country. Vast forests cover the hills and valleys, with the exception now and then of a solitary clearing or farm. Occasionally a village sawmill or a salmon cannery is passed, and the windings of the river furnish a grand panorama of ever-changing scenery. Portions of the Coast or Cascade ranges are constantly in sight. As the steamer winds around some sharp turn in the river, or runs up beside a clear spot in the forest, the snow-white summits of Mount Hood, Mount Jefferson and Mount St. Helens, all over 10,000 feet in height, may be seen glistening high above the surrounding country. Although the river does not approach nearer than seventy miles to these peaks, their height is so great and the atmosphere so clear that they do not appear to be more than a few miles distant.

Portland, the metropolis of Oregon, is built on gently rising ground, is regularly laid out and contains many magnificent public buildings, business houses and dwellings. The business transacted is very large and represents more capital than any city of twice its size in the Union. We give views of the Custom House and one of the principal streets. One of the common boasts of the average Portlander is that his city has over twenty inhabitants worth more than $1,000,000. The city lies at the foot of the Willamette Valley, and is the centre of trade for that country, as well as a depot of supplies for the whole northwestern region. There is probably no more beautiful or productive valley in the world than the Willamette. Lying between the coast and Cascade Mountains, it is at once a magnificent farming, grazing, mining, manufacturing and milling country. The valley is splendidly watered by hundreds of mountain streams, most of which furnish the finest water-power. The soil is very fertile and nearly the whole valley is under cultivation.

One of the many points of interest in the region of the great cascades, further up the river, is "Cape Horn," a formation of concrete and sandstone rock rising perpendicularly from the water's edge to a height of 250 feet, and extending along the shore for a distance of half a mile. The formation resembles large columns, pillars and immense cones welded together like a massive wall or barricade. The river-boats, in their passage, run within a stone's throw of it, and one here gets his first sense of inspiration of the region he is invading. Following for a distance of eight miles is a stretch of views positively marvelous in variety and extent. It would be hard to say how many waterfalls there are within this limit. One, the La Tourelle, makes a leap of about 300 feet before it mingles its waters with the Columbia in their rush to the sea. Coming from an overhanging wall projecting from the mainland, a distance of about fifty feet, the water is thrown in rainbow form far out from the precipice, and, falling through mid-air with great force, it dashes into foam and spray in a basin carved from the rock by its own power, and ornamented with wild flowers and vines in gorgeous profusion. Behind the fall the distance to the back wall is about eighty feet. This affords ample room for a driveway between the fall and the main wall. Further up the river the tourist comes face to face with an object which can be seen from the moment he enters this region of the cascades—"Castle Rock." This is a huge, isolated rock on the left, or Washington Territory side of the river. A thousand feet high and covering fifteen acres, it has discarded its relations with surrounding mountains and comes down to the water's edge to greet and introduce the traveler to the grand cascades above. It is estimated that four acres of perfectly level surface may be found on the top.

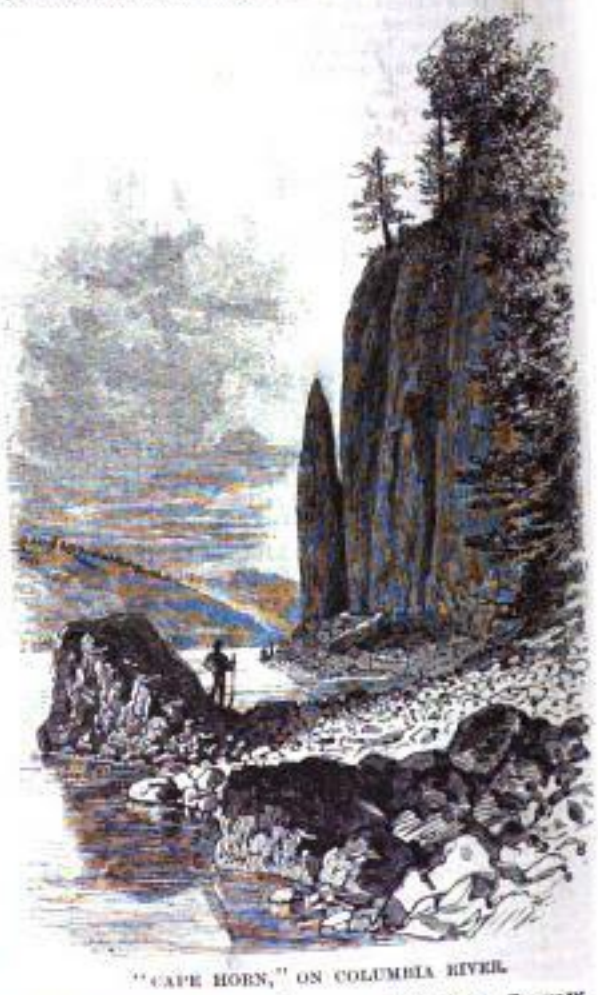
SALMON NET RACKS, ON COLUMBIA RIVER.

THE WORLD'S FAIR OF 1883.

THE first meeting of the Commissioners of the World's Fair of 1883 was held in New York on August 16th, in the Governor's Room in the City Hall. There was a full attendance, all the States being represented except Maine, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada and Tennessee. Many of the Commissioners are well-known throughout the country. Addresses were made by Mayor Cooper, Henry G. Stebbins, Thurlow Weed; ex-Governor Patton, of Alabama; ex-Governor George A. Crawford, of Kansas; N. D. Sperry, of Connecticut; Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia; Algernon S. Sullivan, and others. A temporary organization was effected, with Hon. H. G. Stebbins as chairman, and George W. Debevoise as treasurer. A report was presented from the Committee on Sites, setting forth the advantages of the numerous places proposed.

At the second day's session, five vice-presidents were elected, and the following gentlemen were appointed as the Executive Committee: Edward Cooper, Roswell G. Rolston, J. P. Morgan, George B. Blanchard, James Talcott, David Dows, William A. Cole, William B. Dinsmore, Samuel A. Haines, S. L. M. Barlow, Charles K. Graham, A. M. Hoyt, Charles L. Tiffany, N. K. Fairbanks, William H. Post; Professor Smart, of Indiana; Alex. C. Sands, of Ohio; George A. Crawford, Theo. Bates, of Massachusetts; Thomas McElrath, William O. Roberts, Rufus Hatch, Thomas Rutter, Lewis May, E. R. Dickerson, C. B. Fisk, L. A. Sullivan, John P. Townsend, Thomas Barbour, James F. Wenman and W. L. Strong.

The Executive Committee was instructed to report at the next meeting what legislation, State or National, is required in reference to the exhibition. A committee of five was appointed to prepare an address to the American people and the Governors of the various States and Territories, as follows: Henry G. Stebbins, New York; James H. Smart, Indiana; J. Henry Behan, Louisiana; Commissioner Le Duc, Minnesota, and the Rev. Dr. Newman, New York. The question of a site was referred to the Executive Committee, with the understanding that they should recommend three or four of the sites proposed, and leave the final selection to the Commissioners.



The Act of Congress under which the Commission exists was passed last April, after a preliminary committee had, in New York City, worked up the matter, and had prepared the way for the appointment of a Commission. The Act is entitled, "An Act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the treaty of peace and the recognition of American independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and the products of the soil and mine, in the City of New York, in the State of New York, in the year 1883." The first section creates the United States International Commission. The second section says that the Commission shall consist of two Commissioners from each State, and one from each Territory, and one from the District of Columbia, together with the Committee of Finance, and about 125 New York gentlemen named in the Bill, who shall fix the precise date, and prepare for and superintend the holding of the exhibition upon a site within the corporate limits of the City of New York. In the third section it is provided that the Commission shall have a corporate existence, may sue and be sued, and may purchase, hold and sell property at will.

"CASTLE ROCK," ON COLUMBIA RIVER.

SALMON FISHERS' CAMP.

"CAPE HORN," ON COLUMBIA RIVER.

OREGON.—THE METROPOLIS, SCENERY AND CHIEF INDUSTRY OF THE EXTREME NORTHWEST STATE.—FROM PHOTOGRAPHS BY E. CONKLIN.

Digitized by Google

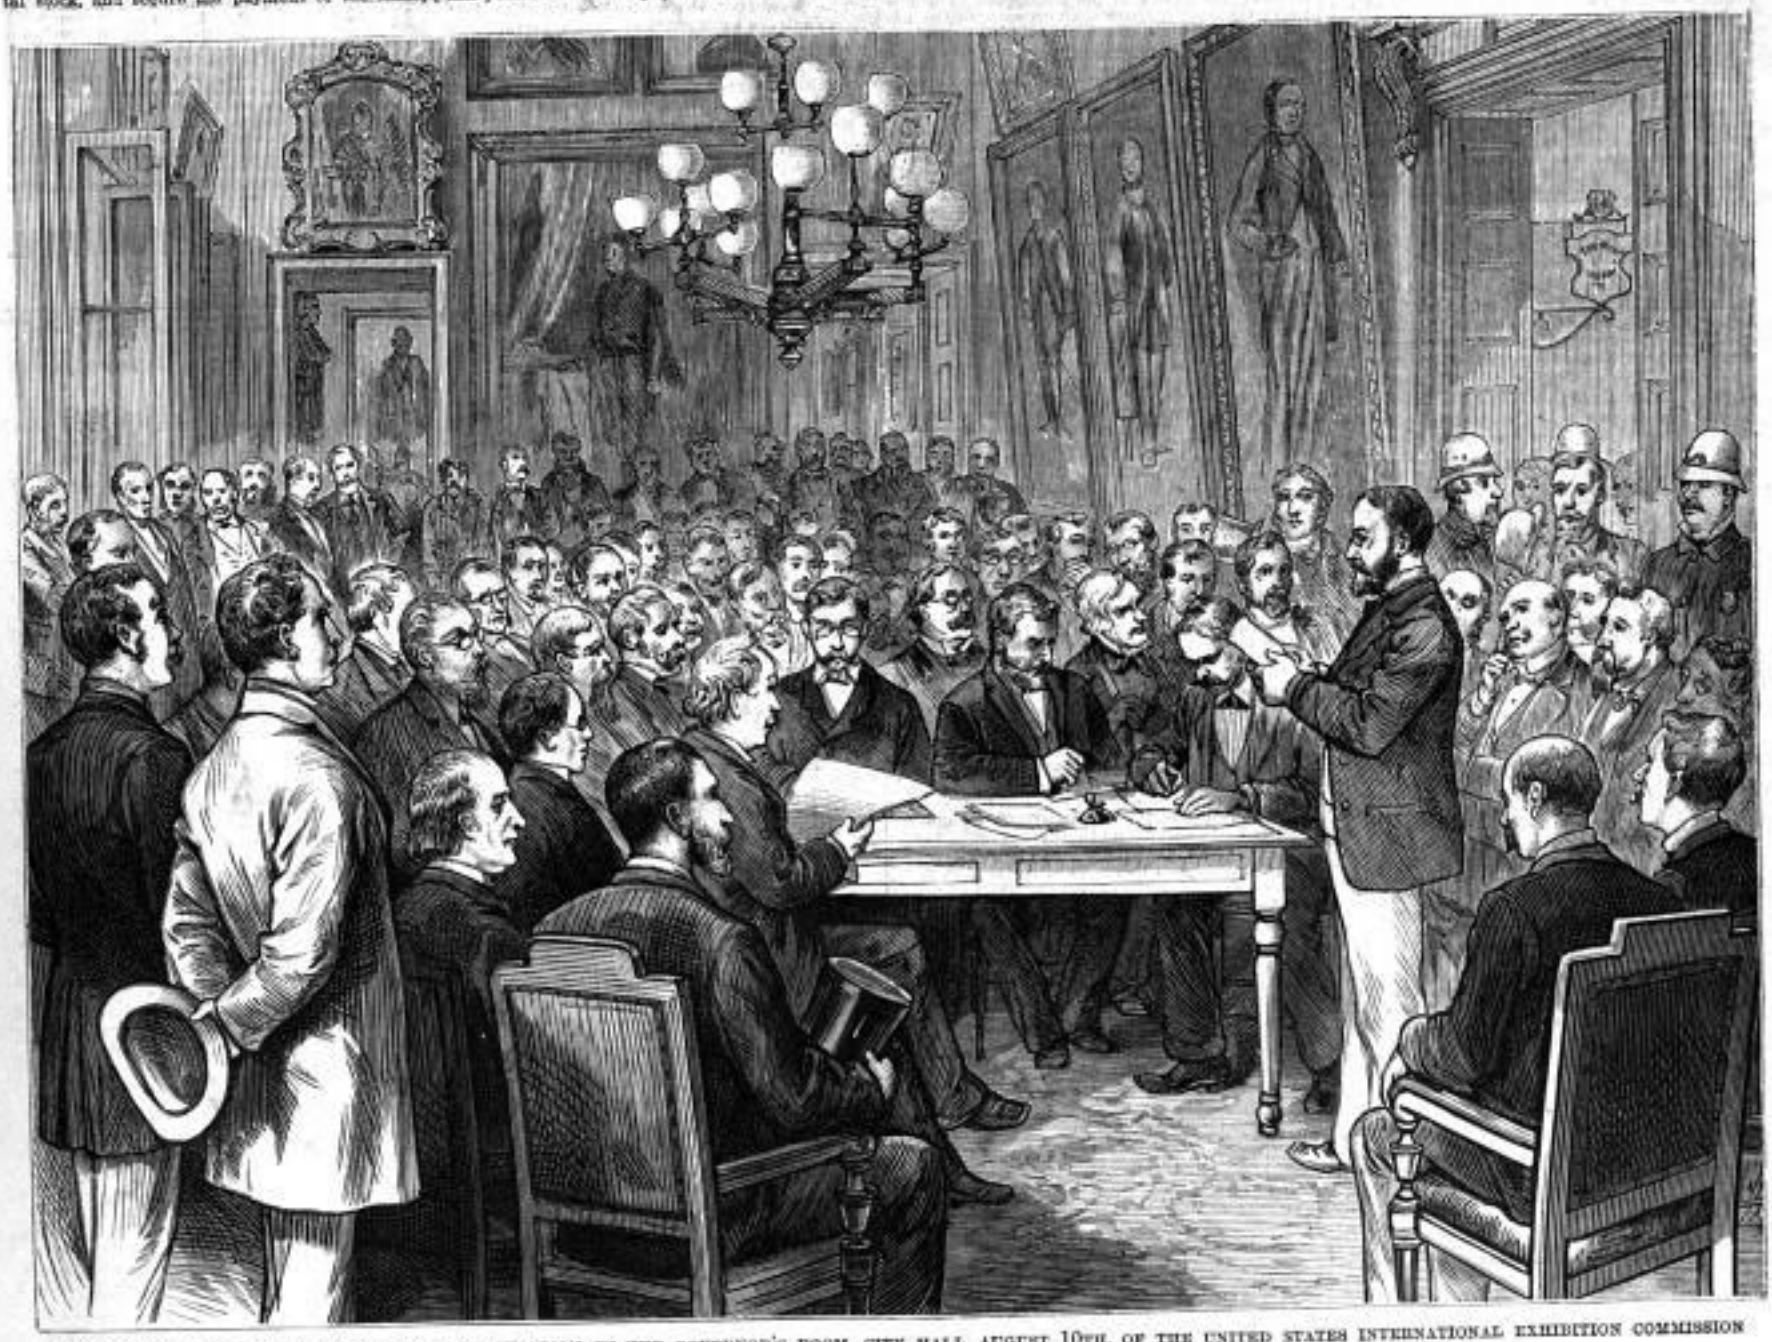
MASSACHUSETTS.—THE OLD LYNDE MANSION, AT MELROSE.

The fourth section provides for the appointment of the Commissioners by the Governors of the States, within sixty days from the passage of the Act. In the remaining sections, it is provided that the Commission shall hold its sessions in New York City; that it shall submit to Congress, at the first session after the appointment of Commissioners, a suitable date for opening and closing the exhibition, a schedule of ceremonies, and the custom-house regulations; that the United States shall not be responsible for the debts of the Commission; that whenever the President shall be informed by the Governor of New York that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings, the President, if he deem the preparations adequate, shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, stating the time, place, etc.; authorizing the Commission to receive subscriptions of capital stock, not exceeding $12,000,000, to be divided into shares of $10 each, and that each subscriber shall pay not less than ten per cent. of his subscription at the time that he subscribes; that stock certificates shall be issued therefor, to be transferable, each share of stock to carry one vote in the election of a Finance Committee; that a Finance Committee shall take charge of the funds; that the Commission shall prepare a complete classification of exhibits; that it shall have authority to issue bonds not in excess of the amount actually paid in upon its capital stock, and secure the payment of the same, principal and interest, by a mortgage upon its property and income, present and prospective; that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall prepare the certificates of stock, and that no shareholder or stockholder shall be personally liable for the debts of the Commission. Necessary action has also been taken by the Legislature of New York, and everything is now ready for the Commission to go to work.

REPRESENTATIVE SOUTHERN JOURNALISTS.

WM. RULE, OF THE KNOXVILLE "CHRONICLE."

WILLIAM RULE, the present editor-in-chief of the Knoxville Daily Chronicle, the only Republican daily published in the late insurgent States, and the weekly Whig and Chronicle, was born May 15th, 1839, on his father's farm, six miles south of Knoxville, where he lived until 1858. He obtained such education as the common schools of the locality afforded, attending school in Fall and Winter, and working on the farm during the Summer months—the schools not being the best by any means. In 1859 he entered the office of Brownlow's Knoxville Whig as mailing clerk, and remained in this position until that paper was closed out by the rebellion of 1861. In 1862 he fled from East Tennessee, then in possession of the Confederate forces, and under cover of the night made his way through the Cumberland Mountains into the Federal lines, where he at once enlisted as a private in the Sixth Tennessee Infantry of the Union army. He participated in the campaign of 1863 in Middle Tennessee, under Generals Rosecrans and Thomas, and was in the battle of Chickamauga. He went with Sherman's command to relieve Burnside at Knoxville, and was with Sherman on his march through Georgia to Atlanta in 1864, in General Schofield's command, having in the meantime been promoted to the position of adjutant of his regiment. He was with General Thomas at Nashville when General Hood's army was so signally defeated, after which, with his command, he was transferred to the eastern coast of North Carolina. The term of service of the regiment expired on the 31st of March, 1865, and it was relieved from duty at Goldsboro, N. C., and regularly mustered out of service at Nashville, Tenn., on the 27th of April, 1865, after the collapse of the rebellion. Mr. Rule was elected Clerk of the County Court of Knox County, Tennessee, in 1866, and re-elected in 1870. After one year of his second term he resigned to accept the position of special agent in the Post Office Department. He was connected with the editorial staff of the Knoxville Whig from 1867 to 1869, withdrawing from the same when, by some means, it fell into the hands of Democratic stockholders. In 1870 he founded the Knoxville Daily and weekly Chronicle, and has ever since been one of the editors and proprietors of that paper. Captain A. J. Ricks, now Clerk of the United States Circuit Court at Cleveland, Ohio, was for many years associated with him as equal partner in the paper, but, in 1875, he sold his interest to ex-Senator W. G. Brownlow, who, with Mr. Rule, continued the publication of the Chronicle, the weekly edition being called, as it still is, the Whig and Chronicle. In May, 1877, Senator Brownlow died, and in 1878 his interest was sold to R. H. Brown, who is now an equal partner, Mr. Rule being chief editor. Mr. Rule has been actively engaged in journalism almost constantly for twenty years, and has taken a leading part in politics ever since he was twenty one years old. He is now serving his second term as a member of the National Republican Committee. He has gained considerable reputation as a vigorous, truthful writer, always ready to vindicate the right and denounce the wrong, regardless of party. His private character is irreproachable, and he is the only Republican who has been able, during the last eight years, to carry Knoxville in a majorality contest, having been elected to that position several years ago, overcoming a handsome Democratic majority.



WILLIAM RULE, EDITOR OF THE KNOXVILLE "CHRONICLE."

THE OLD LYNDE HOUSE.

ONE of the most remarkable of the few and scattered relics of American antiquities—an example of the New England style of home architecture two hundred years ago—is the old Lynde House, in Melrose. Its situation is surprisingly beautiful and romantic. It stands on a gentle slope midway to the top of the hill that rises a little above it on the north, and is nearly in the centre of the farm that is connected with it. The farm is very uneven on its surface, inclosed by woods on two sides, and bounded on the south side by the old road from Malden to Stoneham, about a mile from Spot Pond.

This old house, including the farm—this venerable remnant of the earliest settlement of New

NEW YORK CITY.—FIRST MEETING AND ORGANIZATION, IN THE GOVERNOR'S ROOM, CITY HALL, AUGUST 10TH, OF THE UNITED STATES INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION COMMISSION HAVING IN CHARGE THE WORLD'S FAIR TO BE HELD IN NEW YORK IN 1883.

Digitized by Google

England, built more than a hundred years before Washington was born—this representative of the simple and humble but independent rural life of our ancestors—this heirloom from our Pilgrim Fathers to us and all future generations—this most ancient of the few remaining links that connect us with the heroic age of our native country, mutely unfolding to us many a romantic incident that happened before our national independence—this magnificent relic, consecrated by the lives and the heroism, the piety and self-sacrifice of our ancestors—is likely to be sold to make room for modern dwellings. An appeal has been made to the Massachusetts Historical Society to save this place by purchasing it as a noble and venerable relic, as valuable to the poet as to the painter, and especially to all who feel an interest in our national history.

If purchased and dedicated to the purposes of history, it would become one of the most interesting objects of national curiosity to the inhabitants of New England.

Mail Matter of the Last Fiscal Year.

ON August 15th, 1879, the Postmaster-General issued an order directing an actual count to be made on the first seven days of November, 1879, and annually thereafter, of the number of letters and postal-cards and of packages of miscellaneous printed matter and merchandise deposited for mailing in all the post-offices and postal-cars, and the number of newspapers and periodicals mailed during that time to subscribers and news agents, to be obtained from the publishers. The first week of November was chosen for the count, because it was thought the business of that week would be as near as possible a fair average upon which to estimate the annual work of the postal-service. Multiplying the results of the count by fifty-two, it is estimated that the domestic postal business of the last fiscal year was as follows:

Letters (all kinds)..	868,433,572
Postal-cards	276,446,711
Newspapers to subscribers and news agents	695,175,624
Magazines to subscribers and news agents	53,473,276
Books, circulars and miscellaneous printed matter	300,845,480
Articles of merchandise	22,634,456
Total	2,217,068,119

This count is of matter originating in this country only. The ten States in which the largest amount of mail matter originated are as follows: New York, 538,950,724; Pennsylvania, 207,196,080; Ohio, 168,564,800; Illinois, 167,944,868; Massachusetts, 145,973,464; Missouri, 93,037,680; Michigan, 64,753,264; Iowa, 57,227,656; Indiana, 51,922,208; Wisconsin, 47,943,664. These are the first reliable statistics ever obtained of the number of letters, etc, passing through the mails.

Reaching the Pole in a Balloon.

COMMANDER CHEYNE, of the British Navy, is still endeavoring to carry out his plan of reaching the North Pole by means of balloons. A London committee, consisting of the Dean of Westminster, the Master of the Temple, Dr. Vaughan, the Minister of Finance for Canada, and seventy members of Parliament and scientific men, has been formed, and over $7,000 collected towards the purpose of carrying out the new venture, the ultimate cost of which is estimated at $150,000. The proposition is to send out a ship to the furthest attainable point, then to form outside stations by the guidance of which the wind currents could be utilized at various heights as curves of sailing, by which the balloon might reach within more or less practicable distance of the Pole, and the completion of the journey made by such sledging arrangements as could be conveyed by the three or four balloons that would constitute the aerial fleet steering by trailing ropes. By abandoning some of the balloons and the stores, and using their remaining gas to fill completely the one or two balloons by which the return journey to the ship could be accomplished, the party, it is claimed, would be brought back in safety. Commander Cheyne recently laid his plans before the Aëronautical Society of London, and in the discussion which followed the project was supported by such practical aeronauts as Mr. Coxwell and Mr. Simmons.

A Dead Sea in California.

A WRITER in the San Francisco Chronicle tells the following: "The propeller Rocket, which will soon be placed on Mono Lake, will have no trouble about floating, as the density of the water is remarkable, being just the reverse of that of Lake Tahoe, in which the body of a drowned person never returns to the surface. An exchange says that for bitterness and promiscuous meanness the waters of Mono Lake surpass those of the Dead Sea. They contain so much alkali that in a windy day the lake is a regular tub of soapsuds. The writer has seen a wall of lather five feet high along the whole of that shore against which the waves were beating. Occasionally the wind would take up a bunch of this lather as big as a bushel-basket and carry it several hundred feet inland. So buoyant are the waters of the lake that quite a party of men may navigate them on a raft made of four or five dry cottonwood poles. Out in the lake are islands of rock lava-like concretions, through which streams of water boil up. The water of these springs is like that of the lake, but in one place is a large spring of fresh water. This is near the northwest corner of the lake, and at a point where there is a depth of eight or ten feet of water. It is a sort of fountain. A column of fresh water, some three feet in diameter, is projected upwards with such force that it rises to the height of at least two feet above the general level of the lake in the form of a mound or knoll, and makes a rippling noise that can be heard a considerable distance. But for the fact that this fountain has a depth of eight or ten feet of water to contend against, it would probably rise to a considerable height in the air.

THE "DAILY SARATOGIAN."

THAT the glittering Saratoga boasts of a newspaper of its own goes without saying, but that it boasts of a journal crisp, sparkling, and edited after the best fashion, is something to be proud of. The Daily Saratogian is an admirable illustration of what the organ of a place like Saratoga should be, and in the careful selection of its varied matter no small meed of praise is due to its able editor, Colonel Ritchie. It is a paper that exacts laudation on its merits alone.

FINE PASSENGER COACHES.

THE new passenger coaches soon to be placed on the New York Central and Hudson River Railroads are different from those now in use. The seats are all finished in cane, none being upholstered, and they are arranged like those in the elevated railroad cars in New York, with the centre seats along the side of the cars. There are no panels between the windows except in the centre, where there are three wide ones, thus affording ample space for mirrors, which are placed inside. The central windows are very wide, which, together with the fact that there are only narrow strips of wood between them, makes the sides of the coaches appear to be nearly all glass. The cars are all supplied with the automatic air-brake of the latest pattern.

FUN.

DARWIN is still a bachelor. The linking missis what he needs.

WHAT a pity the census was not taken during melon season, when half our population is doubled up!

MAMMA: "When grandpa was your age, Effie, tea was two dollars a pound and bread twenty-five cents a loaf." Effie: "And is that why poor grandpa is so thin?"

THREE little girls had great fun in a neighbor's house at South Bend, Ind., during the absence of the family. They first broke all the window-panes. Then they poured several gallons of milk on the parlor carpet. Finally, they emptied six dozen cans of raspberries and huckleberries into a tub, and dyed all the fine dresses they could find in the juice.

MABEL: "Give us a cake, auntie. I know you've got one in your basket." Auntie (an early riser): "No, dear, they are roses I've been gathering, and they wouldn't like being given to a little girl who gets up so late in the morning." Mabel: "Go on, auntie, they wouldn't mind; they lays in their bed all day, when they gets a chance, and nobody don't pick them."

A TRIPLE FOR WIMBLEDON.—She (whispering): "Hush! Take it, darling! Your own heart will teach you to find out its use." He: "Kind, thoughtful girl! Any dainty is welcome in camp, and——" She: "Not a word. Papa is waking. Good-by!" (And she was gone.) And when he found she had given him a cat in the basket he waxed wroth, for—alas!—his heart did not teach him that when in camp, he should hide a billet under its collar, and let it loose, whereupon Tom would make his way straight back to his mistress—all as they do in Holland, where the cat is the lovers' postman!

"HOW is your son coming on?" "Oh, I am having a power of trouble with him." "What's the matter now?" "Well, you know, I couldn't send him to school, because, thanks to Governor Roberts, there are no free schools, and I couldn't afford to send him to a private school." "Yes, I know that is so." "Well, I sent him away from Galveston out to the frontier, and as luck would have it, he was convicted of horse-stealing and got five years in the penitentiary." "That was bad." "No, it wasn't, for you see at the penitentiary he could learn a trade and become a useful citizen." "Well, that's good." "No, it ain't; for Governor Roberts has pardoned him on account of his youth and ignorance."

HANS GROWTOOT, a worthy German farmer, who has been a life-long resident of Berks County, has a shrewish wife, who has long rendered his life anything but a couch of roses. One day not long ago she, in a fit of pique, picked up her duds and left him, vowing never to come back. The news went around among the neighbors—you know how intelligence of all kinds does travel in the country—and at night several of them, of whom I was one, went to condole with Hans. He sat on his front stoop puffing away at his pipe. "Hans," I remarked, "I pity you." "My boy," replied the honest Dutchman, as he disturbedly knocked out the ashes of his pipe, "you was right. She has shust come back!"

AN anecdote is told of a physician who was called to a family to prescribe for a case of incipient consumption. He gave them a prescription for pills, and wrote the direction: "One pill to be taken three times a day in any convenient vehicle." The family looked in the dictionary to get the meaning of the prescription. They got on well till they got to the word vehicle. They found "cart, wagon, carriage, buggy, wheelbarrow." After grave consideration they came to the conclusion that the doctor meant the patient should ride out, and while in the vehicle he should take the pill. He followed the advice to the letter, and in a few weeks the fresh air and exercise secured the advantage which otherwise might not have come.

RATIONAL TREATMENT AND POSITIVE CURES

Are what the afflicted seek for, and those who resort to Dr. Pierce's Family Medicines are not doomed to disappointment. So positively efficacious is his Favorite Prescription in all cases of female weaknesses, nervous and other derangements incident to the sex, that this potent remedy is sold under a positive guarantee. For particulars see Pierce's Memorandum Book (given away by druggists), or see the wrappers of the medicine. Sold by druggists.

WASECA, Minn., April 5th, 1879.

R. V. PIERCE, M.D.:

Dear Sir—I feel that I should be neglecting my duty were I to fail in giving my testimony as to the value of your medicines. For years I have been a great sufferer from a complication of chronic diseases which our physicians treated in vain. I am now using your Favorite Prescription, and find myself almost well. Your medicines have done me more good than anything I have ever used.

I remain gratefully yours,

MRS. E. B. FARMALEE.

ACCIDENT INSURANCE doesn't pay for pain, but for loss of time; and time is money. Insure in THE TRAVELERS.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

IN INDIGESTION AND NERVOUS DISEASES.

I HAVE extensively used HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE in my practice, in cases of Dyspepsia, Nervous Prostration, and kindred affections, and I have almost invariably obtained very good results.

PHILADELPHIA. A. TRAN, M.D.

THE ambition of the American people leads them to overtax their strength and completely break down their nervous systems, impoverish their blood, and almost destroy their constitutions. Recover your constitution immediately, before it is too late, by taking DR. BROWNING'S TONIC AND ALTERATIVE, the great Blood Purifier and Blood-Maker. Price 50 cents and $1. For sale by the Proprietor, W. Champion Browning, M. D., 1117 Arch Street, Philadelphia, and all Druggists and Dealers in Medicines.

WHAT makes your hair so beautiful? MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORER. Every Druggist sells it.

BURNETT'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS are used and indorsed by the best Hotels, Confectioners and Grocers throughout the country. They are perfectly pure and of great strength—at once the cheapest and best; and received the highest award at the Centennial Exhibition.

THE GRAND CENTRAL HOTEL in this city has all the advantages which it claims in its advertisement, and the fact that its management is the same as that of the Manhattan Beach and Oriental Hotels is sufficient guarantee that its promise to the public will be kept.

DR. FLAGG, for thirty years one of the most successful educators in the country, offers greatly reduced rates for board and tuition in our advertising columns. His school is located on the Hudson River and in the most healthy and beautiful location.

THE ST. NICHOLAS, of New York, is as fresh and youthful as in its earliest days, and well deserves the reputation it acquired years ago. Exquisite order and neatness, and a luxurious table, are attractions that experienced travelers always appreciate; and these are just the requisites which make the ST. NICHOLAS such a perennial favorite.

FISK & HATCH,

Bankers,

AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT BONDS,

And other desirable Investment Securities,

No. 5 Nassau St., New York,

Buy and sell all issues of Government Bonds, in large or small amounts, at current market prices, and will be pleased to furnish information in reference to all matters connected with investments in Government Bonds.

We are prepared to give information in regard to first-class Railway Securities, and to execute orders for the same.

Buy and sell all marketable Stocks and Bonds on commission, at the Stock Exchange and in the open market.

Receive accounts of Banks, Bankers, Merchants and others, and allow interest on daily balances; and for those keeping accounts with us we collect United States coupons, and registered interest, and other coupons, dividends, etc., and credit without charge.

☞ We give special attention to orders from Banks, Bankers, Institutions and investors out of the city, by Mail or Telegraph, to buy or sell Government Bonds, State and Railroad Bonds, Bank Stocks, Railroad Stocks, and other securities.

We have issued the Seventh Edition of "Memoranda Concerning Government Bonds," copies of which can be had on application.

FISK & HATCH.

Bouquetiere.

The Bouquetiere is the Acme of Perfection for wearing the Bouquet to Coat, Dress, Belt or Hair. Simple and durable; in Gilt or Bronze. Mailed free on receipt of price, 25 cents each Five for $1, or per dozen, $2.

GEORGE D. COOPER (Sole Agent), No. 27 Union Square, N. Y.

ANGOSTURA LIQUEUR

The Finest and Purest Sweet Cordial in existence. Prepared by DR. J. G. B. SIEGERT & SONS, the manufacturers of the world-renowned

ANGOSTURA BITTERS

J. W. HANCOX, Sole Agent, 51 Broadway, New York.

The OLDEST and BEST of the JUVENILE PUBLICATIONS.

Frank Leslie's

Boys' & Girls' Weekly

is now publishing the following admirable serial stories, all beautifully illustrated:

"Jim Jeffs; Or, The Mystery of the House by the River." By NED ROMER.

"Left to Himself." By CONSTANCE AM LOOS.

"The Pearl of the Sahara; Or, The Adventures of Two American Boys." By CONSTANCE ROMER.

"Hal Harkforward and Tom Tallyho's Schooldays." By BRACKENRIDGE HEMING (Jack Harkaway).

"Nelly Blake's Schooldays."

"Cicero the Second; Or, Talked into Bad Luck." By JACK MANLY.

Sold by all newsdealers. Price 5 cents a copy; $2.50 a year, postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

L.S.L.

Take Notice!

This is the only Lottery ever voted on by the people of a State, and, under a late decision of the United States Supreme Court at Washington, is the only Legal Lottery now in the United States, all other charters having been repealed or having no existence.

This institution was regularly incorporated by the Legislature of the State for Educational and Charitable purposes in 1868, for the term of Twenty-five Years, to which contract the inviolable faith of the State was pledged, which pledge has been renewed by an overwhelming popular vote, securing its franchise in the new Constitution adopted December 25, A. D. 1879, with a capital of $1,000 000, to which it has since added a reserve fund of over $350 000.

ITS GRAND SINGLE NUMBER DISTRIBUTION has always taken place on September 14th.

M. A. DAUPHIN,

NEW ORLEANS, LA.,

Or same person at 319 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

CANDY

Send one, two, three or five dollars for a retail sample box, etc., by express, of the best Candies in America, put up elegantly, and strictly pure. Refers to all Chicago.

C. F. GUNTHER, Confectioner, 78 Madison St., Chicago.

Newspaper Advertising Bureau.

BY ADDRESSING GEO. P. ROWELL & CO., 10 Spruce St., New York, the exact cost of any proposed line of advertising can be learned. 100 page pamphlet, 10c.

CLAVERACK COLLEGE

AND HUDSON RIVER INSTITUTE, at Claverack, N. Y., three miles from Hudson and eight from Catskill. One of the most successful and largest boarding schools in the country. Fits boys thoroughly for college. Full College Course for Women. Art, Languages and Music, specialties. Fourteen Instructors, ten Departments. 1924 year opens September 6th. Pupils eight years and upwards received. Terms greatly reduced. Personal care in primary. Address, for Catalogue and terms in different departments that will meet the wants of every one, REV. ALONZO FLACK, Ph.D., President.

Starin's Glen Island.

NEW ROCHELLE HARBOR, LONG ISLAND SOUND.

THE ELEGANT STEAMERS

Laura M. Starin and St. Nicholas,

Will leave for GLEN ISLAND daily and Sundays from Pier No. 18, N. R., Jewell's Wharf, Brooklyn; Thirty-third Street, E. R. For time tables see daily papers.

Grand Concert in Pavilion Daily.

A RHODE ISLAND CLAM-BAKE served daily from 12 M. to 6 P. M., for 75 cents, in the magnificent Dining-Hall of the Club-House, under the supervision of

HIRAM D. MAXFIELD,

The celebrated caterer.

MAMMOTH DANCING PAVILION, BILLIARDS, BOWLING ALLEYS, RIFLE RANGES, BOATING AND BATHING.

EXCURSION TICKETS (round trip), 40 cents; single, 25 cents. Clam-bake 75 cents.

SHELTER ISLAND.

Steamer J. H. STARIN leaves Pier No. 18, N. R., foot of Cortlandt Street, MONDAYS and FRIDAYS, at 9 P. M., for Shelter Island and New Haven. A sail of four hours by daylight across the Sound, after leaving the City of Elms. Fare, single $1.25; excursion, $2.25.

STARIN'S EXCURSIONS.

MANHATTAN BEACH.

VIA GREENPOINT.

Steamer SYLVAN GROVE, from foot of Twenty-third Street, E. R., at 8.45, 9.45, 10.45, and half-hourly to 3.45 P.M. Returning, leave Manhattan Beach at 7.25, 10, 11.05 A.M., 12.05, 12.30, and every half-hour to 10.35 P.M.

VIA BAY RIDGE.

Steamers THOS. COLLYER and MATTEAWAN from 23d St., N.R., at 9.10, 10.25 A.M., and hourly to 8.25 P.M.

Leaving LEROY STREET ten minutes and PIER No. 6 thirty minutes after leaving 23d St. The boats leaving 23d St. at 7.25 and 8.25 P.M. do not stop at Leroy and Pier 6.

The steamer D. R. MARTIN leaves foot of Whitehall Street at 8.25 A.M. hourly to 8.25 P.M. Trains from Manhattan Beach connecting with D. R. Martin for Whitehall Street, leave hourly from 8.20 A.M. to 12.20 P.M., 1.25 to 6.25 P.M., 7.20 to 9.20 P.M. Trains connecting with steamer for Pier 6, Leroy St. and 23d St. leave every hour from 11 A.M. to 3.35 and 10.40 P.M.

GILMORE'S FULL BAND and LEVY every afternoon and evening.

ROYAL

HAVANA LOTTERY

A GRAND

EXTRAORDINARY DRAWING

AT HAVANA, CUBA. Has always drawn

SEPTEMBER 4th.

Only 18,000 Tickets issued.

CAPITAL PRIZE, 500,000 Spanish Dollars.

534 Prizes, amounting to 1,350,000 Pesos.

Tickets have always been $75; halves, $37.50; quarters, $18.75; fifths, $15; tenths, $7.50; twentieths, $4.

LOUISIANA STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 10th and Sept. 14th. Tickets have always been $2; half tickets, $1.

KENTUCKY STATE LOTTERY—Has always drawn Aug. 16th and 31st. Tickets, $1.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY—Has always drawn Aug. 31st. Tickets have always been $2; halves, $1. Prizes cashed. Full information sent free. Address, J. DUFF & CO., Bankers, 42 Nassau St., (corner Liberty), New York.

TO THE PUBLIC.

BOKER'S BITTERS.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS AND IMITATIONS.

In accordance with the desire frequently expressed, both in the United States and abroad, these Bitters, so long and justly celebrated for their diuretic as a cordial, and for their medicinal virtues against all diseases of, or arising from, the digestive organs, will henceforth be put up and sold not only in quart, but

ALSO IN PINT BOTTLES,

for medicinal, family, traveling, and other purposes. To be had at all the principal druggists', grocers', liquor-merchants', etc. L. FUNKE, Jr., Sole Agent, New York, 78 John Street. Post Office Box 1,929.

THE GREAT FAMILY JOURNAL

Frank Leslie's

CHIMNEY CORNER,

THE

Leading Literary Family Journal.

New Literary and Artistic Attractions appear in Rapid Succession.

The CHIMNEY CORNER is the only weekly that publishes healthy and unsensational Fiction; the Novels and Stories are attractive and interesting, and are contributed by the most popular writers. The contents embrace also Biography, Travels, Incidents of all Times and Countries, Foreign Manners and Customs, Essays, Well-chosen Matter for Young Readers, Examples for the Aspiring Youth of Both Sexes, Natural History in a popular form, the Wonders of Nature, Science, Art, and Human Ingenuity, Adventures with Wild Men and Beasts, Narratives of Daring and Peril, Social Hints, etc., etc.

Each Number contains sixteen pages, eight of which are embellished with beautiful engravings.

Published every Monday. For sale by all newsdealers. Price, single copies, 10 cents. Annual subscription, $4; three months, $1—postpaid.

Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

J. H. HAVERLY'S AMUSEMENT ENTERPRISES

HAVERLY'S FIFTH AVENUE THEATRE,
Broadway and Twenty-eighth St., N. Y.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S FOURTEENTH STREET THEATRE, N. Y.
Cor. Sixth Avenue and Fourteenth Street.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager.
HAVERLY'S NIBLO'S GARDEN THEATRE, N. Y.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, BROOKLYN.
Johnson and Washington Streets
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager
HAVERLY'S THEATRE, CHICAGO
Cor. Dearborn and Monroe Sts.
J. H. HAVERLY, Proprietor and Manager
HAVERLY'S UNITED MASTODON MINSTRELS.
J. H. HAVERLY'S GRAND ATHLETIC AND PEDESTRIAN ENTERPRISES
FRED. J. ENGELHARDT, Manager
HAVERLY'S WIDOW BEDOTT COMEDY CO.
HAVERLY'S GENUINE COLORED MINSTRELS.
Also controlling, at all times, a large additional number of Leading Attractions, and always ready to negotiate with Grand Opera Stars (with or without company), Combinations and Amusement Enterprises generally.

Old Dominion Steamship Co.

FOR NORFOLK, RICHMOND, OLD POINT COMFORT, THE VIRGINIA SPRINGS, THE SOUTH, SOUTHWEST AND WEST, From Pier 45, N. R., Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, 3 P.M.
FOR LEWES AND REHOBOTH BEACH, DELAWARE, From Pier 37, N. R., Monday, Wednesday and Friday, 3 P.M.
Elegant passenger accommodations on all steamers.
General Office, 197 Greenwich St., N. Y.
W. H. STANFORD, Sec.

KNOW THYSELF.

THE untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase the new medical work published by the PEABODY MEDICAL INSTITUTE, Boston, entitled THE SCIENCE OF LIFE; Or, SELF-PRESERVATION. Exhausted vitality, nervous and physical debility, or vitality impaired by the errors of youth or too close application to business, may be restored and manhood regained.
Two hundredth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings. Three hundred pages, more than 50 valuable prescriptions for all forms of prevailing diseases, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, either one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in French cloth, price only $1, sent by mail, postpaid.
The London Lancet says: "No person should be without this valuable book. The author is a noble benefactor."
An illustrated sample sent to all on receipt of 6 cents for postage.
The author refers, by permission, to Hon. P. A. Bissell, M.D., President of the National Medical Assoc'n.
Address, Dr. W. H. PARKER, No. 4 Bulfinch Street, Boston, Mass. The author may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience.
HEAL THYSELF

DAY'S Kidney PAD

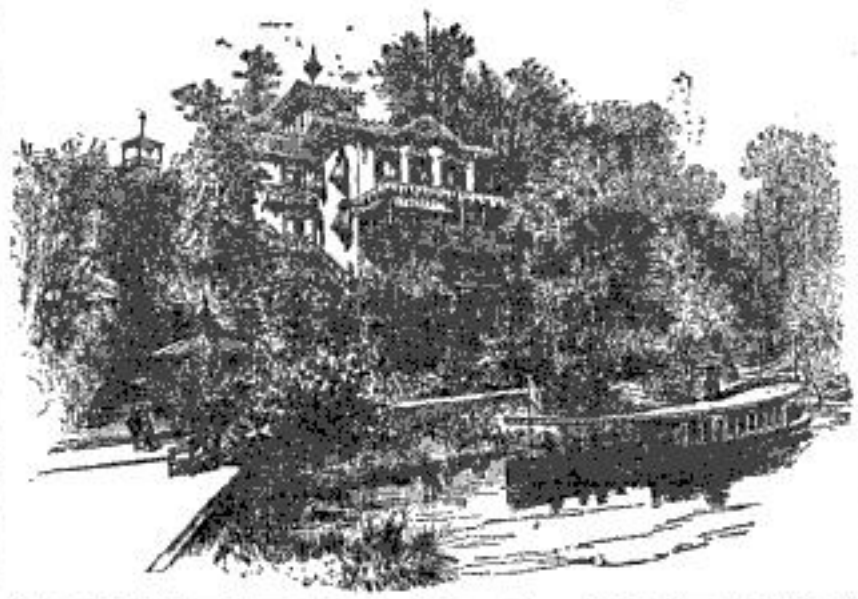
A CURE for the most prevalent and fatal diseases that afflict mankind FOUND AT LAST. Internal medicines never did nor never can cure KIDNEY DISEASE. STOP IT NOW! apply Day's Kidney Pad AT ONCE, and be cured of all affections of the Kidneys, Bladder and Urinary Organs. It is the only treatment that will cure NERVOUS AND PHYSICAL DEBILITY, and that distressing complaint, "BACK ACHE." It will annually save many times its cost in medicines and plasters, which at best give but temporary relief. Sold by Druggists or sent by mail on receipt of price, $2. Our book, "How a Life Was Saved," giving a history of this new discovery and a large record of most remarkable cures, sent free. Write for it.
DAY KIDNEY PAD CO., Toledo, O.

FRANK LESLIE'S
Illustrated Newspaper
$1.50
FOR 22 WEEKS
OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN,
Beginning with No. 1,200.
Political subjects will be ably represented editorially, and fully illustrated, during this period.
Address,
FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55, 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

ELGIN WATCHES,
All styles, Gold, Silver and Nickel, $6 to $40. Chains, etc., sent C. O. D. to be examined. Write for Catalogue to STANDARD AMERICAN WATCH CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Send stamp for Catalogue.
Rifles, Shot Guns, Revolvers, sent C. O. D. for examination.

TAPE-WORM
INFALLIBLY CURED with two spoons of medicine in 2-3 hours. For particulars, address, with stamp, H. ECKHORN, 4 St. Mark's Place, New York.



JUDGE FOR YOURSELF
By sending 50c. money or 40c. postage stamps, with age, you will receive by return mail a correct picture of your future husband or wife, with name and date of marriage. Address, W. FOX, Box 38, Fultonville, N.Y.

Imitation Gold Watches.
$8, $10, $15, $20 and $25 each; Chains $2 to $12 to match. Jewelry of the same. Sent C.O.D., by Express. Send stamp for Illustrated Circular. COLLINS METAL WATCH FACTORY, 338 Broadway, N. Y. Box 3866.

18 Elegant New Style Chromo Cards, with name, 10 cts postpaid. GEO. I. REED & CO., Nassau, N. Y.

FOR SALE,

"INTERLAKEN,"
THE COUNTRY HOME OF
THE LATE FRANK LESLIE, ESQ.,

Consisting of 62 acres, situated on LAKE SARATOGA, and extending back to Lake Lonely.
The house contains twelve rooms, gas and water.
The stable, finished in fine woods, has six box-stalls.
Finely appointed billiard-room, and three handsomely furnished sleeping-rooms over coach-house.
Gardener's cottage.
Conservatories profusely stocked with rare plants.
The furniture, steam-yacht, sail and row boats, French omnibus, etc., will be sold with the place.
Apply to
HOMER MORGAN, 2 Pine Street; or,
V. K. STEVENSON, 1 Pine St., and 35 E. 17th St.

10 Actress Photos, 10 Comic Songs, 10 Trump't Cards, Game Authors, 15c. Chromo Co., Northford, Conn.

20 Lovely Rosebud Chromo Cards, or 20 all Floral Mottos with name, 10c. Nassau Card Co., Nassau, N. Y.

COMPREHENSIVE, INTERESTING AND CHEAP.
Frank Leslie's
POPULAR MONTHLY.
The Largest, Most Attractive, and Cheapest Magazine in the World.
THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER NOW READY
With the following varied and brilliant
CONTENTS:
"THE CAMPAIGN OF 1880."—THE NOMINEES OF THE TWO PARTIES. Ten illustrations and portraits.
"SOME GOSSIPING PAPERS." By Mrs. Barrow.
"THE OLD AND THE NEW ACADIA." By Frank Norton. Ten illustrations.
"THE WASHINGTONS OF YORKSHIRE." Five illustrations.
"CUSTOMS OF OLD SPAIN—SPANISH WEDDING DANCES." Four illustrations.
"VICTOR HUGO." By the Author of "Roman Violet," etc. Six illustrations and portrait.
"THEODORE, KING OF ABYSSINIA." By A. B. Guerney. Fifteen illustrations.
"TURIN." By Lady Blanche Murphy. Eight illustrations.
"LODGERS AND BOARDERS IN LOWER LIFE." By Andrew Wilson, Ph. D. Nine illustrations.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Not Guilty," by Eva W. Pierce; concluded. "The Romance of Captain Beatty's Life"; illustrated. "Holman's Ouida," an Arizona Romance, by W. O. Stoddard; illustrated. "The Robbers of the Gorge," by F. E. Hamilton; illustrated. "Miss Prescott's Three Lovers, and How their Wooing Sped," by Amanda M. Douglas; illustrated. "A Queen of Bohemia," by Marguerite F. Aymar; illustrated. "Given Up by his Friends"; illustrated. "The Mistake of my Life"; illustrated—etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Wm. Kearns, the Kentucky Ranger"; illustrated. "Only in Fun," by Kate Drury; illustrated. "The Three Genii," illustrated. "Outwitting a Highwayman"; illustrated. "A Singular Old Maid," by Prudence Bowes; illustrated. "How Senator Linn's Life was Saved"; illustrated. "Russian State Prisons," Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"A Barmecidal Feast," by Richard Dowling. "Far Away," "My Lady," by Rita. "Remember," by Ethel De Fonblanque. "The Ballad of Cassandra." "The Sheep's Petition." "Southwick," by J. G. Whittier; illustrated—etc., etc.
MISCELLANY.—"Spanish Relics near Tallahassee." "Why Lace is so Costly." "Sunday Afternoon in Germany." "Suspended Animation." "Glass Beads." "A Pretty Climbing Vine—The Ground Nut"; illustrated. "Glass and its History." "Boxwood." "Power of a Growing Tree." "Recent Progress in Science." "Entertaining Column," etc., etc.
128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS
A Beautiful Colored Plate Frontispiece,
"THE BRIDEGROOM STIRRUP-CUP IN ANDALUSIA."
Single copies, 25 cents; annual subscription, $3; six months, $1.50; four months, $1.
SEND 25 CENTS FOR SPECIMEN COPY.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

H.W. JOHNS' ASBESTOS
LIQUID PAINTS, ROOFING, BOILER COVERINGS
Steam Packing, Sheathings, Fireproof Coatings, Cements
Send for Samples, Illustrated Pamphlet and Price List.
H. W. JOHNS M'F'G CO., 87 Maiden Lane, N.Y.

ESPECIAL NOTICE.
Judge Brown, of the United States Circuit Court, on March 31st, made the following decisions:
1. That the Commonwealth Distribution Company is legal.
2. That its drawings are fair.
The Postmaster-General has, therefore, rescinded his order against the delivery of mails to this company.
Registered letters will be delivered and postal-orders paid as formerly.
23d
Popular Drawing COMMONWEALTH DISTRIBUTION COMPANY has always drawn in public at Macauley's Theatre, Louisville, Ky., on a Saturday.
AUGUST 31.
Authorized by the Legislature and sustained by the courts of Kentucky.
1,900 prizes, $112,400; Capitals, $50,000, $10,000, $5,000; 10 of $1,000; 1,947 others, from $200 down.
Tickets always sold at $2; halves, $1.
Address R. M. BOARDMAN, Courier-Journal Building, Louisville, Ky.; or same at 309 Broadway, New York, or W. PORTER, 1,221 Broadway, New York, or T. J. COMERFORD, 212 Broadway, New York.

NO MORE RHEUMATISM
GOUT OR GRAVEL. Schlumberger is the only patentee in France. L. A. Paris, 102 W. 14th St., N.Y., his only agent for the celebration French Salicylates, which relieve at once, cure in four days, without dangerous consequences, their purity being controlled according to French laws by the Board of Pharmacy of Paris. Beware—The genuine has red seal and signature of agent on each box. $1, postpaid. Send stamp for pamphlet, Thousands of references.

BARLOW'S INDIGO BLUE | THE FAMILY WASH BLUE. For Sale by Grocers. D. L. WILTBERGER, Prop., 233 N. Second St., Philadelphia.

SCARCE GOODS.—Books, Photos, &c. Sample Catalogue 3c. Paris Book Co., Chicago, Ill.

50 Chromo, Snowflake and Lace Cards, with name, 10c, 40 all chromos, 10c. Star Printing Co., Northford, Ct.

$777 A YEAR and expenses to agents. Outfit free. Address, P. O. FICKERY, Augusta, Maine.

MANMARIAL BALM restores and develops the bust. Warranted sure and safe. Price, $1. New England Medical Institute, 24 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

20 new style Chromo Cards, no 2 alike, name printed, 10c. Samples free. HILL & CO., Lebanon, N. H.

50 Elegant Cards, New Chromo, Shells, Gilt-edge, etc., with name, 10c. G. A. SPRING, Northford, Ct.

50 New Style Cards, Lithographed in bright colors, 10c. 60 Agt's Samples 10c. Conn. Card Co., Northford, Ct.

Agents Wanted.

AGENTS WANTED for "The Life and Times of GEN. W. S. HANCOCK," by T. C. Williams, Editor-in-chief New York World, with facts and figures since the days of Washington. A Cyclopedia for voters. A book worth having. Over 500 pages, 60 illustrations, $2. The outfit for the business, 50 cents. Apply at once.
E. B. TREAT, Publisher
757 Broadway, New York.

THE BONANZA FOR BOOK-AGENTS
In selling our two splendidly illustrated books, Lives of the first written by his lifelong friend, Hon. J. W. FORNEY, an author of national fame, and an ardent admirer of the "superb soldier"; the second written by his comrade-in-arms and personal friend, Hon. JAS. S. BRISBIN, an author of wide celebrity. Both official, low-priced, immensely popular, selling beyond precedent. Agents double profits by selling both. Outfits 50c. each. Act quick and win money. HUBBARD BROS., 738 Chestnut St., Phila.
HANCOCK and GARFIELD

$350 A MONTH—AGENTS WANTED—75 best selling articles in the world; 1 sample free. Address Jay Bronson, Detroit, Mich.

ON 30 DAYS TRIAL
We send on 30 Days' Trial our ELECTRO-VOLTAIC BELTS, BANDS, Suspensories, Trusses, and other appliances, to those suffering from Nervous Debility, Weaknesses, or Lost Vitality from any cause; or to those afflicted with Rheumatism, Paralysis, Dyspepsia, Liver or Kidney troubles, etc., etc.; or Ruptures. Speedy cures guaranteed. Our Illustrated Pamphlet Free. Address VOLTAIC BELT CO., Marshall, Mich.

SCHMITT & KOEHNE.
Central Park Brewery
AND
Bottling Company.

Brewery, Bottling Department and Office, 160—165 East Fifty ninth Street, Ice-house and Rock-vaults, Fifty sixth and Fifty-seventh Street, Avenue A and East River, N. Y.
BOHEMIAN and LAGER BEER.
The finest Beer for family use. The best Shipping Beer in bottles, warranted to keep in any climate for months and years.

Frank Leslie's Pleasant Hours.
A MONTHLY PICTORIAL JOURNAL of LIGHT, PLEASING LITERATURE.
INTERESTING AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED STORIES, COMPLETE IN EACH NUMBER.
PLEASING TALES, ADVENTURES, ANECDOTE, AND MIRTH-PROVOKING ILLUSTRATIONS.
For sale by all newsdealers, price 15 cents. Annual subscription, $1.80, postpaid.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

ATTRACTIVE, INTERESTING AND EDIFYING.
Frank Leslie's
SUNDAY MAGAZINE.
The September Number Now Ready
CONTENTS.
"THE BENEDICTINES." Four illustrations.
"FLORENCE THE BEAUTIFUL: AN HISTORICAL AND ARTISTIC SKETCH." Eight illustrations.
"PETER PAUL RUBENS." Three illustrations.
"THE PHARAOHS." By Herbert Lee. Illustrated.
"THE IDOLATRY OF ANCIENT EGYPT." Illustrated.
"THE CHILDREN OF THE BIBLE—No. VIII. TIMOTHY." Illustrated.
"THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER." Illustrated.
"THE BISHOP AND CATHEDRAL OF TRURO." Three illustrations.
"THE ORIGIN OF THE PASSION PLAY."
"MOHAMMEDANISM."
"FOLK LORE OF PALESTINE." Etc., etc.
ESSAYS.—"On Preaching the Word," by Bishop Perry. "The Roman Breviary." "A Buddhist Tract." "Noah's Ark." "Christianity and Children." "The Cry of Need, in the Book of Psalms." Etc., etc.
SERIAL AND SHORT STORIES.—"Rube, the Nailmaker's Daughter," by the Author of "Gideon's Rock," etc.; concluded. "Hester Morgan's Husband," by L. T. Meade; Chapters I.-VIII.; Illustrated. "A Modern Cinderella," by M. T. Caldor; Illustrated. "The Nurse's Story"; Illustrated. "A Girl's Ambition," by Annot F. Watson; Illustrated. "Maid Marjory," by the Author of "Little Singer"; Chap. V.-IX.; Illustrated. Etc., etc.
SKETCHES.—"Balaam"; Illustrated. "The Crusades"; Illustrated. "A Converted Farmer"; Illustrated. "Lost in Sahara," by Alfred H. Guernsey; Illustrated. "The Monkeys and the Baby"; Illustrated. "The Story of an Illustrious Painter"; Illustrated. "Marriage in Japan," by the Rev. Nasa G. Houghton, M.A. Etc., etc.
POEMS.—"September"; Illustrated. "The Church Mouse," by Frances Ridley Havergal. "Three Angels." "A Rest." "The Masque of the Months," by Austin Dobson. "The Vacant Chair," by Augusta Browne Garrett. "Children's Laughter," by Edwin Charles Wreford. "The Orchard Well"; Illustrated. "Does it Rain?"; Illustrated.
MISCELLANY.—"The Goddess Kali"; Illustrated. "Interesting Incident." "Cover of the Book of Gospels of Archbishop Aribert"; Illustrated. "St. Gervase and St. Protase"; Illustrated. "The Donkey's Protector"; Illustrated. "Nebo, Author of Writing." "Backbiting." "Show Him the Apple." "The Prayer of Childhood." "Cromwell Prevented from Sailing"; Illustrated. "The Gutenberg Monument at Frankfort"; Illustrated. "David's Wanderings." "The Mother of the Virgin." Etc., etc. "Religious Notes and News." "Editor's Portfolio." "Obituary Notices." "Recreations for Sunday Afternoon." Music—"Nearer my God to Thee." Etc., etc.
128 QUARTO PAGES—OVER 100 ILLUSTRATIONS.
Single copy, 25 cents; or $3 a year; six months, $1.50; four months, $1—postpaid.
SEND 25 CENTS FOR A SPECIMEN COPY.
Frank Leslie's Publishing House,
53, 55 & 57 Park Place, New York.

Digitized by Google

Grand Central Hotel,

667 to 677 Broadway, New York.

NEW MANAGEMENT.

The Grand Central Hotel, the most centrally located Hotel for both business and pleasure-seekers, has recently changed hands, and is now under the management of Messrs. KEEPER, McKINNIE & Co., of the famous Manhattan Beach Hotel, and has been thoroughly renovated and refurnished, making it one of the most desirable hotels in the city, with its large airy rooms and wide halls. The house is kept on the American plan, at the low price of $3 per day, with a small charge for parlor and baths extra. A liberal arrangement can be made with persons remaining permanently.

KEEPER, McKINNIE & CO., of the Manhattan Beach Hotel, Proprietors.

Columbia Bicycle

The Bicycle has proved itself to be a permanent, practical road-vehicle, and the number in daily use is rapidly increasing. Professional and business men, seekers after health or pleasure, all join in bearing witness to its merits. Send 3c. stamp for catalogue with price-list and full information.

The Pope Mfg. Co.

59 SUMMER STREET,

Boston, Mass.

KIDNEY-WORT

The Great Remedy For THE LIVER, THE BOWELS, and the KIDNEYS.

These great organs are the Natural cleansers of the System. If they work well, health will be perfect, if they become clogged, dreadful diseases are developed because the blood is poisoned with the humors that should have been expelled naturally. KIDNEY-WORT will restore the natural action, and throw off the disease. Thousand have been cured, and all may be. For sale by all Druggists.

INMAN ROYAL MAIL STEAMERS

For QUEENSTOWN and LIVERPOOL.

NOTICE.—The steamers of this line take Lieutenant Maury's lane routes at all seasons of the year.

CITY OF BERLIN.....Saturday, August 21, 6 A.M.
CITY OF MONTREAL..Thursday, August 26, 9:10 A.M.
CITY OF RICHMOND...Saturday, September 4, 3 P.M.
CITY OF CHESTER...Thursday, September 9, 8:30 A.M.
CITY OF BRUSSELS...Thursday, September 16, 3 P.M.

From Pier 37, North River, foot of Charlton St.

Cabin, $80 and $100. Return tickets on favorable terms. Steerage, $28. Drafts at lowest rates.

Saloons, state-rooms, smoking and bathrooms amidships.

These steamers do not carry cattle, sheep or pigs.

JOHN G. DALE, Agent, 31 and 33 Broadway, New York.
G. A. FAULK, 105 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia.
L. H. PALMER, 3 Old State House, Boston.
F. C. BROWN, 32 South Clark Street, Chicago.

MABIE, TODD & BARD.

GOLD PENS.

Pencils, Holders, Cases, etc.

180 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Send for Price-List.

Our Goods are for sale by First-class Dealers in U. S.

OPIUM Morphine Habit Cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till Cured. DR. J. STEPHENS, Lebanon, Ohio

KEEP'S SHIRTS,

Gloves, Umbrellas, Underwear, Etc.

SAMPLES AND CIRCULARS MAILED FREE.

KEEP MANUFACTURING COMPANY,

631, 633, 635, 637 Broadway, N.Y.

Summer Excursions at Low Rates.

Newport, Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, Isle of Shoals, Old Orchard Beach, Mount Desert, Moosehead and Rangeley Lakes, White Mountains, Saratoga, Niagara Falls, Montreal, Quebec, &c. Send for list of FALL RIVER LINE TOURS AND EXCURSIONS, Furnished free.

GEO. L. CONNOR, Gen. Pass. Agt., P. O. Box 452, N. Y.

TRUSS EGGLESTON SENSIBLE TRUSS. Made on new principles. Send for Circulars. Eggleston Truss, Chicago, Ill.

Do Your Own Printing $3 PRESS prints cards, labels, etc. (Self-inker $4.) Larger sizes for larger work. For old or young. Great money saver. A paying business anywhere for all or spare time. Send two stamps for a catalogue of all sizes Presses, Type, Cards, Paper, &c., to the Manufacturers KELSEY & CO., Meriden, Conn.

$55.66 Agents Profit per Week. Will prove it or forfeit $500. $4 Outfit free. E. G. RIDEOUT & CO., 10 Barclay St., N.Y.

DR. TANNER AND THE S. P. C. A.

MR. BERGH TO DR. TANNER.—"Bravo, bravo, old man! You've done nobly, but please don't try the experiment on my pets."

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Keep the Blood cool and the Brain clear by the use of

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

FISHERMEN!
TWINES AND NETTING!

MANUFACTURED BY

WM. E. HOOPER & SONS, Baltimore, Md.

☞ Send for Price-List, naming your County and State.

N.Y. Central & Hudson River R.R.

THE BEST ROUTE EAST OR WEST.

Through Cars between New York or Boston and Chicago or St. Louis.

See NIAGARA FALLS, SARATOGA, and the HUDSON.

C. B. MEEKER, General Passenger Agent.

NICOLL THE TAILOR.

SPRING & SUMMER STYLES.

Diagonals, Worsteds, English Tweeds and Cassimeres,

MADE TO ORDER.

ELECTRIC LIGHTS used in BOTH STORES.

620 BROADWAY,

AND

139 to 151 Bowery, New York.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement

SENT BY MAIL.

14 STOP ORGANS
SUB BASS & Oct. Coupler, & Set Reeds, $65

Pianos $125 and upwards, sent on trial. Catalogue free. Address, DANIEL F. BEATTY, Washington, N.J.

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC HAIR BRUSH.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION,

Which has won its way to royal favor in England, been cordially indorsed by the Prince and Princess of Wales, and written upon by the Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, is now brought to the notice of the American public. It cures by natural means, will always do good, never harm, and is a remedy lasting for many years. It should be used daily in place of the ordinary Hair Brush. The Brush Handle is made of a new odorless composition resembling ebony; a combination of substances PRODUCING A PERMANENT ELECTRIC VOLTAIC CURRENT, WHICH ACTS IMMEDIATELY UPON THE HAIR GLANDS AND FOLLICLES. This power can always be tested by a silver compass which accompanies each Brush.

It is Warranted to

Cure Nervous Headache in 5 minutes!!
Cure Bilious Headache in 5 minutes!!
Positively remove Scurf and Dandruff!!
Prevent Falling Hair and Baldness!!
Cure all Diseases of the Scalp!!
Promptly arrests Premature Grayness!!
Makes the Hair grow Long and Glossy!!
Immediately soothes the weary Brain!!
Money returned if not as represented!!

IT NEVER FAILS TO PRODUCE A RAPID GROWTH OF HAIR ON BALD HEADS, where the Glands and Follicles are not totally destroyed.

Proprietors: The Pall Mall Electric Association of London. New York Branch: 842 Broadway.

[From REV. DR. BRIDGMAN.] Brooklyn, June 1st, 1880.

"Gents: I have never before given a testimonial, but am willing to encourage the use of an honest remedy. I am so pleased with your Hair Brush that I deem it my duty to write you recommending it most cordially. My hair, about a year since, commenced falling out, and I was rapidly becoming bald; but since using the Brush a thick growth of hair has made its appearance, quite equal to that which I had previous to its falling out. I have tried other remedies, but with no success. After this remarkable result I purchased one for my wife, who has been a great sufferer from headache, and she finds it a prompt and infallible remedy. A. BRIDGMAN, D.D."

London, Jan. 4th, 1879.

"The Hon. Mrs. Locke deems it a pleasure and duty to state that they have never failed in her case, and many other cures have come under her observation. She also finds them most beneficial for the hair, it being greatly improved by their use."

9 GODWIN ST., Bradford, England, Dec. 19th, 1878.

"My Aunt writes me they are the greatest blessing to her, as in all cases they relieve her at once. My hair is growing rapidly, the bald place being quite covered. I do think you ought to make these things known, for the benefit of others, as I am convinced it is the best Hair Renewer yet put before the public. Yours truly, J. JEWETT."

"Over 1,500,000 in use. An honest remedy, worthy of all praise."—British Medical Index.

"ROUND LAKE CAMP-MEETING GROUNDS, Saratoga Co., N. Y., June 8th, 1880.

"Your Brush is certainly a remarkable cure. I am highly pleased with it. Its effect is most wonderful, and you may be sure I shall recommend it heartily among my friends. It is also a splendid Hair Brush, well worth the money, and will last me for years.

REV. J. D. ROGERS, Superintendent."

[From ALLEN PEARCE & CO., Wholesale Druggists.] Boston, England, Feb. 1879.

"The effect was really astounding, removing the pain after a few minutes. As far as real value, they are worth a guinea each."

Over 7,000 similar Testimonials can be seen at our Office.

Remember that this is not a "Metallic" Wire Brush, but made of PURE BRISTLES.

A BEAUTIFUL BRUSH,

LASTING FOR YEARS.

Mention this Paper.

SENT POSTPAID on RECEIPT of $3,

Or by Express, C. O. D.

MONEY RETURNED IF NOT AS REPRESENTED.

As soon as you receive the Brush, if not well satisfied with your bargain, write us, and we will return the money. What can be fairer?

This paper will not knowingly publish any humbug, and before advertising the Brush one was placed in the hands of the Editor, with a request to test its merits. We have also placed one in the hands of Mayor Cooper and Postmaster James of New York, as a guarantee of our good faith.

Remittances should be made payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 Broadway, New York. Agents wanted in every town.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED
NEWSPAPER

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1880, by F. W. Leland, Assignee, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington.—Entered at the Post Office, New York, N.Y., as Second-class Matter.

No. 1,301.—Vol. LI. NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 4, 1880. [Price 10 Cents. $4.00 Yearly, 13 Weeks $1.00.

NEW YORK CITY.—THE STUDY OF BOTANY UNDER DIFFICULTIES—A SCENE ON A BY-PATH IN CENTRAL PARK.—See Page 6.

Digitized by Google

FRANK LESLIE'S
ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER,
53, 55 & 57 PARK PLACE, NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 4, 1880.

NOTICE.

FRANK LESLIE'S PUBLISHING HOUSE,
53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York City, N. Y.
P. O. Box 4121.

NEW YORK, January 17th, 1880.

Under the assignment, and with the assent of Mrs. Miriam F Leslie, the widow of Frank Leslie, and his sole legatee under his will, the publications of the House will be continued as heretofore under the management of the undersigned.

All communications should be addressed to 57 Park Place, or to P. O. Box 4121, New York City, N. Y.

I. W. ENGLAND, Assignee.

SHAMS BROUGHT TO THE TEST.

ONE of our contemporaries in this city contained the other day the report of an "interview" with Mr. Secretary Evarts, in the course of which he is represented to have held the following language:

"If the supporters of the Republican Platform to-day had given the Administration their hearty support three years ago it would not be a question of doubt to-day as to which party will succeed in the coming election. The whole country would have rallied to the standard which proclaimed industry and prosperity to all sections of the land."

And while the Secretary of State was speaking in this wise in Washington, a company of bankers, assembled in public convention at Saratoga in this State, was discussing, with calmness and intelligence, some of the problems on which the "industry and prosperity" of the country, in all its sections, are seen to depend, but which the fugiemen of both the two great historical parties seem inclined, for the present, to hustle as far as possible out of sight under the smoke and dust of a vulgar political wrangle. That the Democratic leaders should "fight shy" of the pending financial issues may find its sufficient explanation, if not justification, in the fact that they labor under a conscious sense of inability to meet these issues in the present divided state of political sentiment within their ranks, on all questions relating to national banks, the greenback circulation, and the depreciated silver dollar. But that the Republican leaders, after the initiative they have taken in promoting the resumption of specie payments, should shrink from the logical consequences and concomitants of that initiative, if it was ever undertaken with sincerity and with earnestness, we find it difficult to explain on any theory that is easily consistent with the repute of its authors for intelligence or for courage. With Mr. Evarts, we feel inclined to exclaim, "What do the masses of the people care about the squabble of the politicians over troops at the polls, or other abstract points of a partisan nature," when there are real and vital questions impending over us which come home to the very business and bosoms of the people?

"Troops at the polls" would, indeed, be a good slogan if there were any danger that a single voter was likely to be intimidated by their presence at the polls in the coming Presidential election; and "the Solid South" might be a good battle-cry if it were not raised by men who clamor for a "Solid North," and who claim a vested right in the "solid" vote of the colored race, thus showing that it is not a sectional or political "solidity" which excites their indignation, but the side on which the "solidity" is found. And the impertinence of these "issues" is set in only a clearer light by the magnitude and importance of the questions which have been put by them in a temporary abeyance, as if, forsooth, the politics of the country could be divorced from the economical interests and business pursuits of the people.

Hence we cannot but consider it as a cause of gratulation that, while false cries and panic terrors are being sounded from a thousand political hustings in the land, a body of practical economists and of financial experts has come to remind the American people that the nominal resumption of specie payments is "not a final settlement of any of the great questions of finance which have agitated the country for so many years past, nor is it a demonstration of courage or of the highest financial wisdom on the part of the nation." It certainly was not a demonstration of courage or of financial wisdom on the part of our legislators, for the great majority of the Democrats in Congress sought to frustrate its accomplishment, and, beyond the passage of a resolution that a qualified resumption of specie payments should take place on the 1st of January, 1879, the Republicans in Congress did little or nothing to bring about the desired result. Abundant crops and a favorable balance of trade did greatly more to facilitate the resumption of specie payments than any wisdom of our rulers at Washington, though Mr. Secretary Sherman deserves all the credit that is due to the skillful administrative officer who knew how to take the tide of our prosperous fortunes at the flood. So true is it that our nominal resumption of specie payments resulted from a conjunction of fortuitous causes rather than from any determinate policy of statesmanship, that one of the bankers in the Saratoga Convention did not scruple to hold the following language:

"Resumption may come about and specie payments be for a long time maintained on an amount of specie wholly inadequate to the permanent maintenance of specie payments. This was the character of the resumption of January 1st, 1879, of which, as a people, we have little cause for boasting, though we have much cause to congratulate ourselves upon our good fortune. The credit of resumption does not belong to us, for we did not bring it about by any intelligent act and did not purposely contribute anything towards its accomplishment. All that we did was to issue a resolution by Congress that we would resume on the 1st of January, 1879, but we did not take any steps to accomplish it. We only sat down and waited."

As the politicians "only sat down and waited" for the so-called resumption of specie payments in 1879, so in this year of grace 1880 they only "sit and wait" while the frail and unsteady basis of this resumption is being slowly but surely undermined before their eyes. The legal-tender notes, instead of being retired according to the solemn promise of the nation when it issued them, are retained to-day in circulation by the force of a statute of Congress, when the country has no need for them, but when their mere presence is a standing lure to monetary fanatics as well as a gross breach of public faith and of political morality. The depreciated silver dollar is still another standing menace to the stability of resumption. Two-fifths of the coin reserve of the Government is now held in this depreciated coin, and soon the proportion will be more than one-half, and then a slight disturbance either in our civil or commercial condition would precipitate the shipment of gold abroad, the collapse of resumption as it now stands, and the reduction of trade and commerce to a single silver standard, in common with Asiatic countries like India and China. Then would come another crash and another panic. The withdrawal of gold from circulation will make a "tight money market." The shock of the public credit will make it "tighter." Contracts between citizens will be disturbed, and contracts made with people abroad will be subject to all the hindrances and losses incident to computations made in two currencies, and one of these a currency of changing value.

And this preposterous policy is cherished by the Democrats of the South and West not only in spite of their ancient political traditions, but in spite of the dread of Federal "centralization" professed in the Cincinnati platform; but what Federal "centralization" can be more potent for evil than a policy which lodges in the Secretary of the Treasury a power to force a depreciated dollar on the people at any moment he may select? For the silver dollar must be forced on the people before they will take it, seeing as we do that only six millions of the sixty-five millions already coined can now be kept afloat in our general circulation, and that the discarded coin, as fast as it comes from the mint, is stowed away in vaults which have to be enlarged to hold it because the people will not use it.

And many Republicans, too, as if wishing to tide over the coming Presidential election without confessing the weakness of the claim they found on the "success of resumption," are now glorying in the shame of the silver dollar, and actually do homage to it as the keystone of the arch on which resumption rests. To this effect that organ of Stalwart Republicanism, the National Republican at Washington, reasons as follows:

"The silver dollar lies at the door of the Treasury and prevents a speculation in gold and the consequent depreciation of the greenback. Were the gold maniacs—the brokers of the country—at liberty to demand gold for their greenbacks at the Treasury, the fair fabric of resumption, the pride and glory of Mr. Sherman's record, would wither in a week. The broker knows that if he could corner a hundred millions of greenbacks—and such a scheme would be easy of accomplishment to the Goulds and Keenes of Wall Street—Mr. Sherman would hand him over bags of silver dollars, not the compact gold which he covets. This certainly has prevented and will prevent that raid upon the gold in the Treasury which was the dream of Wall Street before resumption. The bright silver in the Treasury is all that makes a Black Friday on Wall Street impossible."

Would it be possible to state in clearer terms the "scarecrow" quality of the silver dollar, the insecurity of resumption, and the political immorality which not only tolerates such a specious and delusive policy, but actually exults in it?

AS OTHERS SEE US.

THE unexampled material prosperity of the United States is a subject of almost constant comment in the European press. The truth is that there is not a country in Europe which does not feel its social framework more or less shaken by the influence of our example—not one whose whole industrial and commercial system is not affected by our agricultural and manufacturing competition. This competition is, indeed, becoming practically destructive to some foreign productive interests. The London Examiner, in a recent article on this subject, sums up a statement of the vast advantages we enjoy agriculturally, in these words:

"The Americans appear to have at last discovered that, if they are to "whip creation" effectively, they must take their stand on their agricultural rather than on their manufacturing advantages. At the next census it is calculated that they will number 50,000,000 souls, the majority of whom will be breeders of cattle and growers of grain. And the ratio of increase of these formidable competitors is enormous. Four hundred thousand immigrants, it is estimated, will this year be landed on the shores of the United States, chiefly English, Irish, Germans and Scandinavians, of the best class and in the prime of life. The amount of ready money which they bring with them to their adopted country is not less than £12 per head, while the value of their industry is simply inestimable. They are admittedly the best bone and sinew of the Old World. Avoiding the mistake of the earlier immigrants, they no longer attempt to find a home in the Eastern States, but at once take train for the Far West, where at present, at all events, the demand for manual labor of all kinds is practically unlimited. Much has been said about the folly of labor combinations "driving capital out of the country." But here manifestly we have the converse process at work. The proletariat of Europe is being driven by the hundred thousand across the Atlantic to escape the dreaded conscription, and the crushing burdens imposed by the "bloated armaments" maintained by monarchical States. The New World is redressing the balance of the Old with a vengeance. Our agriculturists have been the first to feel the strain. They are face to face with a competition of ruinous severity. The gravity of the crisis cannot be exaggerated. Better harvests will avail them but little. To any one who has beheld with his own eyes "what is being done in those glorious, free United States," agriculturally speaking, the general insensibility of Englishmen to the imminent ruin with which our agricultural interest is menaced must appear to savor of absolute lunacy.

A FEW WORDS OF WARNING.

IN the belief that the present and still active depression in the value of the majority of gold and silver mining stocks will not hinder either the purchases of mines or the organization of such mines into joint-stock companies, we offer a few suggestions to our readers and the general public.

To the successful working of every gold and silver mine there are three essential pre-requisities: First, The existence of an ore body, which, after the most careful possible examination, promises to repay judicious and economic development. Second, Efficient management under and above ground. Third, Honest financial administration. When these three indispensable requisites can be reunited, profitable employment of capital in mining enterprises may ensue. Either of the three lacking, disaster is inevitable. And that it is not easy to reunite them is best proved by the very small number of mines paying regular and continuous dividends out of their earnings. They do not to-day amount to twenty.

The first pre-requisite—namely, the existence of an ore body—is not by any means the easiest of the three. More mistakes are probably made in this than in either of the other two which we have mentioned. In the first place, even the original purchaser of the mine and the organizers of the company, be they never so honest, may have been deceived. It is, of course, impossible for all intending investors in the stock to visit and inspect the mine. They are obliged, therefore, to rely mainly, if not entirely, upon reports, more or less trustworthy. Reports cannot be valuable or reliable except as made by honest, disinterested, experienced geologists, metallurgists and mining engineers. And again, such men are about as scarce as hens' teeth. Possibly the best plan is to obtain the services of the men whose reputations for honesty and experience stand, and have stood, the longest at the head of the list. But the best even of these must occasionally make mistakes. Humanum est errare, and in corroboration of this we remind our readers that very many of the districts which to-day are the leading fields of mining industry of the country have, at some preceding date, been abandoned as worthless by practical miners and declared valueless by the same eminent mining experts.

The second pre-requisite is efficient under and above ground management. This department is, in mining enterprises of any magnitude, in charge of a general superintendent. For the success of the enterprise this person must reunite honesty to a thorough knowledge of geology and metallurgy, and must be a thorough judge of every class of labor. He cannot efficiently direct the foreman of the under-ground work unless he possesses practical knowledge of every species of rock and every class of ore. He must be well up in all branches of practical philosophy, and competent to overcome unexpected obstacles and difficulties—social and physical. If these requirements are indispensable for the under-ground portion of his work, those for the treatment of the extracted ore are not less necessary and exacting. He must be a thorough analytical chemist. To disintegrate the bullion from the ore, he should be thoroughly versed in the laws of nature which had incorporated the bullion in the ore. Fortunes have been lost and good mines abandoned for lack of knowledge as to how to treat refractory ores. A competent man may make poor ore pay, and an incompetent one ruins a valuable mine. As a general rule, the best under-ground men are poor hands at treating ores, and the rule holds inversely. And inefficiency in either branch of the business converts what should be dividends into assessments or mortgage bonds.

The third pre-requisite is honest financial administration. On this point a very few words will suffice. The public has been of late so fearfully victimized by apparently respectable lists of directors and trustees, that without these words of warning it is improbable that any sane person will invest a dollar without having first learned, by close investigation, the antecedents of the persons to whom he intrusts it. Moreover, the "army-worm"—the name given in the Street to these sharks who have of late been feeding upon a credulous public—is gradually leaving. Men are returning to the Pacific Slope, because there is nothing green left here upon which they may browse.

THE MORALE OF AMUSEMENT.

A CONTEMPORARY, alluding to the fact that over 3,000 persons assembled to view the recent bull fight in this city, made the incident the text of a sermon on that love of cruelty which it said was inherent in the human race. This has always been a favorite topic with the cynical and morose, who delight in depreciating the masses for the purpose of elevating their own class to a moral platform higher than the rest. In his subtle and pseudo philosophical manner, Rochefoucauld sounded the first modern keynote of this shallow and cold hearted philosophy when he said, in one of those half-truth fallacies called moral reflections, "There is something in the misfortunes of our dearest friends not altogether displeasing to us."

We forbear to comment upon this libel on the human heart, leaving it to the judgment of our readers, who cannot but feel its subtle atrocity. The whole philosophy of that school of glittering eclectics is founded on a system utterly at variance with all logic and experience. It is a system where the exception is considered the rule. Van Amburgh, the celebrated lion-tamer, whose exhibitions were once so popular in England and America, used to relate an anecdote which illustrates how completely the love of excitement and craving for sensation operates upon the minds of all. In his various exhibitions he had noticed in the very front row of the parquet one particular old gentleman, who seemed never to miss an exhibition. One of the most startling of Van Amburgh's feats was to put his head into the mouth of his largest lion. Van Amburgh's curiosity was aroused, and he managed to get an interview with this constant spectator, who unblushingly confessed to the astonished lion-tamer that the sole object of his unvarying attendance was to see Van Amburgh put his head into the lion's mouth once too often—in point of fact, to see the brute bite his head off. If any one has built from this fact a theory of the natural cruelty of the human heart, he will perhaps be amazed to find that this votary of sensation was Allsopp, the humanitarian friend of Coleridge, and the founder of a refuge for orphans in his native town of Norwich.

It is a natural postulate in all things, of two evils to choose the least, and it is equally natural in all matters concerning mankind to choose the best of any two theories. In this view, we incline to the belief that the substratum of the community is not cruelty but thoughtlessness and that innate love of excitement and craving for sensation without which civilization would stagnate, and even Christianity pause in its heroic career of human improvement. It is this undying element in our nature that lends such attractions to those perilous acrobatic feats of the trapeze and the tight-rope. In addition to this is that instinctive admiration we all feel for those deeds of difficulty and daring which partake more or less of the heroic. It would be a libel upon humanity to say that the thousands who nightly visit the new pantomime at Wallack's, which is full of dangerous experiments in gravitation, are attracted by the forlorn hope of seeing some fatal catastrophe. In spite of the pessimists, we believe that a cruel heart is the exception, and not the rule, in human nature.

ECHOES FROM ABROAD.

THE illness of Mr. Gladstone, from which he has happily recovered, caused much excitement in London. It appears that his magnificent constitution has at last broken down, and that Mr. Gladstone at seventy-one cannot deliver addresses bareheaded under the falling snow, undergo all the worry and excitement of a general election and then carry on his shoulders the whole Government, without feeling the weight of his self-imposed task. During the few last debates in the House of Commons which he attended before his illness, Mr. Gladstone's fretfulness and excitability were very noticeable, and upon one occasion he went so far as to catch Sir Vernon Harcourt's coattails and pull him into his seat, saying that he had spoken long enough. A curious incident of the case, was that Dr. Andrew Clark, who was in attendance and who is one of the principal physicians in London, received numerous letters advising him how to treat his illustrious patient!

Since the rejection of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill by the Lords, there has been a fierce outcry among certain persons who are known as the Metropolitan Liberals—men who, although Members of Parliament, have no great standing. These persons, whenever the House of Lords throws out some foolish Bill, immediately begin to clamor for the abolition of the Upper House, forgetting that the influence which it exerts is generally a good one, and that when there is really a popular demand for the passing of any measure, the Lords seldom stand in the way. In Ireland this throwing out of the Bill has led to serious consequences. An attempt has been made to blow up the barracks at Cork. Two barrels of gunpowder were placed in a recess in the railroad tunnel which runs underneath the barracks. The commandant received timely warning and had the barrels removed and thereby saved the lives of a host of unoffending soldiers. At Dungannon there have been serious riots, and from the western parts of the island come reports of men drilling at night and of numerous threatening letters. The prosperity of the people in the North of Ireland is in striking contrast with the lazy misery of the inhabitants of the South and West. The flax crop is very promising and covers a wide area. Besides taking the lead with its linens, which are known all over the world, Belfast is now competing with Glasgow and the Clyde in shipbuilding, while in printing, this city has attained a proud position.

Digitized by Google

The financial positions of France and Germany are well worthy of consideration. After France had paid the enormous indemnity, in which she had been mulcted at the close of the Franco-Prussian War, the French people set themselves manfully to work in order that, by economy and hard work, they might recover the losses which they had suffered. Germany, on the other hand, elated by victory and feeling in her pockets that plentiful supply of ducats which she had received, became foolishly extravagant, and the natural consequence is that to-day Germany is almost bankrupt, and that France is rich and prosperous. Since the consummation of the unity of Germany there have been many Ministers of Finance, none of whose views, unfortunately, agreed with those of Prince Bismarck. The protective tariff does not supply sufficient funds, and Prince Bismarck now proposes to impose more indirect taxes, such as a brewers' malt tax, a tobacco monopoly and additional stamp duties. The young men are unwilling to serve as officers in the army, and their physique is said to have considerably deteriorated since the last war. This disinclination is shown by the number of young officers who are seeking employment in Turkey. Meanwhile, in France the army has reached a high state of perfection, and the Autumn manœuvres, which will soon be held, will undoubtedly show a high state of efficiency in the French ranks. The danger of general war which is caused by the Eastern question is thoroughly felt in France, and, indeed, all the Great Powers are anxiously awaiting the settlement of the present difficulty, which may result either in peace or war.

While all Europe is disturbed by wars and rumors of wars, it is pleasant to turn our attention to little Belgium, where a happy and prosperous people are now celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of their independence. The ill feelings which exist in other monarchical countries between the rulers and the ruled find no resting-place in Belgium. The King is revered as the first citizen in the State; the royal family as the nation's head. Constitutional liberty is seen in that fortunate country at its very best. The people are contented and happy; wealth daily increases; political differences do not engage the entire attention of any class; art flourishes, and trade and manufacturing interests are at an acme of prosperity. When it is remembered that almost the whole civilized world has lately passed through an era of great depression, it is worth noting that Belgium, instead of suffering, has continuously increased in prosperity. In the matter of machinery the advance is prodigious. For many years Belgium looked to England and France for the greater part of her machinery, and several foreign houses had established themselves permanently in Belgium. Now, however, there is not a single foreign house, and machinery is exported at an annually increasing rate. Much assistance has been rendered by the Government towards fostering these industries, and the present annual value of Belgian exports in machines exceeds fifty millions of francs. One of the largest manufacturing industries which is not counted under the head of machinery, is the manufacture of firearms. In the town of Liège 30,000 persons are engaged in this branch, and they work, not in unhealthy factories, but in their own homes. Coal and other mining has also enormously increased, and the leather trade, for which Belgium was always famous, continues to thrive. At the present moment this country imports more skins from La Plata than either England, France or Germany. Enough cotton is annually imported and manufactured to supply all home wants, and strength, added to French elegance, makes Belgian furniture almost the best in the world. What this country has done and is doing in art is too well known to require any notice here, but it may be remarked that architecture has taken great strides under the patronage of the King, whose tastes in this line are so notorious that he goes by the name of "Leopold the Builder." Of late years Brussels has greatly improved in the architecture of her houses and public buildings; indeed, there are few cities that can compare in beauty with the modern metropolis of Belgium. Under these circumstances it is not strange that the Belgians should be proud of themselves, and that the Commissioners of the Exhibition should invite the representatives of the press of all countries to show them the proud position among nations which Belgium has acquired.

It is freely charged in responsible quarters that the present Democratic State Committee in this State is not heartily interested in the success of General Hancock, and that unless a new committee shall be constituted, the campaign will not be prosecuted with the energy and vigor necessary to success. This is a matter which concerns the Democracy of the whole country, and if the allegation of indifference on the part of the present committee should be true, it would seem that steps should be taken to lodge the conduct of the canvass in hands which will not hang listless in presence of the crisis which is now upon the party.

SEVERAL States have anti tramp laws. If they would only enforce them against the political vagrants who are now flitting to and fro as professional stump-speakers, and disgusting all decent people by harangues which are only too often as mischievous in tendency as they are indecent, a real service would be done to the cause of morality and honest politics.

THE State of Minnesota, only twenty three years old, will produce this year 45,000,000 bushels of wheat, besides an enormous yield of oats, corn and barley. The full acreage of wheat is 2,963,325 acres, an increase of 200,804 acres over last year. This is certainly a splendid exhibit for so young a State, and affords a striking proof of the growth, while it at the same time embodies a prophecy of the grand possibilities, of the great Northwest.

THE belief that the spirit of revolution in Mexico has been exterminated is not justified by late reports, which represent that in several localities gangs of marauders have risen in revolt and attempted to levy tribute from wealthy citizens. All the revolutionary movements appear to have been promptly suppressed, but the fact that they have been attempted indicate a want of stability and a prevalence of a rebellious temper which augur badly for the prosperity of the Republic.

THE great Southern fair to be held at Atlanta, Ga., next month, under the auspices of the Gate City Guard, promises to eclipse everything of the kind ever attempted in that section of the Union. During the fair there will be a grand reunion of Southern and Northern military bodies, the influence of which is expected to be eminently salutary in subduing sectional animosities. The proceeds of the fair will be applied to the erection of a memorial hall by the military organization already named, the cost of which will be over $50,000.

THE decline of the Greenback movement is very clearly illustrated by the insignificant character of the New York Greenback Convention held at Syracuse last week. The attendance did not at any time exceed over one hundred persons, and the proceedings lacked altogether the vim and enthusiasm which two or three years ago characterized conventions of this sort. The truth is that the Greenback Labor Party is now nothing more than a refuge for crippled and decayed politicians who cannot find harbor anywhere else. The managers have no other ambition than to trade upon the little capital they imagine themselves to possess; but they are not likely to find any bidders this year for wares which are of no real value to either party.

A STATEMENT issued by the Treasury Department shows that the net revenue of the Government from all sources for 1880 is $333,526,610, while in 1879 it amounted to $273,827,184, an increase of $59,699,426. The net ordinary expenditures of the Government for 1880 are shown to be $267,642,367, against $266,947,883 for 1879. A comparison of expenditures for interest on the public debt and for pensions for the years 1879 and 1880 shows a large increase in the one and a considerable reduction in the other. For 1879 the interest on the public debt amounted to $105,327,949, and for 1880 to $95,757,575, a decrease of $9,570,374. In 1879 there was expended on account of pensions $35,121,482, while for 1880 the expenditure for this account amounted to $56,737,174, an increase of $21,655,692 in one year.

AT a recent meeting of the Saratoga Monument Association ex-Governor Seymour, in urging our commemorating, as a people, of the deeds of our ancestors, said very truly that the mere ornamentation which is put on public buildings, and which disfigures rather than adorns, greatly exceeds in cost each year the expense of erecting suitable monuments to mark the scenes of great events in our history and the graves of men who sacrificed their lives in obtaining the independence of our country. He maintained that the public moneys in this particular were unwisely expended, and the Association, under the impulse of his suggestion, resolved to appeal directly to Congress for financial help. Meanwhile, the work of constructing the monument will go forward under the $10,000 appropriation made by the Legislature.

WEEK before last several persons were killed and a large number seriously injured by the second section of an excursion train on a New Jersey railroad running into the first section on a siding. It now turns out that the disaster was due to the fact that the engineer did not know how to use the automatic brake, being utterly ignorant of the principles upon which it is operated, and that as a result the only check upon the train, when he attempted to stop it, was the power-brake applied to the driver-wheels. Had he understood his business, he could have stopped his train in thrice its own length; as it was, he barely stopped it in a mile and a half. There must be something wrong in a system of management under which ignorant and incompetent men are thus permitted to operate the motive power of a railway carrying thousands of passengers daily. The incident will not be lost if it shall impress upon railway managers the absolute importance of employing none but capable and trustworthy men as engineers. As a step to this end they must pay such wages as the highest forms of intelligence and conscientiousness have a right to exact, and abandon the niggardly policy which, as a rule, sets a premium upon stupidity and carelessness.

A REPORT just made by a sanitary inspector appointed to inquire into the subject of the health of shop-girls, as affected by long continued standing, has some importance as dissipating a false impression now very generally prevalent. It has been believed that women cannot maintain the standing posture as long as men without rendering them liable to sickness, but the facts disclosed by this sanitary inquiry do not sustain this common opinion. One employer testified that out of an average of 250 girls only 7 had died within fifteen years, and that there was very little severe sickness among them. Saleswomen themselves complain of their long hours of work, but there seems to be no evidence that their health is seriously affected by occupying a standing rather than a sitting posture. Still, it would be well if employers would generally provide sitting accommodations for employés, to be occupied at their leisure intervals.

CONNECTICUT and New Jersey are pivotal States in the present political campaign, and both parties seem determined to bring their best men to the front. In the former State the Republican nominee for Governor, a gentleman of great popularity and unexceptional character, is antagonized by ex-Governor James E. English, the Democratic candidate. Mr. English has an unblemished record, is able and popular, and his nomination will not only lift the canvass to a high plane, but secure a square trial of strength on the broad ground of principle and character between the parties of the State. In New Jersey the Republicans have nominated Hon. F. A. Potts for Governor, and go into the canvass with a vigor and enthusiasm which they have not manifested for years. "Mr. Potts," as the World remarks, "is one of the strongest and cleanest Republican leaders" of the State—a gentleman who enjoys the cordial respect and confidence of the good men of all parties, and whose record, both in political and business life, has been always conspicuous for conscientiousness, ability and integrity. The Democrats have yet to nominate, and unless they shall select a candidate representing the best and highest element of the party, the election of Mr. Potts—as many of their party-leaders concede—will be something more than probable.

CENSUS estimates fix the total population of the United States at about 48,000,000. The Northern States, as estimated, will have a population of 30,763,820, and the Southern States 17,692,331, the average rate of growth of the South being slightly in excess of twenty-eight per cent., and that of the North being slightly below twenty-seven per cent. This alleged heavy increase in the South is believed in some quarters not to be genuine, and it is certainly, to say the least of it, very unexpected. If the figures from all the States are correct, or approximately so, then the gain of the North in members of Congress will not be at all what has been anticipated. The basis of representation is now 131,425, which gives 292 members of the House. If the membership of the House should now be fixed at 300, and the quota of population for each Representative fixed at (say) 163,000, then Alabama, Indiana, Maine, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee and Vermont would lose one member each, and New York two. On the other hand, Texas would gain four, Kansas three, Minnesota two, Nebraska two, and California, Kentucky, Michigan, Missouri, Virginia and West Virginia, each one. On this showing the net gain in what are commonly called the Southern States would be five Representatives, and the gains in the Northwest being reduced by the losses in the East, the net gain of the North would be only two.

THE elimination of the carpet-bag element from Louisiana politics seems to have been followed by the intrusion upon the scene, especially in New Orleans, of a ruffianly Democratic element, which proposes to itself the absolute control of the party policy. This element has recently distinguished itself by outbreaks of hoodlumism which have not only provoked the severest censure of respectable citizens of both parties, but have induced the reputable Democratic journals to propose instant action for the expulsion of the offenders from all share in the party management. Thus the Picayune says:

> "The fact is that the Democracy of this State and city has fallen largely under the control of bad men, who are Democrats only in name, and who, by capturing the machinery of the regular organization, have secured many of the highest and most lucrative offices of the Government. The party can never be vindicated until these men have been expelled from the party, or at least until they have lost their hold upon it through the control of ward clubs, primaries and parochial committees. The way to reach that end is to ignore the authority and even the existence of their clubs and committees, and to effect a new and genuinely Democratic organization."

It is creditable to the men of character in the Democratic Party that they are meeting the evil with which they are confronted in this decisive way. To submit to the domination of the hoodlums would be to invite not only disaster within but reproach from without. It is certainly to be hoped that the victory may rest, decisively and speedily, with the law-abiding men of the city and State.

NEWS OF THE WEEK

Domestic.

THE Prohibitionists of Maine have nominated Joshua N. Osgood for Governor.

ONE hundred and thirty-seven hostile Sioux Indians have been captured and brought into Fort Keogh.

THE prices of September coal were advanced ten cents a ton for large size and twenty cents for domestic grades.

MANY of the department clerks in Washington have been granted leave of absence to go to Maine for campaign work.

PROPOSITIONS have been submitted to the Treasury Department for an issue of gold certificates, similar to those for silver.

GENERAL MILES reports that 800 hostile Sioux have surrendered to him, and that 1,000 more are en route for the same purpose.

FULTON MARKET has again been declared unsafe, this time by a board of examiners appointed by the Department of Public Works.

THE New York State Greenback Convention, last week, nominated Thomas C. Armstrong for Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals.

SPOTTED TAIL is assisting Government officers at Rosebud Agency in suppressing the thievish operations of certain Indian marauders.

THE American Bar Association in session at Saratoga last week elected Mr. Edward J. Phelps, of Vermont, as president for the ensuing year.

GENERAL GRANT has written another letter expressing his satisfaction with the Republican national ticket. He will come East the latter part of August.

IT is announced that General Butler will support General Hancock. He is likely to receive the Democratic nomination for Governor of Massachusetts.

THE Connecticut Democratic Convention, last week, nominated by acclamation James E. English for Governor and Charles M. Pond for Lieutenant Governor.

IT is intimated that the Democratic managers of Indiana propose to ask the Supreme Court to review and revise its opinion declaring that the State election must be held in October.

THE Secretary of War has granted Cadet Whittaker a furlough pending further proceedings, which are likely to end in a court martial, which has been demanded on his behalf.

THE State Department has instructed the United States Minister at Constantinople to lay the case of the murdered American missionary, the Rev. J. W. Parsons, before the Porte.

THE triennial conclave of Knights Templar at Chicago ended August 19th with the election of officers. Sir Knight Benjamin Dean, of Boston, was elected Grand Master. The next grand conclave will be held at San Francisco.

THE military reservations located on public lands of the United States embrace 2,629,580 acres in twenty-four States and Territories. The largest amount in any one is in Montana, where the reservations aggregate 830,905 acres.

AN order reducing the rate of postage on newspapers mailed to foreign countries belonging to the Universal Postal Union to one cent for each weight of two ounces or fraction of two ounces, has been issued by the Post Office Department.

THE Attorney-General has instructed United States Marshals to enforce the Federal laws in Alabama against persons charged with bulling and intimidating United States witnesses, and destroying processes from the United States Court.

A FIRE at St. Louis, August 17th, destroyed a flouring mill, a number of cars containing grain and other property worth $500,000. The town of Eureka, Nevada, was nearly destroyed by fire on the same day, 300 buildings being burned, involving a loss of $750,000.

THE Receivers of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad are cutting down expenses by suspending trains, dismissing workmen, etc. They are hard pushed for money, the whole amount to be raised during the year being $11,856,912, and this does not include money for wages nor materials furnished.

BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS, near the mouth of the Rio Grande, is reported to have been nearly destroyed by the storm which prevailed along the Texas coast on the 11th and 12th instants, and that many lives were lost. The telegraph wires being down, no communication can be had with the stricken city.

Foreign.

THE Porte has at length agreed to surrender Dulcigno to Montenegro.

THE Employers' Liability Bill has passed the British House of Commons.

DIPLOMATIC relations have been established between Roumania and the United States.

IN Mexico, the supporters of Lerdo and Gonzales are said to have combined for political objects.

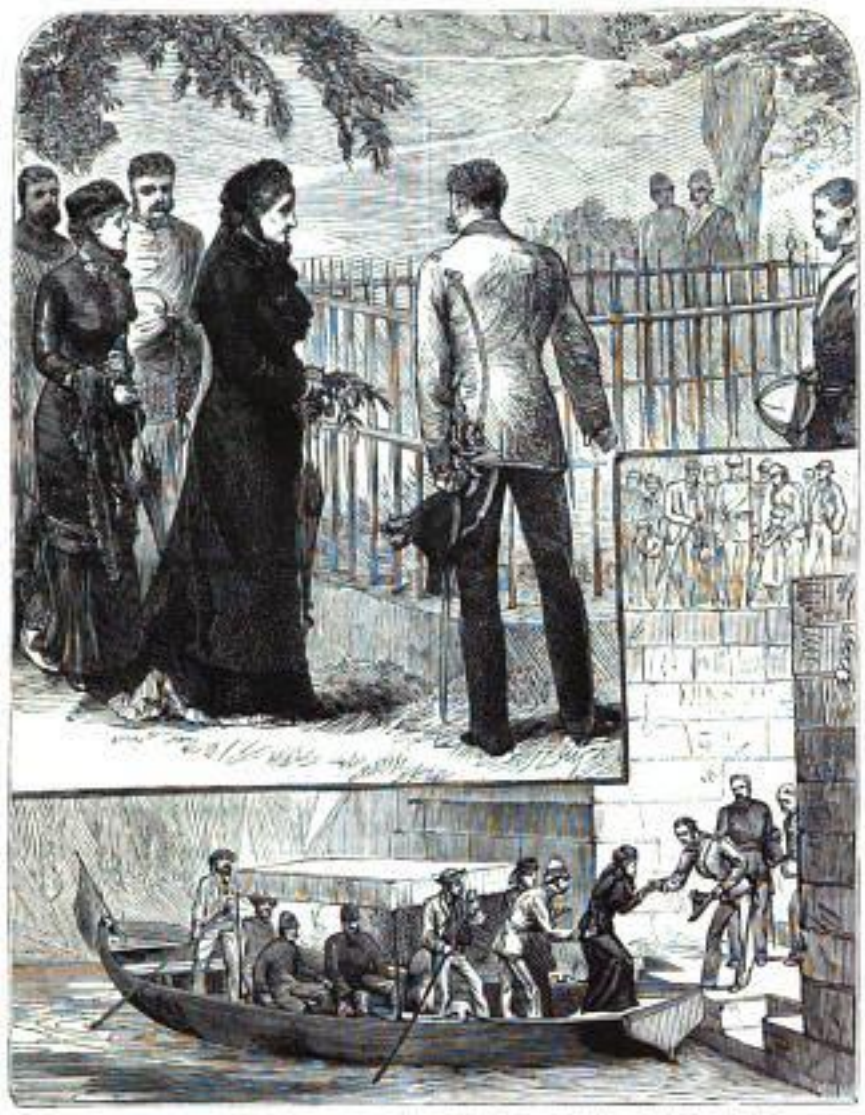
NEGOTIATIONS are proceeding between the United States and Great Britain as to the Fortune Bay affair.

PAN-SLAVIST preparations are going on for the union of Roumelia and Bulgaria in case of war between Turkey and Greece.

SENOR EMILIO CASTELAR has issued a manifesto asking his adherents to participate in the Spanish elections to be held on September 5th.

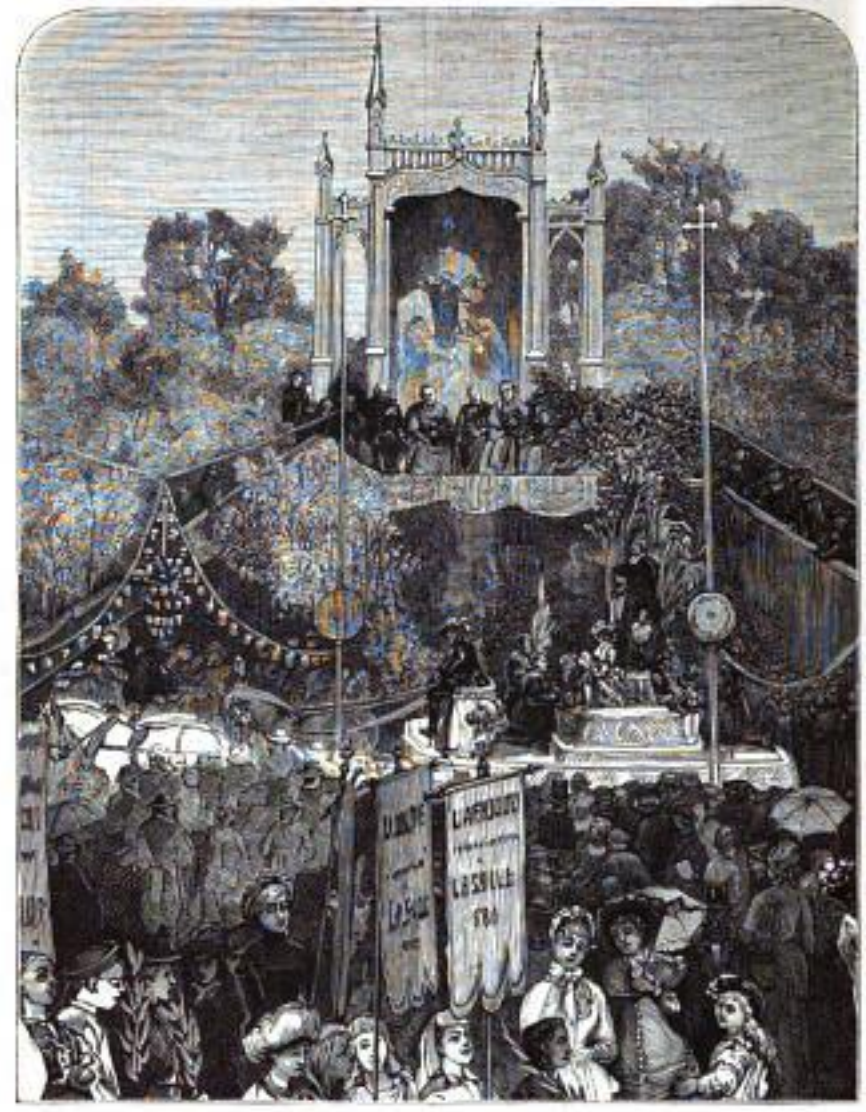
CHILI is preparing to send a larger force northward for the capture of Lima. In Lima the paper dollar is worth ten cents, and in Valparaiso sixty cents.

FLOODS have destroyed the crops in Silesia and East and West Prussia and caused immense loss of life and property. It is feared the condition of the lands will prevent sowing this Fall.



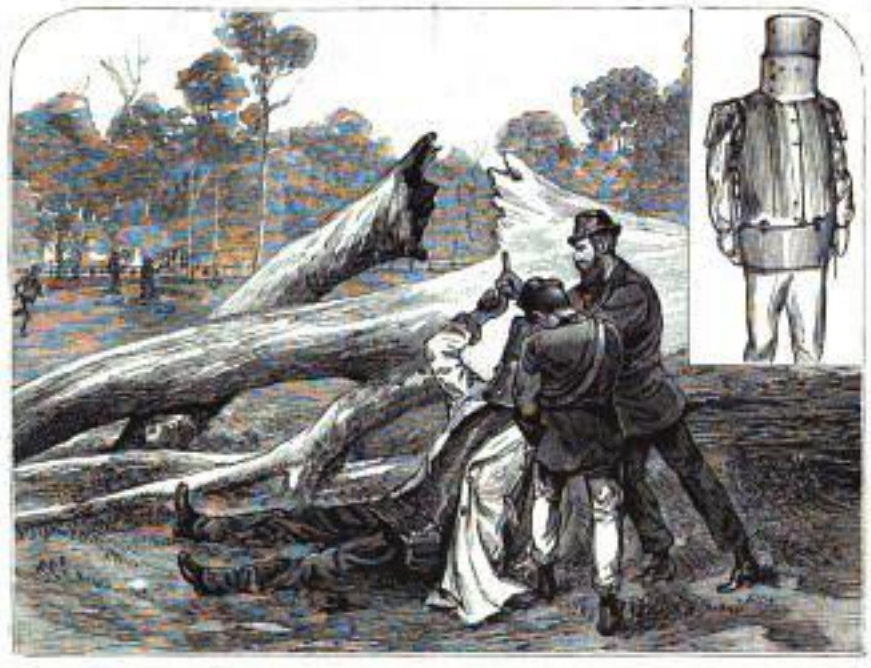
THE appointments of General Louis Melikoff as Minister of the Interior, and General Tchevrein, hitherto Director of the Third Section of the Imperial Chancellery, as his Under Secretary, are gazetted.

A BERLIN correspondent says he hears on good authority that the British proposal to enforce the decisions of the Berlin Conference by armed measures is coldly received by the Powers. Germany has already declined to participate in such intervention.

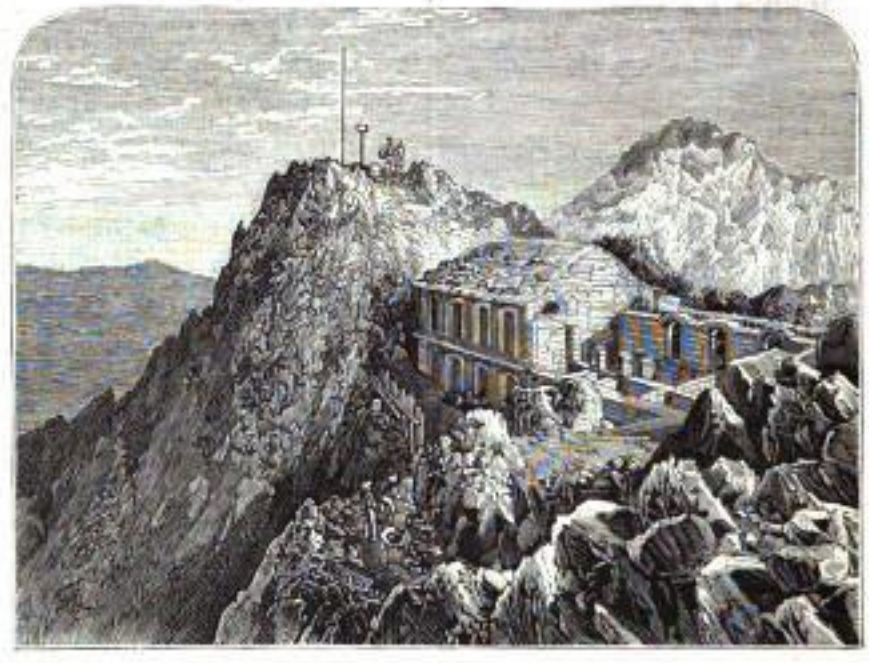


MR. ANGELL, the new United States Envoy to China, left Yokohama July 19th, in the United States ship Ashuelot, accompanied by his family. He proceeds first to Shanghai, thence northward, touching at various ports, proposing to reach Pekin about the end of August. Commissioners Swift and Trescott sail in the United States ship Richmond, intending to join Mr. Angell before arriving at Pekin.

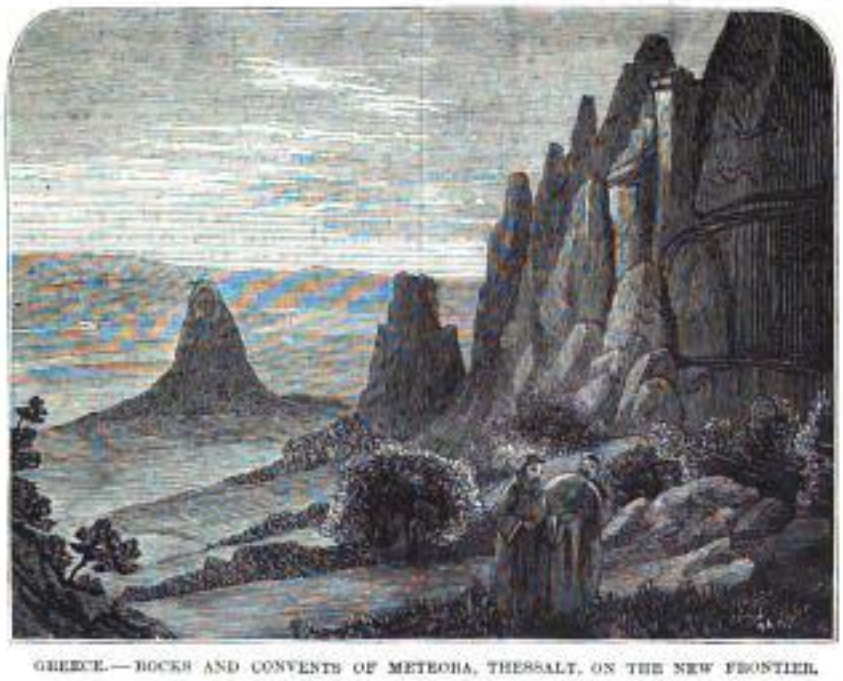
Digitized by Google



The Pictorial Spirit of the Illustrated Foreign Press.—SEE PAGE 7.



ST. HELENA.—VISIT OF THE EX-EMPRESS TO THE TOMB OF NAPOLEON I.

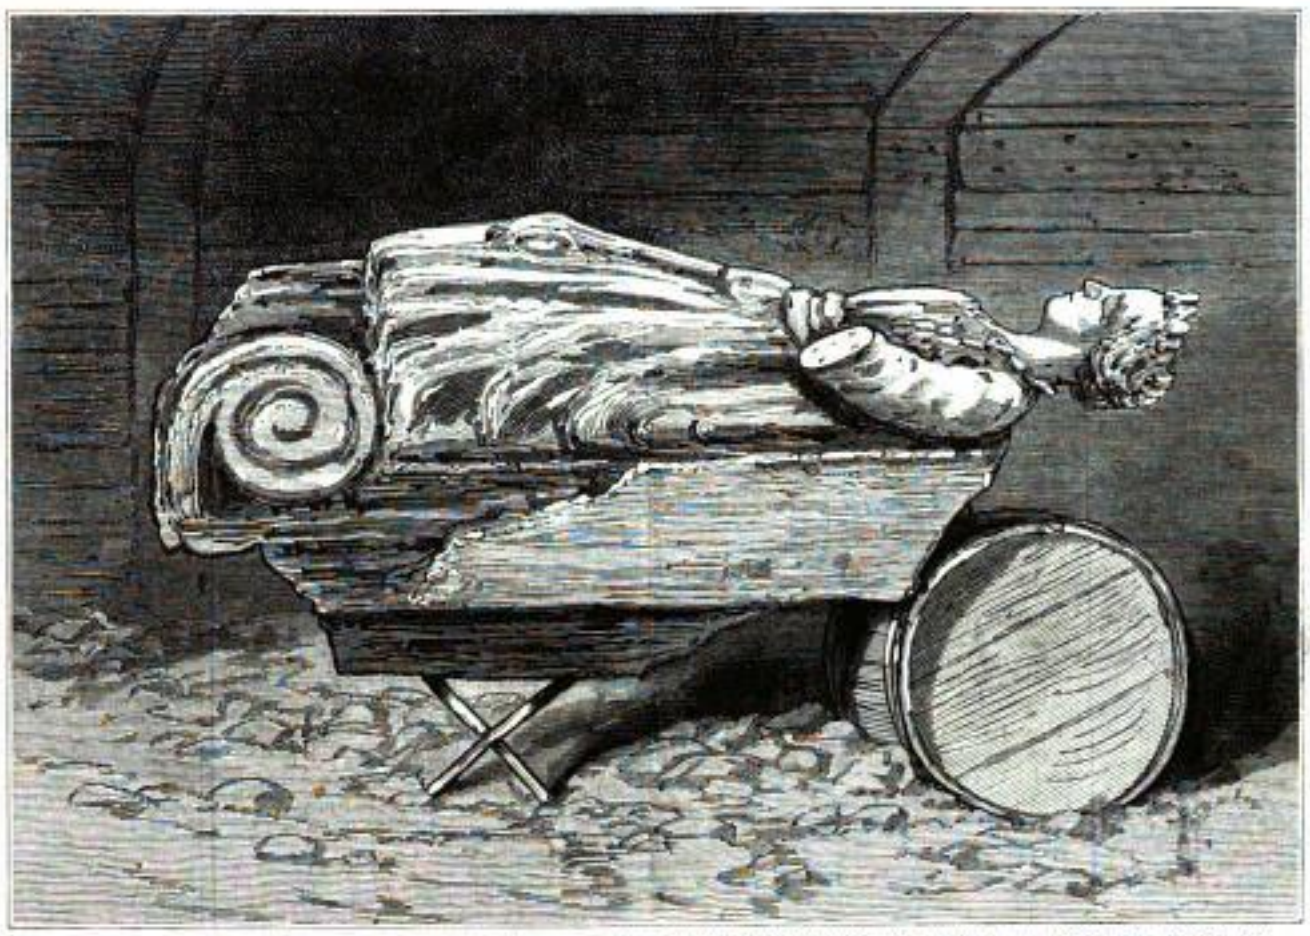


FRANCE.—THE SECOND CENTENARY OF LA SALLE, AT RHEIMS.

AUSTRALIA.—CAPTURE OF NED KELLY, NEAR GLENBOWAN, NEW SOUTH WALES.

FRANCE.—THE NEW OBSERVATORY AT THE PIC DU MIDI.

GREECE.—ROCKS AND CONVENTS OF METEORA, THESSALY, ON THE NEW FRONTIER.



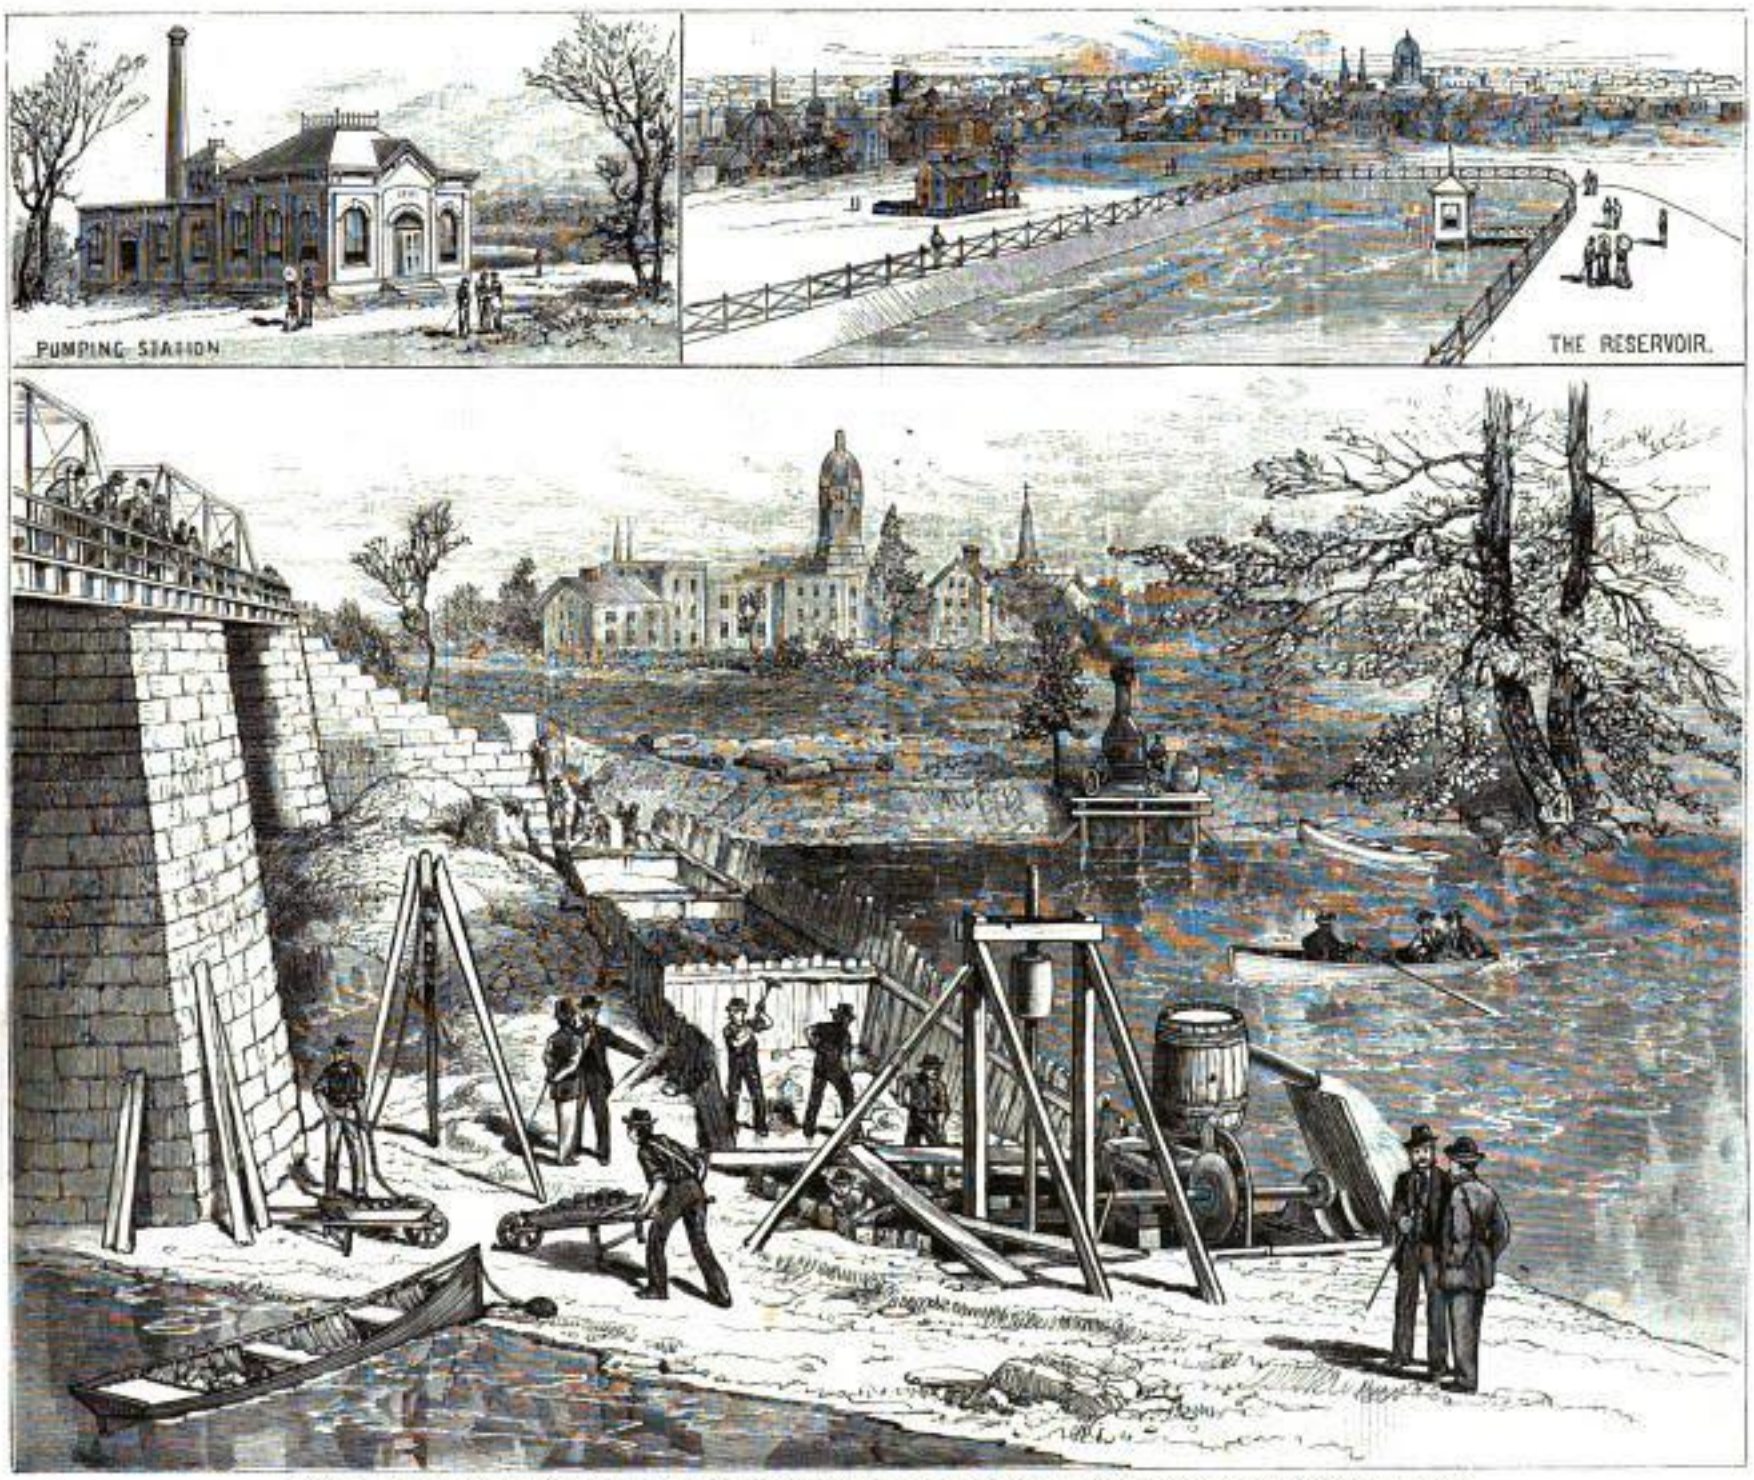
SPAIN.—THE COLUMBUS CELL IN THE CONVENT OF LA RABIDA.

Digitized by Google

THE FIGURE-HEAD OF THE "ATALANTA."

THE British barkentine Girt of Devon, Captain Grant, which arrived at St. Johns, Newfoundland, on July 29th last, had on board a large, white, painted figure-head, which the captain affirmed to be the head of the ill-starred British training-ship Atalanta. In accordance with the ordinary scale, the figure-head would exactly fit a ship ranging from 700 to 900 tons. It is the figure of a goddess, and very similar to the figures of Diana or Atalanta, as represented by Roman and Greek mythologists. It is a three-fourths length figure, with a coronal fillet on the head. The robes that flow loose and gracefully over the figure are gathered by a buckle above the knee, and a few inches below the figure is truncated and takes a fluent, wedge-like shape, where it entered the ship's cutwater. As a considerable reward has been offered by the British Admiralty for any authenticated fragment of the missing ship, Captain Grant will retain his prize till he reaches England in his own vessel.

In a carefully-executed sketch of the Atalanta that appeared in the London Illustrated News of the 26th of last April, the figure-head, as there represented, is, as to pose of body, reduced scale, size, and all essential features, the same as that picked up by the Girt of Devon. When Captain Grant first saw the floating figure, about a quarter of a mile distant, a seagull was perched on the bust. The position of the ship at the time was latitude 46 degrees 12 minutes north, longitude 22 degrees 30 minutes west. One noticeable feature about the figure-head is the evidence of great violence, either by collision with ice or with floating wreckage. The large metal bolts that fastened it to the cutwater are rudely bent and broken, indicating the application of a tremendous shock to the bows of the ship, and the lower part of the figure is broken and splintered, which tends to strengthen the theory of collision.



THE RECOVERED FIGURE-HEAD OF THE MISSING BRITISH TRAINING-SHIP "ATALANTA."—SKETCHED AT ST. JOHN'S, NEWFOUNDLAND. BY J. W. HAYWARD.

THE NEW WATER-WORKS AT FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

WE Illustrate on this page the water-works now in course of construction at Fort Wayne, Ind., at a cost of $300,000. The city of Fort Wayne lies at the junction of the St. Mary's and St. Joseph's Rivers, which here form the Maumee, and has now a population of some 30,000, with all the improvements, except a water-supply system, which are found in our modern cities. Two years ago the question of erecting water-works was submitted to a vote of the people, who decided by a large majority in favor of the proposition. After some discussion the trustees decided to use the Holly system of motive power, and engines of large capacity were purchased. Work was commenced in 1879 by H. D. Wood & Co., of Philadelphia, who had the contract for furnishing and laying the pipes. The only serious trouble they have experienced was in crossing the St. Mary's River. The pumping station is located on the northern city limits, in close connection with the settling-basin, or well, into which it is expected that, owing to the nature of the ground, enough water will filter to supply the public wants. If not, access can be had to Spy Run, a stream in near proximity. The water is forced through pipes under the St. Mary's to the southern part of the city, where the reservoir is located. The reservoir has a capacity of 300,000 gallons, and the head of water is ninety-seven feet above the city level. The water is distributed through twenty-six miles of pipe. The work—except the reservoir—will be completed in October next, when there will be a State Firemen's Tournament. The work has been under the supervision of J. D. Cook, engineer, with C. S. Brackenridge as assistant. The trustees are Messrs. Chas. McCulloch, Henry Mouning and Christian Berreker.

THE CATHEDRAL OF COLOGNE.

A DISPATCH was received in New York on Saturday, August 14th, stating that the dome of the great cathedral at Cologne had been finished, the last stone having been inserted in the finial of the second tower. The Cathedral of Cologne has been 630 years in building, it having been begun at about 1250, in the height of the religious enthusiasm in the Roman Catholic Church, when enormous edifices were required to accommodate the crowds who thronged to the altar. It is the largest example of Gothic architecture in the world, and, unlike most of the finest of the old cathedrals, its plans were designed with mathematical exactness. This has detracted somewhat from its artistic merit, and it is inferior to some of the French cathedrals, such as Rheims, the genius of the architects in the latter cases having had free scope. The Cologne Cathedral is a glorious pile, however, and it towers like a mountain above the city in the INDIANA.—NEW WATER-WORKS IN COURSE OF ERECTION FOR THE CITY OF FORT WAYNE.—FROM SKETCHES BY J. F. WING.

Digitized by Google

plate when seen from a distance. It is 511 feet long and 231 feet in breadth, and its twin towers are 512 feet high, exactly the same as its length. Up to 1530 it remained in the same state as in the Middle Ages, only the great choir and a portion of the towers having been built, the entire main part of the structure, the nave, transept and the aisles not having been begun. But, fortunately, the original plans had been found in the dusty archives of the cathedral, giving every detail of its construction, so that the work could be carried on exactly as at first intended. In 1830 there was a great enthusiasm for the monuments of the past throughout Germany, and the work of completing the noble pile was taken hold of with energy under King Frederick William III. of Prussia. It has been pushed forward rapidly, and as much has been done in the last fifty years as could have been done in centuries of the Middle Ages. The greater part of the building is really of modern construction. One of the towers contains the famous Kaiser Glocke (emperor's bell), presented by Emperor William in thanksgiving for the victory over France. The work has been done by large Government appropriations, private subscriptions, and by the Cologne Cathedral Building Society (Dombauverein), with frequent drawings of a grand lottery. The nave, aisles and the transept were consecrated in 1848, and the whole interior was thrown open in 1863.

THE TWO MISS AMBERLEYS.

WITHIN the vine-clad window two charming girls, in the severely simple attire that fashion prescribes for traveling. Without, a long, well knit, masculine figure lies perdu in the grass, face invisible, being covered by the owner's hat. To him there saunters another gentleman, dark, stylish, wide-awake.

"Hullo, Kingston! Wake up. Got something to tell you." And he unkindly draws away the sheltering hat, disclosing a handsome, angry face.

"Confound you! What makes you pester a fellow so in this warm weather?" says the victim, sitting up disconsolately.

"Did I spoil your nap? Have a cigar, instead. I wanted to tell you of the new arrival, Aggie Amberley, the great heiress, with her cousin and companion. There's a chance for you to get a rich wife, my boy!"

"Don't want one. Hang this cigar, it don't draw! A poor man like myself can't afford to marry a rich wife."

"I should say that he couldn't afford to marry anything else," laughed the other, "and Aggie Amberley is a beauty as well as an heiress. You don't often meet such a prize!"

"You had better make up to her yourself," said Kingston, dryly.

"Perhaps I shall, and leave you the cousin, who is also a beauty in another style. Hanged if I'll tell you which is which, though! And you'll never find it out from the manner of our hosts towards them. There are no worshipers of the golden calf in this house."

"Humph!" said Kingston, and smoked a few minutes in silence; then he broke out: "The man that marries a woman for her money is the meanest creature that crawls on this earth! You have money enough of your own, Preston, for your motives to be above suspicion, but as for me—by Jove! I would not marry a rich woman if I loved her ever so well! I've no fancy for the name of fortune-hunter."

"Bravo, Don Quixote!" laughed his friend. "Now, suppose we go and take a swim. You need some cooling off."

They strolled away, unconscious of fair eyes watching them.

Then said one young lady to the other:

"If that fellow does not marry a rich woman, my name's not Aggie Amberley!"

A few days later Mrs. Courtney and her guests were grouped on the lawn—the ladies with some dainty needlework, Mr. Preston reading aloud to them; Harry Kingston in his favorite position, flat on his back in the grass, working at a certain problem which had been troubling him for some days—Which was Aggie Amberley? That tall, stylish blonde in lilac silk, with pond-lilies on her bosom, or this graceful, dark-eyed fairy in fluttering white muslin?

"The fair-haired one for money! She looks more like a fashionable beauty, as Jim Preston said the heiress was. Not that charming little gypsy. Providence would never bestow a fortune on a girl with such a bewitching face. It would be too much partiality. But she don't look much like a poor relation either. I'd give a good deal to hear one of those young ladies call the other by her Christian name."

Said the fair Miss Amberley: "Aggie, have you a needleful of violet silk?"

Said the dark Miss Amberley: "No, Aggie; but I can get you some from up-stairs."

Harry fairly gasped.

Later he learned that the blonde was called Agnes and the brunette Agatha.

Then he began to notice that Miss Agatha dressed more simply than her cousin and that she was always ready to offer small services which the other accepted calmly. And one day the young lady expressed it as her opinion that riches must be a great burden, although, to be sure, Cousin Aggie had such a mind for finances! But for her part, she hoped no one would leave her a fortune.

This was said in a confidential way, with her great eyes looking earnestly into his.

"And what eyes the little thing has," thought Kingston, "they look a fellow's heart right out of his body."

After that Kingston considered his first problem very happily solved. Another had taken its place. How much money was necessary for the luxury of marriage? Jim Preston was courting Miss Agnes Amberley without any attempt at disguise. Perhaps his example was a little bit infectious. At all events Kingston and Miss Agatha were thrown much together, and their confidential talks increased in number and interest. On the last day of Kingston's visit he took a farewell stroll with Agatha. They stopped on a little rustic bridge thrown over a hollow. They were telling each other their first impressions.

"So you thought my cousin looked as if she was born in the purple. And pray what did you think of me?"

"You'll be angry."

"Oh, no, I won't."

"Well, then, I said to myself, 'What a dear little gypsy.'"

Of course Miss Amberley was not angry. She had said she would not be, but she struck her hand hard against the rough woodwork.

"Take care, you will hurt yourself. And now, may I ask your first opinion of me?"

"I thought—that is, I said to myself—'There is a man I shall just enjoy making a fool of,'" she answered, spitefully. "Oh!"

She had run a great splinter into her hand. It was very painful. Harry worked forgivingly to get it out. Just as he succeeded, Miss Amberly turned alarmingly white and murmured:

"Don't be frightened—how foolish I am—I feel like——" And but for his arm she would have fallen.

Kingston was too much bewildered to do anything but hold her tight and cover the wounded hand with kisses.

Strange to say, this peculiar method of reviving a young lady succeeded. She opened her eyes and the color returned to her face.

"Mr. Kingston!" pulling her hand away.

"Oh, if you wanted to make a fool of me," he said, gloomily, "you have entirely succeeded. I love you!"

He expected her to draw herself coldly from his hold, but she did not. She seemed quite contented where she was, only a rosy glow overspread her face, and she whispered:

"Are you sure—very sure?"

"I wish I was as sure of my eternal salvation!"

"Oh, Harry! No, you must not do that! Do you love me enough not to care whether I am rich or poor?"

"Ten thousand times Yes!"

"And—and you want me for your wife anyhow?"

"Of course I do."

"Then take me! You may kiss me now, Harry."

And he did.

"Of course it makes no difference to you," said the young lady, presently; "but you have offered yourself to the rich Miss Amberley. You needn't start so. You can't throw me over now, sir."

For a moment that was just what Harry thought of doing, but the quick tears in his companion's eyes brought him to his senses.

Voices below. Mr. Preston passed through the ravine in company with the other Miss Amberley. He was holding the young lady's hand, and her stately composure seemed for once somewhat ruffled.

"No more of this, Mr. Preston!" she exclaimed, in an agitated voice. "It is right that I should tell you it was my cousin's whim to confuse our identity. You doubtless think you are addressing Miss Amberley, the heiress——"

"Not at all," interrupted Preston. "I have known the truth all along. It is only Kingston who is deceived, and if that is all the defense you can make——"

The pair passed out of sight.

"It is too funny!" declared Agatha, leaning on her lover's shoulder to laugh. "That will be a match, too."

And it was. And the following Winter the two Miss Amberleys passed out of existence, but Mrs. Harry Kingston and Mrs. James Preston became the belles of the season.

SUMMER LIFE ON LAKE CHAUTAUQUA.

LAKE CHAUTAUQUA, possessing a dull Indian legend not worth narrating, was discovered by Tachoque, the favorite son of a wandering tribe, who named it Juduqua. The lake is fed from several small inlets and springs, and its outlet, Conewango River, lazily washes the 10,000 inhabited town of Jamestown. At its head it is three miles wide; two miles further down Point Chautauqua and Fair Point confront one another, then comes the low wooded Long Point, and then the lake widens till it resembles the Hudson at Nyack. I was informed that the lake abounds in fish, and that a ten-pound pickerel is no uncommon take. Being an old hand, I receive fishing and hunting stories, as diplomatists say, "under reserve." Woodcock were mentioned, as were also ruffled grouse, squirrel and duck. Communication between Jamestown—the seat of our most extensive alpaca mills—and the various landings along the lake, is admirably kept up by a fleet of propellers, one of them, the Jamestown, being capable of conveying 2,500 passengers. Mayville is perched at the head of the lake. It is the Chautauqua county seat, and boasts of a court-house and other county buildings, a Union school edifice, three large churches and a newspaper. When I visited the town it was fairly enveloped in a mist of lake flies, so thick as to form a dark cloud. Those flies rise from out the lake at certain seasons and drive the inhabitants almost crazy. Luckily for the natives the life of the fly is but of a few hours' duration. It is with Chautauqua, otherwise known as Fair Point—the seat of the National Sunday-school Assembly, and several other assemblies of an evangelical nature—that I have to deal. The visitor, who approaches it by water, perceives a dense grove of gigantic forest trees, with dots of white appearing here and there from between their trunks. Presently a large and pretentious building looms up. This is the Palace Hotel. As the boat draws nearer, a dock may be made out, and then he perceives statuary, and arbors, and flowers, and vigorous indications of the aid extended by the hand of man to the extraordinary beauties of nature. Once ashore and Chautauqua instantly reveals itself. It is a city of canvas, interspersed here and there with frame Lilliputian dwellings, while Brobdingnagian amphitheatres, lecture halls and churches, loom up amongst the trees in startling immensity when compared with their tiny surroundings, and above all the great forest trees keep solemn watch and ward.

The frame houses are mostly uniform as to shape, and consist of a gaping entrance wide as a church-door, Gothic in form, a railed stoop, and balcony over it. Upon the stoop and balcony the dwellers reside. It is no figure of speech to say that the Chautauqua people keep open house. The door yawns; the whole façade seems to open like a doll's-house. Everybody can tell what everybody else is doing, and the economy of space is as carefully studied as on board a ten-ton yacht. It is amusing to read "Rooms to Let," posted upon edifices consisting, to all appearance, of but one apartment, the apartment already fully occupied. The inhabitants all pose for effect, as if they were sitting to Mr. L. E. Walker, the photographer of the Point. Attitude is everything at Chautauqua, from the amphitheatre to the hammock. The cooking is done al fresco. In close proximity to most of the houses are stumps of felled trees. Upon these are pots and pans and broilers, and all the paraphernalia of the culinary department, while the fire is lighted in a niche in the stump. The odor of frying veal greets the olfactory nerves at every turn. The fatted calf is killed for these non-prodigals. The canvas dwellings are wonderfully picturesque. Some of them are decorated with devices in leaves and ferns and flowers. Canary birds hang suspended in brass cages. The interiors consist of a Saratoga trunk, a bed fit for an anchorite, an iron washstand, and a cracked fifty-cent mirror. In front, as on the stage in a booth at a country fair, stand the dinner table, camp stools, and—nothing more. People leave cozy homesteads for this sort of thing, and call it—what? I can well understand the fascination of camping out, the solitude of the solemn woods, the lonely shore, the mountain's brow; but to be in an enlarged sack in a grove where the chatter of 10,000 people only ceases late in the night, to be en évidence and to pose from rosy morn to dewy eve, "I'll none of it, my masters!"

Chautauqua is indented with ravines, one of which has been artfully embanked, a roof clapped on it, benches for seating 6,000 persons extended down its slopes, and this is called the amphitheatre. Here sermons and lectures and addresses are delivered; here is the Chautauqua salute flung out through the medium of white pocket-handkerchiefs; lighted by electricity, the night effect is weird and spectral, especially during a microscopic illustration, and the gaunt, hideous form of some unknown insect leaps into life on the great white disk. In St. Paul's Grove is the Hall of Philosophy, open à la grecque, hung with basket gardens and ornamented with busts of the ancient philosophers, grim-looking individuals all, from Plato to Socrates. This grove was dedicated to the uses of the "Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle." The Hall is also used by the Normal School of Languages. I was considerably astonished to find myself stumbling over some toy houses about two inches in height; nor did my wonderment abate upon being informed that I had upset the entire City of Jericho. For a moment I imagined myself Gulliver in Lilliput, but a signboard announced that I was in Palestine Park, and surrounded in miniature by the Dead Sea, the River Jordan, Mount Tabor, Mount Hermon, and the cities of Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethany, Capernaum, Bethlehem, and other places mentioned in Holy Writ. Quitting the Holy Land, I turned into a New England kitchen, an exact counterpart of that exhibited at the Centennial, where I found that pork and beans was the only typical New England dish to be had in this rough-hewn log edifice. Crossing to Wesley Avenue, I found myself in the great auditorium, erected beneath gigantic trees, and capable of seating 5,000 people. The stage is admirably fitted up, the decorations tasteful in the extreme. The Jewish Tabernacle, Ancient Pyramid, and Children's Temple are within bow-shot; the latter, built in the form of a Greek cross, measures 101x84 feet, and has a seating capacity for 1,500. The most important dwelling at Chautauqua, so far as the artist and I were concerned, is the tent used by General Grant when visiting the lake, and in which, owing to the courtesy of Mr. Lewis Miller—the distinguished president of the Fair Point Association—we slept the sleep of the just during our sojourn. It is very lofty, very roomy, and boasts of a parlor, bedroom and dressing-room, in addition to which is a sort of gigantic sunshade in front, forming the most agreeable apartment of all. I have paid dearly for worse accommodation in many first class hotels.

The Chautauquans are early people, very early people. We were awakened at 5 A.M. by the "Sweet By-and-by," and at 10:30 P.M. we two were the only people outside wood or canvas. Ah, yes, there were two more—lovers, who had improved the occasion by a wander in the leaky shades of the grim old trees. A night-watchman awaited their coming beneath a lamp that hung from a piece of board nailed to a tree. The manner in which that guardian of the night informed the amorous pair that it was past retiring hour was a sermon and an impeachment in one.

"Two bells ring," he informed us, as the abashed couple scurried away, "the first at 10 o'clock to tell all folks to be preparing for bed. That bell brings 'em to their quarters, and the second sees lights out. We don't want no romancing around here, and my business is to see that no couples are out after 10:30. But I never offend them; I only says, 'It's past the hour'; they know what I mean well enough."

A Chautauqua day is thus apportioned out: 6 A.M., bath; 6:30, breakfast; 7:30, normal class drill; 8:30, witnessing the exercises in the Children's Temple; 9:30, concert; 10:30, scientific conversazione in the Pavilion; 12:30, dinner; 2, lecture in the Auditorium; 4, lecture in Palestine Park; 5, blackboard exercises; 6, tea; 7:30, evening service, and then croquet, boating, fireworks, etc., till the 10 o'clock bell, and at 10:30 everybody is housed, or ought to be.

GATHERING WILD FLOWERS AND FERNS IN CENTRAL PARK.

FLOWERS! How the universal hand of man blesses them! They are wreathed round the cradle, the marriage-altar and the tomb. The Persian in the far East delights in their perfume, and writes his love in nosegays; while the Indian child in the Far West claps his hands with glee as he gathers the abundant blossoms, or, as they have been happily termed, "the illuminated Scriptures of the prairies." How eagerly the pent-up city children cull ferns and flowers, bringing them back messengers of peace to their respective arks! It is on the Spring and Summer evenings that the little ones return laden with sweet-smelling spoils; but their harvest is in the Fall, when the leaves are dyed blood-red, or russet or gold, and the ferns are like feathers worn by Queen Titania and her fairy court. Happy are they who can roam into the country and pluck ferns at their sweet will will; and unhappy the lot of the charming young girls in our illustration, who, in dread of the approaching policeman, bundle their forbidden fruit into their aprons and scamper off like frightened deer.

HON. H. B. BIGELOW.

THE Hon. Hobart B. Bigelow, the Republican candidate for Governor of Connecticut, is at present the Mayor of the City of New Haven. He was born at North Haven in 1834. The first sixteen years of his life were spent in his country home, where he led the usual life of a country boy, including the "schooling" obtainable in such localities. At the age of seventeen he went to New Haven, and found employment in the shops of the New Haven Manufacturing Company. Here he remained for two years, hard at work, and when nineteen years old entered the employment of Ives & Smith, founders and machinists. He passed in that building through successive changes, from journeyman to foreman, and from foreman to proprietor of the works. He commenced business for himself just before the war, and that period, which proved a condensed golden age to many, was not unfavorable to Mr. Bigelow. In 1861, in connection with Mr. Henry Bushnell, the inventor of the compressed air motor, he took a large Government contract for furnishing "gun parts" for 300,000 Springfield muskets. This took about three years, during which time he had in his employment 200 men. After the war he carried on his business at the same place, until its increase made a removal to more commodious quarters necessary, and in 1867 he removed to Grapevine Point, where his work as a boiler-maker has greatly increased, and where he has added to his business the construction of engines which have become well known for their excellence of make and their serviceableness.

Soon after he began business for himself his ability began to be appreciated by his fellow-citizens, and he was elected to the Council, serving therein with such acceptance to his constituents that he was elected Alderman the year following, serving one term. Eight years ago the Common Council appointed him a member of the Board of Supervisors, and he held the office five years. In 1874 he was appointed by Mayor Lewis a member of the Board of Fire Commissioners for the term of three years, and declined a reappointment at the expiration of his term. In 1875 he went to the Legislature, where he was a very popular member, and did good service on the Committee on Banks. December 3d, 1878, he was elected Mayor of New Haven by the great majority of 2,287, and has filled the office to the satisfaction of the people.

The qualities that have made him successful are industry, a mind capable of dealing with large matters, quickness in decision, "pluck," justice in his dealings with all, and friendliness. His private life is irreproachable, he gives freely of his abundance, he is kind to and considerate of his employés, and seeks to do his duty in all the relations of life.

In our next number we will give a portrait of Hon. James E. English, the Democratic candidate for Governor.

HON. DAVID H. JEROME, OF MICHIGAN.

THE Hon. David H. Jerome, the Republican candidate for Governor of Michigan, was born at Detroit on the 17th of November, 1822. On the death of his father, which occurred when Mr. Jerome was an infant, his mother went to Central New York, but returned in 1843 and settled in St. Clair County, where Mr. Jerome was educated. In 1853 he went to California and engaged in mining, but returned to Michigan in 1854 and embarked in business at Saginaw City, where he has resided ever since, and is now the senior member of the hardware firm of D. H. Jerome & Co. In 1862 he was authorized by Governor Blair to raise the regiment apportioned to the Sixth Congressional District, and was commissioned commandant of camp, with the rank of colonel, to prepare the regiment for the field. In 1865 he was appointed on the State Military Board, of which he continued a member and President until the year 1873. In 1862 he was elected to the State Senate, and served six years. During his entire Senatorial career he was Chairman of the important Committee on State Affairs. He was one of the Commissioners to prepare a new State Constitution. At present Mr. Jerome is President of the Saginaw Valley and St. Louis Railroad and of the Saginaw Street Railroad Company. He is also a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners and a trustee of the Michigan Military Academy. Religiously, he is an Episcopalian, and has been a vestryman in the Episcopal Church for twenty-three years.

An International Charity Congress.

AN International Congrès de Bienfaisance is to be held at Milan, Italy, from the 29th of August to the 4th of September, and the United States has been invited, as before announced, to send one or more representatives. The matter has been referred to General Eaton, the commissioner of education, who has invited an eminent philanthropist of Massachusetts to become the American representative. As this gentleman has not signified his acceptance, his name cannot be made public. The Congress, like its predecessors at Frankfort-on-the-Main, London, Brussels and Naples, will have for its objects the discussion of all questions relating to the administration of public charities. Among the questions under that general head to be proposed for consideration are the following: "What action may the State, the province and the commune take in the organization and administration of charities?" "Which are the most natural principles for the regulation of tutelage, the supervision and administration of charity, as well as the reforms necessary in institutions which no longer answer the objects of the founders?" "What is the best mode of distributing alms?" "What is the relation between almsgiving and the provident institutions?" "What is the best method of rendering sanitary assistance to the poor in their homes?" "How can liberated prisoners best be assisted?" "In what manner can abandoned children best be cared for?"

The Approaching Royal Birth in Spain.

NO SOONER does a Spanish prince or princess of the blood royal condescend to be born than the august little stranger is called upon to play a conspicuous part in court ceremonials of a very solemn and fatiguing character. The programme of action to be observed on such occasions has just been published at Madrid, in anticipation of a "happy event" expected to take place in the Palacio Real before the end of this month, and will doubtless be carried out to its minutest detail. According to ancient prescriptions, the lying-in chamber of a Spanish queen may not have more than one door, which must communicate with a saloon in which the great officers of State, deputations from both Chambers of the Cortes, admirals, marshals, and grandees of Spain are required to assemble when the Body Surgeon of her Majesty shall announce that the birth is at hand. This announcement is made to the President of the Council and the Minister of Justice, who are conducted by the King in person into the Queen's bedroom, where the accoucheur officially communicates to them the state of affairs. This they, in their turn, impart to the illustrious gathering in the aforesaid saloon. The assembled dignitaries then wait patiently until the royal infant "deigns to enter the world." As soon as this important event takes place, the King carries the newborn babe into the saloon on a huge golden salver, and exhibits it to all present, commencing with the Minister-President. Twenty-four hours later its birth is registered civilly, and the Cardinal Patriarch of India baptizes it in the palace chapel. Immediately after this ceremony the baby, if a boy, is dubbed knight, and invested with the insignia of the Golden Fleece.

Sarah Bernhardt's Wardrobe.

SARAH BERNHARDT is having made in Paris twenty-seven dresses for eight plays of her répertoire and twenty for general use, preparatory to her appearance in the United States, at a total cost of 75,000 francs. The following is a sketch of the most important of the dresses: For "Adrienne Lecouvreur," all Louis XV. style, one toilet with ivory satin train and front of skirt of China-blue drapery, with garlands of red and tea-roses, and Alen on lace on a pointed bodice. Another toilet of brocade silk, specially made in Lyons, with cascades of flowers embroidered on the skirt, and the bodice trimmed with Bruges lace. The goods alone of this dress cost 2,500 francs. Another déshabillé toilet, all of satin and Languedoc lace. For "Camille," a ball dress of white satin, with large embroidered camellias covering a ground which is wholly of pearls, a court train and a novel arrangement secured at the shoulder and draping at the side. This dress costs 10,000 francs. Another dress for a déshabillé toilet, wholly of Valenciennes lace and pearls. For "Frou-Frou," ivory satin dress, covered with embroidery of pearl and mother-of-pearl. One Lampas dress, with crimson flowers on a cream ground, and a crimson grain. One dress, all of black satin and jet, bow-necked, with a cuirass. For the "Sphinx," one sensational dress, with yellow satin skirt, black and jet waist, with two huge ravens upholding the skirt. A house dress of brocade silk, with crimson and pale roses on a cream ground, and ruby satin train. This dress is marvelously effective.

Digitized by Google

The World's Coffee Production.

THE four great coffee countries of the world are Brazil, Java, Sumatra and Ceylon. The data and figures for 1879 show that Brazil itself has produced an extraordinary quantity of beans. Hitherto, 250,000 tons have been considered as a good yearly figure for Brazil; last year, the export alone amounted to 273,000 tons. But the consumption of coffee in the country itself now amounts to 80,000 tons, raising the total yearly products of Brazil to 353,000 tons. Fortunately for the planters in other parts of the world, coffee has grown into a necessity in the United States, and, thanks to this, its price has risen. Although the soil of Brazil, especially for coffee culture, is very extensive, yet the difficulty of obtaining labor daily becomes greater, and this renders it doubtful whether the above figure can be much exceeded. The crop in Java and Sumatra was estimated at 94,000 tons for export; the consumption of the inhabitants, although the population is double that of Brazil, is not half that of the latter country. The production in Ceylon, though greater than that of 1878, shows a falling off when compared with former years; there were in all 41,200 tons exported from the island, the native consumption being very small. Coffee is, besides, grown in Central America, in several of the South American Republics, in the British and other colonies of the West Indies, in Hayti, Cuba, Porto Rico, Arabia, Mauritius, Réunion, and along the northeast coast of Africa, in Liberia, and the African West Coast, in Manilla, Celebes, and several of the Islands of the Pacific, and, lastly, in British India. But the total production of all these regions does not reach half of the export of the four chief countries named above.

Not Fit for Soldiers.

A SERIOUS falling off in the physical quality of the youths this year drawn for military service in the manufacturing towns of Germany is at present the subject of grave consideration at the Imperial War Office. The commissions at work in several such towns for the examination and drafting of the annual levies have, it appears, reported the results of their recently terminated labors as being of an unusually unsatisfactory character. At Barmen, for instance, 706 young men, who, upon the completion of their twentieth year, presented themselves at the local headquarters in order that their fitness for service might be submitted to the customary tests, only yielded 139 recruits for the line and nine for the guard. Of the remainder, 455 were dismissed to their homes as permanently disqualified from serving their country in arms, and 127 were relegated to the reserves of the first and second class. The main causes of rejection were constitutional debility and physical deformities. A large number of these pallid, feeble lads, moreover were found to consist of married men, not infrequently fathers of one or two children born in wedlock. This fact has suggested to the military authorities the expediency of recommending to the Reichstag, next session, a law prohibiting marriage to youths liable to army service until they shall have completed such service or attained the full age of twenty-three. The proposition, as it entails little or no hardship upon the rising generation, may very likely commend itself to the practical common sense of the Imperial German Legislature.

The Biggest Gambling on Record.

PLAY has run so high of late at the St. Petersburg Yacht Club that the most august personages in Russia have felt themselves called upon to check the gambling propensities of the reckless Boyars, whose recent inordinate gains and losses have been brought under Government cognizance. The particular episode which prompted imperial intervention was the changing of hands, within a week, of no less a sum than $3,000,000 in the play rooms of the club. More than half of that enormous amount was lost by Prince Demidoff, of San Donato, to his cousin, Colonel Count Schouvaloff—not the diplomatist, but an aide-de-camp to the Czar. This stupendous gambling transaction came to the ears of Count Loris Melikoff, who deemed it his duty to report the matter to the Emperor, craving his Majesty's permission to dissolve the club. This crowning disaster to the jeunesse dorée of the Russian capital was averted through the interposition of the Grand Duke Vladimir; but the Czar sent for Count Schouvaloff, and laid his commands upon that gentleman to return seven-eighths of his winnings to Prince Demidoff, observing that "he might be very well satisfied with having gained $40,000 at a game of cards." It is needless to say that his Majesty's orders were carried out to the letter.

Progress in Jerusalem.

A WONDERFUL change has taken place in Jerusalem of late years, and it is probably now a more comfortable residence than ever before in its history. Mr. Schick, who holds the appointment of Surveyor of Buildings in the holy city, has lately issued a very instructive report. He tells us that ruined houses have been restored or rebuilt by individuals or companies, and buildings on the Peabody plan have been erected by associations. The streets are now lighted—kept, for an Eastern city, most exceptionally clean—and the aqueduct from the Pools of Solomon has been restored, and water brought thence to the city. Tanneries and slaughter-houses have been removed outside the town. The sanitary department is under the control of a German physician. Bethlehem and Nazareth are eagerly emulating the progress of the capital. In the latter place windows are becoming quite frequent. It is asserted that there is a fixed resolution on the part of thousands in Prussia to make that country as hot as possible for Jews, and it is not unlikely that this may in a measure increase the already considerable number now returning to Palestine, more especially as the German Jews already are a power in Jerusalem. The improvements are, further, likely to lead to many Europeans wintering there.

The Chinese Royal Family.

THE present ruling house of China, if we estimate it in the way we estimate European royal families, is, as Charles Dickens observed, a "tremendous family" to provide for, as it embraces the trifling number of some 40,000 souls. Of course, this is easily accounted for, if it be recollected that most Chinese emperors have wives by the score, and consequently the number of aunts, uncles, cousins, and cousins ever so many times removed, owned by each emperor make up a rather startling figure. But, of course, nobody could be expected to love 40,000 cousins; so by Chinese law or custom all claim on the emperor's attention closes somewhere about the existing generation of first cousins. Still, as the odd 39,160 are undoubtedly of royal blood, a large proportion of them receive about a dollar a month from the public treasury, and if, within a certain degree of relationship, are entitled to wear a yellow girdle. This, however, does not in the least interfere with their honestly earning their bread, and the mess-coolie in the British legation at Pekin in 1863 was a yellow-girdled "cousin," entitled, moreover, to wear I don't know what button on the top of his very dilapidated old hat. All members of this imperial clan, however, if they get very little in the way of pension, have one great advantage—they cannot be tried before an ordinary court. A special tribunal exists to try them, and it was stated in a tolerably recent Pekin gazette, that its members got a terrible wigging for letting off some of the emperor's relations for some offense they had committed. So much for royal cousins in China. But the ladies of the palace afford the most curious paradox to foreigners, who forget that the Chinese are not the only people who make a great distinction between profession and practice. An ordinary Chinaman in China proper will tell you that women are decidedly inferior beings, and as to their having souls, pooh-poohs the idea outright. But if you remark that the whole government of the country has for the last eighteen years (with a short interval) been carried on by two ladies—the emperor's mother and empress dowager, two of the cleverest women now alive in China or any other country—he calmly remarks that perhaps they are different from other folk, and he will not at all admit that the average Chinawoman can possibly possess brains or sense. It is of no use pointing out to him that Chinese history abounds with heroines, and that cases of female pluck, ability and virtue are constantly recorded in imperial documents even at the present day.

Divorces in France.

THE recent report of the French Minister of Justice for 1878 shows that the number of judicial separations decreed in that year was greater than ever before, 3,217 cases having been before the tribunals. In 2,802 cases the demand for separation was made by wives. Classing the cases according to the social position of the parties to them, 1,575 petitions were lodged by workingmen or their wives, 579 by persons of independent property or who were members of a liberal profession, 520 by tradespeople, and 405 by cultivators of the soil, while in 348 cases no information on this head is given. It may be observed that in 38 per cent. of the cases there had been no children of the marriage, while with regard to the time which had elapsed between the marriage and the suit for separation it is stated that 16 were commenced within a year of marriage, 748 after two years, 989 after 10 years, 1,063 after 20 years, 271 after 30 years, 93 after 40 years, 28 after from 40 to 50 years, and one after 55 years. With regard to the causes of separation, in nearly 3,000 cases the motive alleged was cruelty or neglect, there being only 169 charges of adultery against the wife by the husband, and 93 against the husband by the wife. In 31 cases a separation was asked for on the ground of one of the parties to the marriage having been sentenced to prison for some criminal offense. Out of the 3,227 cases, 438 did not come to a hearing, but of the others the tribunals only rejected 283, pronouncing altogether 2,556 decrees of separation.

The Swedish Colony in Maine.

IN 1870 the desirability of Scandinavian immigration having been discussed in the Maine Legislature, a commission was appointed "to ascertain what measures, if any, should be adopted by the State to induce settlements upon its unpeopled townships." The commission made a tour of Aroostook County, and finally reported in favor of recruiting a colony of Swedes in Sweden, transporting them to Maine, and permanently settling them on the wild lands of the State.

The report provided that an agent should go to Sweden, collect the Swedes, bring them across the water, and locate them on township No. 15, range No. 3, of the State's lands. Only such as could pay their own passage from Sweden to Maine were to be received, and on their arrival in Maine each head of a family was to receive 100 acres of land. On the 23d of March, 1873, the Legislature passed an Act authorizing the experiment to be tried, and just four months later to a day the Hon. W. W. Thomas, Jr., arrived in Northern Maine with a colony of Swedes. There were 80, all told, and on their arrival upon their reservation, which was christened "New Sweden," they were welcomed by 300 Americans, who escorted them to the five log cabins which had been hastily built for them. This was ten years ago. To-day there are 517 Swedes in New Sweden, 210 in Woodland, 25 in Caribou and 24 in Perham, making 776 in the colony. Though located in four townships, the colony forms one solid block.

These Swedes now own farms and buildings valued at $53,490. Their farm productions in 1879 were valued at $14,604. They have 2,332 acres of improved land. They raised in 1879 23,000 bushels of potatoes, 8,001 bushels of oats, 4,967 bushels of rye and 1,168 bushels of wheat. They own 154 horses, 82 oxen, 264 cows, 177 calves and 295 sheep. Besides the 776 Swedes in the colony, it is believed that there are 250 more scattered over Aroostook County, and about 1,000 in other parts of the State, all of whom have been drawn to Maine by the representations of the original colonists. These Swedes are a hard-working, honest and always industrious people.

Opera in Russia.

THE Municipal Governments of Moscow and St. Petersburg are seeking to be released from the subsidies which they grant the Imperial operas every year. Since 1855, when the Emperor gave instructions that St. Petersburg should be "graciously allowed"—in plain English "compelled"—to contribute to the support of the opera, the city has voted, in the aggregate, $1,350,000, the lowest amount yearly being 28,500 rubles. Moscow is bound to furnish twice this sum annually, but it is only since 1873 that she has contributed to the expenses of the Imperial opera. Both cities are agitating for a release from this exaction, on the ground that their finances are already in a bankrupt condition. As, however, this would involve an increase to the theatrical fund derived from the Czar's own privy purse, it is believed that the petitions will be ignored.

The North Pole.

EXPLORERS have been hunting for the North Pole for a century or more, and here at last is a Baltimore child, who, under the joint superintendence of a clairvoyant and the spirit of the late Indian Chief Wampa, has seen the Pole with the mind's eye, and has written out a description of the landscape. The Pole is situated on an island, having a gradual rise from the water's edge to about the middle of it. On some parts of it appear only bare rocks; on other parts it has an abundant vegetation. About half of it, the east side, is covered with fruit trees. In some part they grow in dense thickets; in some they grow not so close together, and have grass thickly interspersed among them. The fruit consists of oranges, lemons, bananas, cocoanuts, and other tropical fruits. This part of the Pole is inhabited by beetles, white and black ants, grasshoppers, and many other kinds of insects, all unusually large; also by many different species of the monkey tribe. On the west side of the island the vegetation is not so dense. It has many tropical fruits, but the trees are small. Among the natural products are the gooseberry, blackberry, grape, currant, raspberry and mandrake. But it differs from the east side in having no monkeys, and in having vast numbers of birds of every size and plumage. Among them are the ostrich, swan, goose, duck, quail, robin and humming-bird. On both sides are many small streams. The water of these is pure and clear as crystal. The temperature of both sides is warm. It does not vary. Here the crust of the earth is much thinner than at the equator, and the temperature is caused not so much by the sun as the heat coming out of the earth.

PICTORIAL SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN ILLUSTRATED PRESS.

The ex-Empress of France at St. Helena.

The steamship Trojan, bearing the ex-Empress of France to England after her pilgrimage to Zululand, touched at St. Helena on July 12th, to give the lonely Eugénie an opportunity for visiting the tomb of Napoleon I. at Longwood. The party first visited The Briars, which is the villa occupied by Napoleon when he first arrived in the island. At Longwood, Old House, which was his principal and final residence, and where he died in 1821, after five years' detention in exile, the widow of his nephew and imperial successor staid more than an hour. She made a minute inspection of every room in the house, and seemed more especially affected by the sight of the apartment in which he drew his last breath. The very spot in which he lay in that room is marked by the erection of a marble bust, inclosed within a rail. The house was purchased and entirely restored by the late Emperor about twelve years ago. The ex-Empress also visited the well-known tomb, surrounded by willow-trees, from which thousands of travelers have plucked sprigs.

The Second Centenary of the Ven. John B. de La Salle at Rheims.

The Catholic teaching community known as the Brothers of the Christian Schools is well known in this country, where the members direct a great many of the boys' parochial schools, established by the denomination to which they belong, as well as several reformatories, and not a few academies and colleges. The organization dates back two centuries, and was founded by a worthy French priest, John B. de La Salle, who, seeing the neglect of primary education, formed a community, giving them rules to insure their proper training for teachers. The celebration at Rheims consisted in a pontifical High Mass by the Bishop of Chalons, and a Papal benediction by the Archbishop of Rheims. The panegyric of the venerable Abbé de La Salle was pronounced by the Bishop of Limoges, and several other members of the French hierarchy attended. A dinner and a historical sketch closed the exercises of the day.

Capture of Ned Kelly, the Australian Outlaw.

After keeping the Australian colonies of Victoria and New South Wales in a state of excitement and terror for nearly ten years, Ned Kelly, the leader of the famous Kelly gang of horse thieves and murderers, was captured on the 28th of June last, near Glenrowan. The desperado stood the firing of the officers for some time with the utmost indifference, a coat and helmet of metal protecting him from the shots; but when one of his pursuers, amazed at the harmless effect of the bullets, fired at his legs, he was brought down at once. The wounded outlaw was carried to the jail at Melbourne, where he was stripped of his armor, and given medical attention. It would be impossible now to give an accurate account of the doings of this gang in both colonies. Their murders are certainly numerous, and their success, heretofore, in eluding capture by the police, militia, volunteers, bloodhounds and "black trackers" who have been employed against them, is simply marvelous. A year ago the Government of Victoria and New South Wales united in offering a very large reward for their heads—the sum of $40,000—an amount equal to $10,000 for each offender.

The Observatory on the Pic du Midi, France.

The French Government is erecting an Observatory at the Pic du-Midi in the Pyrenees, nearly 9,000 feet above sea level. Last Winter was so severe that the road up to the Observatory was completely swept away, and the snow lay so long that work was not actually resumed on the Observatory itself till July. Forty-five men are now at work, protected by lightning rods, the raising and erection of which was no slight undertaking. Sand has been found in abundance, and water is obtained from the snow that is still on the peak above them. The Observatory is now more than half completed, and it is partly roofed, the tiles having been made expressly of enormous weight.

The Columbus Room in the Convent of La Rabida.

Spain treasures with care the little old Franciscan Convent of La Rabida, near Palos, and our illustration shows the room wherein occurred the turning-point of the fortunes of Columbus. He had left the Court of Spain disheartened and hopeless. No one would listen to his plans. His studies had wasted his substance, and, a forlorn wayfarer, he knocked at this convent portal to ask shelter for himself and his son. He found not only this, but in Father Marchena a man to understand him. In this room the discoverer and the friar discussed the whole project of a western voyage, and Marchena became so enthusiastic that he hastened to the Court with Columbus, and, having been confessor to Queen Isabella, easily reached her presence and pleaded the cause of Columbus, with what success all men know.

Convents of Meteora, Thessaly.

The singular rocks of Meteora, near the new Greek frontier, are seen from a great distance in descending the valley of the Peneus. They rise about a mile distant from the river—a group of insulated, massive cones and pillars of rock of great height, and for the most part perpendicular. The deep recesses between these pinnacles are thickly clothed with trees. On a nearer approach the outlines of several Greek monasteries are seen on these heights, seeming as if entirely separated from the rest of the world. The small town of Kalabak or Stagi is situated below the most lofty of these pinnacles. The situation of these monasteries of Meteora, or "Convents high up in the air," is most remarkable. A short walk from the village of Stagi leads the traveler among the strange pinnacles crowned by these convents. They form a cluster of detached rocks, separated by deep chasms, and each has a little level space on its summit, where the buildings are placed, looking like incrustations on the cliff. A colony of monks settled on these rocks, for the sake of the security they afforded, at a very early period. The six convents, still tenanted by the fathers, possess wells and cisterns, some goats and sheep, and a store of meal; but they depend for their support chiefly on charitable contributions. The convents are accessible by nets drawn up, and also by ladders of wood and rope, made in several separate joints, and let down over the face of the cliff from the mouths of artificial tunnels in the rock, which communicate with the lower parts of the buildings. At night, and when not required, these ladders are pulled up. The ladders are the most hazardous mode of ascent or descent, as they are perfectly pendicular, and swing backwards and forwards in the air with the least breath of wind. The traveler is recommended to trust himself in the net as the safest and most angelic method of ascent.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

—THE Pope has accepted the position of godfather to the expected heir to the Spanish throne.

—IN Germany, owing to the bad harvest, agitation has been commenced to prohibit the exportation of corn.

—THE staff of the German army, after successful experiments, have adopted the telephone to replace, in target practice, trumpet signals.

—INVITATIONS have been addressed to the United States asking for specimens to the International Food Exhibition in London in October.

—THE total assessed valuation of real and personal property in Philadelphia is $843,662,129, an increase of $7,601,295 over the valuation of last year.

—THE Santo Domingo Congress in extraordinary session has declared Heureaux Constitutional President. He obtained 17,398 votes out of 19,611 votes.

—LARGE quantities of printed matter have been distributed in India with, it is said, the knowledge of the Porte, tending to excite the Mussulmans against the British.

—THE herring fishing on the east coast of Scotland is the most successful on record. It has been found impossible to cure all the fish caught, and tons have been carted to the manure merchants.

—THE Jews' quarter, a very picturesque feature of Amsterdam, has been robbed of its chief attraction as vendors being forbidden to expose their wares in the open air. The enforcement of the order caused a riot.

—THE passes of officials of the State railways in India are made of gold and silver. The general manager, who has the freedom of all the lines, wears a gold pass, about the size of a $20 gold piece, on his watch chain. His subordinates wear silver.

—IT is said that at the next session of the German Reichstag the entire question of the currency will be reopened. The agitation against an exclusive gold currency is daily gaining ground. It is said Bismarck favors the re-adoption of silver as a legal tender.

—THE British Indian estimates for the year 1880-81 make the receipts £68,748,000 and the expenditures £68,319,000, giving a surplus of £417,000, and showing a decrease of £1,000,000 on each side of the account as compared with 1879-80.

—THE emigration returns from Liverpool for July show an increase of 5,300 persons, compared with July, 1879. Thirteen thousand of the emigrants came to America. All the cabins of the steamers now leaving Liverpool for New York, and for some weeks to come are fully engaged.

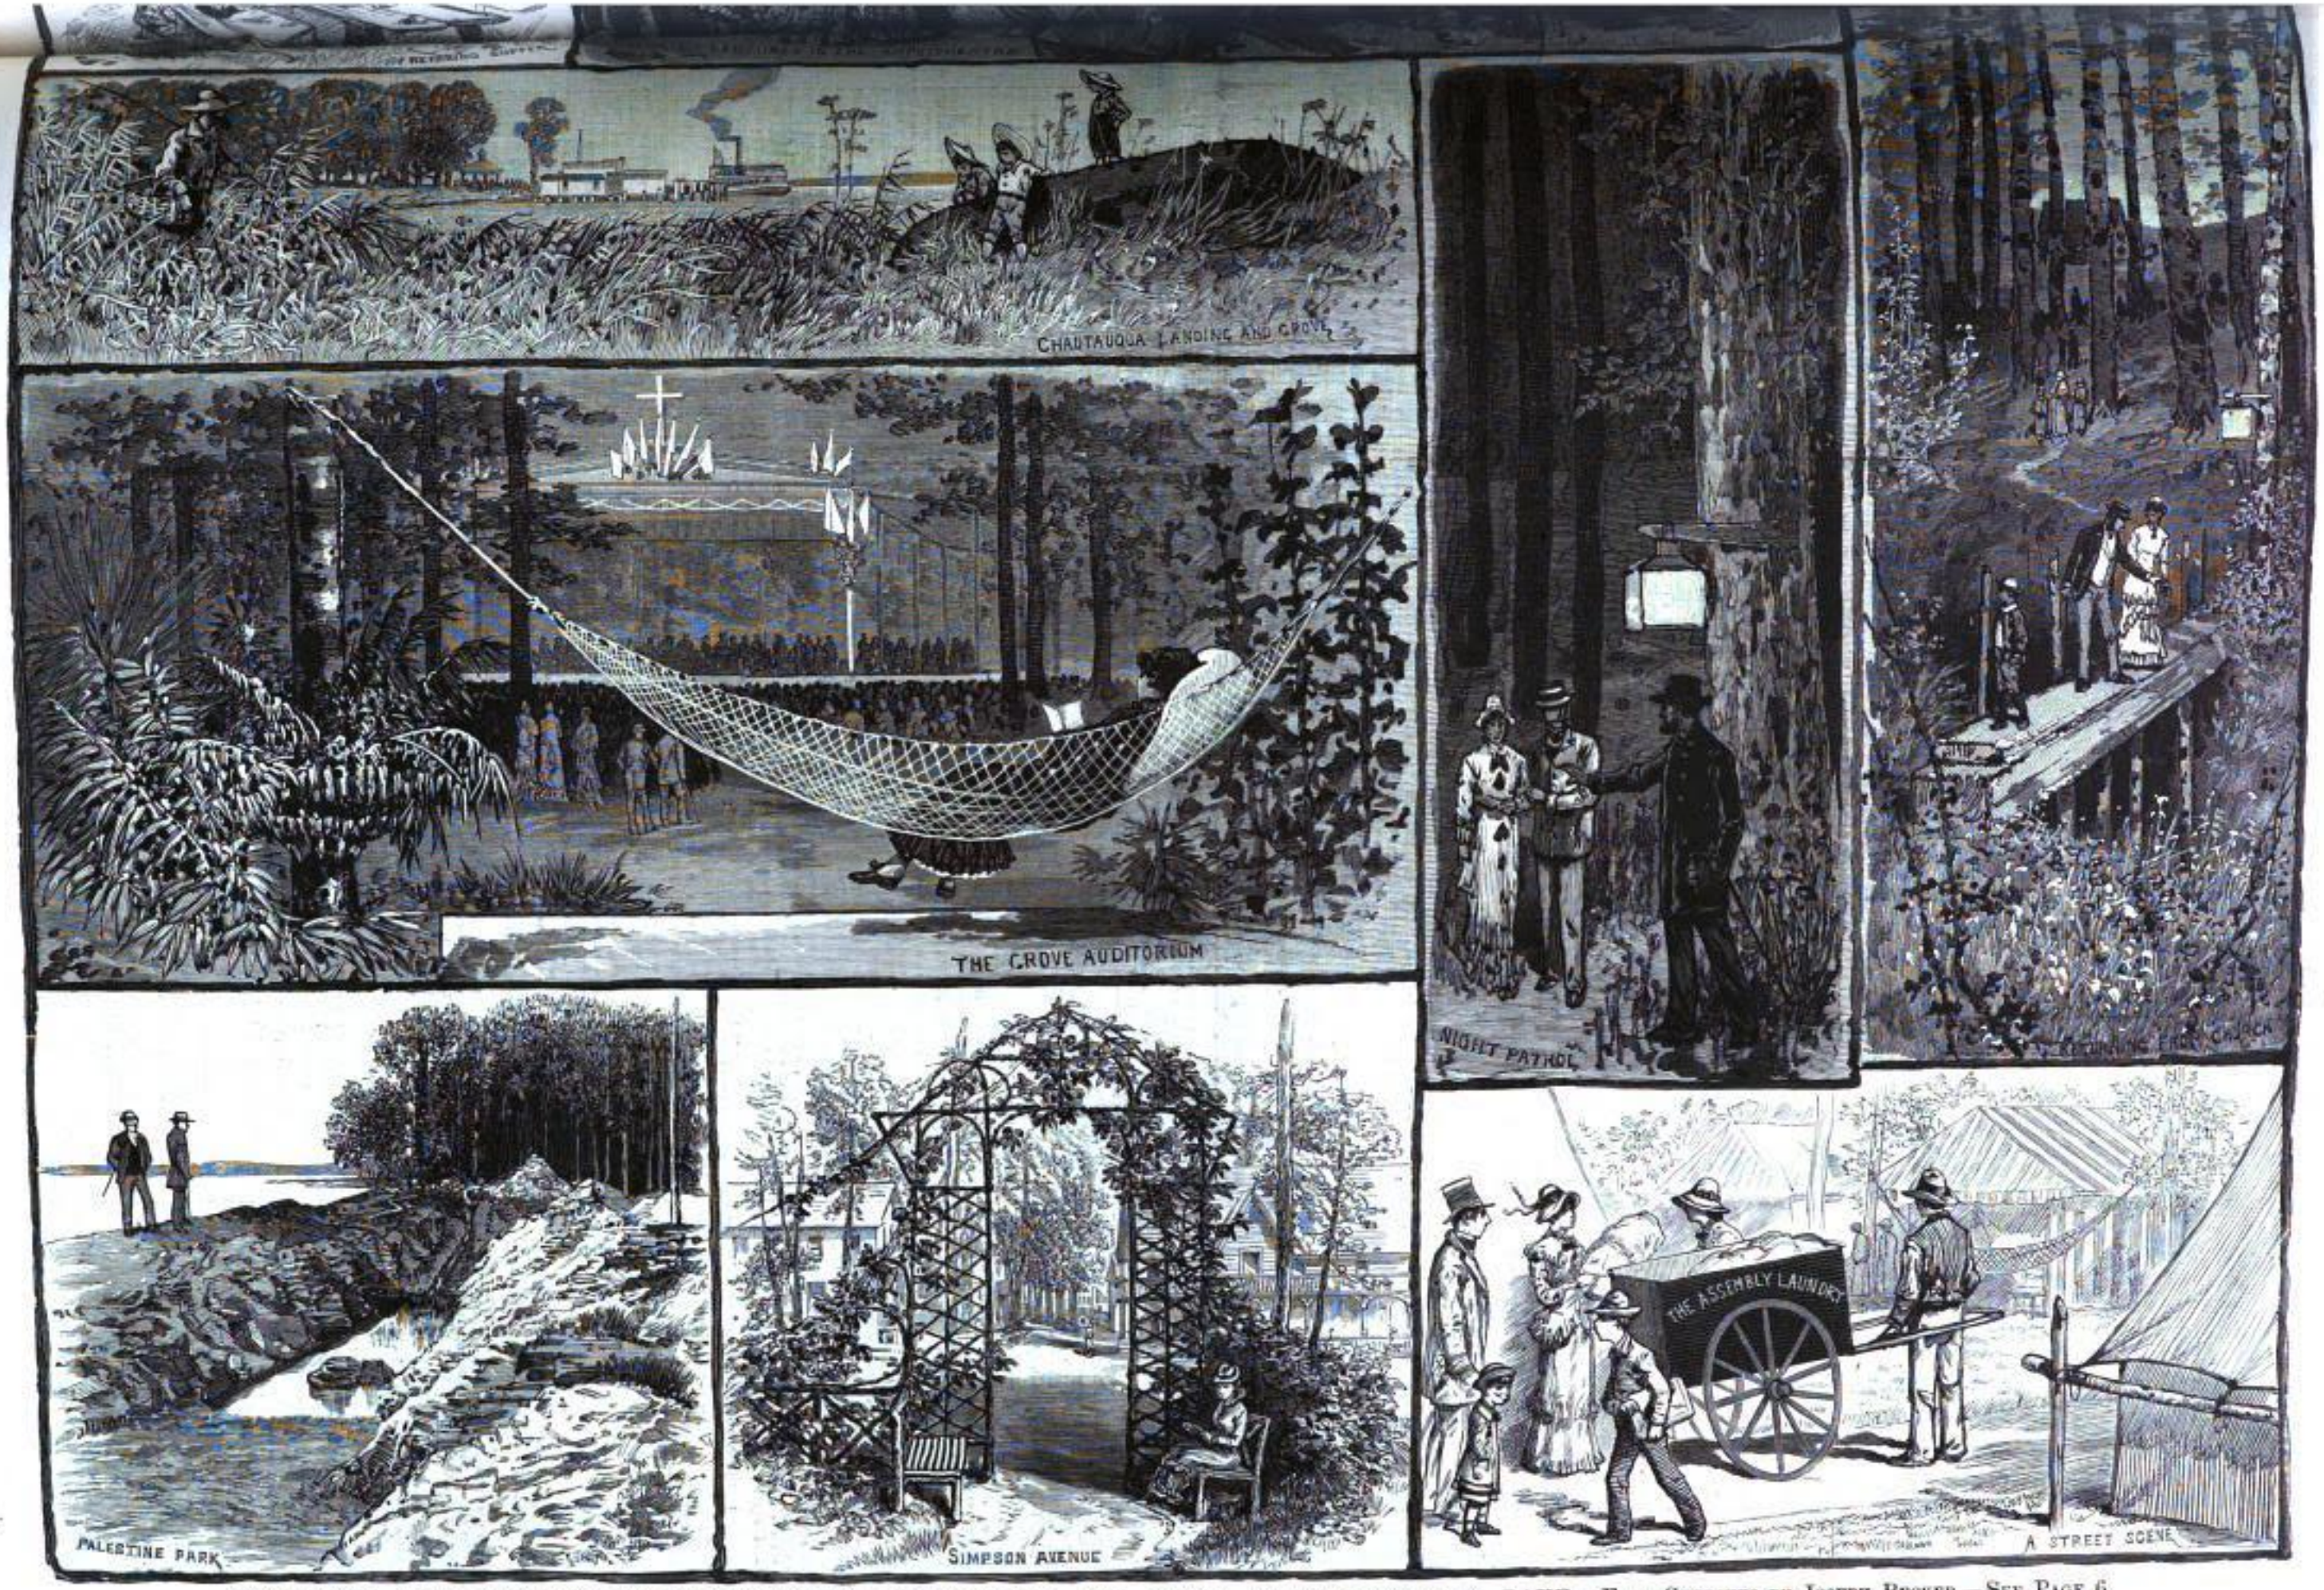
—THE British loss in front of Candahar was one officer, 200 Europeans and 700 native soldiers. In India it is thought to be hazardous simultaneously to evacuate Cabul and march General Roberts to Candahar. Ayoob Khan is occasionally shelling Candahar, but without doing much damage.

—THE Viking's ship lately discovered at Sandfiord, in Norway, has been taken to Christiania, and placed under cover in the University garden, near the old boat found at Tuneo some years ago. The damaged part is to be restored, and the colors, which rapidly faded in the sunlight, freshened up.

—THE Chief of the Bureau of Statistics reports that the total value of the exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during the month of July, 1880, were $20,803,804, and during July, 1879, $19,558,048. For the seven months ended July 31st, 1880, they were $150,411,483, and during the same period in 1879, $109,331,153.

—THE western rail connections of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, saving 100 miles between St. Louis and Louisville and the seaboard, will be completed before the end of the year, and the extension of the line from Richmond, Va., to deep water on Chesapeake bay, where the largest grain elevator on the Atlantic coast will be erected, will soon be begun.

—AT last the great Cathedral of Cologne is finished. The foundation was laid in the middle of the thirteenth century, more than 600 years ago, and the work has gone on intermittently ever since. It is perhaps the finest Gothic structure in the world. Immense sums of money have been expended on it, the mere item of repairs swallowing up a large amount. Now that the last stone is laid, there is hope that some future generation may witness the completion of the Washington National Monument.



—THERE is another change of government in Victoria, Australia. Mr. Graham Berry has returned to power, and the conflict between the two branches of the Legislature will be renewed with vigor. The Upper House is Conservative, and refuses to pass measures tagged on to money Bills; consequently, about once a year there is a deadlock, and Government officials do not get a cent for months. Then some sort of compromise is arrived at, and people are paid, but next year the same trouble occurs over again. It is injurious to the colony in many ways. This year there is a deficit in revenue.

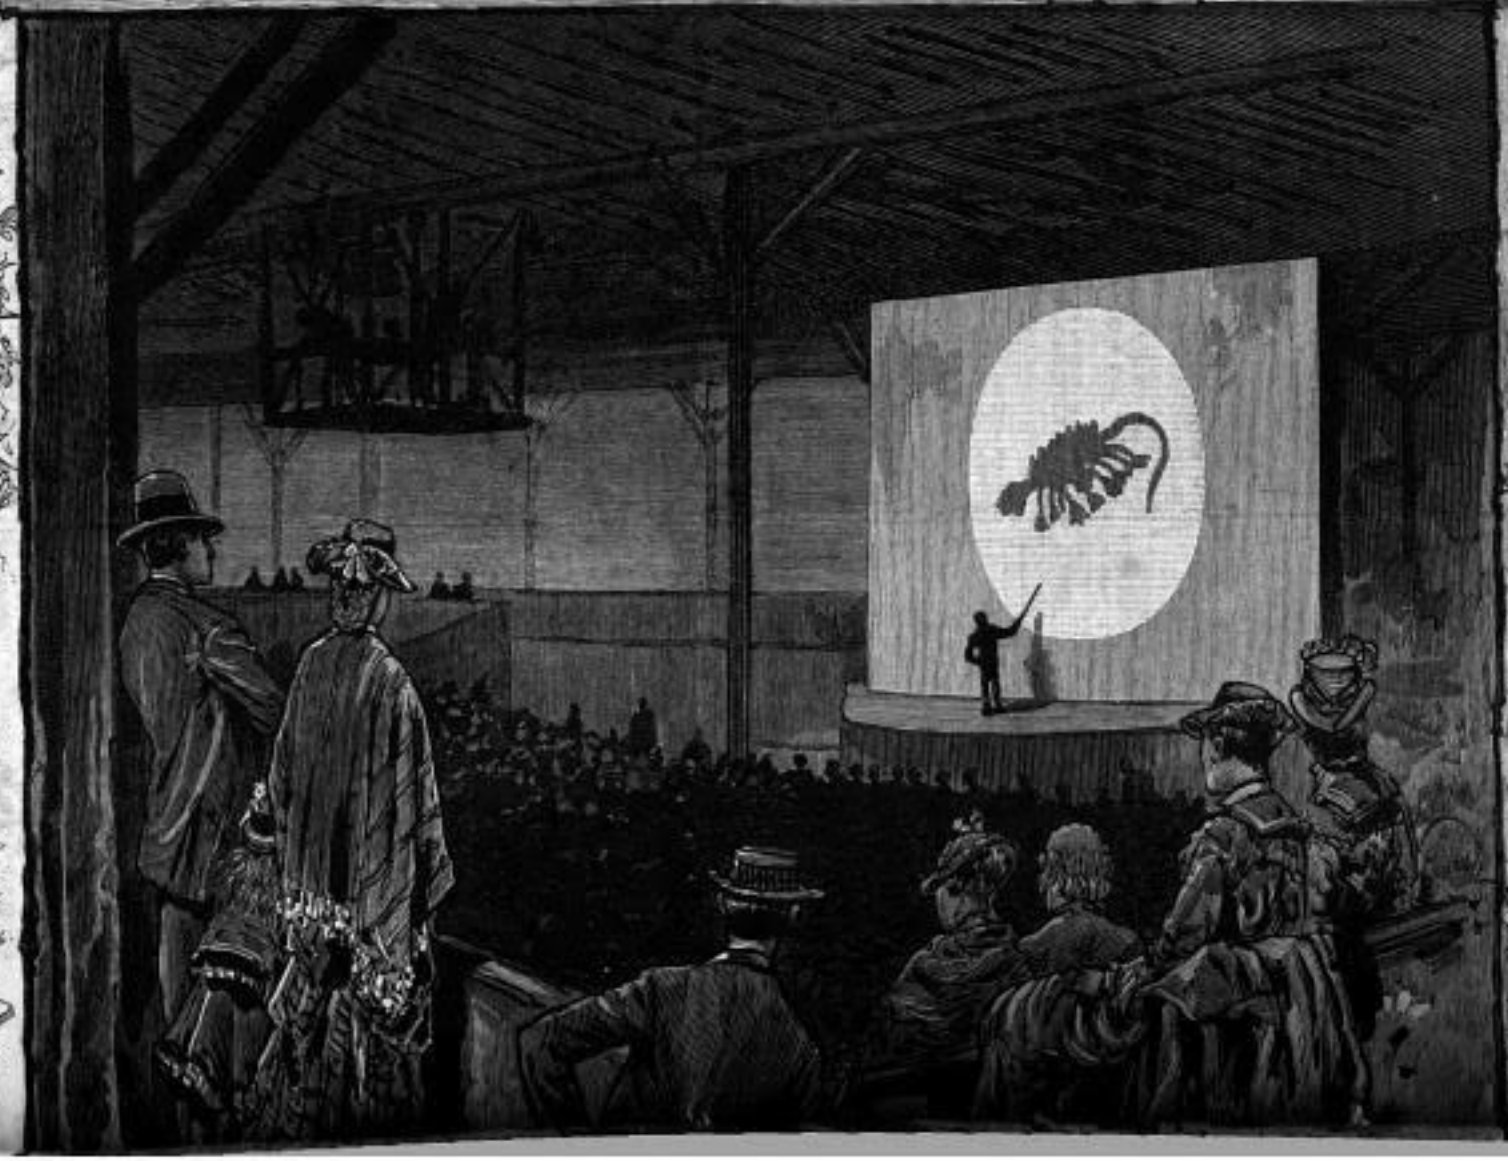
—THE following appointments for the United States have been announced by the Pope: The Very Rev. P. Manogue, of Virginia City, Nev., to be Bishop in partibus, with future succession to the Right Rev. Eugene O'Connell, Bishop of Grass Valley, Cal.; Rev. John A. Watterson, of Emmettsburg, Md., to be Bishop of Columbus, Ohio; Rev. Mr. Heyes to be Bishop in partibus, with succession to Most Rev. J. M. Henne, Archbishop of Milwaukee; Rev. Mr. Portillo, to be Bishop in partibus and Vicar Apostolic of Lower California, and Rev. James Laird Patterson to be Bishop in partibus.

—A MEMORIAL window is to be dedicated to Sir Walter Raleigh in that abbey at Westminster, under whose shadow his ashes repose, "thus adding," the subscription circular says, "a fresh link to the chain which closely unites Great Britain and her first born daughter. Raleigh is held in fair warmer remembrance by the citizens of the United States, and especially by those who now reside in Virginia and South Carolina, than by the modern English inhabitants of the Old Country, which gave him birth. Virginia hails in him the first European who appreciated the delights of that fascinating nicotian weed which is now one of the most popular luxuries of civilized mankind, and North Carolina has named her legislative capital Raleigh after him."

—PROFESSOR NORDENSKJÖLD'S discoveries are about to be utilized by Russia in a way that few could have dreamed of two or three years ago. Three steamers have been purchased in Sweden, and are under orders to proceed to the town of Semipalatinsk, near the Chinese frontier, in mid Siberia. The route taken will be round Norway, and past the White Sea and Nova Zembla to the Kara Sea and Obi River. On reaching Tobolsk they will find there several barges laden with troops and stores, which it will be their duty to tow up the Irtish to Semipalatinsk, distant a few days' march from the Chinese frontier. Thanks to Professor Nordenskjöld, Russia will be able to concentrate troops on the Chinese border in half the time that would have been considered possible a few years ago, when the difficulties of navigable Siberian rivers for military transport purposes was scarcely dreamed of by the Czar's ministers.

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK.—OUR POPULAR SUMMER RESORTS—RECREATION AND STUDY AT CHAUTAUQUA LAKE.—From Sketches by Joseph Becker.—See Page 6.



Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

SONNET.

A SHIP steers southward with a song of sails,
Cresting the billows in resistless pride;
A smiling sky dreams on the ocean wide,
And like a chart its mystery unveils.
The conquering keel defies the unborn gales;
It heeds no treacherous calm, no faithless tide,
Till rocks unseen loom up on either side,
And wreck its beauty, while the wild sea wails!

My ship of love once sailed in pleasant case,
To reach the harbor of thy love, the shock
Of storms was spared me, and a generous breeze
Drifted me onward over lake and loch,
Until my soul, trusting in tranquil seas,
Was wrecked upon thy heart's unfeeling rock!

F. S. SALTUS.

THE SCHAFFUSKIE LANDS.

BY ANNIE DUFFELL,

AUTHOR OF "IN THE MESHES," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIX. — MR. DORNSDOFF FEELS APPREHENSIONS.

COUNT TOBOSKIE has just returned to his castle after an unusually weary day with his state duties. As he enters his private apartment his chamberlain informs him that a visitor is awaiting him in the reception-room.

"I am too weary to receive any one this evening," he says, with a frown. But as he speaks he glances carelessly at the card extended, and sees written upon it "Henry Dornsdoff." His dull eyes suddenly flash with the murderous hatred that he entertains for this man, who is hounding to her death the woman of his mad love. It matters not that he believes her guilty, one sight of the famous attorney kindles a rage in his breast that it requires his utmost strength to control.

"Show him up!" he says, briefly. And in a few minutes his enemy stands face to face with him.

"You have business with me?" he inquires, coldly, and in his bearing he has unconsciously thrown all that haughty arrogance of the noble.

"I have," replies the attorney, calmly, though in his breast is a fierce tempest of rage and mortification at the manner of his distinguished host. Yet even as he suffers from his wounded self-esteem, a savage exultation seizes him; he knows that he is dragging the proud spirit of this haughty aristocrat through a hell of torture and bitterness; he knows that he has it in his power to wound him to the quick, to deaden all life for him for ever through the condemnation of the woman upon whom he is striving to affix the brand of murderess, and for whom he, with his keen insight, has discovered Toboskie's passion. In the palm of his hand he holds the fate of two lives—two lives of his hated, highborn enemies—the aristocrats.

Yet he is not quite secure of his vengeance. Knowing the fierce, unchangeable natures, where they love, of the men of Toboskie's race, he is by no means sure that Toboskie himself, overpowered by his passion, may not avail himself of his individual and almost limitless power as the ruling spirit behind the throne of Russia to save this woman from the sentence of that more inferior voice, the law. One word from this man confronting him with his icy, immovable exterior—one word, if he dared speak it, and the worst came to the worst—would deprive his fiat of legal force and efficacy and ransom his prisoner. After all his years of weary toil and degradation, this is just where he has arrived, and beyond it he can never go—in all things save brains, and there they stand face to face, he is this man's inferior and his slave. These thoughts and misgivings have prompted him to his present visit. Nothing else but a fear of his vengeance escaping him would have compelled him to place himself in a position where he was subject to the galling hauteur, the bitter condescension, of his noble enemy.

"Will you be kind enough to state your business? Be seated."

With a slight gesture Count Toboskie indicates a chair for his visitor, himself sinking into a huge fauteuil.

The cold, indifferent tones, the careless invitation, the proud bearing, all sink deeply into Dornsdoff's soul, already lacerated and embittered by envy. But with the patience of a sleuthhound he bides his time. He seats himself and turns the full fire of his sharp, swift eye upon his companion.

"Count Toboskie should be aware that there is but one matter that would give me a claim to seek him in his private character. I come, my lord, concerning the Lagors-Ashhurst case."

"I am at your service."

Dornsdoff straightens himself and boldly commences his business.

"My lord, what is to be the result of this affair?"

An icy smile fastens upon the delicate, satirical lips of the noble.

"From the fervor with which you have been conducting the case, and your discriminating intelligence displayed, it would be much more appropriate for me to make that inquiry of you, Mr. Dornsdoff," he replies.

"That may be true, my lord," responds the attorney, always in that immutable calm, though his deep-set eyes flash. "In the eyes of justice there should be but one universal fate for murderers, be they high or low; but justice is not always had in Russia." Then, changing his voice, he continues: "My lord, there is a rumor afloat to the affect that the friends of Lord Ashhurst intend appealing to you in this matter."

"I have heard nothing of that; and, pardon me if I inquire in what way does it concern you?"

"It concerns me in the same way that it concerns the whole kingdom," replies the attorney, and there is a rising inflection in his voice. "I am well aware that, after the court and the law had exhausted their intelligence upon this important matter, and rendered their impartial opinions, it is in your power to nullify their sentence; that one word from you to the Czar in favor of your fellow aristocrat would save her from the righteous doom accorded her by just and competent judges."

Where he sits in his haughty and invincible power, the statesman glances curiously at his visitor, whom he perceives is strongly agitated, despite his efforts at self-control.

"And what if I speak that word?" he says, quietly.

The attorney springs to his feet, and his hand closes tightly upon the carved top of the chair.

"It would be unjust; and the people, downtrodden as they are, would rise in rebellion!" His eyes are hot and lurid, his voice suppressedly fierce.

Count Toboskie also rises to his feet, his delicate, dark face like bronze, yet there is a dangerous gleam in his steady eye.

"Am I to construe that into a threat?" he asks, and his voice is chill, with that mortal coldness more dangerous than wrath.

"No, my lord," replies Dornsdoff, who sees that his excitement has carried him too far. "I am merely an advocate for justice, and humble and powerless as I am, compared with the——"

"We will excuse all that," interrupts the count, in icy sarcasm. "To the point, Mr. Dornsdoff."

The attorney bows calmly, though inwardly consumed with rage and mortification.

"With your permission," he resumes, "I refer you to the last execution. What were the facts? A nobleman, with as many enemies, even among his own class, as there are stars in the heavens, is found murdered in the streets. At first it is a mystery. Then upon a poor, drunken, helpless wretch of the people is affixed the crime. There is nothing but circumstantial evidence, and the poorest at that; but he is tried, condemned and executed, despite the petitions of the people, with whom he was a favorite and who knew him innocent. If ever an innocent man was hung that man was Rudolph Strakosch. And now, not three months have elapsed, ere another murder is committed; this time the crime is fastened upon one of the aristocracy. Strange, isn't it? but it only goes to show that the evidence is very great. Rudolph Strakosch, poor devil! was one of the people; Maize Ashhurst, the daughter of a long line of English earls. Against the man there was absolutely no evidence that he committed the deed, and no motive, as even robbery was not committed; for the woman, even a child could not doubt that she is the guilty one; such powerful circumstantial evidence is unparalleled. She was in Count Lagors's room that night, and it is positively proven that she was the last one with him in life. She confesses herself that she spent two hours of that night in his society. What motive took her there? She was heard to have hard words with him; and when she left the chamber, overpowered with the horror of her deed, she well-nigh fainted on the threshold of the castle. Her arm was broken, her attire very much disordered, herself undeniably under the influence of liquor. Yet it is possible that this woman may escape."

Toboskie hears in silence. He knows that what his companion has said is true—that the girl of his worship stands branded with the crime of Cain; yet he could leap upon him and strangle the life from him as one wild brute would tear another. Never has such a passion seized him as that passion with which he now yearns for this man's life. He thirsts for his blood with a tiger-lust, yet he must remain silent while, unresented, he takes upon his soul lips the name of the woman of his worship—that woman, who, by her own crime, has put all assistance beyond her.

"It is justice that we want," proceeds the attorney's voice, now cool with the consciousness of power, "and the people demand of you the exiling of this woman—demand it as their right. And if it is refused——" He pauses, and again that ring comes into his voice that rouses the noble. He looks at him steadily, and a lion's wrath shines in his eyes.

"Well," he says, "and if it be refused, what then?"

Dornsdoff returns the glance, his eyes dark and menacing.

"There will be darker doings than there have been for years in Russia," he replies.

Toboskie is fully roused, his flashing eyes measure from head to foot the thick set, bull-like figure of the attorney, and his voice rolls forth like a trumpet-call.

"And who dares differ from my judgment?" he thunders. "Who dares sit upon my actions? Who presumes to dictate, or influence, or control me?"

"No one but who would expect to suffer for it with his blood. Yet, my Count Toboskie, there are those who would even rebel at such a price against tyranny and injustice," and the earnestness with which he adheres to his cause positively dignifies the speaker. Toboskie comes nearer respecting him than at any other moment of his life.

"When you came here, it may and it may not have been your motive to dictate to me," he says, and his voice has suddenly grown calm. "I will not call your design into question, but I will say that what has passed savors strongly of threatening. Mr. Dornsdorff, you are aware that there is such a thing as rank and power"—a bitter gleam flickers into the eyes of the listener—"and I assure you that I will permit of the interference of no one in the discharge of my official duties. I have been fortunate enough to find favor in the eyes of my sovereign, and I feel fully capable of controlling the affairs of the people as well as those of the nation. Understand one thing for ever—Russia is an empire and her statesmen not of the people, and insubordination will ever be punished, as also every semblance of treason."

"As it should be," speaks up Dornsdoff, boldly, "but I do not think it disloyalty to beg for justice."

"There are different views of justice; every one is not a capable judge," replies the count, chilly. "Of one thing be assured, I shall be the dictator of my own actions, and most assuredly if I see fit and deem it proper I shall pardon Lord Ashhurst's daughter."

A light like a wild brute's flashes into the steel-gray eyes of the attorney, and his shrunken face grows warm with the hot blood of uncontrollable anger.

"Then, sir, there would be no justice in that," he cries, fiercely, "but the ignoble, contemptible partiality of one aristocrat to another——"

"You forget yourself," interrupts the count, sternly.

"I can never to do that, my lord," replies Dornsdoff, with sudden and infinite bitterness. "There are circumstances in my position that will not allow me to forget it even for a moment. But I tell you that a crisis has arrived, and if you pardon this woman the people will rise in rebellion. I am of them, and I know the spirit that possesses them. They were mad with grief at the death of their brother, and they have not recovered from it yet. If you liberate this murderess, this high-bred courtesan, their madness will take shape and method, and there will be hard days in Russia."

Toboskie's hands clinch at the appellation of shame, but his composure is unshaken; he is the statesman now, and not the lover.

"Are you aware that you are talking treason, and that I could have you put in irons for it?" he says, quietly.

"I am aware that you could put me in irons for whatsoever offense you chose to imagine," replies Dornsdoff, hotly, "but I am not aware that I am talking treason, for what I have said has been for the good of my country. I foresee rebellion, and I have but told you of it. That is my offense, I believe."

"There will not be rebellion," responds the count, in that chill, disdainful tone of conscious supremacy. "The people know too well the fate of the rebel to give way to such folly. It would be but child's play; they would be as clay in the hands of our army. But enough of this foolishness. If this is your business, I believe it is finished. And now, Mr. Dornsdoff, allow me to say that the people's cause is also my cause." A sudden realization that he has been rude fastens upon Toboskie; and the claim of guest sanctifies even this man in his eyes, reared as he has been in the stately courtesy of the noble; therefore, his tones soften. "And I shall never cease to hold their interest very near me. Mark you, I did not say that I intended to pardon this young lady; I may not even be appealed to. You seem to have magnified my importance. But I did say that if she was innocent I would not have her suffer for another's crime; and surely this should be the sentiment of every honest man. But—I believe her guilty."

